5.26.'03.

From the Library of

Professor William Henry Green

Bequeathed by him to the Library of

Princeton Theological Seminary

BS2555
.S85
1864
V.1

THE

WORDS OF THE LORD JESUS,

THE RISEN SAVIOUR AND THE ANGELS.

BY

RUDOLF STIER, D. D.,

LATE CHIEF PASTOR AND SUPERINTENDENT OF SCHKEUDITZ.

Translated By

REV. WILLIAM B. POPE.

Revised by

JAMES STRONG, S.T.D.,

AUTHOR OF McCLINTOCK & STRONG'S CYCLOPÆDIA,

AND

REV. HENRY B. SMITH, D.D.,

PROFESSOR IN THE UNION THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, NEW YORK,

COMPLETE IN THREE VOLUMES.

VOLUME I.

FOURTH AMERICAN EDITION,

NEW YORK:

PUBLISHED BY N. TIBBALS & SON,

37 PARK ROW, AND 145 NASSAU STREET.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1864, by N. TIBBALS,
In the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York.

PREFACE TO THE AMERICAN EDITION.

The attention of the American Editors, in this reprint from Clark's "Foreign Theological Library," has been chiefly confined to the translation of the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin words occurring in the pages—which very often render the meaning of the author's comments wholly unintelligible to the English reader, and to the correction of many erroneous and inelegant phrases which had escaped the notice of the translator and proof-reader in the Edinburgh edition. They have occasionally, but rarely, appended (within brackets) a very brief foot-note illustrating or modifying the author's views. Beyond this they have not deemed their legitimate province to extend. These features, however, together with the more compact and cheap form of the work, will, it is believed, be found to be material improvements in this edition.

Dr. Ewald Rudolph Stier was born at Frankstadt, March 17, 1800; he died at Eisleben, smitten by paralysis, December 16, 1862. From his birth to 1815, when he was matriculated at the University of Berlin—"the only examination to which he submitted in all his life"—his years were passed in straitened circumstances, since his father was compelled to move from place to place, in the agitated condition of German affairs. But he early showed great zeal in learning. He began his academic career as a jurist, but soon renounced the law, under Schleiermacher's influence, and studied theology at Berlin and Halle. His ardent temperament made him prominent in the Bürschenschaft, and for a long time he fell under the influence of the prevalent rationalism. His first literary productions were Poems and Tales, in which he followed the lead of the romantic school, as represented by Tieck and Jean Paul. A severe family affliction, and a renewed study of the Bible, with the aid of Bengel's Gnomon and Von Meyer's Bible-Work, effected a total revolution in his views, and he burnt an immense quantity of youthful manuscripts, and devoted himself henceforth to the investigation of the Word of God.

In Berlin his faith was strengthened by intercourse with the Baron Von Kottwitz, Von Bethmann-Hollweg, Tholuck, and Neander. From 1821 to 1823 he studied in the Preachers' Seminary at Wittenberg, under the guidance of Nitzsch, Schleusner, and Heubner. Krummacher, Tholuck, and Rothe were here his companions. Dr. Heubner said that "the Seminary had never before had such an interpreter as Stier, nor such a philosopher as Rothe." To relieve Krummacher's doubts about the canonicity of the Song of Songs, Stier in one week wrote out a striking commentary upon it, afterwards published in the first volume of his Andeutungen für gläubiges Schriftverständniss, 1824. After teaching a year in a Seminary for Teachers in Karklene, he went to Basle in 1824, to the Mission Institute, having previously been married to a sister of Karl Immanuel Nitzsch. Here he remained four years; among his pupils were Gobat, Isenberg and Lenpolt. Compelled by impaired health to quit this post, and opposed for his pietism, he passed some time in comparative seclusion, still pursuing his Biblical studies, until he was called to be pastor at Frankleben, near Halle, in 1829. Here he preached and labored with ardor; though bitterly opposed by the rationalists, he was encouraged by the friendship of such men as Tholuck, Guerike, Von Gerlach, Harnisch, and Bunsen. He developed his views upon a more Biblical style of preaching in opposition to current theories in his Biblische Keryktik. In 1833, he published a Lehrgebäude der hebräischen Sprache, and his Siebzig ausgewählte Psalmen. He read the Old Testament in Hebrew twice through, "without points." In his Gesangbuchsnoth he criticised with severity the prevalent hymnology. In 1838 he was called from his secluded parish to Wichlinghausen, in Barmen; and here, in the Wupperthal, he preached and began to publish that series of commentaries which has made his name famous — on the Epistle to the Hebrews, on James, and on the Words of the Lord Jesus, and also the first volumes of the well-known Polyglot Bible, which he edited in conjunction with Thiele. Here, too, he lost his first wife, who had been to him a constant solace and faithful help. His zeal for reform led him into conflicts with his presbytery, which, however, were all adjusted before he was compelled by bodily prostration to give up his parochial charge, and again seek in Wittenberg a place of comparative retirement. During a residence here of three years he wrote his commentaries on the Epistle to the Ephesians, on the Second Part of the Prophecy of Isaiah, three works on the Proverbs of Solomon, and a volume on the Epistle of Jude, besides completing his great work on the Words of our Lord. In 1850 he became Superintendent in Schkeuditz (between Halle and Leipsic), and in 1859 he was transferred to the same office in Eisleben; in both places he was earnest in his labors, and especially blessed in the "Bible Hours," which he devoted to comments upon that divine Word in which he found his chief delight. In 1857 he published his Words of the Word, extracted from his larger work, which were supplemented in 1859 by Words of the Lord from Heaven, and in 1860 by his Words of the Angels. His projected works on Job, and on the Prophecies of the Old Testament in Word and Type were not completed.

His literary activity is also attested by several other volumes. In 1825 he published a volume of Hymns and Poems, and another in 1845. In 1851 appeared his Private Agenda, now in its fifth edition, containing forms for all ecclesiastical services; in 1854 a volume of Evangelical Discourses. One of his main objects in life was to edit a revised translation of the Bible, on the basis of Luther's version. In 1828 he wrote on the Old and New in the German Bible; in 1836, Ought Luther's Bible to remain Unrevised? in 1842 he aided in a new edition of John Fr. Von Meyer's translation, and, after the death of the latter, he published in 1836 still another edition, with manifold corrections, defending it in 1861 by a pamphlet on the Correction of the German Bible. He was an ardent adherent of the Union and opponent of the revived extreme Lutheranism, writing in this controversy Aphorisms to Greet the Militant Church, 1847; A Confession from the United Church, 1848; and Unlutheran Theses, 1854. He also maintained that the Apocrypha should be retained in the popular edition of the German Bible. During all his life he struggled with many corporeal infirmities. His death was sudden. After a day spent in his usual labors, he was struck down by apoplexy at midnight, Dec. 16, 1862, and soon afterwards expired. A widow, and eight children from his first and second marriages, survive him. A few days before his death he said, "That it was a good thing for man to bear the yoke even in advanced life. So much better will it be to rest from our labors."

His chief work is his Words of the Lord Jesus. It has been widely circulated in Germany, in England, and in other lands, not only quickening the faith of believers, but also instructing scholars by its depth, its originality, its fervor, and its variety. His personal Christian experience, and his devout reverence for God's word, shine out on every page.

Many of the above facts have been derived from an instructive article in the Neue Evangelische Kirchenzeitung (March 14, 1863) which says of him, that "he is known as an interpreter wherever the Evangelical Church extends." "He suffered much for the sake of Christ and that truth, which he fearlessly preached in word and writing. The words in 1 Cor. ii. 12 may be applied to him with entire justice; for that full assurance of knowledge, which God gave him in rich measure, was his strength, and laid the basis of his peculiar cheerfulness and confidence in respect to doctrine, and of that straightforward purpose in action, with which he walked in the way prescribed by his inmost spirit."

TRANSLATOR'S PREFACE.

THE work which is now introduced to the English reader has been for fifteen years in high esteem among the divines of Germany, as well as of several other countries. The respect which occasional extracts have received, and the ample references to it among recent expositors, warrant the expectation that it will be no less cordially welcomed among the British churches.

No one will read it, as such a book should be read, without feeling that he is under the guidance of one who is profoundly imbued with the mind of Christ. The author's aim is the loftiest that mortal man can set before himself — to unfold the meaning and harmony of all the recorded words that fell from the lips of the Word made flesh. That the Lord's own sanction is manifestly given to the attempt, is the highest tribute we can pay to it.

The form of the work may possibly be in some respects repulsive to the reader unaccustomed to German theology. The minute subtilty of its analysis, its keen inquisition into the secret thread of every discourse, with some occasional novelties of theory or exposition, will not disparage it to the student who keeps the original text always before his eye, and understands the rare value of criticism which combines deep thought with deeper devotion. The very frequent vindication of the true meaning against fanciful or infidel interpretations sometimes interrupts the current of the exposition; but it must be remembered that the work is throughout an unwearied protest against Rationalistic opinions. These bring its own distinguishing excellencies into relief; and every work of orthodox German Theology has, as such, a strong preliminary claim to our favor.

Finally, as the Translator is not necessarily responsible for all the opinions of the original; so neither ought the original to be absolutely judged of by the translation, which but faintly reproduces its peculiar qualities of style.

LONDON, April, 1855.

GENERAL PREFACE.

Discourse—the revelation of the inner man by utterance to others—admits of a wide variety of gradation and method; and one kind of revelation may be more direct and distinctively such than another. As this is true of man, so is it also of God the Lord. He had spoken πολυμερῶς καὶ πολυτρόπως, "at sundry times and in divers manners," in past time, before as yet the Eternal Word Himself was made flesh; but now the human exegesis of the λόγια τοῦ θεοῦ, "oracles of God," can have no other or higher, nor propose to itself a loftier aim, than to repose with John, the eagle of the Church of the last times, upon the full assurance: Θεὸν οὐδεὶς ἑώρακε πώποτε· ὁ μονογενὴς υἱὸς, ὁ ὢν εἰς τὸν κόλπον τοῦ πατρός, ἐκεῖνος ἐξηγήσατο, "No man hath seen God at any time: the only begotten Son, which is in the bosom of the Father, he hath declared him."

In hearing him, and his Spirit, who takes of the things of Christ in the Apostles, we find the only sound principle for the interpretation of the ancient Scriptures which bear witness of him, and pointed to him. No historical or psychological ἐπίλυσις, "interpretation," of ours, may ever avail to empty or invalidate for us one single כֹּה אָמַר יְהוָה or נְאֻם יְהוָה, "thus saith the Lord;" but, on the other hand, whatever is recorded in the inviolable γραφή, or "Scripture," though without this preface, is regarded by us who discern the power of God in such Scripture, ῥηθὲν ἡμῖν ὑπὸ τοῦ θεοῦ, "spoken unto us by God," Matt. xxii. 31. But then we also at the same time perceive the distinction which still subsists between all the former revelations of God, and the last by his Son: a distinction which is indicated in the prophetic Scripture itself. In the very centre and heart of the revelations of God by Isaiah, which are yet waiting for their true interpretation, that, namely, which shall accord with the word of Christ and his apostles, the God of Israel promises (Isa. ii. 6), that when his people's true and everlasting redemption shall come, He himself, who spake, would be there, and evidence his presence by a new, then first openly proclaimed חִנֵּנִי, "Behold, it is I!" (comp. ver. 7 with ch. xl. 9). But the perfect theophany thus promised was to be accomplished, according to the uninterrupted testimony of Isaiah—a testimony which grows in clearness from that first עִמָּנוּ אֵל, 'Immanuel," and גִּבּוֹר אֵל, "Mighty God," shining out of the darkness, like a faint star of hope, to the very end of his closely-connected and ever soaring predictions—by him who is at once the Servant of the Lord and the Lord himself. The twelfth and thirteenth verses of ch. ii. are inseparably united, but the אֲנִי הוּא הַמְדַבֵּר, "I am he that doth speak," of ver. 6 refers back to ch. xl. 5, and also to ch. xlviii. 16. From this latter point — the transitional termination of a second main division of the entire Isaiah-prophecy — the Messianic vision emerges clear and distinct from the type out of which it grew, and becomes absolutely independent of it. Whatever system of interpretation wilfully turns back into the type again, must necessarily lose the full and entire sense of the letter itself; in which beneath Israel's deliverance from Babylon the true and everlasting redemption is pretypified, and in Cyrus the builder of the Temple is indicated that one עַבְדּוֹ יְהוָה, "Servant of the Lord," to come. Then cries the prophet, as the type and in the name of That coming one: From the time that it was, there am I; and now the Lord God and his Spirit hath sent me! Here, for the first time, the eternal Sent of the Eternal, came forward in the first person to announce himself; an announcement which grows progressively more distinct in the third great division, from ch. xlix. onwards. The emphatic suffix in מֵעֵת הֱיוֹתָהּ, "from the time that it was," refers back to the creation of heaven and earth, ver. 13 (comp. ch. xlv. 18–19), and the proper antithesis of מֵעֵת "from the time," is the anticipatory עַתָּה, "now," and הִנֵּנִי, "Behold it is I!" of the Revelation in the flesh. I, the self-same אֲנִי הוּא, "I am He," ver. 12, who was present at the beginning of the existence of all things, at that first וַיְהִי וַיְהִי, "Let there be! and there was," when the Eternal Word was with God (Prov. viii. 27 has also שָׁם אֲנִי, "there was I"), come now as Sent, and also as יְהוָה גֹּאֲלֵךְ, "the Lord thy Redeemer," ver. 17. Thus he is truly הַמְדַבֵּר, the Eternal Word, He that speaketh, not merely here by the prophets, but in the most absolute sense from the beginning and from eternity. To both these places in Isaiah,* the Lord refers in John xviii. 20 and viii. 25. The sublime and mysterious answer, in the latter passage particularly, to Σὺ τίς εἶ, "Who art thou?" of the Jews, is only rightly understood when we regard the Lord as asserting himself in the absolute ἐγώ εἰμι, אֲנִי הוּא, "I am He!" to be the λαλῶν, or "speaker," and as referring to his words, which all must hear.

Oh that all those, who, like these Jews, are still for ever putting questions, could understand and hear this answer, and all that the Truth sent from the Truth had to say and to judge concerning them and the world. Had it not been too bold, I would fain have prefixed this title to my book, The words of the Word. If, as one of the Fathers says, every act in the history of the Eternal Word incarnate, is itself Word and Doctrine — how great is the claim upon our attention, when we hear it said of him: He opened his mouth and spake! There is deeper significance in any one word of the Lord Jesus, which he himself spake (Acts xx. 35), than in all the sayings of the Apostles and Prophets. His λόγοι, "words," are the most express outbeamings of the λόγος, "Word."

But have we these words, just as he spoke them? This is the question of modern criticism, which refuses to take for granted what should, however, be taken for granted by all who believe in a revelation of the Son of God; namely, that his words cannot have fallen to the ground, cannot have dropped and been lost through the sieve of erring human composition.† Yes, we possess what he spoke. Not, indeed, in the letter of the verba ipsissima, but through the mediating witness of the Evangelists, elevated in the Spirit. Yet are they truly and essentially the ipsissima (identical), as his teaching for the world and the Church. Thou shalt know them to be such, if the same Spirit under whose influence the Gospels are written, shall explain to thee and illustrate their letter. John, the fourth Evangelist, who adheres with the least tenacity of all to the literal, original expression, gives us nevertheless, as is manifest to every one, the words of the Word in their most spiritual and living reality. Each Evangelist has his peculiar gift from the Lord, his own peculiar plan and aim in his Spirit-moved spirit; but, through the combination of all, the Holy Ghost has so wrought out one wonderful scheme, that the whole of what these four Evangelists present to us as the utterance of the Son of God incarnate, carries with it its own evidence in its perfect harmony. Alas, that it should be said of us, "Sed nos non habemus aures, sicut Deus habet linguam" (but we have not ears as God has a tongue)! —Oh that we could but read and hear!

We must assuredly read as men, what the Lord has humanly spoken, and consigned to human record. But to every man who reads as of the truth (John xviii. 37), it is given to hear and to see the glory of the incarnate word; for in these Gospels his manifestation, his life, his teaching, are truly transfigured into an ever-living and life-giving Spirit-word. It was necessary that the Word should first be made flesh, but equally so that the flesh should become spirit again; and it is as such that the Word now speaks to the world. This is the essential principle of life; from which — as an incorruptible seed — the Faith and the Church derive their being. Could we imagine — I speak as a fool — the Church of Christ utterly vanquished, and expelled from the face of the earth; yet, if one of these four gospels—and let that one be even Mark's—were to fall into the hands of conscientious and sincere readers, out of this that Church must of necessity, and assuredly would, spring up anew.

The theological investigation and exposition, even of the orthodox, has to this very day been far too much occupied with inquisition into the tradition-threads that bind together the human and the divine, with the harmonizing of the histories and so forth, leaving far too much in abeyance the task of penetrating to the substance — the words of the Lord Jesus. We are too much disposed, if not to ravel what God has woven into its thread again, at least to pry too curiously into warp and woof, into its minutest fabric and texture. But just as this answers no good purpose, generally speaking, in the κτίσις, or "physical creation," so will it not avail in the γραφή, or "Scripture," which itself is a καινὴ κτίσις, or "new creation." It is because this is not sufficiently remembered, that while we have commentaries enough upon the Gospel of Matthew, Mark, etc., we have very few indeed upon the words of the Lord which they contain.

* For the exposition of which, I may appeal to my Jesaias, nicht Pseudo-Jesaias (Barmen, 1850).

† To borrow Hase's expression, a "supernatural preservation of these archives" must be classed among "those unknown propitious circumstances" which establish the authority of the Gospels.

The latest, most extravagant criticism of the Gospels—which to many thousands of those who hang upon the lips of their Master, and live from day to day upon his words of eternal life, is nothing less than sheer madness; this frenzied infidelity is utterly unable now to hear, by reason of the raging of its fever-fantasies. Could these victims of delusion but begin to give heed to what he says to them, from his first Μετανοεῖτε, "Repent!" to all that he signified in that great cry Ἐγώ εἰμι, "I am He!"—then would the history itself in this light soon become clear and self-convincing. All right understanding of the origin of the Gospels, so far as we may understand it, must rest upon the living, believing, apprehension of their contents, which are unlike aught else in the world's history. Without the most profound exegesis of the words of our Lord, all the labor of the harmonists must be exposed to perpetual error. We find, for example, in the latest and best of them, that of Ebrard, an occasional separation of things essentially united, or sometimes an incorrect identification of discourses uttered at various times.*

To my believing brethren, therefore, I would fain administer a useful hint: Look well at what now lies under your shears; take heed lest sometimes, if not often, you be tempted incautiously to clip it even as others do. And as to these others? Unhappy men, they will be likely enough to say concerning me and my book, if it happens to meet their eyes: Here is one coming out of his dark corner again with all hardihood, who seems to know nothing of what we have long since made plain, who is bold enough and simple enough to put faith in the so-called discourses of our Lord—that marvellous medley which has been compounded under the inscriptions κατὰ Ματθαῖον, Μάρκον, "according to Matthew, Mark," etc. (we know this and can explain it all, as if we had been there)! Yes, dear sirs, you may indeed say this; but what conflict it would cost your conscience to read for yourselves, let your conscience answer. Permit me, on the other hand, to tell you in all friendliness—There are those who have given patient and industrious attention to every thing that has sprung from the lofty wisdom of your unbelief, but whose faith in the testimony of God's Spirit in Holy Writ, has not seldom found its most effectual invigoration and its most convincing argument in the self-contradictory folly of your books —the darkness of which has only served to make the others' light the brighter and more precious.

* Once more, and more earnestly than ever, must we in the second edition protest against Rauh's method of defence against Baur (Deutsche Zeitschrift für Christl. Wiss., etc.), which, with its homœopathy, is little likely to cure this criticism run mad. It is itself merely the same sophistry, though practised on the other side; the same perverse method of dealing with the word — first rending it asunder, then patching it together again. Poor Synoptics! how must they suffer for the honor of John! "The confused and fortuitous synoptical narration—evidencing but faint traces of any connection—broken threads!" Such is the style in which they are spoken of. "In helpless, perplexing nakedness" this thing or that appears in their account. A "perfectly misleading answer of the Lord, following some external sound, has wandered away" to the place where it now stands, and the Johannæan connection is absolutely necessary in order to our "understanding, in any degree, the Synoptical narrative." "Things somewhat similar are easily enough joined together," and so many things are "drawn one to another, which have no internal connection." We are told of "reminiscences, which have passed out of buried controversies into the traditional form of gnomic sentences, or rather, these sayings have been collected together out of traditions, true in particular cases, but widely dispersed." The "traces of connection" which are allowed to exist, are just enough to bind together the whole into one mechanical conglomerate. Let me be laughed at or not, let men shrug their shoulders or not, I rebuke, in the name of the Spirit of Truth, that license of our youngest licentiates which leads them so far astray as to censure and sit in judgment upon the Recorders on whose word the whole Church rests. Does not all ecclesiastical experience down to this very day demonstrate that precisely this mechanical conglomerate, these broken threads, these helpless, perplexed and naked relations and sayings which in themselves are so inexplicable, do most mightily take hold of the living and simple believer, and so inexhaustibly instruct him, that he needs no help of any of the theologians? Therefore, we hold it better to say, that wherever there is any actual deviation from specific historical truth, any transposition, dislocation, etc. (of which instances do occur, but far, far less frequently than is now-a-days generally supposed; always occurring, moreover, in non-essentials, and never involving the slightest falsification)—the Holy Ghost, the true and only traditor of this tradition, has intentionally and significantly so ordered it, with that Wisdom which we, the learned, should be willing to learn from, since it is continually and most undoubtedly justified of those simple ones, its children. I may presume, that some little theoretical and scientific justification of it, also, for the learned, may be derived from my books, if their suggestions and views are admitted by unprejudiced minds.

It will now be once more made evident that I, for my own insignificant part, belong to the number of those who, themselves enjoying the kernel, and inviting others to its enjoyment, will not allow themselves to be involved in the contests that are everywhere raging about the mere shell; who would rather sit as convivæ (guests) than as investigating and over-curious coqui (cooks), at the Lord's well-spread table; who rather take the medicine than chemically analyze it. Let others inspect the swaddling-clothes of Immanuel with even greater anxiety than the wise men of the East, my regard is fixed upon Himself, who is folded within them. But in saying this, I cannot forget that both swaddling-clothes and manger, though woven and built by sinful hands, were consecrated for him and through him. That I, in like manner, hold fast the rigid inspiration of the word in which we find and possess the Christ, yet not in the mechanical fashion of that orthodoxy which seems sometimes to gaze in blank amazement at him who was born of woman, as if he had fallen from heaven in his swaddling-clothes: this I must finally and most earnestly beg every one to observe, *on account of the persevering injustice with which I have been treated in this particular.

To construct a detailed historical harmony of the Gospels I regard as a thing impossible,† inasmuch as the testimony of the Spirit leaves behind and transcends the mere common and subordinate historical truth; and has something far better to teach us than merely when and where, and with what relations one to another, this and that was spoken or done. Who ever asks with such fond pertinacity about the date of any saying of Plato or Goethe? But to acknowledge this, and in consequence to concede willingly to sound criticism more than they at any cost are willing to do, is certainly a better defence against that pseudo-criticism which now rushes in to the assault, laboriously seeking out untruthfulnesses, in that which to all essentials is pure truth itself, and contains not a single iota of what is actually false. Ingeniously and diligently to investigate that historical element of which we have no record, may, in profane literature, be a blameless pastime of learned curiosity; but to neglect and perplex that which is given us in Holy Writ through such bye-play of inquisitiveness, must ever be a perverted πάρεργον, "by-work" (work of secondary importance), where man ought earnestly to seek what he has to do. So also while adjusting and arranging the minute specialities which are before us, to sacrifice the contemplation and ever-growing knowledge of those great momentous matters which are plainly revealed, and thus with the best intention through too much labor upon the shell, to neglect to taste, or to be diverted from enjoying the kernel, is scarcely a less perversion. There is for thoughtful criticism an uncontroverted and real basis of fact in which we have ample scope; so ample, that our very reason requires, and much more our faith, that we should not adventure upon further subtle investigations until that which we have—I do not say is fixed upon its sure external foundations, for it is given to us for a higher purpose than that, but — has passed into our whole knowledge and life. Seek we, in this matter also, the kingdom of God and his righteousness, so shall the needful critical knowledge be added unto us; and our position with relation to the Great Fact of Redemption in Christ be more like that of the Apostles.

That Jesus of Nazareth, as the Son of God come in the flesh, did, in his generation, so live, so teach, so suffer, so die, so rise again, as the four Evangelists with all their differences unite perfectly in relating, is a truth, attested to be the most certain of all certain truth by the whole history of the world before him and since, by Israel's permanence among the nations, as well as that of Christianity itself. The entire mystery of all history finds in this its centre and only solution. Similarly the longing, and questioning, and seeking of every man's inner spirit, finds here its simple fulfilment and answer—here, where all the lines so wonderfully converge, and every thing significantly tells us that the Revelation of the Divine penetrates all human individuality. Simply to accept this is no false simplicity but the highest wisdom, which reverently hearkening, in obedience of faith,

* That unjust treatment still continues—eight years after this was first written. Probably I may be able to exhibit, after a while, more clearly, in what way my rigid and yet not mechanical view of Inspiration is on either hand distinguished from the old and the new doctrine.

† [The author evidently means that all such chronological arrangements must rest in part upon conjecture, and therefore cannot have the absolute certainty throughout of explicitly connected history.—Am. Ed.]

to the Eternal Wisdom, is rewarded by the right perception of the truth which is unto salvation.

From this point of view it appears to be in most cases altogether a matter of indifference, whether this or that was spoken and done here or elsewhere. Wherever it is matter of importance, the providence of God has ordered that it shall be authentically plain before us, and be easily found by that modest and earnestly-seeking investigation, for which in his condescension scope has been left. But, otherwise, we should thankfully receive what through God's grace is written for us, remembering that the true meaning, which the Eternal Wisdom calls us to seek, lies rather in the how it is written than in the how it took place.

The spirit and design of this exposition is purely and properly exegetical; and all who, like myself, adhere firmly to this, may be justified in making it their glory. To be inveighed against by enemies, and blamed by friends, for reading and understanding the Old Testament as Christ and his Apostles read and understood it, is an honor for which one may meekly thank his God. When theology shall direct its aim to that point where "Prophecy and Fulfilment" meet together and are united in their interpretation (more entirely and firmly than in Hofmann's book, which does not fulfil the sounding prophecy of its title); then will it find no more reason to blame any simple apostolical ἵνα πληρωθῇ, "that it might be fulfilled," or any such reading of the ancient Scripture, as those of the Epistle to the Hebrews. But to be rebuked and set aside, as if acting upon one's own caprice and imposing the meaning instead of expounding it, when one only aims to let the King of Truth speak, as he is pleased to speak with evidence which breaks through all obscurity and concealment; to be rebuked for this, that one would rather take to his ears and to his heart the wonderful words of the Eternal Word in all their immediate power as they are uttered and beam forth from himself, instead of their so much prized translation into the poor and narrow language of man, with all the concomitant perversions, and endless disputations (through which process of so-called exposition the very essence of the text is ofttimes lost): to be blamed for this would be indeed a most grievous affliction, and yet one must be prepared for it.

That discussions and treatises concerning the recognition of the one object of exegesis should be exceedingly in vogue among those to whom that all-holy object as exhibited in the Gospels is not yet established as such, is as natural as it is useful. Let every man labor according to his call. It is quite necessary, indeed, that the decision as to the object of faith—"here speaks the Son of God, who preserves and illustrates to us through his Spirit, all that he spoke in the flesh"—should precede the exposition of those sayings as his. Then only when this criticism has reached its positive goal, does exegesis properly begin. But we find naturally enough among those who take the other position with respect to the Word, a system of compromise with doubt, through which even orthodox men sometimes are led to deny the faith in particulars which they acknowledge on the whole, and to mix matters with their exposition, which have no more relation to it than philosophical prolegomena on the being and attributes of God would have to the Lord's Prayer; and then to speak upon the word and round about the word, in a spirit of confused and undecided half rejection and half acceptance of its contents. But it is natural enough, on the other hand, that we should decline to term this exegesis, which speaks out of the word is given to us.

Our exegetical stand-point is not that of seeking and finding, still less that of missing here and rejecting there: but that of having. The great הִנֵּנִי, "Behold it is I!" of the revelation of God in the flesh, of the spirit in the letter, has become to us of all certainties the most certain. Let us be permitted on our part, while so much license is given, to speak as we believe and because we believe; out of the word, not round about it; according to its own peculiar system, not according to the system of any science, theology, or philosophy, nor of any dogmatics or confession; not translating it into any heterogeneous form of speech or of thought, and not raising again upon every point the discussion of the possession of our sure and certain foundation. Nor let it be thought unbecoming, that in order to such hearing and acceptance, we offer with all solemnity what should be heard and received by the entire man. All sound exposition of the Divine word of salvation must, at least, have a hortatory element, for that word itself is hortatory throughout: in these pages there is not the smallest paragraph which simply ministers food to our critical curiosity. Nothing seems to us more unnatural than a certain dead, dry handling of the Word of life — never speaking from the heart to the heart — which is called the "purely scientific." But just in this manner does our falsely-boasted science in its latest fashions—which, after all, are more or less scanty and pitiful, with their "πίστις" (faith), and their "Jahve"—run along its course side by side with the living confession of the Lord in the faith of his church. The Bible has never failed, since it was given, to speak for itself without the assistance of the learned; and it produces in its believers a believing apprehension of itself, without which it would long ago have gone the way of all waste paper. In its application to preaching in the church, it has ever preserved its living power, and ever will: there is the exegesis of the Spirit at home. If the mere professor (who sits so comfortably upon his master's chair, whereas he ought to feel himself obliged to stand in the pulpit before "the Established Church" [sic] of the only Master and Lord) cannot use his wisdom in preaching, nor minister therewith to those who do preach, then is that very fact the most decisive testimony against such wisdom.* For the Bible is not, once for all, a mere old document for the learned, but a text for the preacher to the church and the world, ever and inexhaustibly new. Here do those emanationes scripturæ, which Bacon referred to, flow freely forth; not in the wranglings of commentaries, whose Mishna and Gemara confound and obscure the student with the text itself, so that the word, before it can be read, is utterly prevented from speaking by its own exposition.

I have not, as already said, neglected commentaries, whether believing or heterodox; but I have, with still more diligence, for now about thirty years, sought out, collected and put to the most living use in my own heart and ministry, the immediate emanations of the living word. I avow publicly before God and the world that all the theology and criticism of the age, whether infidel, or one-fourth, one-half, three parts orthodox, has since then only served to strengthen and confirm me in my joyful boast: I know in whom I believe. I know that what I read and possess in the word will remain when the world passes away; and that its slightest sentence will prove a better dying pillow than all else that man could conceive or possess. I know that to interpret to the world the words of the Lord Jesus is the loftiest task of human teaching or writing. The Lord is my witness that I approached it, in the publication of this book, with solemn diffidence, being deeply conscious that here and there error might too probably have intruded. Much even now may have escaped my most conscientious revision, which found (I must confess) little to retract; but these "Discourses of the Lord Jesus" have, as a whole, since then received the confirmation of a large circle of the faithful, whose acknowledgments in many ways rendered, of the grace and truth which they contain, I can thankfully lay at the Lord's feet.

In his name, then, let this book once more go forth, and let all men everywhere, who cannot accord with what they deem my too rigid adherence to the written word, hear once more a testimony, which, thank God, is still unchanged: I read the canonical text of the Bible as written through the Holy Ghost; but I so read it, not because I have framed for myself beforehand any inspiration dogma about, or have devoted myself as a bond-slave to the old dogmatic theology; but because this word approves itself with ever-increasing force as inspired to my reason, which, though not indeed sound, is through the virtue of that word daily recovering soundness. It is because this living word in a thousand ways has directed and is ever directing my inner being, with all its intelligence, thought, and will, that I have subjected to it the freedom of my whole existence.

The great and fundamental deficiency of nearly all learned exegesis, with which mine must for ever differ, is its misapprehension of the depth and fulness of meaning which, in accordance with its higher nature, necessarily belongs to every word of the Spirit. Though believed to be the word of God, it is treated superficially and on principles of partial and one-sided deduction, just as if it were the word of man. In the endeavor to understand it that depth is not explored where, from the one root of the "sensus simplex," the richest fulness of references spring up and ramify in such a manner, that what upon the ground and territory of its immediate historical connection, presents one definitely apprehended truth as the kernel of its meaning, does nevertheless expand itself into an inexhaustible variety of senses for the teaching of the world in all ages, and especially in the Church, where the Holy Spirit himself continues to unfold his germinal word even to the end of the days. While this applies to every word of the Spirit in its several measures, to the words of the Word it applies without measure to an extent which eternity only will disclose. Many of Christ's utterances make upon the most obtuse mind the overpowering impression of a mysterious, superabounding amplitude of meaning. If others, even the most part of them, appear in their slight drapery of proverbial, Rabbinical, parabolical forms of language so humanly simple; yet approach them closely, contemplate them in their ever new applications to various times, and they will be so transfigured before you, that you will cease to deem it incomprehensible that the Church through the process of centuries of reading and preaching, has never grown weary of them, or that this word, in its unchangeable might, has triumphantly lived down all the fleeting words of men. If all that enlightened preachers have found for their preaching, or believing readers have found for their edification, in any one parable or any one single ecclesiastical Pericope (lesson) could be collected and comprised in fit words—that would be the entire exegesis—so far as this might be possible before the words in futurity shall unfold perfectly its own yet more perfect meaning.

* "A minister who for many long years has drawn edification from the Word of God for his people, may well have sometimes a stray thought, of which a professor of theology need not be ashamed"—so says Theremin in his Abendstunden, with significant irony. I will be more bold and severe, and maintain, that the professor of exegesis often puts forth notions at which the preacher instructed in the living use of Scripture must blush.

In the words of Christ all the scattered and intersecting rays of truth extant in humanity are collected and blended into the full and perfect light of day. Ἐγὼ τὴν ἀλήθειαν λέγω, ἐγώ εἰμι ἡ ἀλήθεια, "I speak the truth, I am the truth"—he cries, standing in the midst of Israel, and in the centre, therefore, of all nations. The preparatory, prophetic word, finds its end and goal in the word of Christ: the apostolical word rests upon him as its foundation, and is in him already in its rudiments performed. To grasp and illustrate in all their significance the entire relations of his perfect revelation—to Judaism, such as it was when the Lord came, compounded of the truth of God and man's inventions; and to the elements of truth scattered in heathenism which he confirmed, as well as to all the errors of the Gentiles which he condemned—is the right province of sound theological science. True philosophy, that is, the self-consciousness of humanity and its history, can only reach its perfection through a profound understanding of these. For Christianity, or to speak more correctly Christ, is not indeed that Deus ex machinâ (mechanical Deity) which inspires the false speculation of historical inquiry with so much affected horror; but that to which old Hippocrates, with all his art, was after all constrained to do homage (at the close of his treatise περὶ ἱερῆς νόσου), as the point to which all the eminent in science come back, though without at first understanding what he meant—that πάντα θεῖα καὶ ἀνθρώπινα πάντα, "all divinity and all humanity," finds its full realization only in him, who is the God-man; whose מוֹצָאוֹת, "goings forth" (Mic. v. 1), according to his humanity mount upwards to Adam, as according to his divinity they go up to the bosom of the Father. The Son of God enters into history as the Son of man; and all history has been made by the finger of God to prepare for him, and to aspire towards him. But to embrace this wider field in our comprehension, which indeed before the fulfilment of the mystery of God and the second revelation of all the secrets of that which we too readily dignify with the name of "history," can only approximately be done, is not the more immediate design of exegesis in its stricter sense; although this alone will ultimately set the seal of completeness upon the interpretation of the entire manifestation of Christ, and more especially of his word. In the mean time true exposition suffers the light which is concentrated in the sun of personal truth to shine immediately upon it, and understands Matt. iv. 17 without the help of any Rabbinical מַלְכוּת הַשָּׁמַיִם, "Kingdom of Heaven," as also Matt. xxviii. 19, John xvi. 13 to 15, without the אָדָם קַדְמוֹן, "first man," or the אֲרִיךְ and אַצִּיל אַבְּדִיךְ (זְעִיר אַבְּדִיךְ) "long-suffering and quick-tempered," of the Cabala, and without the Triad of Plato or Philo. Hearkening with open ears, it immediately attests that only which Christ testifies: and every man can then, according to his ability, go forth from Christ to understand the world and history, and returning back again find rest in him. Let this be understood as spoken in explanation to those, who find wanting in our book the usual derivations into Christianity from its connection with the teachings of the age. We deny not that connection, but we much prefer to regard the derivation as proceeding in the opposite direction, not from the age, but into it.

Let the word of Christ explain itself. This is and must ever be a matter of fundamental importance, and we would fain hope at least to assist many a reader to gain this central point for its understanding. But that for sinful man with his infirm reason, there is now no other understanding of divine things than that of faith, in the sense of the scholastic Fides præcedit intellectum (faith precedes intellection), and of the Pauline αἰχμαλωτίζειν πᾶν νόημα εἰς τὴν ὑπακοὴν τοῦ Χριστοῦ, "bringing every thought into subjection to Christ," so that the private judgment must submit itself to the heart's experience through faith—let him dispute either with God or the devil who is inclined to do so; let him contend against it in his Edom-wisdom who has a mind to be dashed to pieces by this stone of stumbling. To show that on the other hand faith also has an ever-increasing understanding of its own, and need not be abashed before any pseudo-reason whatever, (which, indeed, it alone can help out of its πρῶτον ψεῦδος, "original falsity," into the γινώσκειν τὴν ἀλήθειαν, "knowledge of the truth"), is the proud design of this little contribution of ours—a design which, in the name of the Most Lowly, known to heaven and earth, and in opposition to all the proud, we dare openly to avow. But as to those who believe in the Lord, and yet through a pernicious and false science, either cannot or will not bow to that miracle of the Holy Ghost—the sure transmission of his life and words in the Gospels, which are the central word of the whole invisible Scriptnre, may the Spirit of Truth bear more and more convincingly his own witness to his own testimony, which tolerates no correction of man!

They are but hints, after all, which are now offered—with all their diffuseness they are nothing more. For the author is deeply conscious that upon no one single word has he done more than very partially draw out that fulness of meaning, which is vaster than the ocean and deeper than the abyss. Yet it may be hoped that the reader will find many things that will abide with him, and bear to be further worked out. The apology which in the first edition here stood for the imperfect form and presentation of the work on account of little and fragmentary leisure, may be repeated, so far at least as concerns the first part; for this second edition goes forth amid the duties of a very unpropitious official situation. Yet have I, as it will be seen, done my best to review, revise, and supplement the whole, with especial reference to what has appeared since or was overlooked at first, so far as this could be done without too much altering or enlarging the book.

To those of my dear readers who call the Lord Jesus their Lord in faith, I give my brotherly greeting. All others may the Lord himself greet at the outset with his own most solemn words, words which blend his loving kindness with their severity: Ἐὰν γὰρ μὴ πιστεύσητε, ὅτι ἐγώ εἰμι, ἀποθανεῖσθε ἐν ταῖς ἁμαρτίαις ὑμῶν, "For if ye will not believe that I am He, ye shall die in your sins." Do they still ask, Σὺ τίς εἶ, "Who art thou?" there is both answer and advice in his reply: Τὴν ἀρχὴν ὅ, τι καὶ λαλῶ ὑμῖν, "The same that I said unto you at the beginning." Hear these his words to you, so shall you apprehend who he is, and what you are, and further learn to cry — Lord to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life, and we believe and are sure that thou art Christ, the Son of the living God; that thou art indeed Christ, the Saviour of the world.

Isa. lii. 6:

כִּי־אֲנִי־הוּא הַמְדַבֵּר הִנֵּנִי׃

I am He that doth speak: behold it is I.

PREFACE TO THE GOSPELS OF MARK AND LUKE.

When wicked men were about to condemn the Holy One of God, with intent to murder the Prince of Life, he, whom the Father had sanctified and sent into the world, with deep humility putting himself on a level with us, appealed to the principle of their divinely-given law: "In the mouth of two or three witnesses shall everything be established." He did so as if even he, when lying under a weighty criminal charge, must yield to such a testimony, should it be found consistent. He refers, however, much more to the double and yet single testimony borne by himself on behalf of his own person and cause; the testimony, viz., of the Father and of the Son. For of course it is only God himself, in the person of the God-man, who convincingly attests himself to the world. When this testimony was, after the resurrection and ascension, completed and glorified by the Holy Spirit, it re-appeared still as a divinely human testimony in personal forms. First and foremost, every one was such a witness who had received power from on high to see and hear, in whom the risen Saviour lived. But even at this early period the Apostles occupied a place of special prominence: We are his witnesses. They spoke what they had seen and heard, as those who had been with him from the beginning, during the whole time that the Lord Jesus had gone out and in among men, until the time that he was taken up into heaven. From this time onward they told of his deeds, they reproduced his sayings; the Church of believers received the impress of the life and word of her Lord with increasing zeal and enjoyment, in the full strength and depth and assurance of the life which it had received in and from him through the Holy Ghost. Then the Evangelists and teachers particularly were confirmed in their office—an office bordering on that of the Apostles, and the object of which was to retain sure possession of a treasure which they guard with tenderest reverence and warmest affection.

This is the brief first period of the fresh stream from the opened fountain—apostolical tradition held in the strength and assurance of the Holy Ghost as he brings to remembrance, and explains the truth; dwelling as he then did in the whole Church; teaching some to recount and teach, and others to retain and preserve. This is the ground and soil out of which our four Gospels grew. For, inasmuch as this first fresh life in the earthen vessel of erring sinful humanity was exposed to the constant danger of perishing, without an objective κανών, "canon," it was fitting certainly that the revelation of the Eternal Word which had taken place in flesh should also be made in writing, for the Church of all ages, and for the whole world. The Lord who is the Spirit, therefore, chose and prepared special witnesses in order that his cause might again stand, for all faith, and against all unbelief, in the mouth of two, three witnesses; nay, he added yet a fourth witness, thereby superabundantly completing his plan. The Church was enabled by the same Spirit to recognise the gift thus bestowed upon her; and she has continued to possess ever since the self-testimony of her Lord in the writings of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John.

These sacred writers did not avail themselves of each other's works according to the common practice of book-making; but they drew from the one common fountain of the stream which was still flowing on mightily in them and around them. It is thus exactly in accordance with the principle which appeared in the God-man himself, that in them also the Divine is at the same time individually human. This fourfold composition sets before us, in inseparable connection, the two things: viz., the most perfect unity of the facts related, through the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, on the one hand, and the most perfect freedom, and personal life of human composition, on the other.*

So far as we are concerned, we abide by the ancient conviction that the order of sequence of the Evangelists, which has scarcely ever varied since their writings were put together, depends upon the order of time; in this order of time, however, there is involved the order of the Spirit, progressing and developing as it advances to the close. In propounding the view which we take of this matter, we find that on the whole we agree with Lange, who has in this case, to a certain extent, the merit of having been the first to point out the right way. Would that he had not, in particular instances, by the arbitrary procedure which influences so many of his views, again extinguished the light which he had kindled!

The publican, called to be an Apostle, is the first who was raised up to testify, against the scoffing Scribes and Pharisees, that Jesus had been proved to be the Christ, and had entered by suffering into glory. The first word is in the exercise of long-suffering patience addressed to Israel the first-called: Matthew writes for the Jews in their own language. He takes care, however, within a longer or shorter period, by furnishing a free spirited translation, of equal value with the original, that no interpreter shall, on his own responsibility, translate his Gospel into that language of the world by which the Hebrew was to be so soon supplanted.† This is our Gospel according to Matthew, in which the Apostle and eye-witness, so ingenuously confident, so free in spirit, and yet without making one mistake even in the smallest word, fashions into form the first firm kernel out of the living tradition; a Gospel which no criticism, except one which knows how to penetrate in faith to the depth of this origin, can avail either to own or to understand. "He is the first who played upon the sacerdotal trumpet:" this expression of Origen has more in it than is at first apparent. The current appropriation of the cherubic figures to the four Evangelists is certainly false: that introduced by Lange is alone correct, according to which Matthew is represented in the sacrificial cow, and Luke in the man.‡ The first evangelist shows us the Messiah; but this means the great deliverance, redemption, and expiation of a lost people and world in the person of Him who has come (chap. i. 21, viii. 17, xx. 28). This is the fundamental thought lying behind all; here, at the same time, we may freely say that Matthew royally sublime, majestic and unbiassed, wielding imperial sway, testifies of the King. But we shall immediately have more to say of him who (chap. ii.) was rejected in Israel: this tragic conflict and issue, related in the light of Christian faith, the existence of which is taken for granted, is the first history which leads us out from the Old Testament into the New.§

Israel proceeds to reject his King; and the kingdom is given to the Gentiles. For the election's sake the seed of Abraham still has its right given to it; after that the Gospel goes to the heathen. The same Peter who uttered the first word in Jerusalem was here also the first to be employed in this work of transition. He himself, who represents‖ not so much the Jewish Christians as the transition and exodus from them, was less called to write than to speak the Gospel; he merely furnishes, therefore, his son Mark with the apostolical material for a second Gospel, intended in the first instance for the use of the

* Or, as Lange says: The relation of the four Gospels to each other is a mystery, on which criticism has expended much hard labor, and which can be understood only when we come to acknowledge that the most perfect inspiration is one with the most perfect freedom of the individual; so that the unity of the different witnesses demands, in its highest strength, the purest individual difference of the testimonies.

† The idea that Matthew himself translated his Gospel is in itself not a very absurd one, as is evident from the example of Josephus. Thus writes Delitzsch in the Luther. Zeitschrift, 1850, 3. He very truly remarks, that in the well-known passage of Papias it is manifest that at the time of that account, no one, so far as he knew, was any longer under the necessity of translating for himself the Hebrew Gospel: The whole treatise, thoroughly understood, leads to the above-mentioned result: viz., that a Hebrew original had been authentically translated.

‡ The sequence referred, in the first instance, to the life of Jesus, "the cow, the man, the lion, the eagle," according to Oetinger (in Auberlen, page 284 ff., 319 ff., 465), is a complete blunder—the subject spoken of being the "labor of the ox."

§ It is amusing to true Protestants to read, that Sepp, a man of no real scientific acquirements, notwithstanding his immense superficial knowledge, degrades the first Gospel and assigns it to Philip—all in the cause of the Romish suppression of the Bible, and with a view to give Peter the first place (Leben Christi, vii. 71 ff).

‖ Finally, however, in his second epistle, and when in the prospect of death, he testifies his oneness with the beloved brother Paul, the Apostle of the Gentiles. Scripture torn to pieces by pseudo-criticism, and history turned upside down, teach now certainly something different; but it is not real scripture and right history.

Romans. Mark is Peter's true son in power; corresponding to the figure of the lion of the cherubim, he exhibits before his readers the mighty acts and works of the Son of God —in clearly defined and on that account more powerful forms; in lofty contrast to Roman might, which knows nothing and effects nothing except what is earthly—a style of composition in accordance with the genius of the Roman mind. As Matthew, partly owing to his disposition for argument, and partly on account of the task assigned him, had already given prominence to the sayings, these in Mark's Gospel retire into the background. Still, there is many a striking particular introduced from the more exact knowledge of Peter for the sake of elucidating those sayings, and to heighten the pictorial effect of the histories already recorded in Matthew; for, with these the reader is supposed to be acquainted. Mark, therefore, is not to be placed after Luke:* he relates as the second, yet unbiassed witness, along with and next to Matthew, drawing his incidents from the one fountain of apostolic tradition.

Luke occupies another, and also in the development a later stage; although we are to conceive of the sequence of time in this first development as following in quick succession. We refer with pleasure to the well-grounded statements of Lücke,† which are very striking, at least as regards the point from which they set out, and which we accept in order to draw from them more definite conclusions. The Gospels of Matthew and Mark certainly belong to the first kind and grade of evangelic composition, the pure collection of tradition; here, however, we claim the really "pure" collection for the authors of these Gospels. "The Gospel of Luke occupies a higher grade:" here, again, we make our own reservation in regard to the little word "higher," which other people, perhaps, understand differently. "Here more attention is paid to connection of time and event; here we find a fruitful commencement of ecclesiastical research and description." All very true, so far as I see; although I must conceive of the "Gospel formations" of these grades very differently from Lücke. Suffice it that the third Gospel shows an advance upon the former two; it therefore justly occupies the place after Mark in genuine historical order, even though the commencement of the new arrangement may have taken place altogether at the same point of time. We find here a leaning on Paul, corresponding to that on Peter; for it was needful that the two of the Evangelists who were not Apostles should stand upon a sure apostolic basis. Here the transition to the Gentiles is, for the first time, quite completed; for, to write for Greeks (as all the Gentiles at that time were designated, in opposition to the Jews) was a still further advance towards general humanity. Now Luke, a Greek by birth and by nature, wrote, as is evident, not merely for Theophilus (he may have lived either at Rome or anywhere else), but for the Greek Gentile world. Thus in the third Gospel there is completed the progress of the testimony for the world onward from its commencement at the first rejection of the Messiah by Israel, as narrated in the first; up through the intervening member, the imposing manifestation of might, as detailed in the second; and thus this third Gospel, a εὐαγγέλιον σωματικόν, "bodily Gospel," became acknowledged as a sure foundation. The Evangelist to whom must be given the appropriate cherubic figure, the human form, shows us the most beautiful and the most gracious of the sons of men, the Saviour born to us, the Friend of Sinners, the Physician of Men, the grace which appeared in him calling and alluring all nations. The character of Luke corresponds in a peculiar manner to what is now called the human character; this principle being that which was represented by ancient Greece.

At the same time, at this stage we find manifest evidence of an active appropriating inquiring spirit. The researches of Luke, which, bearing as they do the new stamp of the Apostle Paul, and now no longer rooted in the tradition of the first chosen Apostles, take a deeper hold upon the Gospel of the past infancy of the Church, and a wider grasp of the era then just commencing; an era in which it was of importance to blend firmly the subjective conviction of the individual, won over as a catechumen, with the tradition of the Church, which was already losing its unbiassed character, and when an ἀσφάλεια περὶ ὧν κατηχήθης λόγων, "certainty of those things wherein thou hast been instructed," because necessary for the ἐπίγνωσις, "knowledge." This is exactly the historical and no less the symbolical character of his dedication to Theophilus and his prologue. These λόγοι, words, as the subject matter of ecclesiastical κατήχησις, "instruction," are not a mere system of doctrine, which must, of course, rest upon a history, but also and especially the history itself, which had been handed down by tradition, including, of course, the words of the Word. They are the πράγματα, transactions ("things"), which might certainly be called to the end of time πεπληροφορημένα ἐν ἡμῖν, "most surely believed among us," but whose διήγησις, "declaration," even at the time when Luke wrote, had begun to be multiform, and therefore uncertain.* Still, Luke does not in reality blame (it is only the Spirit that does so inferentially through him) those who had begun what they had undertaken; his design in his ἔδοξε κἀμοί, "it seemed good to me also," is to clear himself and to add to what had already been done. "He has found in general that these treatises agree with this tradition" (Lange). He is therefore, on his part, less conscious than the others are of the inspiration which guides him in his inquiries and his composition." So far is he from desiring to be henceforth regarded as "the first censor and critic of the Gospels previously existing," that he has even "conceded the imperfection of the synoptical Gospels!"† No, he is well acquainted, especially with Matthew and Mark, and fully acknowledges them, the αὐτόπτης and ὑπηρέτης, "eye-witness" and "minister" (for these are the very classes which they respectively represent). But, because other αὐτόπται καὶ ὑπηρέται had also παρέδοσαν, "delivered," what was not equally authentic; and further because the accounts of this additional matter had already begun to be of various kinds, he brings forward his contribution with the most scrupulous assiduity; and the Spirit elevates it to the rank of a third Gospel, and allows the other productions to disappear in the Church. He has investigated ἀκριβῶς, "perfectly," everything (πᾶσιν, scil. πράγμασιν, as is manifest from the παρακολουθεῖν, the usual expression for this), even up to the ἄνωθεν of the ἀρχή, "the very first." In him we make acquaintance with the evidence of criticism: and he himself, in his continuation of his πρῶτος λόγος, "former treatise," in the Acts of the Apostles, has given to all later criticism a sure safeguard; directing it to conceive of Church history, down to the present day, as growing out of the life of Christ as we have it in the Gospels: this is the origin of the Church, and the producing cause of the apostolic foundation of the Church. Even at the present day it is found that the Gospel according to Luke and the Acts of the Apostles are the portions of Scripture most suitable for Bible classes, where the object is to re-establish the ἀσφάλεια περὶ ὧν κατηχήθης λόγων, or certainty of catechetical instruction.

* As Clemens Alexandrinus, alone against the unanimous voice of antiquity, asserts, and as Guericke again maintains. Many in the present day follow them in this (Thiersch, in his Versuch zu Herstellung, etc., which recently he has not retracted in the Kirche im Alterthum); Delitzsch assumes it as a "certain admitted result;" we, however, do not agree with them, but claim for Mark the second place, though on other grounds and in another sense than Hilgenfeld. We cannot say more in this preface.

† Kommentar über das. Ev. Johannis. 3d ed. vol. i., p. 201.

These are the Three; who after a long period were joined by a fourth, bearing the indisputable seal of the Spirit. Matthew had given special attention to the sayings of the Lord; and John completes these by such sayings as it was competent only for him who lay on the breast of Jesus to hear and to preserve. Mark had used the appellation Son of God,‡ with marked emphasis, after Son of David; and John gives us, therefore, the deep direct self-testimony of the "only begotten Son," in words which make a deeper

* The λόγοι in Luke are exactly the same as the λόγια which, according to Papias, Matthew συνεγράψατο, "compiled." It is the fixing in writing by selection and arrangement that is meant. The explanation given by Lange (Leb. Jes. i., 161) after Lücke, holds its ground, when understood aright and explained, in spite of Ebrard's Recensirende Zurechtweisung (Tholuck's Litt. Anz. 1844, p. 502. Compare Stud. und Krit. 1833, 2. 501). Certainly λόγιον, λόγια cannot mean "oral, running, historical communications; evangelic history still found in the stream of conversation," as Lange precipitately and inexactly says. But from the idea of "sacred utterance, revelation" there might very well arise a form of speech, which might not exactly signify a "sacred book, a revealed scripture." Here, it would be in the plural τὰ λόγια, equivalent to "the things, as well the sayings as the deeds and events, in which God revealed himself through Christ," and naturally equivalent at the present day to the above, with the addition, "as they were circulated in their yet unwritten form." For συνεγράψατο denotes a certain opposition. Delitzsch is wrong (Luth. Zeitschr., 1850, 3) in understanding the expression as denoting "chiefly the utterances of the Lord." The most correct view, in our opinion, is that of the Catholic Schwartz (Neue Untersuchungen über das Vemandtschaftsverhältniss der synopt. Ev. p. 114 ff. Λόγια is the Greek word corresponding to the Hebrew דִּבְרֵי; and it follows from the nature of Christianity that a revelation of fact applied to the purpose of instruction is what is meant. Papias places himself in the same relation to tradition when he writes the λόγους of the Apostles. The whole of Christian truth, says Schwartz, is called sometimes λόγια κυριακά, sometimes λόγοι or διδασκαλία, sometimes ἀπομνημονεύματα or εὐαγγέλιον. In Ignatius ad Smyrn. c. 3 (larger edition), λόγια stands for "the Acts of the Apostles." Very right, we say, as Luke's prologue with its πράγματα and λόγοι belongs to the second treatise as well as the first seeing that the ποιεῖν τε καὶ διδάσκειν (mark this consequence) was only the beginning of the whole.

† As may be read in Sepp, vii. 211, 212.

‡ Compare Matthew i. 1 with Mark i. 1; next at Mark i. 24, also further chap. iii. 11, xv. 39.

impression on the spirit of man than is made even by his mighty deeds. After he had labored during a whole apostolic life, quietly and deeply; had even suffered for the testimony of Jesus, and had sent forth the Apocalypse from his place of banishment in Patmos; after Jerusalem had been destroyed, and the prophecy given by the Lord of his first coming had been fulfilled in earnest of that of his second; then at last, and not till then, does John write his Gospel, as the higher and highest Apocalypse for all who believe and shall believe on the name of the Son of God, irrespective whether they are Jews or Gentiles, Romans or Greeks.* As Luke, indirectly and in the sense of Paul, opposes Jewish narrow-mindedness; so now the last controversy of John is one in which he strikes down all unbelief and every heretical infidel opinion. But he does not, properly speaking, lay down, in order, a collection of carefully investigated historical data; though he too, on his part, supplements his predecessors, and, for example, introduces some mighty deeds, such as the healing of the man born blind and the resurrection of Lazarus. But he looks like the eagle upon the "Light of the World." His prologue begins with the most appropriate commencement in the bosom of the Father, and his Gospel unveils for all genuine speculation the deepest basis of fact.

We have here the latest help against all the misconception and mistakes of the latest times, prefigured as these were by the rising ψευδώνυμος γνῶσις, "science falsely so-called," of early Christian times; against all Idealistic and Pantheistic perverted speculations.† For — though it can only be indicated — the four Evangelists, in their fourfold cherubic figures, correspond finally and prophetically to a historical process of development of the Church throughout its entire history. The idea has before this been thrown out,‡ that the cow, the lion, the man, and the eagle, symbolize the apostolic, the Roman, the Reformed, and the last Church; if we reflect upon it we shall find that the four-formed Gospels admit of being applied in the same way. On this subject, however, we prefer not entering at large.

These are the four witnesses, whose varied testimony agrees with marvellous harmony. Thus has the Church accepted it; having rested securely upon this testimony from the beginning.§ Is there to be now for once no more agreement? Far from it! Rather, as it is written that before the Sanhedrim two and three witnesses were not to be brought together at once; so at this day wherever such a procedure is adopted, false witnesses never do agree. By separating the Gospels from each other, we obtain a brilliant proof of their unity. And certainly the accusation is groundless precisely where it is well-founded; for it must first falsely assume that the Evangelists intended to write as if they were writing chronicles or minutes, in order that the differences which certainly do exist, the apparent contradictions which mark the Life, may, along with this vicious assumption, make out a charge of real contradiction.

These volumes have already shown, and will still further show, that the person and history—that the word of the Lord Jesus—remain essentially the same in all the Evangelists. That, on the other hand, a chronologically arranged harmony which shall (in all cases and conclusively) exhibit the particular circumstances and words is scarcely possible, we have also admitted and avowed. The design of our Commentary is to invite all readers, but especially all learned readers, to apprehend the deep reason why the wisdom of God has denied us such a history of the wonder of wonders in history; and to persuade them in the midst of all the laborious disputings and demonstrations about the shell, not to lose the kernel. Let it not, however, be said that we must be contented to remain in a state of pure uncertainty and perplexity as to the external course of the life of Jesus

* Or even Germans—we say against Lange, for here every peculiarity ceases.

† In so far there is a remarkable presentiment of what is right in the preposterous remark of Fichte, which tells much more than he designed it should do, and than the awkward clause itself really expresses: "It is only with John that the philosopher can come to terms." (Anweisung Zern sel. Leben, p. 155.)

‡ Meyer has a beautiful poem on this subject in his own way, in the Blätter für höh Warh. iv. 71.

§ The fundamental thought to which we gave expression in the preface of the first volume, "that by all who believe in a revelation of the Son of God, it must be taken for granted that his word cannot have fallen to the ground; cannot have dropped and been lost through the seive of erring human composition," depends upon the yet more general position, taken for granted, also, as implied in believing, and applicable to the life and works, as well as the sayings; viz., "that the image of Christ, as it is handed down to us in the four canonical Gospels is genuine." The 126th § in Martensen's Doymatik contains an admirable statement expressed in a few striking words against the new criticism; and concludes with the following unanswerable sentence: "Even the conviction of the internal truth and original perfection of the testimony of the Gospels, is a fundamental experience which is renewed at every age in the Church and in every individual believer."

in the Gospels. That we may not be thus misunderstood, we now give, in a tabular form, our view of the harmony. We do not arrange the materials in this table with any degree of dogmatism; but with the conviction that many particulars may reasonably be arranged differently by others. We append it for the purpose of showing that we have not expounded the sayings blindly, and at random; and also that an investigation conducted in a spirit of dogmatism, which will not allow of anything remaining undetermined, will meet with enough in the first place to bring it to a pause. This table will at the same time serve as an Index to a considerable part of this work, so as to enable the reader at once to turn to any particular passage which we have expounded. The continuation of this table, applicable to the rest of the work, will appear in due course in the subsequent volume:

	MATTHEW.	MARK.	LUKE.	JOHN.
Annunciation of the Births of John and Jesus	.....	.....	i. 5–38	.....
Visit of Mary to Elizabeth	.....	.....	" 39–56	.....
Appearance of the Angel to Joseph,	i. 18–25	.....	.....	.....
Birth and Circumcision of John	.....	.....	" 57–80	.....
Birth of Jesus in Bethlehem, and his Circumcision	" 25. ii. 1	.....	ii. 1–21	.....
Presentation in the Temple, Simeon and Anna	.....	.....	" 22–38	.....
Visit of the Magi; Flight to Egypt; Abode at Nazareth	ii. 1–23	.....	" 39, 40	.....
The Child twelve years old in the Temple	.....	.....	" 41–52	.....
The Appearance of the Baptist (September or October), and his Work	iii. 1–12	i. 1–8	iii. 1–18	i. 6–8
The Baptism and Temptation of Jesus (December)	" 13–iv. 11	" 9–13	" 21–iv. 13	.....
Immediately upon this: the Message to the Baptist and his Testimony	.....	.....	.....	" 15, 19–34
The first Disciple and the first Miracle in Galilee	.....	.....	.....	" 35–ii. 11
Brief abode at Capernaum; first Passover; Purification of the Temple, and Miracles in Jerusalem, Nicodemus	.....	.....	.....	ii. 12–iii. 21
Longer Residence and Baptizing in Judea, Controversy and Testimony thereon	.....	.....	.....	iii. 22–36
Journey to Galilee through Samaria (the end of December); the Woman of Samaria	.....	.....	.....	iv. 1–42
Second Miracle in Galilee	.....	.....	.....	" 43–54
Preaching in Galilee; Rejection at Nazareth	.....	.....	iv. 14–30	" (44)
Imprisonment of the Baptist	xiv. 3–5	vi. 17–20	iii. 19, 20	(iii. 24)
Jesus in Capernaum and Galilee; Continues the Preaching of John.	iv. 12–17	i. 14–15	.....	.....
Calling of the Fishers of Men, Peter's Draught of Fishes	" 18–22	" 16–20	v. 1–11	.....
Powerful Teaching and Healing in Galilee	" 23–25	" (22)	.....	.....
The Choosing of the Apostles, and Sermon on the Mount	v. 1–vii. 29	iii. 13–19	vi. 12–49	.....
The Leper and the Centurion's Servant	viii. 1–13	i. 40–45	v. 12–16 / vii. 1–10	.....
Capernaum: the Demoniac in the Synagogue, Peter's Wife's Mother, Many Sick Folk	" 14–17	" 21–34	iv. 31–41	.....
Jesus withdraws from the Crowd, Visits other Cities	.....	" 35–39	" 42–44 / (viii. 1–3)	.....

	Matthew.	Mark.	Luke.	John.
One Day: The Calumny about Beelzebub, Reply to it, the Woman who pronounced Him Blessed, Mother and Brethren	xii. 22–50	iii. 20–35	xi. 14–36 } viii. 19–21 }	.....
On the same Day (on account of Matt. xiii. 1, Mark iv. 35), Intention to Cross the Sea	viii. 18.	.....	.....	.....
Still before this: the Offer of a certain Follower	" 19, 20	.....	.....	.....
(A later Incident of the same Kind and Parallels to it of uncertain date)	" (21, 22)	.....	(ix. 57–60	.....
Further Abode in consequence of the People: Preaching in Parables	xiii. 1–53	iv. 1–34	viii. 4–18 } (xiii. 18–21) }	.....
Actual Passage: Stilling of the sea, Gadarene Demoniac	viii. 23–34	" 35–v. 20	viii. 22–39	....
After the Return (another day): the Sick of the Palsy, Matthew's Call and Entertainment, Question on Fasting	ix. 1–17	ii. 1–22	v. 17–39	.....
The Daughter of Jairus, and the Woman with the Issue of Blood	" 18–26	v. 21–43	viii. 40–56	.....
Two blind Men and a Demoniac	" 27–34	.....	.....	.....
Some Time after: new Attempt and Second Rejection in Nazareth	xiii. 54–58	vi. 1–6	.....	.....
Raising of the Young Man at Nain	.....	.....	vii. 11–17	.....
Message and Question of the Baptist	xi. 2–30	.....	" 18–35	.....
(Undefined incidents of this early period): Anointing by the Woman who was a Sinner; another Entertainment in a Pharisee's house	.....	.....	" 36–50 } xi. 37–54 }	.....
Journey to Jerusalem at the Feast of Purim (in Adar); Bethesda	.....	.....	.....	v. 1–47
Plucking of the Ears of Corn; Withered Hand; Deadlier Enmity. (Beginning of Nisan, again in Galilee)	xii. 1–21	ii. 23–iii. 12	vi. 1–11	.....
Sending out of the Twelve	ix. 35–x. 42	vi. 7–13	ix. 1–6	.....
Narrative of the Death of the Baptist; Fear of Herod	(xi. 1) xiv. 1–12	" 14–29	" 7–9	.....
Return of the Apostles from their Mission (after a few days)	.....	" 30	" 10	.....
First Feeding, Five Thousand. About the Time of the second Passover	xiv. 13–22	" 31–45	" 10–17	vi. 1–15
Miraculous Passage over the Sea. Temerity of Peter	" 23–34	" 46–53	.....	" 16–25
Discourses in Capernaum about the Bread of Heaven; Offence and Confession	.....	.....	.....	" 26–71
Many Sick People Healed	xiv. 35, 36	" 54–56	.....	.....
Discourses about human Traditions to the Scribes	xv. 1–20	vii. 1–23	.....	.....
Departure to the Phœnician Coasts, the Canaanitish Woman	" 21–28	" 24–30	.....	.....
Once more many Sick People Healed; before this (by the way), the Deaf and Dumb Man	" 29–31	" 31–37	.....	.....
Second Feeding, Four Thousand; Demand for Signs; Warning about Leaven	" 32–xvi. 12	viii. 1–21	.....	.....
The Blind Man at Bethsaida	.....	" 22–26	.....	.....
Journey to Jerusalem at the Feast of Tabernacles (September); probable Residence till the Feast of the Dedication of the Temple (December)	.....	.....	.....	vii. 1–x. 39

	Matthew.	Mark.	Luke.	John.
Cesarea Philippi: What do the People say of the Son of Man? First Intimation of his Sufferings	xvi. 13-28	viii. 27–ix. 1	ix. 18–27	.....
Transfiguration, Lunatic. Second Intimation of his Sufferings	xvii. 1–23	ix. 2–32	" 28–45	.....
Tribute Money and Stater (in Adar?)	" 24–27	.....	.....	.....
Controversy about Precedence, the Little Child. Sayings of wider Import	xviii. 1–35	" 33–50	" 46–50	.....
Last Journey to Jerusalem. Luke's Account of it (with incidents and sayings of a somewhat earlier date interspersed)	(xix. 1)	(x. 1)	" 51–xviii. 14	.....
Of Divorce; Blessing of the Children	" 1–15	" 1–16	xviii. 15–17	x. 40–42
Resurrection of Lazarus	.....	.....	.....	xi. 1–53
Good Master, What shall I do? Forsake all! What shall we have then?	" 16–30	" 17–31	" 18–30	.....
Parable of the Laborers in the Vineyard	xx. 1–16	.....	.....	.....
Up to Jerusalem! Third Intimation of his Sufferings	" 17–19	" 32–34	" 31–34	.....
Petition of the Sons of Zebedee	" 20–28	" 35–45	.....	.....
The Blind Men at Jericho	" 29–34	" 46–52	" 35–43	.....
Zacchæus; Parable of the Pounds	.....	.....	xix. 1–27	.....
(Jesus in Ephraim)? The date quite uncertain	.....	.....	.....	" 54–57
Six Days before the Third Passover: Anointing by Mary	xxvi. 6–16	xiv. 3–9	.....	xii. 1–11
Sunday.—Entrance into Jerusalem, Weeping over the City	xxi. 1–11	xi. 1–10	" 28–44	" 12–19
The Lord begins to Inspect the Temple	" 12	" 11	" 45	.....
Greeks, Voice from Heaven, Sayings,	.....	.....	.....	" 20–37
(General Summary of the Testimony of Jesus)	.....	.....	.....	" (44–50)
In the Evening to Bethany	" 17	" 11	.....	.....
Monday.—Cursing of the Fig-Tree	" 18, 19	" 12–14	.....	.....
Proper Cleansing of the Temple, at the end as at the beginning	" 12–16	" 15–18	" 45–48	.....
Tuesday.—The Fig-tree is Withered	" 19–22	" 19–26	.....	.....
Vindication and Parables	" 23–xxii. 14	" 27–xii. 12	xx. 1–19	.....
Ensnaring Questions by the Pharisees and Sadducees	xxii. 15–46	xii. 13–37	" 20–44	.....
Woes on the Pharisees and Jerusalem	xxiii. 1–39	" 38–40	" 45–47	.....
The poor Widow	.....	" 41–44	xxi. 1–4	.....
Prophecies and Parables	xxiv. 1–xxv. 46	xiii. 1–37	" 5–36	.....
(Residence in these days)	.....	.....	" 37, 38	.....

A few explanations may be added to this table, for the purpose merely of guarding against the contemptuous charge that we have not thoroughly weighed what has been advanced; and these, at the same time, from the aphoristic form in which they appear, may direct and stimulate to deeper inquiry. We confine ourselves to individual remarks, where they seem especially needed, or to references to what will be found treated of in these volumes; we shall, after that, take a comprehensive view of the course of each synoptical Gospel in reference to the order of time.

That the angel appeared to Joseph previous to Mary's visit to Elizabeth, appears to us not to be in accordance with real decorum, or with the delicately conducted progress of the history.

We hold it extremely arbitrary to regard Luke iii. 1, 2 as speaking not of the first commandment from God to enter upon the duties of his office, but as a "later call" addressed to the Baptist shortly before his imprisonment (according to Wieseler). That the baptism and temptation of Jesus occurred in summer or spring, appears entirely unfounded; the winter seems to us the far more suitable time,* parallel to his birth and in accordance with Luke iii. 23. From his baptism till the passover there are few occurrences; but the period would be an extremely long one, according to Wieseler, p. 258, during which we have no notice of any occurrence having taken place. On the other hand the commencement of Jesus' work in Galilee is naturally very rich and full.

In placing the events related from Matt. iv. 12, to xi. 30 so early as before the feast of Purim, we again differ from Wieseler; who, however, has by no means shown that the journey of John vi. 1 is identical with that of Matt. iv. 12. To carry out such a view will involve us in many difficulties in regard to particular points in the narratives of the synoptical Evangelists, since John vi. must harmonise with Matt. xiv. Matt. iv. 12 itself intimates that a period of time must have elapsed to which the events related down to John iv. 54 belong; then Matt. v. 1 is still more manifestly connected with chap. iv. 25 by the τοὺς ὄχλους, "the multitudes;" the Sermon on the Mount, therefore, cannot have been brought in from a later period, or be made up of portions of later addresses, as some would have it.

Mark i. 21 is by no means to be regarded as following in immediate connection after ver. 20; ver. 22 rather intimates a preceding powerful teaching (for, generally applicable to his teaching), and that in the same expression which Matthew uses to denote the impression made upon the people by the Sermon on the Mount. We do not consider it necessary to show that ἐν ταῖς ἡμέραις ταύταις, "in those days," Luke vi. 12, is not a formula of sequence, but a general expression applicable to the first rich period of the work of Jesus.

The definite statement in Matt. viii. 1, 2, 5 (which again agrees with Luke vii. 1), is quite sufficient to fix the place of Luke v. 12, notwithstanding the indefinite form in which it appears.

Matt. viii. 18, with its indefinite πολλοὺς ὄχλους, "great multitudes," is by no means in immediate connection with the preceding verses, the 16th and 17th; for Mark i. 35, and Luke iv. 42, agree in giving an entirely different conclusion of the evening spent at Capernaum. For the arrangement in Matthew, see page 138. From this we are to understand that his statement in chap. viii. 23 is to be referred to the day, if, according to chap. xiii. 1, the parables had preceded; as the definite statement of Matt. iv. 35, must remain unbroken. This was certainly one of the richest days; of these, however, there must have been many, occasioned by the great crowding of the people and the unwearied activity of the Lord in the first period.† Matt. xiii. 1 is to be understood in a pluperfect sense, as giving a repetition of the discourses spoken of as having already begun to be delivered, in chap. xii. 22, and the delivery of which had taken place before the multitude of the works narrated in chap. viii. and ix. The calumny about Beelzebub may have occurred in the early part of the same day, at the commencement of his work (notice also in Mark iv, 1 the πάλιν ἤρξατο). And the offer of the man to follow him (as to the others who made a similar offer see p. 139 ff.) when he was preparing to cross the sea; after that, the preaching in parables to the people as they pressed upon him (chap. viii. 18, Luke viii. 4), still before he actually departed; on the passage the stilling of the sea, on the other side, the Gadarenes, who immediately forced him to return (still on the same day, or more probably after a night's rest, for according to Mark iv. 35, it was already evening); all this is not too much for one day. And when in Matt. ix. 2 the same day appears to have embraced a multitude of events—Mark v. 21, and Luke viii. 40, 41, present the same appearance—the explanation is to be found in the peculiarity of the Evangelists, who do not pay much attention to divisions into days when, in filling up some magnificent, comprehensive scene, they hasten on from one event to another by a καί, "and," or a καὶ ἰδού, "and behold." It is not only the evening, Mark iv. 35, that gives light here, the entertainment of Matthew requires at all events an invitation and a preparation; and yet this entertainment undoubtedly occurred between the return from Gadara and the raising of Jairus' daughter.

* On the appearance of the Baptist in October, Sepp, among many very strange things, gives some hints not to be despised (Leben Christi, p. 118 ff.).

† Schleiermacher speaks of the very wonderful appearance presented by the life of Christ when we notice the striking contrast between a great day in which everything is heaped together, even to the highest degree of improbability, and a great and almost empty intervening space. But such great days occur in every great life; and should not the history give us an account of some of these? Yet it does not affirm that the intervening empty spaces were in reality empty.

Matt. ix. 9 hangs quite naturally upon what goes before, exactly as does Luke v. 27. In like manner Matt. ix. 14 is a natural continuation of the narrative, and Luke v. 33 gives a comprehensive view of the whole scene. We cannot see why, in opposition to the express statements of these two narratives, Ebrard places the question about fasting before the entertainment. A clear reason, however, is contained in Matt. ix. 18 for placing the healing of the man sick of the palsy, and the matters connected with it, before the daughter of Jairus; indeed, the formulæ, Mark v. 21, Luke viii. 40, leave no room for hesitation.

Matt. xi. 2 does not carry forward the narrative in regular order, but, after the general closing formula, ver. 1, steps backward into an earlier period, as is manifest from the loosely connecting clause, ch. xii. 1, at the end of this chronological parenthesis. Matthew desired to reserve the contents of ch. xi. as an important conclusion to a first part of his description of the Messiah establishing his claims by works and words.

On Matt. ix. 25, see page 213.

Matt. xii. 1 again comes in correctly in chronological order, with the exception that the journey at the feast of Purim is omitted. We have the rubbing of the ears of corn placed, not after the Passover, but fourteen days earlier: see p. 218. There thus remains before the time when the thousands were fed about the Passover (John vi.), sufficient time for the sending out and the returning of the twelve; whose journeyings, moreover, we are not to consider as having lasted any length of time. They came back in their simplicity very soon to the Lord, as may be seen in Mark vi. 30, and still more manifestly in Luke ix. 10. The idea of Gemberg, that they spent nine months on their missionary tour, is to us inconceivable.

That Matt. ix. 35, till x. 42, has anticipated the chronology is again in accordance with the plan of the Evangelist to conclude with chaps. viii.–xi. a first cycle of the works and sayings of Christ.

By placing Matt. xii. 22 so early (we are compelled to do so by the other Evangelists), the τότε, "then," certainly loses every special chronological import. In constructing a harmony, however, it frequently occurs that we cannot avoid either giving up the most manifest data in one Gospel for the sake of another, or abandon the task altogether of reconciling apparent contradictions, in any other way than by taking such a view of indefinite formulæ:* and it is well known that τότε, when it stands alone, is usually employed throughout the first Gospel as a particle of this kind. We have already seen that chaps. xii. and xiii. are connected together, and we have proved (p. 249) that the parables could not possibly have been spoken before the Sermon on the Mount.

On the rejection at Nazareth, which, as related in Matt. xiii. 54, we are to regard as having occurred a second time, see our exposition of that passage.

Matt., chaps. xiv. and xv., hang quite well together, and fall into the time generally indicated in John vii. 1.

We protest on behalf of Matt. xvii. 24–27 against Wieseler's chronology, on the ground that his exposition of the δίδραχμα, or "didrachm," as denoting the civic tribute money paid to the Roman Emperor, is quite untenable. See what has been said on this subject, p. 327.

In Matt. xix. 1 we find the last journey of Luke pointed out. See our remarks in the exposition.

Although the connection between Matt. xix. 15, 16, and also that between Mark x. 16, 17, appear to be close, we do not know where else to bring in (and here for once we agree with Ebrard) the resurrection of Lazarus—an event for which it is very difficult to find a place. Here there is peculiarly a great non liquet (it does not appear) for the special point of time of this mighty event; still a poor harmonist must even for this put down at least something that is possible. We require only not to read (and we are not compelled to do so) the 15th and 16th verses of Matt. xix., in immediate sequence; but ἐπορεύθη ἐκεῖθεν, "he departed thence," as the concluding formula, and then the Καὶ ἰδού, "and behold," as beginning a new paragraph.

Mark does not arrange his pictures in his first part up to chap. vi. 7 in exact order. This is an axiom which requires certainly to be well proved against many critics. In

* Every one knows this who has had the least experience in such matters. Many a result laboriously wrought out has been dashed to the ground by some intervening statement; for every example the whole proof must be examined on every side. The author has given such proofs for many of his positions: whoever examines his results will find it to be so.

chap. ii. 1, for example, the wide expression δι' ἡμερῶν, "after some days," certainly allows our transposition.

Mark iii. 20, 21 cannot possibly, as Ebrard expounds, be a special occurrence after the Sermon on the Mount (and after the leper). The ἔρχονται εἰς οἶκον, they come home ("they went into an house"), is an indefinite beginning of a new picture, whose frame is not finished till we reach ver. 35. Οἱ παρ' αὐτοῦ, those about him ("his friends"), must be his relatives, for ver. 31 is manifestly connected with ver. 21 by an οὖν, "then;" referring back to something going before, after the πνεῦμα ἀκάθαρτον ἔχει, "he hath a unclean spirit," of the Scribes had been put down as parallel to the ὅτι ἐξέστη, "he is beside himself," of his relatives. See the exposition of that passage. The short notice in Luke viii. 19–21 is in its right place, at least so far as that what is related took place on the day of the parables.

Luke gives in chap. iv. 31, 32 only a general formula, which, therefore, does not immediately connect ver. 33 with ver. 30: still the general foundation for the particular miracle here has the same weight as at Mark i. 21, 22.

In Luke vi. 6 it is the following Sabbath, probably the Sabbath immediately following, that is meant; and thus the passage agrees with Matt. xii. 9, and we obtain an explanation of the πάλιν, "again," in Mark iii. 1.

In Luke vii. 11 the reading ἐν τῷ ἑξῆς, "the day after," is the only correct one, and is merely an indefinite formula for a really later occurrence.* For the raising of the dead recorded by Matthew, ix. 24–26, as having taken place alone, is certain; this selection itself leads us to this supposition—indeed the whole history looks like it, especially the former case. See p. 162, and our remarks on Luke vii. 13, 14. Ebrard has overlooked this, p. 144. According to his arrangement the young man at Nain was brought to life immediately after the daughter of Jarius; and yet this event must be connected (on account of the ἐν τῇ ἑξῆς) with the whole section containing the Sermon of the Mount and the events down to Peter's wife's mother, which, as we have proved on satisfactory grounds, must have taken place before the raising of Jarius' daughter.

Luke ix. 57, 58 is probably a very conceivable repetition of the event and the word, Matt. viii. 19, 20, in the real life of Jesus. We can scarcely, with Ebrard, refer the μετὰ ταῦτα, "after these things," of Luke x. 1, merely to the sending out of the twelve, and not also to what had been immediately related at chap. ix. The history of the other individual may in this case have been anticipated by Matthew as a parallel case.

We must, in opposition to Ebrard, place the whole contents of Matt. xv. 1 to xvi. 12, before the journey to the feast of tabernacles, John vii., and all matters connected with that journey as far as chap. x. 39; for otherwise the two feedings would be too far distant from each other, not to speak of many other considerations. Bengel's simple and probable idea is, that the Lord remained at Jerusalem from the feast of the tabernacles till that of the dedication of the temple. We have already expressed ourselves doubtful (p. 284) whether the "Scribes which were of Jerusalem," Matt. xv. 1, Mark vii. 1, had returned from the feast of the passover, John vi. 4. That, according to Mark, the confession of Peter followed immediately after the conversation about the leaven, is not true; Mark viii. 27, opens a new scene with an indefinite formula.

How then, according to the above assumptions, does each of the synoptical Evangelists stand related to the chronological order of his contents? We shall now take a glance at this, for the purpose of making manifest at least the possibility of our table.

Matthew passes over between the 11th and 12th verses of chap. iv. the following matters of which we have the record given us by John; viz., the provisional engaging of disciples, the first miracle at Cana, the first passover at Jerusalem, a residence in Judea, the journey through Samaria, and labors in Galilee, which are as yet rather divided into separate portions, and do not possess any very public character, as far as the imprisonment of the Baptist. Still there remains in his Gospel, chaps. v.–vii., what is really the proper commencement of the Lord's ministry; the first solemn preaching of his real public appearance, the tone and scene of which were anticipated by a preparatory work and collecting of disciples. In chap. viii. 13 he passes over the demoniac

* If we adopt τῷ, there is no reason why we should also adopt καθεξῆς, as at chap. viii. 1; since the fact of the passage being the only one w ere the phrase occurs is not sufficient to prove that phrase tc have been one commonly used by Luke: there is as much reas n for altering the τῷ ἑξῆς in that passage to make it conform to this one.

in the synagogue; and ver. 17 is consequently, in the first instance, a concluding formula. In ver. 21 he appends, as has been already observed, a later parallel to an event which occurred at that time, vers. 19, 20. The parables delivered on the day mentioned ver. 18 when the Lord was still on the sea, and before he set sail, Matthew reserves for his chapter of instruction, as he confines himself in the first instance to the Lord's works. See p. 164. He relates, therefore, immediately, the stilling of the storm, and the story of the Gadarenes, together with what follows it, as far as chap. ix. 34. After he had given, in vers. 35, 36, a general transition-formula, he opens a new scene: the programme of the teaching on the Mount is entered upon; disciples are called; miracles in abundance are wrought, though the hostility only of the Pharisees is excited; then he sends out the twelve: to this paragraph we have a general conclusion in chap. xi. 1, similar to the one already noticed, and which is again repeated in chap. xiv. But now he goes back, chap. xi. 2, to the message from John which had been sent at an earlier period (when accounts of the works of Christ first reached him); passes over the feast of Purim, yet inserts, in correct historical sequence, chap. xii. 1–21, what had taken place previous to the sending out of the twelve. With chap. xii. 22, he still goes further back, using his indefinite τότε, "then," in order to exhibit the origin of the hostility now mentioned for the second time, and to narrate its first outbreak; he consequently introduces here what had happened before the stilling of the storm. Chap. xiii. 1, therefore, has this meaning: even then he had, after such sayings addressed to his enemies, spoken the following parables to the people. Finally, after all these transpositions he restores chap. xiv. again into the chronological order left off at chap. x.; brings up from an earlier period the imprisonment and beheading of John, vers. 3–12; and, with the single exception of the passage, chap. xxvi. 6–16, which also belongs to an earlier period, carries on the chronological order till the end. He thus passes over the feast of Tabernacles and that of the dedication of the temple between the 12th and 13th verses of chap. xvi.; in chap. xix. 1, also, he passes over the incidents and sayings of this last journey, which Luke has preserved; the resurrection of Lazarus also is not mentioned.

Mark, who begins at a later period of the history than any of the other Evangelists, passes over, like Matthew, the first year—which bears the character of a year of gradual quiet preparation—and begins chap. i. 14, 15 exactly as Matthew does chap. iv. 12–17. But then, for the purpose of pressing forward in medias res, and εὐθέως, "immediately," opening up before us with imposing effect the great scene of the works of Jesus, he deals in nothing but chronological transpositions, and heaps picture upon picture without the least concern about the sequence of time. He falls all at once, chap. i. 21, into the events which took place after the Sermon on the Mount; and these events follow each other in chronological succession down to ver. 39; again in vers. 40–45 he brings in what happened at an earlier period and passes over the Centurion altogether. In chap. ii. 1–22 he anticipates, in like manner, the events that took place after the journey to Gadara; and from ver. 23 to chap. iii. 12 he brings in matter of a still later date. Now for the first time, chap. iii. 13 (referring by the εἰς τὸ ὄρος, into the [Engl. vers. "a"] mountain, to the well-known tradition), he goes back and begins with the Sermon on the Mount; of which, however, (except by the allusion to it in "the mountain"), he gives no account except as regards the choosing of the Apostles.* He has already related what happened immediately after this; he therefore passes over it, and proceeds in exact chronological order, through chap. iii. 20, 21; till he mentions the calumny about Beelzebub, and from that point again, in exact order (according to our harmony), to chap. v. 20. He had already anticipated in chap. ii. what followed this (Matt. ix. 1–17); he therefore proceeds straight onward in chronological order from chap. v. 21 to chap. vi. 6. He then passes over the young man at Nain, the sending out of the twelve, the feast of Purim (as well as what he himself had previously related, chap. ii. 23–iii. 12), and continues the narrative after chap. vi. 7, exactly as Matthew does, putting in, also like him, at the wrong place, the death of the Baptist and the anointing at Bethany.

* Because, as our Table shows, the sending out of the twelve followed immediately after Mark iii. 5, 6, it occurred to the Evangelist immediately to go back to their choice. There is a relation of combination of the same kind in Luke vi. 12; and another in Matt. xi. 2, where, instead of what followed chronologically in chap. xiv. 1, 2, there is introduced for the first time a statement about John of what had occurred at an earlier period. Gemberg gives an entirely different combination, which, proceeding from the idea that Mark narrates according to the order of time, leads to very peculiar results (Stud. und Krit. 1845, 1). We do not feel inclined to allow our system to be overturned by this; we must not, however, confute it at length. Meanwhile it is enough that our view of Mark's Gospel agrees with the oldest view we have, that of Papias.

Luke, after having narrated the appearance of the Baptist, and the baptism and temptation of Jesus, passes over, like Matthew and Mark, the first year, except that he relates our Lord's first sermon at Nazareth, and his rejection by the inhabitants of that city. (In chap. iii. 19, 20, he has appended at once the imprisonment of the Baptist, the account of which the other Evangelists have introduced at a later part of their Gospels.) In chap. iv. 31–34, he anticipates the progress of the history as Mark does; in chap. v. 1–11 he brings up from a former period a special example of the early calling of disciples; in chap. v. 12 he introduces a narrative which he manifestly avows to be wholly indefinite; the portion from chap. v. 17 to vi. 11, is of the same character, all the events there recorded having happened at later periods. He now brings up, chap. vi. 12, from an earlier period, exactly as Mark does, the solemn choosing of the disciples and the Sermon on the Mount; appends to this, chap. vii. 1–10, an event which happened not long after; with chap. vii. 11–50, again he springs forward, and with chap. viii. 1–3 introduces a general description as a resting-point. From this he turns back in chap. viii. 4–39 to the discourse delivered in parables, to the storm and to the Gadarenes; the proper connection at this point appears to have been unknown to him; hence he brings in, vers. 19–21, what took place before the parables, and in ver. 22 a phrase implying want of knowledge is used in manifest opposition to iv. 35.* Finally he has introduced the Gadarenes quite correctly after the storm. What happened upon this, according to Matthew, he has, like Mark, already anticipated; he, therefore, proceeds with the narration of Jairus and of the woman with the issue of blood, down to ver. 56. Again, he has already given an account of the young man at Nain, of the message of John, and also of the rubbing of the ears of corn, and of the withered hand; he therefore advances in chap. ix. to the sending out of the twelve, and from this point onward abides by the chronological order. The only peculiarity is that in chap. ix. 17 he omits much that happened after the first miracle of the loaves, as is seen in the Table, and does not join the other two Evangelists till he reaches the matters related in the passage from the 18th to the 50th verse.

With chap. ix. 51 he begins the portion which is peculiar to himself, and which has been called the journey-narrative. This name, as applied to this portion of the Gospel, may be justified a parte potiori;† as at least the greater part of it manifestly rises out of the last journey to Jerusalem, i. e., out of a journey and tour in connection with the determination expressed at its commencement, "Now to Jerusalem, there to suffer and to die." We may see from chap. xiii. 22, 33, xvii. 11, xviii. 31, 35, xix. 11, 28, that this thought was at every point brought to the remembrance of our Lord. The sequence is not indeed perfect in every particular; the Lord is not in reality always approaching nearer; but for example, even in chap. x. 38, he has already advanced from the neighborhood of Jerusalem, though not when approaching it for the last time. In like manner, perhaps, Luke inserts here and there some sayings from a preceding period; certainly this is not the case with chap. xii. 22 (as we saw in our exposition), or with x. 21. It may be so, for example, with chap. xiii. 18–21; and most certainly it is so with chap. xi. 14–36, where we have a narrative of what, according to Matthew and Mark, happened at a much earlier period. With what are we to connect the expression of the 37th verse, incapable as that expression is of having any more definite aspect given to it, ἐν δὲ τῷ λαλῆσαι, "while he was speaking?" We certainly are not to read it as if it were followed by ταῦτα, these things; it can be understood only as meaning, "when on one occasion (at that time), he was saying such and such things."‡ Nothing more satisfactory can with any degree of certainty be made of these Singularia Lucæ; although ingenuity may make the attempt and—lose its way. From chap. xviii. 15, again, Luke agrees with the other two Evangelists.

* We may remark, however, on this most instructive example, that Luke, even when he had not ascertained everything exactly, yet remains free from positive inaccuracy. His phrase καὶ ἐγένετο ἐν μιᾷ τῶν ἡμερῶν, although, in the same breath, he had related the events of that very day, borders on a direct contradiction of Mark's authentic and definite expression, ἐν ἐκείνῃ τῇ ἡμέρᾳ ὀψίας γενομένης—but it does nothing more.

† At least better than that other description which finds here a "Gnomology," a corpus doctrinæ, formed out of all kinds of fragmentary sayings without any regard to the history; as, for example, was at one time maintained by Vertling against Bengel; Collectanea Lucæ, as Roos called it. We find it impossible to admit that Luke ix. 57, after the significant intimation of ver. 51, does not refer to the journey to Jerusalem.

‡ See what is said on this subject in our remarks on the above passages.

Such is our unbiassed view of the chronological relations in the synoptical Evangelists; in the defence and confirmation of this view there is much that we could say. Those who do not feel any interest in harmonies may drop the subject. Any one, however, who desires seriously to enter upon the subject may study diligently what we have thrown out in the form of brief hints, and as incentives to study. We can have nothing to do with those who quarrel and vex themselves about these matters under a twofold false hypothesis; as if the fixing in every individual case of the chronology, which is left so undetermined by the sacred writers, were the very first thing to be attended to in the life of Jesus; and, further, as if our wisdom could, must, and should arrive at unquestionably certain results in this matter. The man who begins his studies in this department with such a state of mind will never end them; the man who has not, first of all, thoroughly examined and understood the words and works of the Lord in themselves, and as they lie before us, had better not touch with hasty hand the subject of harmony. A thorough exposition of these words and works should come first; and, after that, their arrangement in chronological order; first, let us get the picture, and then frame it. The reverse practice, so much in vogue, receives the punishment due to it for being contrary to nature. The intention and aim of all who are conscious of their own duty and the limits of their own ability, and therefore of all really scientific men, can only be to make attempts at harmony; and in the midst of the different possible attempts that may be made, to resent the imputation of unanswerable inaccuracies, and to maintain a correct theory of inspiration. If the Son himself did not know the time of his second coming, should we be surprised that the Spirit has allowed his Evangelists to remain in much ignorance (significant and salutary) as to many matters of detail connected with the times and the days of his earthly life? But that positive and essential mistakes, even as to a day or an hour, have anywhere been made, has never yet been proved: the most keen-sighted scrutiny has rather issued in unexpected solutions. How much, according to John xxi. 25, might still have been written! But the wisdom of the most holy accommodation to our capacity has meted out what is felt to be at present an abundant fulness out of this inexhaustible wealth. Although χωρῆσαι in that passage does not mean ability to comprehend in the understanding, yet the hyperbolical expression, "That the world itself could not contain the books," is a judicious figure and a proverbial saying, meant to express the sentiment, that "human nature could not completely comprehend and apply the whole."

To show, finally, why each of the three Evangelists has left the chronological order as he has done, is a question which belongs to the last and most difficult department of real Gospel-criticism; that, namely, which has for its object to ascertain the plan of arrangement which must have been adopted by the Evangelists according to fundamental thoughts and important real connecting links. We think it right to abstain in this Preface from making any remarks on this subject, and have, in the course of our exposition, only occasionally thrown out a remark or a hint, where the text or the contents of the passage naturally suggest a thought. According to the design of our book, we to a great extent omit discussing the peculiar character of each individual Evangelist, that we may not be drawn aside from the simplicity, above all other things necessary, which receives what is related as really the works and the words of Jesus. The selection and arrangement of events, though much less the exhibition and classifying of documents, belong to the individual plan: to expound this latter plan is probably a prize reserved for simplicity in future times; for, at present all with much, too much ἰδία ἐπίλυσις, "private interpretation," are occupied with it. Even what Lange has prepared for the construction of this plan, correct though his fundamental views are, appears to us to be by no means conclusive; on the contrary, he is, often enough, not exempt from the danger which he is well aware is incident to the attempt of making a harmony, viz., of becoming entangled by a prying curiosity in the enchanted forest, and in the depths of some more "secret order for here this danger is certainly greater than it is anywhere else.

DEUT. XIX. 15.

עַל־פִּי שְׁנֵי עֵדִים אוֹ עַל־פִּי שְׁלֹשָׁה־עֵדִים יָקוּם דָּבָר׃

At the mouth of two witnesses, or at the mouth of three witnesses, shall this matter be established.

LUKE I. 4.

Ἵνα ἐπιγνῷς περὶ ὧν κατηχήθης λόγων τὴν ἀσφάλειαν.

That thou mightest know the certainty of those things, wherein thou hast been instructed.

CONTENTS OF VOLUME I.

THE FIRST WORDS.

CONTAINING THE FIRST WORDS OF OUR LORD ACCORDING TO ALL THE EVANGELISTS: EMBRACING MATTHEW, CHS. IV.—XI.

PAGE

The First Words of all—to His parents concerning His Father, Luke ii. 49 1
The First Word of Consecration to His office, Matt. iii. 15 5
The First Words of Victory over the Tempter, Matt. iv. 4—10; Luke iv. 4, 8, 12 8
The First Words of the Master to the first Disciples, John i. 38—51 13
The First Word of Majesty at the first Miracle, John ii. 4—8 19
The First official Words to the opposing Rulers of the Temple, John ii. 16—19 21

THE GOSPEL OF MATTHEW.

The Substance of the first Preaching to the People, chap. iv. 17; Mark i. 15 27
Calling of the Fishers of Men, chap. iv. 19; Mark i. 17 (Luke v. 4—10) 28
The Sermon on the Mount, chap. v.—vi. 8 31
The Lord's Prayer, chap. vi. 9—13 83
The Sermon on the Mount—Continued, chap. vi. 14—vii 95
The Extract from the Sermon in Luke vi. 20—49 127
The Leper, chap. viii. 3, 4; Mark i. 41—44; Luke v. 13, 14 133
The Centurion, chap. viii. 7—13; Luke vii. 9 135
Two several Followers, chap. viii. 20—22; Luke ix. 58—60 138
The Stilling of the Sea, chap. viii. 26; Mark iv. 35—39, 40; Luke viii. 22—25 142
The Devils in the Swine, chap. viii. 32; Mark v. 8, 9, 19; Luke viii. 30—39 144
The Paralytic and the Scribes, chap. ix. 2—6; Mark ii. 5, 8, 8—11; Luke v. 20, 22—24 147
The Physician for the Sick, chap. ix. 9—13; Mark ii. 14—17; Luke v. 27—32 150
Answer concerning Fasting, chap. ix. 15—17; Mark ii. 19—22; Luke v. 35—39 154
The Issue of Blood, chap. ix. 22; Mark v. 30—34; Luke viii. 45—48 160
Jairus' Daughter, chap. ix. 24; Mark v. 36—41 (43); Luke viii. 50—54 (55, 56) 162
The Two Blind Men, chap. ix. 28—30 164
The wretched Sheep and the great Harvest, chap. ix. 36—38; (Mark vi. 34; Luke x. 2) 165
Mission of the Twelve, chap. x. 5—42; Mark vi. 8—11; Luke ix. 3—5 167
The Reply and Discourse concerning John's Imprisonment, chap. xi. 4—30; Luke vii. 22—35 (xvi. 16, x. 13—22) 191
The Disciples Pluck Corn on the Sabbath. The Son of Man Lord of the Sabbath, chap. xii. 3—8; Mark ii. 23—28; Luke vi. 3—5 218
The Withered Hand. Is it lawful to do good or to do evil on the Sabbath? chap. xii. 11—13; Mark iii. 3—5; Luke vi. 8—10 223
Beelzebub. Christ defends himself against the charge of being in fellowship with Satan, chap. xii. 25—45; Mark iii. 23—29; Luke xi. 17—36 224
Christ's Mother and Brethren, chap. xii. 48—50; Mark iii. 33—35; Luke viii. 21 244
The Seven Parables, chap. xiii 246
Wherefore in Parables? chap. xiii. 11—17; Mark iv. 11, 12, 21—25; Luke viii. 10, 16—18 249
The Seed in the different kinds of Ground, chap. xiii. 3—9, 18—23; Mark iv. 3—9, 13—20; Luke viii. 5—8, 11—15 254

PAGE
Wheat and Tares, chap. xiii. 24—30, 37—43 261
The Mustard Seed. The Heaven, chap. xiii. 31—33; Mark iv. 30—32; Luke xiii. 18—21 269
The Treasure in the Field. Pearl and Net, chap. xiii. 44—50 273
The Stores of the Householder, chap. xiii. 51, 52 276
The Feeding of the Five Thousand, chap. xiv. 16—19; Mark vi. 31, 37—41; Luke ix. 13—16; John vi. 5, 10—12 278
Christ Walking on the Sea, chap. xiv. 27, 29, 31; Mark vi. 50; John vi. 20 281
The Commandment of God and the Statutes of Men. What defileth a Man, chap. xv. 3—20; Mark vii. 6—23 283
The Canaanitish Woman, chap. xv. 24, 26, 28; Mark vii. 27, 29 291
The Feeding of the Four Thousand, chap. xv. 32, 34; Mark viii. 2, 3, 5 295
Reference to the Signs of the Times, chap. xvi. 2—4; Mark viii. 12 297
Beware of the Leaven! chap. xvi. 6, 8, 11; Mark viii. 15, 17—21 299
Confession of Peter. Christ's First Announcement of his Sufferings. Taking up the Cross and following Christ, chap. xvi. 13—28; Mark viii. 27—ix. 1; Luke ix. 18—27 302
The Transfiguration. The future Elias, chap. xvii. 7, 9, 11, 12; Mark ix. 9, 12, 13 316
The Lunatic. The Unbelieving and Perverse Generation, chap. xvii. 17—21; Mark ix. 16, 19, 21—29; Luke ix. 41 321
Second Announcement of Sufferings, chap. xvii. 22, 23; Mark ix. 31; Luke ix. 44 326
The Tribute Penny and Stater, chap. xvii. 25—27 327
The True Greatness of the Disciples of Christ. The Power of the Church to bind and to loose, chap. xviii. 3—20; Mark ix. 33—50; Luke ix. 48—50 330
The Wicked Servant, chap. xviii. 22—35; Luke xvii. 3, 4 345
Of Divorce, Celibacy, and the Coming of the Little Children, chap. xix. 4—14; Mark x. 3—16; Luke xviii. 16, 17 349
On following Jesus, and the Renunciation belonging thereto. (The Rich Young Man and the Laborers in the Vineyard,) chap. xix. 17—xx. 16; Mark 18—31; Luke xviii. 18—30 358
Third Announcement of Suffering: Answer to the Sons of Zebedee, chap. xx. 18—28; Mark x. 33—45; Luke xviii. 31—33 375
The Two Blind Men at Jericho, chap. xx. 32; Mark x. 51, 52; Luke xviii. 41, 42 383
Christ sends for the Asses, chap. xxi. 2, 3; Mark xi. 2, 3; Luke xix. 30, 31 384
The Den of Robbers, and the Children's Praise, chap. xxi. 13—16; Mark xi. 17; Luke xix. 46 387
The Fig-Tree. The Power of Faith and Prayer, chap. xxi. 19—22; Mark xi. 14, 22, 26 390
Christ's Answer respecting his Authority to the wilfully Ignorant: The Baptism of John: The Two Sons: The Wicked Husbandman: The Corner-Stone, chap. xxi. 24—44; Mark ix. 29—xii. 11; Luke xx. 3—18 393
The Marriage of the King's Son, chap. xxii. 2—14 403
Christ's Answer respecting the Tribute to Cæsar, chap. xxii. 18—21; Mark xii. 15—17; Luke xx. 23—25 409
Answer respecting the Resurrection, chap. xxii. 29—32; Mark xii. 24—27; Luke xx. 34—38 414
Answer to the Question, which is the Great Commandment, chap. xxii. 37—45; Mark xii. 29—37; Luke xx. 41—44 422
Woe to the Pharisees: All Blood upon this Generation: Farewell to Jerusalem, chap. xxiii. 2—39; Mark xii. 38—40; Luke xx. 46, 47 (Luke xi. 39—52; xiii. 34, 35 434
The Prophecy, chap. xxiv. and xxv. 451
The First Coming: Destruction of Jerusalem: Dispersion of Israel, chap. xxiv. 2, 4—28; Mark xiii. 2, 5—23; Luke xxi. 6, 8—24 454
The Middle Coming: Appearing of His Kingdom: Gathering together of the Elect, chap. xxiv. 29—44; Mark xiii. 24—33; Luke xxi. 25—36 465
First Parable: The Faithful and Wise Servant, chap. xxiv. 45—51; Mark xiii. 34—37 (Luke xiv. 42—46 474
Second Parable: The Wise Virgins, chap. xxv. 1—13 476
Third Parable: The Faithful Servants, chap. xxv. 14—30 (Luke xix. 12—27) 481
Last Coming: General and Final Judgment, chap. xxv. 31—46 487

THE GOSPEL OF MARK.

To the Unclean Spirit: Hold thy Peace, chap. i. 25; Luke iv. 35 491
To Preach in other Places also, chap. i. 38; Luke iv. 43 492
The Sons of Thunder (The Little Ship Ready), chap. iii. 17 (9) 493
Parable: The Seed Growing of Itself, chap. iv. 26—29 495
Ephphatha, and the Prohibition to speak of it, chap. vii. 34, 36 498
The Gradual Healing of the Blind Man, chap. viii. 23, 25, 26 500
The True Greatness of the Disciples of Christ: The not following with us: The Fire and Salt prepared for self-denial, chap. ix. 33—50; Luke ix. 48—50 (Matt. xviii. 3—20) 501
The Widow's Mite, chap. xii. 43, 44; Luke xxi. 3, 4 511

THE GOSPEL OF LUKE.

PAGE
The First Preaching in Nazareth, chap. iv. 17—27 (Matt. xiii. 57; Mark vi. 4) ... 514
Peter's Draught of Fishes and his Calling, chap. v. 4—10 (Matt. iv. 19; Mark i. 17) ... 522
The Raising to Life of the Young Man at Nain, chap. vii. 13, 14 ... 524
The Woman who was a Sinner, and Simon the Pharisee, chap. vii. 40—50 ... 526
Disowning of the Zeal of Elias. What Spirit should ye be of, Children? chap. ix. 55, 56 ... 532
Yet a Third Word to a Follower: About looking back, chap. ix. 62 ... 535
The Sending Out of the Seventy, chap. x. 2—16 ... 536
The Return of the Seventy: False and True Joy of the Disciples of the Lord, chap. x. 18—24 ... 539
What shall I do to inherit Eternal Life? The Compassionate Samaritan, chap. x. 26, 37 ... 543
Martha and Mary. One thing is needful, chap. x. 41, 42 ... 550
The Lord Teaches us to Pray, What and How: The Heavenly Friend and Father, chap. xi. 2—13 (Matt vi. 9—13, vii. 7—11) ... 554
The Benediction pronounced upon His Mother transferred to all, chap. xi. 28 ... 559
An Earlier Woe to the Pharisees and Scribes, chap. xi. 39—52 (Matt. xxiii. 2—39) ... 560
The Disciples warned against Hypocrisy. The Fear of Man and Littleness of Faith, chap. xii. 1—12 (Matt. xvi. 6, x. 26—33, xii. 31, 32, x. 19, 20) ... 563
The People and the Disciples warned against various Folly. Covetousness and Earthliness of Mind; Lack of Watchfulness and Fidelity in the Disciples; Folly of the People in not observing the present Day of Grace, and thinking of the coming Judgment, chap. xii. 14—59 (Matt. vi. 25—33, vi. 19—21, xxiv. 42—51, x. 34—36, xvi. 2, 3, v. 25, 26) ... 564
Threatening Appeal to the Impenitent, occasioned by the Report of Pilate's Injustice, chap. xiii. 2—9, 574
Healing on the Sabbath: The Daughter of Abraham loosed from the Bonds of Satan, chap. xiii. 12, 15, 16 ... 578
Answer to the Question whether there are few that be Saved: The Strait Gate and Shutting out of many, chap. xiii. 24—30 (Matt. vii. 13, 14, 21—23, viii. 11, 12, xx. 16) ... 580
Reply to the Hypocritical Warning against Herod. The Fox and the Prophet-Murderess. Prophetic Departure from Jerusalem, chap. xiii. 32—35 (Matt. xxiii. 37—39) ... 583
A Second Sabbath Healing, chap. xiv. 3, 5 (Matt. xii. 10, 11) ... 586
The ungrounded Pretensions of proud Pharisees and unreflecting Followers repelled. Three Parables twice over: the being invited, our own Inviting, and the Refusing Guests; the Requirements of Discipleship; the true Ability both for Building and Warfare, chap. xiv. 8—35 (Matt. xxiii. 12, xxii. 2—9, x. 37, 38) ... 587
His receiving Sinners Vindicated from the Censure of the Self-righteous. The Sinner's Repentance or Punishment, in a Series of Parables, chap. xv. 4—xvi. 31 ... 600
The Seeking of the Lost, the Joy over the Found: the Lost Sheep, and the Woman's Piece of Silver, chap. xv. 4—10 (Matt. xviii. 12, 13) ... 602
The Seeking, Receiving, Forbearing Love of the Father towards the Penitent and the Self-willed, the Open and the Concealed Sinner: The Two Sons, chap. xv. 11—32 ... 608
The Converted Sinner's Prudence in Escaping from Punishment which yet threatens even him: the Unjust Steward, True Fidelity in the use of Worldly Goods, chap. xvi. 1—13 ... 625
The Unconverted Sinner's first Punishment among the Dead, after rejecting the Word of Repentance and Faith: the Rich Man in Torments, and Father Abraham, chap. xvi. 15—31 ... 640
The True Faith which overcometh Offences, chap. xvii. 1—10 (Matt. xviii. 6, 7, 15, 21, 22, xvii. 20), 660
The Thankful One: the Unthankful Nine, chap. xvii. 14, 17—19 ... 666
When Cometh the Kingdom of God? chap. xvii. 20—37 (Matt. xxiv. 23—28, 37—41, 17, 18 ... 668
The Importunate Widow before the Unjust Judge, chap. xviii. 2—8 ... 675
The Pharisee and the Publican, chap. xviii. 10—14 ... 680
The Tarrying with Zacchæus, chap. xix. 5, 9, 10 ... 680
Parable of the Servants of the Nobleman who goes away to receive a Kingdom, chap. xix. 12—27 (Matt. xxv. 14—30) ... 689
The Entrance into Jerusalem: the Stones Crying Out. The Great Destruction, chap. xix. 40, 42—44, 692

TEXTUAL INDEX.

		Page
Matt.	iii. 15	5
"	iv. 10	8
"	iv. 17	27
"	iv. 19.....28,	523
"	iv. 19—21	564
"	v. 25, 26	564
"	v.—vii	31
"	vi. 9—13.....83,	554
"	vi. 14—vii	95
"	vi. 25—33	564
"	vii. 7—11	554
"	vii. 13, 14, 21—23	580
"	viii. 3, 4	133
"	viii. 7—13	135
"	viii. 11, 12	580
"	viii. 20—22	138
"	viii. 26	142
"	viii. 32	144
"	ix. 2—6	147
"	ix. 9—13	150
"	ix. 15—17	154
"	ix. 22	160
"	ix. 24	162
"	ix. 28—30	164
"	ix. 36—38	165
"	x. 5—42	167
"	x. 19, 20	563
"	x. 26—33	563
"	x. 34—36	564
"	x. 37, 38	587
"	xi. 4—30	191
"	xii. 3—8	218
"	xii. 10, 11	586
"	xii. 11—13	223
"	xii. 25—45	224
"	xii. 31, 32	563
"	xii. 48—50	244
"	xiii	246
"	xiii. 11—17	249
"	xiii. 12	587
"	xiii. 3 to 9, 18—23	254
"	xiii. 24—30, 37—43.	261
"	xiii. 31—33	269
"	xiii. 44—50	273
"	xiii. 51, 52	276
"	xiii. 57	514
"	xiv. 16—19	278
"	xiv. 27, 29, 31	281
"	xv. 3—20	283
"	xv. 24, 26, 28	291
"	xv. 32—34	295
"	xvi. 2—4.....297,	564
"	xvi. 6, 8, 11.....299,	563
"	xvi. 13—28	302
"	xvii. 7, 9, 11, 12	316
Matt.	xvii. 17—21	321
"	xvii. 20	660
"	xvii. 22, 23	326
"	xvii. 25—27	327
"	xviii. 3—20.....330,	501
"	xviii. 6, 7, 15, 21, 22,	660
"	xviii. 12, 13	602
"	xviii. 22—35	345
"	xix. 4—14	349
"	xix. 17—xx. 16	358
"	xx. 16	580
"	xx. 18—28	375
"	xx. 32	383
"	xxi. 2, 3	384
"	xxi. 13—16	387
"	xxi. 19—22	390
"	xxi. 24—44	392
"	xxii. 2—14.....403,	587
"	xxii. 18—21	409
"	xxii. 29—32	414
"	xxii. 37—45	422
"	xxiii. 2—39.... 434,	560
"	xxiii. 37—39	583
"	xxiv. 2, 4—28	454
"	xxiv. 23—28, 37—41, 17, 18	668
"	xxiv. 29—44	465
"	xxiv. 45—51....474,	564
"	xxiv. and xxv	451
"	xxv. 1—13	476
"	xxv. 14—30....481,	689
"	xxv. 31—46	486
Mark	i. 15	27
"	i. 17	523
"	i. 25	491
"	i. 27	28
"	i. 38	492
"	i. 41—44	133
"	ii. 5, 8, 8—11	147
"	ii. 14—17	150
"	ii. 19—22	154
"	ii. 23—28	218
"	iii. 3—5	223
"	iii. 17 (9)	493
"	iii. 23—29	224
"	iii. 33—35	244
"	iv. 3—9, 13—20	254
"	iv. 11, 12, 21—25	249
"	iv. 26—29	495
"	iv. 30—32	269
"	iv. 35—39, 40	142
"	v. 8, 9, 19	144
"	v. 30—34	160
"	v. 36—41 (43)	162
Mark	vi. 4	514
"	vi. 8—11	167
"	vi. 31, 37—41	278
"	vi. 34	165
"	vi. 50	281
"	vii. 6—23	283
"	vii. 27, 29	291
"	vii. 34—36	498
"	viii. 2, 3, 5	295
"	viii. 12	297
"	viii. 15, 17—21	299
"	viii. 23, 25, 26	500
"	viii. 27, ix. 1	302
"	ix. 9, 12, 13	316
"	ix. 16, 19, 21, 29	321
"	ix. 29	393
"	ix. 31	326
"	ix. 33—50.....330,	501
"	x. 3—16	349
"	x. 18—31	358
"	x. 33—45	375
"	x. 51, 52	583
"	xi. 2, 3	384
"	xi. 14, 22, 26	390
"	xi. 17	387
"	xii. 11	393
"	xii. 15—17	409
"	xii. 24—27	414
"	xii. 29—37	422
"	xii. 38—40	434
"	xii. 43, 44	511
"	xiii. 2, 5—23	454
"	xiii. 24—33	465
"	xiii. 34—37	474
Luke	ii. 49	1
"	iv. 4, 8, 12	8
"	iv. 17—27	514
"	iv. 35	491
"	iv. 43	492
"	v. 4—10.....28,	523
"	v. 13, 14	133
"	v. 20, 22—24	147
"	v. 27—32	150
"	v. 35—39	154
"	vi. 3—5	218
"	vi. 8—10	223
"	vi. 20—49.....31,	127
"	vii. 9	135
"	vii. 13, 14	524
"	vii. 22—35	191
"	vii. 40—50	526
"	viii. 5—8, 11—15	254
"	viii. 10, 16, 18	249
"	viii. 21	244

		Page
Luke	viii. 22—25	142
"	viii. 30—39	144
"	viii. 45—48	160
"	viii. 50—54 (55, 56).	162
"	ix. 3—5	167
"	ix. 13—16	278
"	ix. 18—27	302
"	ix. 41	321
"	ix. 44	326
"	ix. 48—50....330,	501
"	ix. 55—56	532
"	ix. 58—60	138
"	ix. 62	535
"	x. 2	166
"	x. 2—16	536
"	x. 18—24	539
"	x. 26—37	543
"	x. 41, 42	550
"	xi. 2—13	554
"	xi. 17—36	224
"	xi. 28	559
"	xi. 39—52.....560,	434
Luke	xii. 1—12	566
"	xii. 14—59	564
"	xii. 42—46	474
"	xiii. 2—9	574
"	xiii. 12, 15, 16	578
"	xiii. 18—21	269
"	xiii. 24—30	580
"	xiii. 32—35.....583,	434
"	xiv. 3—5	586
"	xiv. 8—35	587
"	xv. 4—xvi. 31	600
"	xv. 4—10	602
"	xv. 11—32	608
"	xvi. 1—13	625
"	xvi. 15—31	640
"	xvii. 1—10	660
"	xvii. 3, 4	345
"	xvii. 14, 17—19	666
"	xviii. 2—8	675
"	xviii. 10—14	680
"	xviii. 16, 17	349
"	xviii. 18—30	358
Luke	xviii. 20—37	668
"	xviii. 31—33	375
"	xviii. 41, 42	383
"	xix. 5, 9, 10	686
"	xix. 12—27.....481,	689
"	xix. 30, 31	384
"	xix. 40, 42—44	692
"	xix. 46	387
"	xx. 3—18	393
"	xx. 23—25	409
"	xx. 34—38	414
"	xx. 41—44	422
"	xx. 46, 47	434
"	xxi. 6, 8—24	454
"	xxi. 25—36	465
"	xxi. 3, 4	511
John	i. 38—51	13
"	ii. 4—8	19
"	ii. 16—19	21
"	vi. 5, 10—12	278
"	vi. 20	281

THE FIRST WORDS.

Not, indeed, absolutely the first words. The child-words of that most marvellous, most holy childhood, in which the Divinity, gradually beaming through the veil of pure, lovely humanity, comes forth from its profoundest mystery into manifestation, an ever-continuous birth of the eternal Spirit into the human spirit, the human soul; who could comprehend, retain, record? Joseph stood at reverent distance, Mary felt and anticipated all that the purest, most simple faith was capable of—and yet very little. The angels more remotely learned the wisdom of God, while they worshipped before the swaddling-clothes in which the Lord, who should bruise the serpent's head, first moved. Satan began to inquire and make the experiment whether he has nothing in this One too; and could not understand this new thing. The mighty One grew up secretly into the consciousness and possession of his inherited dignity—secretly even, at first, to himself. Just as Christ first fully understood the development of his youth, when he looked back upon it from his manhood, after he had come to the full knowledge of himself; in like manner will it be vouchsafed to his Church, arrived at maturity, to understand the first earthly history of her Lord, which is reserved for her heavenly study. For nothing befell him, which was not to be fully and perfectly known. Then will Mary remember and relate all. But for the time that now is, we have the mature Christ in his word, fulfilling his office among us. One word of the child we have recorded for us, as a note and witness of the hidden portion of his growth and development—that one word of great moment, in which his self-recognition first distinctly breaks forth from the depths of his childhood's unconsciousness. Thus it is the last peculiar word of his childhood, but at the same time, the first, which the Son of the Father speaks. In this we find much, here below, to meditate and observe upon—both as to what preceded and what followed it—so far, that is, as we may now understand it. It was entrusted by Mary's lips for record to Luke, whose gospel in its first two chapters already goes beyond Matthew and Mark, reaching forth towards John's introduction concerning the Word made flesh.

THE FIRST WORDS OF JESUS TO HIS PARENTS CONCERNING HIS FATHER.

(Luke ii. 49.)

Solitary floweret out of the wonderful enclosed garden of the thirty years, plucked precisely as the swollen bud, at a distinctive crisis, is bursting into bloom. To mark this, is assuredly the design and meaning of the present record. The child Jesus sought to know himself, and his whole life of childhood was this seeking: here he begins to find out his own mystery, and it is not merely a first word to his parents and to us, but also a first word of the eternal Spirit in the human spirit of the person of the God-man. This is attested in ver. 50, which intimates that this was the first "My Father" that had fallen from the lips of the child.

The history connected with this word must be recalled, in order to its being rightly understood. It is pre-eminently objective, simply traces the occurrences as they transpire, and thus says in the best manner, and exhibits most lucidly, what on this occasion was to be said and exhibited. It is not even mentioned at the outset that his parents took the boy Jesus with them to Jerusalem; yet there is a latent proof in the "twelve years," as indeed the whole narrative, that this was the first time. Scripture is very sparing of words, where the right reader is able to catch the right meaning. We learn from other sources, that the youth of Israel in that period were reputed בְּנֵי הַתּוֹרָה, (sons of the law). All things from his circumcision onwards proceed in the ordinary course with this extraordinary child.

Luke simply relates that the child Jesus remained behind, without imputing blame to the parents or vindicating him: the sequel sufficiently explains all. They were justified in leaving the youth to his own discretion in Jerusalem, as they had often done elsewhere; and supposed quite innocently, that he would be found in his own place in the company: their error lay not in this. But that the youth wholly absorbed by the Temple and all that was to be seen and heard there, would give his thoughts to nothing else, that he now would belong to it, they considered not before, nor even when it should have been obvious to them, upon their seeking him. Hence we may again collect that it was both for him and for them the first time.

The mistaken idea that Jesus taught, contrary to the appropriate order of human life generally, and much more of his lowly life, is refuted by ver. 46. He sat as a learner, hearing those who taught and asking them questions;* strictly, indeed, and properly, as one who yet knew not, but whose progress and learning went on into ever-increasing wisdom (vers. 40–52). His questions were the pure light-questions of innocence and truth, which keenly and deeply penetrated into the confused errors of the Rabbinical teaching. Rightly to question is the highest wisdom which the learner, as such, can possess. For one genuine question of him who seeks in the right direction itself contains, more realized truth than a thousand disjointed answers of the false wisdom of books and words. Thus does the Galilæan youth in his divine-human simplicity confound the masters in Israel sitting in the loftiest chairs of the erudition of the age, and the seat of the learner predicts the future throne of the teacher.† His light shines forth upon the world now at the first with such simple conviction, that many of those who were susceptible were astonished at the understanding displayed in his questions, and in the answers which he gave when, as would naturally enough follow, he was questioned in return; at least all who gave heed to him—which many who were "offended" at him might not as yet, strictly speaking, be disposed to do.

Jesus brings with him a knowledge and understanding of the written word of God derived from the school of home: he finds this to some extent reproduced in Jerusalem, but only as falsified and overlaid by the errors of human teaching. This contradiction, which at the very first so glaringly manifests itself, stirs mightily his truth-seeking spirit. He had innocently expected to receive from the masters in the house of God the full and much desired answer to his accumulated questions, and nothing but truth and wisdom; but he finds it otherwise, and detects the disparity by that sense of truth which from the beginning recoiled from every error. He could already have taught, but it enters not his mind that he could; he rather asks questions. And what questions, did we but know them! Many a preintimation, we may suppose, of his later manner of asking—How is it written, then, in this or in that Scripture? Thus by Holy Writ he presses hard upon the precepts of man, even as babes and sucklings‡ have done by his Spirit in all ages since; and thus without designing it, or being even conscious of doing so, he opens out the meaning of Scripture. The main subject of their communications is the Messiah and his kingdom: this theme arouses most fully the ready presentiment with which he came there, and in the course of this questioning, which is but the asking after himself, he finds that great answer which the Spirit alone could give him, he makes the discovery of himself, in the first consciousness, not yet mature but now truly beginning—I am He! This he conceals, in deep and pure humility, from the astonished ones around him; but this first reproof of his parents, now least expected, extorts from its profoundest sanctuary this great utterance.

It was the first reproof which he received. They had all along addressed him as "child" with many a direction and admonition, but had never found anything to reprove. The foster-father even now remains standing, as ever, at reverent distance; the mother alone ventures with a mother's right to speak, yet at the same time in the father's name. She indeed only ventures upon a question appealing to his tested integrity as a child, as if she would say—What thou hast now done, I understand not for the first time! Done to us,—this gave an unanswerable pathos to her question; for he had never given them pain before. Thy father—thus had Joseph till now been spoken of. Never, indeed, had Mary's lips as yet been bold to say to the "Son of the Highest" (Luke i. 32) concerning the Most High: Thy Father! Yet are her words—not We, thy parents, but, Thy father and I—a most exquisitely delicate expression of that sacred secret which had almost faded away in her soul, but the consciousness of which is already prepared to anticipate the great word which her son is about to utter.

And he said unto them—How is it that ye sought me! Wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business? Instead of acknowledging any error or uttering any regret for their sorrow and anxiety, he gives them a kind and earnest lesson, though without appearing to do so, concerning their whole parental relation, especially in time past. There are two counter-questions in answer to the two questions of his mother. First of all, he puts another wherefore against hers, as he becomes conscious of the feeling with which they had sought him. It had been so natural to him to be and to abide where he was, that he had not thought of their seeking him at all; and he shows that he regards it as quite needless, at least to seek him sorrowing in grief and anxiety, as if it were possible for him to be in wrong or in danger. The reproof is thus given back, and in such a way, that the blame (as is too often the case, alas! in the human

---

* Not as Sepp (Leben Christi), who supposes that a chair of instruction had been instantly given him in the midst of the teachers, in order to resolve questions and propose them.

† "To answer children is indeed an examen rigorosum," says Hamann. But there is herein foreshadowed the future wisdom of Jesus, as Hamann says again: "He who will stop the mouths of scribes and sophists, must—know how to put questions" (Edition of Roth, ii. 424).

‡ Hence the Rabbins themselves know, that the word of God out of the mouth of childhood is to be received as from the mouth of the Sanhedrim, of Moses, yea of the blessed God himself (Bammidbar Rabba, 14).

education of children of sin) is reflected upon the parents.* But he speaks without any design to shame or correct them; he innocently asks the question of his parents, as he had done before of the doctors; and all the shame lay in the circumstance itself. Incomparably and inconceivably artless, as elevated as it is childlike, is that Wist ye not? That which he here now, while he utters it, begins for the first time to conceive and understand clearly, becomes at the same time so natural to him, that it is as if he had ever known it, as if it could not be otherwise than it was, as if it must be equally self-explained to every one else.

Mary and Joseph assuredly knew who the child of their charge was. But so naturally had the human side of his development proceeded before their eyes, and so accustomed had they been to this alone, as time passed on, that they may well have sometimes nearly lost sight of that which was higher and peculiar in him. Even now, when they were reminded of it by this impressive circumstance, they do not rise above their mere human ideas. And this was their fault: not that they for a while trusted him, uncared for, out of their own hands, and not that they at first supposed that he would re-appear in his right place; but that afterwards, when they found it otherwise, they could sorrowing seek him in any other than that which was his right place.

The opposition between his own "My Father" and Mary's "Thy father," referring to Joseph, is very distinct. In this designedly spoken and well-weighed expression, lies the deep significance of this whole word. No human lips had hitherto pronounced it, for the approximations to it in the Old Testament and in the Apocrypha† are clearly to be distinguished from this my Father. Here already, as ever afterwards, only my Father—never conjoined with us, our Father! This my deepens into a most exclusive, personal appropriation, when the Son of the Highest thus responds to his parents—Ye—sought me! Wist ye not that I—? The great truth rises before him out of Joseph's name of father, that his own true Father is he, whom no one in Israel had ever addressed by that name, and himself never till now: He, in whose house and Temple he now stands.‡

Yet he does not simply say, in my Father's house, but according to the more extensive and undefined ἐν τοῖς of the Greek, in my Father's matters. The Spirit in the youth speaks at once in the later manner of the man,—with profound meaning in concise expression. The first and most obvious meaning refers certainly to the place, the house, namely, where they should at once have sought him, or, rather, supposed him be, without seeking him at all; but when we thoughtfully penetrate through the surface to the heart of the expression, we find much more than this included in it. The next sense is that of a conclusive justification of his remaining behind in the temple without reference to his parents' knowledge and permission—In my Father's will, by his guidance and inward direction. When hitherto any specific objection in his mind, conceived rather as a presentiment, had come into collision with the parental will or the ordinary subordination of childhood, he had subjected and denied himself; but now, his full age commencing, this also must begin to cease, and from this time forward they must, as he now shows by a virtual injunction to be his will, leave him without any further guidance of theirs, knowing by this token that he is about his Father's business. But this emancipation from his earthly parents takes place only as springing from a most firm adherence to his heavenly Father. To be in any thing, as a common expression among men, denotes the occupation of the whole life in it, the being wholly given up to it. Viewed thus, the phraseology gives a yet further answer, how it came to pass that he remained behind, and is a disclosure of the most secret self-justifying reason of the circumstance: I thought of nothing else, it was my meat, the instinctive aim and impulse of my being, that higher law within me, by obeying which I was not disobedient to you, —I must! Here already is the germ of that sacred must, which the Lord so often utters in the subsequent way of his obedience. The contrary among other children might have been more or less marked—dissipating attention to the wonders of the great city, visitations among friends and acquaintances, thoughts about the journey and the return. But both the thoughts and the actions of the holy child were entirely absorbed and wrapped up in this one thing. Thus, as Von Gerlach observes, this first utterance is even thus early "a word of self-renunciation, of self-sacrificing surrender to God, in holy zeal for Him and His House."

Again, if we yet more deeply penetrate into the meaning of this word in relation to the occurrence to which it refers, the question arises, What drew and impelled him as the youth (for such as yet he was) to the Father? The parents found him occupied in learning

* Joseph and Mary had scarcely been quite free from such blame in the bringing up of the holy child. "They often treated him as only their child, and probably afflicted him many times by an inappropriate exercise of their parental authority" (Roos, Lebensgesch. J. Chri. New edition).

† Isa. lxiii.; Mal. ii. 10; Wisd. xiv. 3; Ecclus. xxiii. 1; not so much in the sense of a personal relation, as in that which is indicated by Deut. xxxii. 6; viii. 5; Psa. ciii. 13.

‡ With this first word, which was spoken, withal, in the presence of the doctors of Israel, K nig (Menschwerdung, p. 305) combines that last one also spoken to them, Matt. xxii. 42. From beginning to end Jesus thus sets aside the paternity of Joseph, and testifies his own consciousness of a supernatural origin.

and asking questions in the place where God's word was to be learned. Then he tells them once more, why he remained, and must have remained there—I am in my Father's school for my own instruction. Inasmuch as he does not say, Among the doctors, masters, and wise men, but instead of them names only the Father; his word may be regarded as containing that great and weighty disclosure of his own previous and subsequent inner education, for the sake of which principally this record is given to us. Just now, when he begins to be a "son of the law," he first calls God his Father—his master, teacher, educator.* Jesus was most inwardly taught of the Father, although not without external and human instrumentality. Life, instruction, holy writ, awakened what was within him; he seeks his God in the Temple, in order to find him as his Father; among the masters in Israel he asks questions, in order that through them he may receive from on high the true answers; and the Father's inner guidance even connects itself with the custom to take the youth of twelve years' old first up to the feast to present them before the Lord. Thus it was the Father alone who taught him when his mother early recited or read to him out of Scripture; and not otherwise was it with the youth, the young man, and the man in the synagogue at Nazareth. And what was it that he learned, upon what were his questions and investigations set, in that secret education wherein he "heard of the Father" concerning all things, but especially concerning the Old Testament Scriptures and dispensations? That one word was the rudimental object of his study, which at the close of his life's development was unfolded to him by the Spirit in all its clearness and power—Thou art my Son! He inquired concerning himself with vehement desire to know the mystery of his own being and the problem of his life, and concerning the will of Him who had sent him to finish His work (John iv. 34). In the "labor of his childish spirit, to admit into itself and rightly adjust all things," divine things according to the word of God in the Old Testament were of chief concern to him. "Therein lived the childish consciousness of Jesus, in all the profundity of his secret presentiments."† As he himself had ever, from the beginning, possessed a consciousness of the object of his life, but as yet concealed in his childish capacity;‡ and as this first disclosure (to be followed itself by many such, in advancing clearness and assurance) seems to him at once as natural as if it had never been otherwise than clear to him; so in like manner does he in childish confidence ask his parents—Wist ye not then every thing concerning me long since? And assuredly, however much such a saying must have astonished them, there was so much in it that was right and true, that they could not but take shame to themselves that they had been troubled about the Son of the Highest, as if any evil could befall him before the accomplishment of the mission of his life; that they should have thought it needful to guard him, as if, when out of their immediate care, he could possibly stray beyond his Father's hand, and guidance, and protection. With this last meaning his inquiring word comes round again to the obvious reply which the occasion demanded, and gives the reason of his first question: How is it that ye could seek me sorrowing? Considered ye not that I am always in my Father's hands and care? But yet once again was this altogether forgotten, under the cross, by the deeply-stricken mother—I am not alone, for the Father is with me (John xvi. 32).

Let the whole fulness of this significance be once more gathered into this question, which sublimely presupposes the profoundest mystery as manifest—Knew ye not all this long ago concerning me? Thus his word contains an impressive reference to the past, in order to point the view to the future; an explanation concerning the whole life of the child, and its development into the youth, the young man, the man.* Not as if the mind of the child had specifically conceived all that we deduce from his word, but he speaks prophetically of himself. The Spirit of Christ in himself spreads its wings, and that word which spontaneously gushed from the deepest source of his life in the Father, becomes to the Son a holy text, which he, too, may search into yet more diligently (1 Peter i. 11). Yet is it a pure and genuine child-word, the immediate and unstudied utterance, on the border of childhood, of child-like simplicity; and thus it discloses the first independent acting of him who, passing the limit of childhood, abides still in his Father's business.

And they understood it not. This is recorded concerning the first word of the Word, and of those who, as being nearest to himself, had every advantage for understanding it! They pondered the sacred mystery, and thought not that in catching its most obvious sense, they understood it in its fulness. Even Mary herself, like the rest, appears not yet to understand, before the day of Pentecost, the mystery of the person of Jesus—and who is there below that fully understands it? Thou, vain expositor, hast not the heart

* As Henry Alford says very excellently in his Commentary on the New Test. (London, 1849)—he has so repeatedly mentioned my Reden Jesu, that I am bound in gratitude to make similar reference to him.

† So Braune, in his admirable Auslegung der Evangelien, which we shall now be glad often to compare and cite.

‡ The divine-human self-consciousness under the form of youthful presentiment, present from the beginning, not in any wise superadded later. See Liebner, Christologie, i. 311.

* Just for this reason we cannot agree with Braune, that any "calling to activity in the kingdom of God" is here signified—this would overstep the limits of childhood.

of Mary probably nothing of the Pentecostal spirit; and yet art thou so ready to cry out—I understand the words which he has spoken?

Luke's supplement in vers. 51, 52 was necessary, in order to obviate misunderstanding. As soon as that word of holy righteousness was uttered—the Son of the Father is free! it was again in a sense annulled or suspended, in order to his fulfillment of all righteousness in obedience. The Father's teaching was ever a discipline of obedience (Heb. v. 8); as the Father had inwardly said to him—Tarry here! so now he says—Go down with them, and be subject to them! Hence he is not from this time forth placed in another relation even to Joseph (for the last time referred to in the little saying "to them"), who is not "his Father," and yet for the sake of his mother and his true Father, was still to be honored as such. The mystery folds itself up again in the self-denial of eighteen years, till the time when a new word brings out its other, mighty significance—"Thus it behoveth us to fulfill all righteousness!" till the time when, on the open assumption of his Messiahship, the mother has become "woman," having no longer any authority, and his "my Father" publicly resounds in his house, and before his people, no more to cease till that last word, which coincides with this first—"Father, into thine hands!"

And Jesus increased—so that his self-consciousness was not yet strictly speaking perfected and fully developed. As in age, so also he increased through the teaching of the Father, in wisdom, in his obedience through the grace of God which descended upon his humanity before it came, through him, upon us all. The bud now burst unfolds itself from within; in the heart of this child there is no foolishness bound up (Prov. xxii. 15); no folly in Israel or Nazareth has power to affect him; he advances into all that belongs to manhood, but contracts from it none of its iniquity or sin; all things are constrained to serve him and minister to his wisdom. The displeasure of God has never rested upon his holy One, but the complacency of God, his favor goes on ever increasing with his increase in wisdom, until it is consummated at his baptism. Even his favor with men increases likewise, for he forbears entirely as yet from testifying against their folly and their sin; and therefore the world as yet hateth him not (John vii. 7). "Let us go on in friendship together," said they in Nazareth. O, what gracious words may have issued from his lips during those eighteen years, which are not recorded! But the words which, by the Father's ordination, he was to testify to the world, are sealed up till his hour was come. Then one after another burst forth, each, as it were, a deeper stream from the long pent-up fountain of eternal wisdom and truth.

THE FIRST WORDS OF CONSECRATION TO HIS OFFICE.

(Matt. iii. 15.)

The history of our Lord's baptism, like that of his cross, is contained in all the four Evangelists; but the word which he then uttered is preserved by Mathew alone, as being strictly a word of fulfillment, and therefore belonging especially to the fundamental idea of the first Gospel.

John knew the Lord and yet knew him not. He knew him not, according to his own testimony (John i. 31), as the Messias and the Son of God; but he knew him as one, whose whole life from the beginning had silently cried, Which of you convinceth me of sin? Since he had been in the deserts, he had probably seen him but little, yet often enough, as his life could not have been altogether recluse, to awaken within him the presentiment which now deepens into conviction. His saying in ver. 14 proceeded from the Spirit, who then descended upon him, and is not to be explained on the ordinary principles of human thought. It is a word which marks the transition at that moment taking place within him from presentiment to inward assurance. The question at the same time breaks out in it, which had long lain deep in the heart of the humble Baptist—But who will baptize me, who am also myself a sinner? Certainly, acccording to the ordinance of God, his office and function extended over all, whether they were worse or better than himself, for his mission was to baptize with water; and therefore he baptized without hesitation every Simeon or Nathanael as he came. But here was One greater than Nathanael! John knew this not, indeed, until he saw the Spirit descend, according to the sign which had been given him; yet his spirit goes out towards him with that anticipatory and presentient feeling, which had moved him in his mother's womb towards the mother of his Lord. Jesus comes in all the spiritual grace of gentleness and humility with sinners to the baptism of repentance; as John beholds him, he sees shining through this deep humility the high majesty of the holy One; and that he has an inward token of this, constitutes his own dignity. He has baptized many, has seen and in some sense seen through men of all kinds; but no one like this had as yet come before him. They have all bowed down before him; but before this man, bows down in the irrepressible emotion of his own most profound contrition, the sinful man in the greatest prophet. It might well have prompted him to cry: Art thou then a sinner, a man? To that point his question ventures not to go, it remains suspended between the thought of the man, and the superadded presentiment of the Spirit.* Enough, however, is clear to be uttered thus: Who am I in thy presence, that I in the office and ministry of baptism should be placed over thee?

Then answers the Lord with equal grace and majesty, with as much simplicity as fulness of meaning,† by another of his distinctive first words—the first official word, with which he prepares himself for his anointing, and consecration to his office. He first of all gently sets aside the prohibition and refusal of John, and utters with dignified grace that single word, Suffer it now! Had he said no more, that would have sufficed to the Baptist, for its plainness and dignity were such as to silence all further questioning. It at once intimated, —I know what I now do; I am taught from above to submit to baptism, as thou art taught to baptize. Now for a time thou seemest to be the greater, who consecrates the less—soon, as it is fit, will our relative position be reversed! Now—it is only a transitional relation (as Neander has well observed)—now: My hour is come, is the Lord's thought for himself: Perform thy function upon me, thou shalt afterwards learn what I do, is his meaning with regard to John. This promise, indeed, is already and instantaneously fulfilled, when, in order to remove all the scruples of this upright man, and to terminate this holy conflict of humility in him, by the sublimest and most commanding humility in himself, he proceeds to testify—For thus it becometh us to fulfill all righteousness.

First of all, we cannot but be profoundly impressed by the lofty contrast between this avowal of righteousness, and the confession of sin of all the others, who came to be baptized, ver. 6. And it is strange that theologians in their search for testimonies of the sinlessness of Jesus, do not find here the first and most luminous dictum probans from his own mouth. This was to John the decisive declaration, which set him perfectly at rest—Thy presentiment was true, in a deeper sense than thou canst now comprehend; I am He who knoweth no sin, but for that very reason come I in the likeness of sinners to this baptism. And it is to all the world, that shall receive this word, an all-inclusive testimony of the Lord, concerning his own office and ministry as the restorer of righteousness to sinful men.

To fulfill all righteousness: this has a large and lofty sound in the lips of a man, of an Israelite, who will speak the truth. And it shall be our righteousness, if we observe to do all these commandments before the Lord our God, as he hath commanded us (Deut. vi. 25). For no man ever in Israel could say, that on account of sin, which yields not to the commandment, therefore is the baptism of repentance for the remission of sins at the end of the economy of the law. He who now comes to this baptism, is not a sinner, but a righteous man who neither needs repentance nor pardon. It is he who for us fulfills all righteousness, who, born of a woman and made under the law which was given to the unrighteous, has already hitherto observed and performed all the commandments of the Lord to Israel; and for that very reason now subjects himself also to that baptism which was ordained of God as the concluding commandment of the old covenant, through which is the transition to the new. He received circumcision, though born without the foreskin of the heart; he was redeemed as the first born, though himself the Redeemer; in all probability he offered every sacrifice which was required of an Israelite (as we see in one instance, at least—that of the Passover), though himself the propitiatory and paschal Lamb, the archetype and substance of all these shadows; he visited the temple and the synagogue, he humbly submitted to every custom and ordinance in Israel, and even, when no sin attached to them, to those which were not ordained of God; so likewise must he be baptized "into the coming Messiah," which is nevertheless himself, just as he is the prophet to prepare his own way. In this now, therefore, there is a terminating point, not yet absolutely the last, but certainly a typical and preliminary terminating point of his obedience to the Law. In this baptism, inasmuch as it was the last external commandment of God to Israel, all righteousness was fulfilled by him.

The Lord might now have said again, as he said before—I must;—for the same innate necessity, in the obedience of the Father, prompted him now, it belonged to the same unity of his whole life. Because, however, the question is now especially concerning an external transaction, and because he would obviate the scruple of John as to the propriety, the fitness, the becomingness of that which was about to take place; he adopts this expression, It becometh us by all means! This embraces, besides the obvious reply to the plain question, a concealed testimony to the final principle of the whole course of his self-renunciation and self-substitution in the likeness of sinners. For all the first words of our Lord, especially, have so profound a background of meaning. The πρέπον, it becometh, is not simply used as it often stands in the New Testament (Eph. v. 3; 1 Tim. ii. 10), but in the full and sublime sense of Heb. ii. 10, vii. 26. It seemed fit to the righteous Father, that the

* Presentiment, not full revelation as in Luke i. 43. So far, therefore, Braune is not quite correct, "As formerly the mothers, so now the sons stand before each other." Many suppose, contrary to the whole connection of the text, that the Baptist spoke this after the baptism and manifestation! (Ἀφιῆσιν, "suffered," Jerome dimisit, which Sepp ridiculously maintains against Luther's false translation).

† Certainly with no such "arbitrariness, departing from simplicity and intended for reproof"—as Schleiermacher finds here.

Son in the sinner's stead should in a human obedience bring back their righteousness: within this boundary of thought did the Son himself in his humanity ever reverently confine himself, beyond it he knew and testified nothing. Thus it was also here, when the Baptist, who might not himself become his disciple, but only send disciples to him, was counted worthy to receive an early testimony of the mystery of his atonement which he then afterwards repeated, John i. 29. The preacher of repentance unto the kingdom of heaven expected, indeed, no earthly Jewish Messiah; he understood, as Zachariah's son and the pupil of the Spirit in the wilderness, whatever might be understood by any Israelite, from the word of prophecy concerning him who was to come. But here at the very first does the Lord openly announce to him—Placing myself in the likeness of sinners, taking their sins upon me, I shall and will fulfill righteousness for them. So might he have given back the Baptist's word literally—I have need (χρειαν ἔχω) to be baptized of thee, I must be baptized with the baptism which is prepared for me (Luke xii. 50). And so would he have spoken, if he had wished to speak to himself alone; but he says not now: Thus it becometh me—but us.

But how can he say this, and what does he mean? we ask, and all the more earnestly because we have seen that the profoundest significance of this saying concerns himself alone. The most obvious answer is that he thus replies to the separation between them which the humble scruple had expressed—I of thee, thou to me! He designs now, first of all, to induce the doubter not merely to suffer him to go down into the Jordan, but also to fulfill the external function of his office upon him, and baptize him, even as others. Thus it has this meaning as it regards John—Who art thou then? The preparer of the way, the forerunner. Now I am He that cometh after thee; thy presentiment is right; we appertain to one another, each in his office and ministry. In baptizing me, thou fulfillest all righteousness, and closest thine office: to be baptized of thee, is my righteousnes, and belongs to my ministry and the design of my life. What majesty in this word, which immediately silences all scruple; and, at the same time, what a marvellous emulaion of humility between the Lord and his servant; just as afterwards in the eleventh chapter, where the Lord who was to come, places his servant by his side as one who was also come, and of whom the Scripture had also spoken!

But even this does not yet exhaust the meaning of this great word. The baptism of which it speaks, is only in an external and typical sense the concluding point of obedience for the fulfiller of all righteousness; it is truly and essentially the true beginning-point of that obedience, the consummation of which, in the death of the cross in order to the resurrection, it pretypifies. The Lord does not say—Herein, hereby it is incumbent upon me finally to accomplish all righteousness—but thus! That is an expression of comparison, which points forward to the thing compared. This baptism to which the mature man comes, who till now has loved righteousness and hated iniquity, is his anointing to that sacrifice of himself for sinners which now first properly begins (Psa. xlv. 7). As in this baptism by prophetic figure the righteous one places himself among sinners, so was he afterwards baptized with the baptism of death, in which he as the Lamb of God bore our guilt; which was not to him the wages of sin, but the highest meritorious righteousness for us all. As now the Father confirms his righteousness by a voice from heaven, so then in the resurrection the Father justified him as his Son again (Rom. i. 4; Acts xiii. 33). It follows further, that as now the Spirit descends upon him, so then also descended the outpouring of the Spirit for us all; that baptism with the Spirit to which John alluded, without obtaining it below, and concerning which he unconsciously spoke when he said—I have neen to be baptized of thee. All this our Lord clearly saw when he came to the Jordan; and as he finally spoke of his sufferings as a baptism, so does he now already contemplate in baptism his sufferings. For now his wisdom is perfect, and he no more needs to increase in it. In that last word of his childhood the beginning of his consciousness concerning his own person broke forth; when this was grown perfect and finally sealed, this decisive word of his manhood utters his full consciousness concerning his work. This honour is reserved for him, to testify of himself, before the sign from heaven seals his testimony. He presents himself, saying—Behold I come, to do Thy will; before the Father's response—This is my beloved Son! This acceptance and obligation are to him what the confession of sin is to the sinner. Therein our sins are confessed as done away in his righteousness, and the future baptism for the true forgiveness of sins, which should be ours by virtue of his baptism, pre-announced.

And because, finally, the baptism which he thus prepares for us, finds its consummation only in the essential, actual fellowship of his death and resurrection; we remark, that the "us" in which he includes himself in his humble condescension before John, means in its deepest signification, us all. He utters it as the Son of Man in the name of humanity, as the forerunner in the name of his own, with whom he here, at the very beginning contemplating the uttermost end, most entirely unites himself.* He indeed is, pre-eminently, the Fulfiller; but all who become participators of his righteousness, fulfill in him and through him the same righteousness and in the same way. Thus it became us to become like him, as it became him in our likeness to overcome sin, and render obedience. This will immediately become manifest in the wilderness of temptation, where the Son of God not as the Son for himself, but as man, as the second Adam and the true Israel, spoils, by faith in the word, the power of Satan.

* "He desired and received baptism in the name of the people," says Nitzsch (Prakt. Theol. i. 167), but too concisely. Mark, mereover, what is said there with perfect truth, that he who comes with water and the word of the prophet to fulfill all the types, must also come with blood, then finally and fully with the Spirit.

THE FIRST WORDS OF VICTORY OVER THE TEMPTER.

(Matt. iv. 4, 7, 10; Luke iv. 4, 8, 12.)

These three words are, in their ascending connection, to be reckoned as one; and, indeed, as a third first word, approaching still nearer to the goal of his being, and drawn from the yet more profound depth of the mystery of God the Father and his Son. As the Son's first word of all concerning the Father, Luke ii. 49, embraced the whole inner life of his own most essential personality; and the second concerning his righteousness, Matt. iii. 15, the entire work of his active and passive obedience for us; so now the fulfillment of all righteousness in its three great branches, is maintained and asserted against the tempter to unrighteousness. His obedience approves itself in the renunciation of all enjoyment, of all honor, of all possession, in opposition to the prince of this world: thus does he overcome him in the abasement of faith, to which he had descended from his divine power; and leads human nature back to God again, through the selfsame way, by which it had fallen from him. Concerning the temptation of Christ in itself, its innermost ground in the Father's holy justice, its redeeming might and typical signification for us, and especially the Satanic unity of design in the three temptations of the wilderness; we shall enter into no detailed description here. It is our purpose only to expound the words of Jesus, and to direct particular attention to that which is unfolded in them.

But the words of Jesus on this occasion are not new, nor distinctively his own; they are God's words long ago uttered, and taken from the ancient Scriptures, which he as the fulfiller appropriates to himself. This is, at the outset, of great significance. The child had grown and become strong in spirit, had increased in wisdom; the man, arrived at the mature priestly age, and anointed for the inauguration of his office, is now full of the Holy Ghost (Luke iv. 1). But as afterwards the first word of the Spirit at the Pentecost was a proclamation of what had been said by the prophet Joel, so here the first words of the Lord spoken from the Spirit are only quotations from the Holy Scriptures. He has now learned them entirely, he is a master in the use of them, and will prove himself such first of all, against the enemy, whom the word of truth, which he has perverted into a lie, must again beat down. What virtue and dignity in the holy letter, which, filled with the Spirit of Christ, now becomes only life and truth! Christ makes his appeal when that old "yea, hath God said" is brought against him, not to the heavenly voice which he had just heard, but to the word of God, written in the book of Moses. The living eternal Word himself vests himself in the written word, which in its deepest foundation is written by him and for him. Let men think upon this! Let this be remembered by that theology, which refuses to accept, even from the consciousness of Christ, the entire and full authority of that which was Holy Scripture to him.

But he does not confront Satan with any of those many and clear words of prophecy which are written concerning the future bruiser of the serpent's head. Satan well knows these, but does not understand the mystery hitherto folded up in them, the human abasement and self-renunciation of the Son of God, which is indeed the central mystery of all Scripture, and the essential secret of his victory over the enemy. That enemy must first perceive this in its fulfillment. Here in the wilderness for the first time, he earnestly scrutinizes it, at once doubting and trembling; but does not thoroughly penetrate it, for he came again at the cross with his temptations, and once more foolishly brought forward his already repelled "art thou the Son of God, then save thyself!" The Lord does not permit himself to meet him with an express—I am He: he was indeed, and would thus have shown himself Satan's Lord, but would not then have been his conqueror for us. The first word which he opposes to him, says rather—Man! It is taken, as is also the second, from the temptation of Israel in the wilderness; for Israel is a type of the Son of Man, the servant of God for righteousness, that One to come, in whom alone that nature is consummated into perfect righteousness, which in all men else is ever sinking into deeper sin. Adam stood not; Israel after the flesh stood not, when the Lord his God tempted him, but rather like Satan tempted his God: but now comes the second Adam, God's true servant Israel, through whose obedience the way of life is made known, and actually thrown open—that man truly lives by the power and in the strength of the eternal word.

As Eve in the beginning rightly opposed the tempter with "God had said," but alas did not persist therein; even so now the Lord, but he holds firm. Satan knows well the word of God, and must admit its force; when in full faith and entire obedience it is used in answer against him, the might of his lying delusion is broken. Satan will challenge the wonderful power of God in nature; and his Son, if he be truly such, should make stones out of bread: but this is not the power which drives him out of that human nature, in which he now sees with doubting astonishment the eternal Son standing before him. That at least the bold challenger knew full well, and he knew it still better, who was come to be victor in this fight. Christ answered and said, placing himself as man in the obedience of faith. Thus and not otherwise does God reply to the Devil, and indeed through Christ, the Son of God and the Son of Man. He himself in his humility—submitting to be tempted in order to conquer—is that living answer of God to Satan, which in holy right resists and casts out Satan's right to humanity. Satan must now learn this, and has not finished learning it yet; for he has not even yet betaken himself to his darkness again, but continues, and will continue to tempt the members of the Head with the same temptation, until he shall also in them all be overcome and condemned.

The first temptation, which through our earthly body is most obvious to universal human nature, is that of seeking the enjoyment and nourishment of life against the will of God and independently of his gift; to make for ourselves our bread in the misuse of God's power, entrusted to us over the lower nature and the creature. Our own age exhibits the development of this in those mimic miracles which seek the world's dominion by the industry which conquers nature. Man entering into this temptation, would eat, as the son of God, that of which God has said—Thou shalt not eat of it. That was the case in paradise, even without hunger, and in the midst of the enjoyment of all the fruits of the garden of Eden which were not forbidden; and in the first fall every other was wrapped up. It was exhibited again, especially, when Israel cried in the wilderness, If we are God's people, why have we not bread and flesh at his hands according to our desire? Then did God humble his son Israel, and suffered him to hunger, to show him what was in his heart. The true salvation from this unbelief could not then yet appear, it was only typically made known to the unbelievers, that man doth not live by the creature—bread, but by the word of God. Here in Christ, who abundantly makes good what fallen man has turned to evil; who in voluntary abnegation fasts, in entire obedience hungers, and is thus released from the creature, in which Adam was sinfully held captive; here in Christ does that ancient word written concerning manna, find its new and complete significance—that for the sake of which it was before provided in the Holy Scripture.

Man doth not live by bread only, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of the Lord doth man live. Continually, and in a thousand ways, has the Spirit since then used and applied these words among the children of God, and every interpretation which the Spirit truly puts upon it, is included in its meaning. For this he caused it to be written in the prophecy of Moses, and then to be used in reply to the arch-liar by the lips of the Fulfiller. We seek now only to indicate briefly the leading principles of its interpretation.

Bread is in its general acceptation the food of man's life, regularly appointed for him as the creature instrument of the Divine word of creation and preservation—Thou shalt live thereof (Gen. i. 29; iii. 19; Psa. civ. 14). (The Book of Wisdom [xvi. 26] says instead, —It is not the growing of fruits that nourisheth man). To this stands opposed כָּל-מוֹצָא, פִּי-יְהוָה every (word) that proceedeth out of the mouth of the Lord (Deut. viii. 3); that is, most obviously, as was demonstrated in the case of Israel in the wilderness, any particular word of commandment or will issuing from the power of the Creator and Preserver, which becomes what man may live upon;—any kind of food given independently of the established order of things, as was the miraculous manna. But such manna itself, again, is only a veil of God's power; a pledge and symbol which is condescendingly reached forth to weak faith, in order that there may be something in man's mouth. Wherefore does God work miracles, and not leave man only and entirely to live upon ordinary bread, but thus oftentimes create a new thing for him? That he may make man know that even in the ordinary and natural course it is by no means nature and the creature which have and give the life, but Himself alone. Even in bread man lives not by bread only; for is not the life more than meat? Is not the word, the will, the power of God in everything; so that we do not inhale our very breath from the air, but from the breath of God? "Word" does not stand as such in the Hebrew text, but is taken here from the old exegetical translations (the Septuagint). What is the כָּל-מוֹצָא, פִּי-יְהוָה that proceedeth out of the mouth of the Lord, of which Moses wrote? The breath of the creating effluence from the eternal Power and Godhead, the Spirit, in and of whom all life, even bodily life, consists (Num. xvi. 22; Psa. civ. 29, 30). But the Spirit goes out indeed only in one prepared form, and that form is the word. In the deepest meaning of the essential and only truth, which ever contradicts the lie of Satan, all things in the world, after their kind, are only variously embodied words of the Creator, inasmuch as by his mighty word alone they are upheld in being. (Hence דָּבָר and ῥῆμα, word, in the Scripture signify also thing.) "God does not speak grammatical vocables, but true essential things. Thus sun and moon, heaven and earth, Peter and Paul, Thou and I, are nothing but words of God" (Luther). Thus the creature lives not by any other creature, any more than it lives of itself, but because, and how and of what God will. Therefore the first meaning of the saying of Jesus here—obvious in its profoundness—is: "I commit the sustentation of my life entirely into the hands of God." Moses in the presence of the Lord needed neither bread nor water for forty days (Exod. xxxiv. 28). The man Jesus died not in forty days' fast; but then only at length, when the strength of the Spirit returned to him that there might be place for temptation, felt he hunger.

But we penetrate deeper with the question, which is not always one of simple unbelief—How may this be? and how is this to be understood? Then we may reasonably ask—What is man? Not the body with its earthly, animal soul, but the true and proper man, that is, the living spirit which came forth from God, which only lives in and by the Spirit of God, which continually goes forth as Word for the preservation of the creature. Even as the body—the abiding product of its soul—only subsists through a continual formative impulse of corporeity, so do the body and soul of man, as of a living soul in the moulded dust of the earth, subsist only by the Spirit. The outer man lives by the inner, as this again by the word of God. Shouldst thou say—By bread, and determine in any case to have it, and in thy hunger to procure it for thyself, even at the cost of disobedience—any way thou canst or the tempter places it at thy hand; then art thou captive in that idolatry and delusion, which serves the creature with and instead of the Creator (Rom. i. 25). Then art thou in the way to worship the arch-liar, who promises to give that of which God ever continues the sole giver and Lord.

Nor think that thou livest at all as man, that is, according to thy pure creation as a son of God, in his image, if thou art finding a so-called life of thine own hand in the greatness of thy way (Isa. lvii. 10). For thou art dead in trespasses and sins, although the bread and the pleasures of the world should plentifully abound to thee. Here belongs, further, that most true sense of this sacred saying, according to which it is preached to those who only labor for the perishable bread of this world, and seek not the everlasting bread of God. But this leads us further and further; and "not alone" vindicates again the true life of man in God, against such as in their error cleave to any institution of the means of life, as if it was not God alone in them that gave them efficacy. As a general rule the word of God, externally written and preached, is given for the food of the inner man; but inasmuch as the living word of God in the word, is the true word, thou mayest, if it be his will, without Scripture and preaching, live by his Spirit; without intercourse with brethren, be connected with the Church; even without the physical bread of the sacrament, receive nevertheless the heavenly bread. Every manna given by God in the creature form, is a witness that points beyond itself to the immediate outgoing of God's life for the life of man, out of God's mouth into the believing mouth of man.

So does the letter of the writen word testify here in the believing mouth of Christ, to its own most essential Spirit. And the Lord, at the same time that he avows himself to be man in the life of God, gives to Satan the true and mysterious answer as to who himself is; and that is the last and profoundest sense which makes the old word his own, and transforms it into a new word, now fully for the first time exhibited in its truth. Christ, verily, is the original man, recovered from the fall, Adam and the Son of God in one. The Son of God gave himself to human nature, and incorporated himself with it; Satan's temptation would (for he now first half understands this) detach him from it again, and thereby destroy his mediatorial nature through something, which for it would have the nature of sin. Art thou, poor hungry child of man, the Son of God? Then use thy might! But he has wrapped up his might in entire self-renunciation, in order to overcome the enemy, and thus he does overcome him in simple human faith. He is himself the bread come down from heaven to give unto the world everlasting life, and shall he make for himself bread out of stones for his own proper life? Against the tempter's challenge—Art thou—he only binds himself more firmly to us all: I am man, I am humanity, I am mankind! (Just as that us is used in Matt. iii. 15.) There is, indeed, a twofold nature in humanity, the earthly Adam and that which came forth from God in him; but both in their inseparable unity constitute the proper man, and as such he is re-established in Christ, the God-man. That in him Adam lives entirely by the Logos—is the last and super-abounding fulfillment of the meaning of this word, which thus goes far beyond its application for the instruction of poor fallen man.

Satan has not yet fully apprehended what was said to him; for it penetrates too deeply into that eternal original truth, from which he is fallen, and which he no longer desires to understand: yet he is not repelled, but rather stimulated to a renewed and more earnest attack. The tempter comes again—for this is his manner, and the second temptation proceeds very much like the former. The deceiver had taken his position upon a word of God (Thou art my beloved Son!), though only to pervert it as the deducer of false consequences; he still persists in this method. Holdest thou so firmly to that which is written? Then I know yet another word, which will suit thee well. Dost thou expect, strong in thy faith, the miraculous help of thy God, even as only man? Then, instead of waiting and hungering here in the wilderness—for thou art, nevertheless, the Son of God, and to that I hold—wilt thou not spring down from the pinnacle of the temple among the people, as if thou camest down from heaven, and thus announce thyself with becoming dignity? Thus both the half-mocking audacity, and the impious enticing cunning of the tempter became more intense. He knows the letter of Scripture, and may also use it for temptation, just as he has free access to the Holy City and the Temple. He takes his word from that Psalm of faith's offence and defence against his own hellish might (Psalm xci. 5, 6, 13), which may have already in times past done him much injury; and designs in his malice and presumption to turn that well-known promise of angel-protection for mortal man, to the destruction of this wonderful Son of Man, who in this conflict will assume to be nothing more. But the Lord answers him, in words which are for ever the true defence and reply to every one-sided perversion of a saying of Scripture: It is written again! This πάλιν, again, does not mean contra, on the other hand; for no one word of the Bible contradicts any other: but it simply signifies that one Scripture teaches us how to understand and use another. We are only fully armed against the cunning of Satan, who presses upon us with isolated and wrested sentences of the Bible, when we are thoroughly grounded in a clear perception of the inner unity of the whole Scripture, which supplements itself and explains its own meaning. Our Forerunner teaches us here to use the word as our weapon in our own succeeding warfare, and teaches us especially to lay hold upon this "again it is written!" Moreover, Satan's perversion consisted not in this, that he would have the figurative expression taken literally, for that is here actually permitted to faith in God's word, and Jesus acknowledges without contradiction this interpretation; but the again instructs us in the qualification which averts its abuse.

Jesus continues near to his first quotation. The Lord proved in the wilderness his people Israel (Deut. viii. 2), whether they would tempt him or not, and alas! Israel many times tempted his God; so that afterwards in warning reference to the past, it was said to him by Moses—Ye shall not tempt the Lord your God (Deut. vi. 16). Wherein consists the tempting of God on the part of man? It is the complete opposite of the seeking in faith, of the waiting upon God in the obedience and confidence of trust, a self-willed demand of the mighty help of God; and, consequently, unbelief, disobedience, and distrust are its innermost principles. Thus did the children of Israel demand flesh for their souls (that is, according to their own lusts), and said, Can God furnish a table in the wilderness? So limited they the Holy One of Israel (Psa. lxxviii. 18, 19, 41), and put him arrogantly to the test:—as now, if he does this according to our will, it shall be well. The manna was before their eyes, and further supplies might come from the word and command of God: but they anticipated, by the word of their own self-will, the word of God upon which they should wait; and this is tempting God. This would the Lord have done now, if he had challenged the angel-guard of his God according to the promise, in order to his passage through the air, which was not his prescribed way according to the divine guidance. As he might not himself make bread for himself, so neither could he seek such a way. Satan's cunning omitted "in all thy ways:"* our Lord, however, did not think fit to point out and dwell upon this omission; but instead of such discussion, he set another decisive word of Scripture over against that which had been quoted. The Lord knows his own way, the way of humility and not of vain-glory; the way of waiting upon his God, and not of premature running and anticipation of his will: therefore, the word that is written, remains ever a lamp to his feet.

Every sin in its innermost principle is, properly speaking, a tempting and challenging of God: since he, who should obey, tests the Almighty whether the way of his own self-will shall not prosper. But then, particularly, when the unbelief and disobedience of self-will presses forward in what is false presumption, though seemingly only a firm confidence in promised assistance, as if God must and should hearken to it; this is the masked aggravation of sin, to which Satan here allures. Uncalled reformers, daring enthusiasts, even actual miracle-workers of their own will and for their own honor, have all fallen into this sin, because they have forgotten the word of the Master spoken here in faith and obedience. What if before the eyes of men they have prospered at first in their airy way, it is not because angels have borne them up, but the prince of darkness (who would, it may be, have carried the Lord also in safety down, even as he had lifted him up), yet only to their final fall into the abyss.

Christ remains Lord over Satan in the simplicity and assurance of his human way according to the word of God. Power over his body may the tempter exercise by the permission of the Father, his spirit remains free and firm in obedience to the truth. If, as we perceived, the first answer struck the right point, and protested against Satan's fundamental lie, that in the creature of itself a life was to be sought; the second answer advances still nearer to the crisis, even as the temptation advanced nearer. If the first answer had already sharply and clearly defined the boundary between the Lord God and his creature (in whose stead, and in whose nature, the eternal Son here stands); the second defines it still more sharply, and gives to Satan a further lesson and one peculiarly appropriate to him, which indeed he may not be able to receive. For it is Satan himself who in the permitted abuse of his angel-power, for deceit and destruction against the word and will of God, absolutely and now in the most unreserved manner, tempts the Lord his God. Therefore did Christ change the letter of the Scripture, and say, Thou shalt not; although it is written in Moses, Ye shall not tempt. This is the very power of the Spirit in the weakness of the tempted one, that while he only thinks to cover himself and to hide himself in the sheltering, defending word; that same humble word approves itself as a sharp weapon of attack and of judgment against the tempter's pride.

* Luke omits this, though he has τοῦ διαφυλάξαι σε, to keep thee. When Von Gerlach supposes that this omission should have no stress laid upon it, as it was only meant to say, "wherever thou goest"—he most injustifiably presses down the everywhere profound word of Scripture to the narrow limits of our ordinary human speech.

Then does the evil one begin finally to mark that in this man he has to do with the Lord his God, who will maintain over him his right: yet is he unwilling to admit it. He gathers all his might and greatness for one more last and decisive onset; but the result is that he hears more decisively and openly pronounced that which befitted his own true character. Probably the Lord knew not immediately himself with what kind of person he had directly to do. In manifest bodily appearance Satan cannot, indeed, appear, for such corporeity in him, if it may so be called, would be for us the most frightful horror. Therefore does he disguise and mask himself, now as he had from the beginning—yet still comes as a person. Probably the tempter drew near the first time in human form as a good friend and adviser; the second time it may be he showed himself as an angel of light who might bear him up in his hands.* The Lord, without much questioning, had both times replied to the Satanic design in the temptation, and mediately therefore to Satan himself; but now the "God of this world" comes forward in his naked grossness with the horrible and undisguised demand—Worship me! If thou altogether declinest to be the Son of God, then serve me for that recompense which is in my power, and which I will give thee! He promises to give that which is not his, that which at least, when held and received from him, is perverted from glory into ruin; and the price which he demands is what belongs only to God. Then does the Lord recognize the prince of darkness, the archfiend, whom he has come to eject out of a world that he had usurped; and to whom he can now reply in his own might and dignity, as peremptorily as the demand was plain: Get thee behind me, Satan! This is necessarily the last temptation and victory; for the order observed by Luke, while it has a meaning of its own, must not regulate here the order of time. For the first and the second are so immediately and strictly connected according to Matthew, that we cannot imagine anything intervening: and the repelled one cannot be supposed to have returned again immediately after the third.*

This "away from me" might have been enough. But the humility of the Lord, which itself must have been the keenest condemnation of the father of pride, does him a superfluous honor, and even adds a reason from Scripture. This word is found, again, near to the former (Deut. vi. 13, 14), but is here, in its entire appropriation, more severed than that from its literal connection. In the words which had before fallen from the Lord's lips, Ye shall not tempt, had become, Thou shalt not tempt, for himself and at the same time for the Devil; but now it refers especially and in all significance to the Devil alone; according to Christ's conscious purpose, when he fell back in this encounter, upon that great central word and fundamental commandment of the whole Old Testament, yea of the whole Scripture: Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve.† This answer forms one of the sublimest, most comprehensively significant critical moments in the history of his kingdom: and is the most distinctive and definitive explanation with Satan. Luther ventured with a good intention to add his well-known little word alone to the sacred text (Rom. iii. 28); and in justification of this addition, the Lord's example has been appealed to, who here does the same. But it is not entirely the same, even apart from the difference between our Lord and Luther as to supplementing the word of God. The false emphasizing of "faith alone" wrought much evil in the Church from that time, till men learned to acknowl-

* Lange, indeed, thinks that such mask-work and illusion must have been quite ineffectual upon Christ, the pure One, just as children are not deceived by such jugglery in tales. But the self-renunciation of Christ, and the Father's counsel to give him up to temptation, are on such a supposition quite forgotten. Might not the same argument be used against the anguish and the obscuration at Gethsemane and at the cross? To show all the kingdoms of the world at one glance was, undoubtedly, an illusion, for the letter of Luke's account knows nothing of "highly colored description, which turned a high and extensive prospect in the wilderness to a symbolical account."

* The apostolical authority of Matthew decides the literal truth of his connection; Luke arranges the events, evidently, according to another point of view. Τότε παραλαμβάνει, πάλιν παραλαμβάνει, τότε ἀφίησιν (then—again—then), in Matthew import something more than Luke's mere καί, and. He, in his account, has the two places in his view and joins them—first wilderness and mountain, afterwards returning to the second: —and he had brought him (already between the two) even to the pinnacle of the temple! The well-considered omission in Luke of the ὕπαγε κτλ., get thee, etc., is worthy of notice; for (as Alford remarks) he could not well have left these words in his inverted account.

† See the connection Deut. vi. 4, 14: and Samuel's "Serve him only!" (1 Sam. vii. 3). Hence it is in the LXX. and Vulg: αὐτῷ μόνῳ, illi soli. Even if this μόνῳ, only, of Luke originated in the LXX., yet we have it also authentically in Matthew.

edge, that James' not "strawy" epistle is also 'right" with its enforcement—not through faith alone. But to worship the Lord alone, to serve one God alone is absolutely necessary to the high and stern truth of this Scripture; and this alone can never be too rigorously brought forward in the contest with the lie of idolatry in all its forms. It rejects all the pleasures, power, and glory of the *whole world as soon as this rises against its Creator; and here, at the close, upholds the worship of the one Eternal independently of and above the world. In the beginning of the temptation this distinction between God and his creature was not so express, but in the "not by bread alone" the creature holds its proper place through the immanence of the creating Word.

One of the most profound among the many views of the process and connection of the history of the Temptation, (all of which may be more or less right according to its many-sided truth), or the most essential extract of its spirit, appears to us that of Zinzendorf, who deduces lessons from it concerning the mysteries, the right understanding, and the fundamental truths of the word of God.† The mystery—If thou be the Son of God—is brought forward at the wrong time and in a wrong application by the tempter; therefore the Lord opposes to it that other mystery, which was suited to the occasion. The apprehension of the promised angel-protection, though right in itself, is used partially and turned to temptation; therefore the Lord shows the truth in its completeness, by exhibiting its other side. Finally, when the arch-liar overturns the fundamental truth, that God alone is to be worshipped; the Lord can only re-erect it by asserting it simply again. For, to quote Hamann: "The victory of men over Satan is then most easy, when he most plainly reveals himself. The ten commandments, if they are written in our heart, and we use them in defence against him, will ever drive him away."

Thus, for this reason, do the conqueror and the conquered separate—symbol and type of all future temptation of the Head and the members. The original fundamental truth, in which Satan stood not fast, and which he never more will learn or can, comes to him, as his judgment from the mouth of this humble Son of Man. While the Son of God as man worships and serves with us, he reveals himself as the Lord and God of the god of this world, who, instead of worshiping has tempted him in vain. From this time forward the Devil knew Jesus (Mark i. 24–34, iii. 11, v. 7.)

Thus also is the distinction established between the Redeemer from Satan's power, the rightful King of the whole earth, to whom the ends of the world had been already given by the Father (Psalm ii.); and that false Messiah whom carnal Israel, through fellowship with the deceiving idolatry of the world, had learned to expect. What an earthly-glorious Jewish Messiah would then have been, Antichrist, the Man of Sin, will in the last days actually exhibit, and with an open rejection of the name of God. The time is come and now is, when the worship of the ancient, secular Jehovah, as he revealed himself in the Old Testament should cease, he having through his incarnate eternal Son wrought our redemption; the father of lies offers to men the glory of this world, and all who consent to his lie, thereupon abase themselves to worship him, concerning whom, nevertheless, they desire to know nothing. But he has here thus early exposed and discovered himself, constrained by Christ; and all who abide in the way of Christ, are equipped with the sure armor of that word of truth which he himself first victoriously proved.

THE FIRST WORDS OF THE MASTER TO THE FIRST DISCIPLES.

(John i. 38, 39, 42, 43, 47, 48, 50, 51,)

All this was certainly spoken and done after the temptation, for the baptism recorded by John, ver. 32, was immediately followed by the Spirit's leading into the wilderness. This also was now past, and the mission to the Baptist in ver. 19, did not take place until the fortieth day at least, because the testimony, vers. 20—27, cannot have been uttered before the baptism of Jesus. John deems himself not yet authorized to announce publicly him who was to come; but waits till that mysterious one who had retired from the Jordan into the desert returned to him again, which he probably did as soon as the victory in the wilderness was achieved. When he saw him once more, he could point him out, ver. 29. Further, those pregnant words, "There standeth One among you, whom ye know not," obviously imply, I know him now as erewhile I knew him not. So clearly is established the real harmony of the Gospels when they are rightly read. Τῇ ἐπαύριον, the next day, in vers 29, 35, 43 successively, can only retain its consecutive and unbroken sense when we regard them as following, not only the day of the baptism, but the forty days of the temptation also. To forget this, as the most recent expositors have glaringly done, and insert

* Not excluding even the remark, that enjoyment entices the youth, honor the man, and possession or power, finally, the old.

† In the Discourses, which he delivered in 1742 as Pastor at Philadelphia in Pennsylvania.

them between vers. 28 and 35, is entirely to contradict the chronology of our evangelist, which preserves the strictest coherence.*

The vanquisher of Satan, to whom the angels ministered—the Lamb of God and God's own Son, walks in sublime silence by the Jordan, waiting for the future guidance and direction of his Father. He has come back to the Baptist, for he knows that himself must not first utter—I am He—in the presence of the people of Israel; but that his forerunner must bear witness of him, and that his testimony was now ready. The first day passes—John points to him as he thus walks, and directing attention to his whole appearance and bearing said, Behold—This is he! Not one of the marvelling and inwardly musing hearers, however, ventures to follow him. But when on the next day the testimony to Jesus still walking thus, is repeated—Behold the Lamb of God!—its meaning is then understood—the two disciples at that time with John begin to follow the Lamb. Only two indeed at the first, but in them we see the first strivings of the great impulse of all after following. Another new and sublime initiatory crisis! Beginning of the congregation of disciples, and inauguration of the great teacher into his office; not indeed as yet in public ministration to the people, but according to the appointed and unostentatious procedure of his course, in gentle words to those who are first gathered around his presence. These first words of the teacher and master bear upon them that express and wonderful stamp of majesty in lowliness and lowliness in majesty, which is impressed upon the whole of his subsequent speech and action. They commence with the most simple utterances of human language, springing up, apparently, from the circumstances of the moment. What will ye? come, then, and see! But when we think whose mouth uttered these words, we perceive the beginning of the shining forth of his glory in them: and soon, indeed, does the word of the Master rise to its full dignity in giving the new name, in piercing the hidden heart, in disclosure of what was secret, and in the promise of yet greater things. The whole, moreover is brief and sufficing, simple and clear, wiih no more words than arise out of the occasion. But these are spoken in lowliness as profound as their majesty is sublime: while they have their simply human and external aspect, they have a profoundly significant and majestic background. These first words to the seeing and hearing disciples have their own glory, full of grace and truth—before the days of mighty miracles and preaching. These also verily are spirit, and they are life.

John saw Jesus walking, in silent meditation; waiting for his hour, and his Father's command; in full preparation for the world and its sin; equipped for his testimony to the truth with that armor, which has been tested and approved in his first great conflict, and for the utterance of those new words of God, which the Father has given him. The two disciples had heard the Baptist speak of him, and have so far understood his words, that they now vehemently desire to be the disciples of the true, the higher Master. They follow him in silence, venturing on no address, nor any introduction of their own. But Jesus is conscious in his spirit of the hour that has now come, and turneth—beautiful picture for the devout pencil of the artist! Will not some one now come to me? Such a question lay in that turning—springing from his consciousness that the time was now come, and from the longing of that love which would soon call all men to himself. Then looketh he upon the two, as the first given him of the Father, and opens his mouth in affectionate words. But however humanly and humbly he may begin to speak, yet must what he says become at this crisis and from his lips, an involuntary revelation of the deep significance which lives in the high and peculiar passage of this crisis. He cannot, and he will not avoid this: he knows full clearly with what deep meaning he speaks. If we may so stammer our human thoughts concerning him, in whom all is human as well as divine—a certain struggle between his dignity as God and his humility as the Son of Man, resolves itself into a most profound concert of both. Like a true master, he will not at the very first speak words of instruction to his coming disciples, but rather awake and excite their own consciousness. Thus will he commence their training as disciples. The question-word with which he begins will be found to have a latent fulness of meaning, conveying an essential truth which is applicable to all who ever come to him; and leading immediately to that word of invitation which is the germ and type of all his future exhortation and teaching.

Τί ζητεῖτε; What seek ye? What will ye? that is, though he designedly omits to say so, of me? with me? Wherefore come ye thus behind me? Spoken with any other tone and look, this question would not have had more than the ordinary meaning with which we may suppose a man asking it in such circumstances; it would have been even repulsive—What would you seek in my footsteps? leave me to my own way!* With his look and tone, on the contrary, it already glides by a gracious transition into the following Come! Yet is there

* Hence the unbelieving criticism of this method of harmonizing protests that John makes the insertion of the history of the temptation after the baptism impossible. There is but one true answer to this: the baptism and the temptation precede ver. 19. The evangelist confines himself here, as before in vers. 7 and 15, to the subsequent testimony of the Baptist. Compare Gemberg's remarks, in allusion to Schleirmacher (Stud u. Krit. 1845, i. 105).

* As a late bishop of the Moravian Brethren, when one following would join him as he walked, with the question, "Wherefore thus alone?" made answer, "I would rather be so." Not so the Lord.

a distinction between them. That first word of all contained a solemn question, designed to penetrate the hearts of those who are coming: and this must not be lost sight of in the invitation. He whom they seek, and who is the object of the unconscious seeking of all humanity, he who afterwards stands before the whole world and testifies, "Come ye all unto me and find rest to your souls"—he says not now, Whom seek ye? For whom do ye take me, that ye thus seek to be near me? Although this is involved in the matter, he does not express it, but as yet conceals that great "I am He" (which might have been the response to the Baptist's "this is He!"); and speaks apparently as if there were nothing in him to seek, in order that they, again, may bethink themselves how all is to be sought and found in him. He thinks not first of himself, but first of those who are coming to him. Those only who seek come truly to him, but as they come they are met by the testing word—What seek ye? And wherefore from me? First must we in some degree know, by the revelation of the ground of our hearts through the face of the Searcher of hearts turned full upon us, and be taught by the question which he asks, What it is that we as men and sinners seek and need: then shall we more and more discover that it is only himself whom we seek, because in him all that man seeks is found. It is our Lord himself, in general ever seeking the lost till he finds them, who meets us in our own way, with that first word of the divine manifestation, which would not give the sinner up: Adam, where art thou? Strive not so hard after death in the error of thy life! Seekest thou to live? Thou shalt not find it in departing from me; return therefore to me as I return to thee. But here are Israelites coming to him, disciples of John, prepared in the old covenant of preparatory grace, by the hidden Christ, for the Christ revealed, when he should come. And now that he is come, they come to meet him, and should know well the fit answer to the first question of the Lord. John and Andrew heard it, too, but they reflect not immediately upon the inner significance of this startling question, as John may have understood it, from their subsequent report. They simply reply as well as they can to its most obvious meaning. They could not yet say—"We seek the Messiah, thyself"—until they had already begun to find him. That remained secret in the depth of their consciousness. But because Jesus stands so humanly before them, they are bold to speak in human language—"Rabbi," that is, we would be thy disciples. This would have sufficed as their self-dedicatory profession, Thou art our Master. His question, however, was so gracious, that they gather confidence to go farther—Where lodgest thou? That is, we would this day enter into thy nearer fellowship, we would be with thee, hear thee, and learn of thee. The direct answer is concealed in their words, and it is from a right feeling of mingled reverence and shame, that they hold it back—Behold, thou art the Lamb of God, and the Son of God; we are sinners of the world, Israelites who wait for thee, and expect from thee all that our souls yet need. If their counter-question seems to have in it something of uncourteous abruptness—yet how profoundly humble is it, and how full of trust!

He said unto them, Come and see! If that first word might have been construed by one who was excessively timid, or one who was insincere, into a repulse; this second carries with it its immediate tone of permission, and friendly acceptance—Ye are welcome to me;—but its deepest tone is much more than merely permission. He who has come speaks in gracious invitation and with the gentle command of love: Come! and we catch here already the key-note of his preaching and doctrine. Behold—the Baptist had said—and now they shall behold. The challenge to come and see was an ordinary manner of speech in common life: but in some circumstances used with great solemnity, as of the grave of Lazarus (John xi. 34); with great majesty in the Canticles (iii. 11) concerning the magnificence of King Solomon; as in the Revelation (vi. 1, 3, 5, 7) of the heavenly visions—and in the Psalms (lxvi. 5; xlvi. 9) concerning the wonderful works of God. It was at the same time the common saying of the Rabbi to his disciples (as frequently in the Talmud, בּוֹא רְאֵה, i. e., Come and let it be explained to thee). They came and saw where he abode—but their Lord had more than merely where in his view. They tarried with him, as John adds with emphasis, and saw all they might see in him, his glory full of grace and truth, they tasted and saw that the Lord was gracious (Psalm xxxiv. 9); they beheld in faith the heaven open upon the Son of Man, ves. 50, 51. All this the Lord promised them in that lowly-sublime invitation, which conceals his majesty, yet permits some rays of it to pierce through: Come, and ye shall see, experience, receive, and find all that ye seek.* That is the rule and process of his discipleship; the immediate and self-evidencing testimony of the truth in Christ, as Philip, an apt scholar, begins at once to use it against Nathanael's doubt, ver. 46. This is the sum of the apologies, the missionary appeal to all the world; the testimony of every true divine, of John the evangelist, as of John the forerunner, who having himself seen, can bear his witness against all the perverse blindness of unbelief.

What the two who came so readily, found or saw or heard at that time, is buried in silence; it was so much, however, that Andrew can already testify to his brother Simon—We have found the Messiah! When this third, afterwards to be first, comes forward, we hear another word of the Master, still more authoritative and majestic. Jesus looked upon him and said—Thou art Simon, the son of Jonas—I know thee, who and what thou art, from thy birth till thy present coming to me! The allusion which has been over-critically detected in the etymology of the old name in its allusion to the new, we mention and leave undecided: the hearer, disciple, heretofore son of the timid dove, which flies among the rocks, shall become the sheltering rock of the dove. So lately, again, Lange,* although the reading Ἰωάνου, Ἰωάννου is not lightly to be rejected. Enough, that in this place, the design and reference is especially to the new disciple-name, and such allusion and antithesis can scarcely be deemed consonant with the dignity of the occasion. Thou shalt be called Cephas—I now give thee thy new name; for I know what I shall make thee in my discipleship and for my kingdom! Be my "disciple" henceforth, and out of what thou art, thou shalt become something new. The new name which he gives is, first of all, the revelation in the light of his own countenance of Simon's peculiar and natural character, as in the case of the sons of thunder (Mark iii. 17); it specifies his danger and the temptation of his inborn nature, and also its transformation and sanctification in the new birth. Thus it is given as a promise as well as a warning. He who receives his new name from the Lord, and well sustains it, will become that to which he is called. As in the Old Testament, Jehovah, in his supreme authority, gave the new names of promise, Abraham and Israel; so also now does the Son in his Father's power, and marks out Peter here as an originator, to lay the foundation, and as a spiritual progenitor of the new people of God in the similitude of those two great public persons. As "Israel" indicates penitent, wrestling praying faith, so "Peter" refers to the confession, and the building of the church upon the profession and testimony—although it is the Lord himself who makes Peter, and all who are like him, the foundation upon which he himself builds.

* Bruno Bauer's cunning eye detects here "feeble pomp, empty superfluity," and is sure that Jesus never could have spoken thus.

Rising still higher in its tone of authority, is the word of the Master to Philip; whom he finds and to whom he forthwith gives a direct summons—Follow me! It appears, at first, like a second "Come and see," but has a farther reach of meaning. It expresses in one word the whole disciple-life of all who have come and have seen, and is the early type of all that is wrapped up in the same oft-repeated call, and of that which is connected with it when it is last heard at the close of the gospel of John (xxi. 19, 22).

And now comes the fifth in this rapid formation of the first circle of disciples†—Nathanael. He is not placed in the first rank of influence, but coming as he now does in virtue of the preparing grace which he had received, he may be regarded rather than Peter, or even than John (who has here faithfully recorded the praise with which his Master's lips greeted him) as the fittest type of all disciples—such as the Lord will receive and greatly rejoice over when they come to him. Ah that they all were such! The precipitancy of this hasty question which only catches at the last word—Can any good thing come out of Nazareth? was redeemed from its error by its very sincerity. The error of prejudice, though indeed indirectly connected with sin, does not deepen into the sin of offence as in the case of the other Israelites. Nathanael in Cana, two hours from Nazareth, had no personal knowledge of Jesus—that was certainly not his fault. Jesus now sees him coming just as man should come, seeking, seeking earnestly without guile. O, how few such earnest seekers are there! Here is a true Israelite in whom there is no guile, whose sin is already covered, and his iniquity not imputed to him. It is not the humble man himself whom the Lord addresses, for that would not have been as appropriate as in the other instance—Thou art Simon—which involved a warning. He spoke to the others concerning him (somewhat as the Baptist had spoken about Jesus himself)—Behold, those who come like this man are my joy, these are the disciples whom I would have, thus might and thus ought all Israel to be prepared for me their Messiah.* Though still far from recognizing in the Nazarene the King of Israel, this upright man hears not in vain the "Come and see;" he goes at his friend's suggestion that he may see, and soon is his prejudice lost in his happy experience. This is the sure and direct way to that end. But he who would walk in it to Christ, like Nathanael, must first have gone, through grace, in penitent, wrestling, seeking faith the way of Jacob-Israel: in Jacob's nature, before this first new birth, there is yet deceit and guile. If a sinner, like Zacchæus, believes, the Lord says of him—This also is a son of Abraham. When one who, like Nathanael waiting in preparatory grace for the perfect grace to come, frankly receives what is freely offered to him, the Lord terms him an Israelite indeed, in the purest sense of the word and name. So blessed a commencement of his ministry has the Father prepared for the Son, that in two days five seeking souls are gathered around him—the last, however, the loveliest, whose first misapprehension is at once requited with commendation from his Master's gracious heart.

Nathanael is ashamed and embarrassed; and the more so as he, in his tranquil life, had been intimately known by only a few such as Philip. Whence knowest thou me? The doubt and scruple of his pure spirit which shrinks from the Searcher of hearts, is still less displeasing to him than the first surprise on account of Nazareth. If he has seen and spoken to thee, and thou ask him the same question in the same spirit as Nathanael; he will rejoice thereat, and thou shalt soon experience, how entirely he knows and has ever known thee. The inferior human life of the Lord reflects even now the relations of his exalted state, and we see in it even his omniscience and omnipotence; although he was not actively, in his estate of self-abnegation, either omniscient or almighty, any more than every where present. Whence knows he Nathanael? May it have been through an instantaneous revelation of the Father, even as on other occasions, for instance in the case of the Samaritan woman, whose husbands he reckons? Was it, besides this, through that knowledge of man which belongs to the first man, every where penetrating, by a true physiognomy, through the outer into the inner being, and which knows individual men because it knows what was in man? (ch. ii. 24, 25). Neither of these must be entirely excluded here, yet the expression of the Lord, I saw thee, points in its simple meaning to something past. As the eyes of the crown prince have been wont silently to seek out the true men in the land, that he may collect them around himself when he ascends the throne; so also had Jesus, during his long eighteen years at Nazareth, the seclusion of which must at least have been broken by the festival journey to and from Jerusalem, most observantly looked around upon men. Hence he knows Simon, to whom he gives his name; Philip also, and Matthew, whom he calls to follow him: so did he also actually with his bodily eyes behold Nathanael under the fig-tree, but at the same time he read the thoughts of his heart with eyes opened by the Father. Therefore does he plainly tell him—I see thee not now, as thou comest, for the first time; reminds him, by the expressive before that Philip called thee, of the prejudice against Nazareth which he had manifested (at least thus does Nathanael feel, as the Lord knew); and thus gives him an answer to his question which mightily demonstrates his own divine dignity; a miraculous word which goes straight to his heart, as if the all-knowing One himself should speak—I know thee from everlasting, I penetrate thee through and through. And here is pretypified how now "Christianity grounds the claim to be entirely trusted in for the revelation of the divine treasure to faith, upon the immediate experience of every conscientious man; since as soon as it is known, it seizes him by a glance that penetrates him through and through."* Nathanael's exclamation, "Rabbi," thou art more than Rabbi, more than many in Israel deem the Messiah to be, "thou art the Son of God," is uttered with a feeling akin to that in Psalm cxxxix—Lord thou hast searched me and known me! Thou knowest all that pertains to me, that which even Philip knows not, what I thought known to God alone.

* Better, at least, than Sepp's יְגֹנָה, imbecillitas oppressio.

† How and by what means? "Nothing but personal influences, few words, trust awakening trust." (So Nitzsch, Predigten, vi. Select.)

* Nazareth was even among the Galilæans held in small estimation, nay, despised. More surely is this kind of depreciation signified than—as Alford supposes—out of so small a place so great a thing! for it is added—τι ἀγαθόν, what good thing?

An Israelite in the kingdom of the king of Israel was said to dwell under his fig-tree (1 Kings iv. 25). But in speaking thus distinctively of the fig-tree under which he had seen Nathanael, the Lord's meaning went beyond this proverbial use of the expression, and signified more than merely—In thy habitation in Israel. Nathanael understands, as is obvious to remark, something special and mysterious, connected with a time when he had repaired to his fig-tree, not for refreshment and solace, but according to the pious custom in Israel, as a place of meditation, reflection, and prayer. There had been a solemn transaction with his God—quite alone as he thought; the prayer of repentance which left him without guile, the prayer of deep longing for the consolation of Israel, and what else Nathanael will reveal to us, when all that has been kept secret becomes known. I saw thee—said the Lord—thy inner man before God, the true Israelite in thee. We may receive his word, each one for himself, as the assurance: I have known thee from the beginning in all thy ways! Let every one think of his fig-tree, of the places of his pleasure and his prayer, before he was called to Jesus. He whom his Lord can meet with the testimony: Thou art an Israelite indeed,—may and indeed shall cry out in joyful response: And thou art my King!

Then does the King and the Master, in the last and the sublimest of these his first words of kingly authority, bestow a still further commendation upon Nathanael: he distinctly specifies and praises that one thing, for which his eyes have looked upon from the beginning and ever shall look (Jer. v. 3), with which man must come to him, in order from him to learn it still better—faith.* New, great word of his mouth—Thou believest! Well, thou art come in the right way; thou hast longed, and thou hast sought; thou art come, just as Philip asked thee, to come and see; thou hast seen and heard, and because I have said to thee what only I could say, thou believest;—then I say for thy further faith: Thou shalt see greater things than these! Yes, verily, this promise holds good in its widest sense for all believers who abide with him: greater and yet greater things shall they continue to see, even up to the last "Blessed art thou who hast believed!"

And now that all the relations of the Master to his disciples may, in this first history

* Beck, Einleitung in d. System der Christl Lehre.

* No shadow of "slight blame" here (Von Gerlach)—for such "swiftness" to believe as this, is a precious simplicity, which should not be supposed capable of considering all at once the "necessity of higher evidences."

be shadowed out, his words advance another step in sublime elevation; and we hear his first "Verily, verily I say unto you." But he utters it as the Son of God in the unity of the Father, and not like the prophets—Thus saith the Lord. He utters it with his highest dignity, combined with the gracious condescension of the Son of Man. Hence he appends, as a testimony against unbelief, the "Verily" of swearing by himself; though without it all that he may say must be believed, even because he has said it. What follows is spoken to Nathanael, but yet he says "to you," for he addresses in the person of Nathanael all his disciples, and gives a promise which is recorded for all who, like Nathanael, come, see, believe, and in that faith abide with him.

Henceforth—after ye have thus become my disciples—shall ye see, more and more intimately and gloriously experience, the full meaning of my first word, Come and see. The coming in faith leads to the seeing, yea ultimately to the highest vision of all glory; but this is only through the being seen, the being penetrated by his eye. The genuine disciple-faith of the true Israelites, to which his praise and his promise are given, is that which needs no other miracle for its confirmation than the miracle-word of the Searcher of hearts—such was found also in Samaria (ch. iv. 29).

But what is that miracle which, nevertheless, the Lord does here predict? Ye shall see heaven open, and the angels of God ascending and descending upon the Son of Man. Was this externally and literally fulfilled to those who heard these words first? By no means, assuredly, else would it have been recorded. We know, however, that both had just occurred—the heaven had been opened upon the Son of Man when he was baptized, and the angels had ministered to him in the wilderness. But the former was seen only by the Baptist; the latter by no man. They were secret and mysterious introductory miracles, designed as testimonies for the Lord himself and not for the world; the visible attesting seals of the Father's voice, which by the Spirit evermore said to his spirit—Thou art my Son. One includes the other as a natural consequence; there, where he now is, is heaven open upon him and for him (John iii. 13); but where heaven is, there must also be the service and commerce of angels. At least we thus understand, that the Lord himself, with all his humiliation and self-renunciation, must have had, since his baptism and temptation, an unveiled view of his Father in heaven, and a sure experience of the presence of the angels around him. What further voices and manifestations from above; what further appearances and interpositions of the ministering spirits occurred to him in the mystery of his solitude, it is beyond our province to determine; but we are justified in presuming that there were such by what is recorded in connection with the mount of transfiguration (Matt. xvii. 5) and the garden of anguish (Luke xxii. 43). But of that transfiguration only the three were the witnesses—not Nathanael, Andrew, or Philip, not all his disciples; and that angel-manifestation was, when it took place, witnessed by no one. The notion that the disciples may have often seen appearances of angels around their Lord as he prayed, or slept, or retired into secret from his enemies, which they have not recorded, belongs to some imaginary and poetical Messiah. When the Lord here promises in general terms that those who had come to him should from that time forward (that is, withal, since they occurred to himself at the Jordan and in the wilderness) see these things with him; we must not suppose him to have intended it externally and literally, but symbolically. He takes from the first secret miracles (especially from that first one of all, which the Baptist had made known to the disciples, and which the other followed as a consequence), the expression by which he signifies all the miracles in general which they should behold with him; and were these not, too, heaven-openings and the service of angels? He teaches them that they are so to be regarded; for they are signs and tokens of that open communication which subsists between this Son of Man upon earth, and the heavenly powers and messengers. For that reason it is that he terms himself the Son of Man, in the full and pregnant sense of that name, which he henceforward commonly assumes to himself; thereby at the same time responding to Nathanael's confession, ver. 49—"Yes I am the Son of God in humanity." He had made latent reference to Jacob-Israel's history when he spoke of the Israelite without guile; he recurs to it once more, and refers to what once symbolically occurred at Bethel. It is written in Moses, concerning the ladder of heaven, that the angels of God ascended and descended upon it; and the disciples could not but think of it when the Lord uttered these well-known words. The first word of instruction, consequently, which begins to unlock the Scripture to them, was designed to teach them in the symbolical style of Holy Writ, "Where I am, there is the reality of its fulfillment, the house of God and the gate of heaven; and this ye shall all see and experience by faith." He who in the old time stood above that ladder with his elect Israel upon the earth below, has now descended as the Son of Man, himself the true and proper Israel, in whom the calling and regeneration of all Israelites is perfected. The angels of God, who were wont to hover about man upon earth (wherefore it was there said—They ascended and descended), are all now gathered together around the person of the Son of God and the Son of Man, through whom heaven is once more opened to all who believe in him. O how often may we suppose them afterwards at sublime critical moments of the revelation of his glory, and not merely when signs and miracles are wrought, to have recalled these words; how often was it to their faith, as if they had seen that which he had spoken of! But what our faith thus sees, is truly and really more distinctly seen than with the bodily eye it could be. Fellowship with the unseen world is opened up once more in Christ. This is the first of all the promises which he gave to his disciples.*

THE FIRST WORDS OF DIVINITY AT THE FIRST MIRACLE.

(John II. 4–8.)

What was Mary's design in mentioning that the wine had failed? What would she thereby signify to her son? Assuredly not† the expediency of now breaking up the company, in order to save their kind hosts from being thrown into embarrassment. Such departure before the customary and appointed time would have been still more unbecoming and offensive: besides, our Lord's answer, which certainly must correspond with Mary's thoughts, bears a different application. Neither does so decisive a rejection of his mother's interference befit a single suggestion as to the propriety of departing; nor concerning that can we suppose him to have said—My time is not yet come. Furthermore, Mary says not expressly—They have no more wine; but simply—Wine is wanting. But this is only to be understood as conveying a hint, question and supplication: Shouldst thou not have resources and help for this emergency? Is not this the fit hour, to manifest thyself in might of miracle? (By supplying, may it be, the marriage-present omitted by us in our poverty?) Mary has very long, and with constant desire, waited for such a manifestation of her son. He has not yet accomplished any miracles,‡ though greater than Moses and Elias; and she is amply justified in expecting them, especially since the testimony of John and his own public presentation of himself. If the first disciples (in whose company they were at this time) had spoken aught of the promise—"Hereafter ye shall see"—this would have stimulated her expectation to the highest intensity. She is even warranted to infer, from his acceptance of the invitation to the wedding, that he would not deem such a first use of his miracle-working power unseemly: she perceives, indeed, with exquisite discernment, the intention of the Lord; his will responds to her prophetic wish. It is her prerogative alone, to be capable of conceiving—before it takes place—the amazing grace and condescension of his first miracle.§

And does he, nevertheless, repel her? Does he, nevertheless, rebuke her suggestion, and in such wise as to prevent her from ever so speaking again? He actually accomplished afterwards, what she by gentle insinuation had asked of him—because she divined his thought as no other did; and yet, before he does so, there is this severe, sharp word instead of the glad acknowledgment—Yes, thy thoughts are also my thoughts. Wherefore was this? Because with all that was sound and right in her motive, there is yet mingled a certain human impatience, an over-curious intermeddling with a matter, about which even his mother must now keep silence and wait; the slightest possible touch of the purest womanly-motherly complacency (we know no other word) prompting in her the desire to see her son honored in her presence. Because, also, from this time forward, he, in his office and function, may no more be her son; and therefore takes the first occasion to tell her so once and for all. Here lies the deep significance of this another first word, by which, conformably with that meet dignity with which his heavenly Father had invested him, he releases and disengages himself from every relation of regard and dependence which, as child, he had sustained to his mother according to the flesh. The holy woman who, after having borne him as virgin, became Joseph's wife and widow, is nothing more than this throughout: nor ever may be more; as in heaven she is not, so neither upon earth. He who is not Joseph's son, but the Son of God, at the very assumption of his prophetic office, and through all its functions, shows that he deems himself not the son of Mary, but him whom the Father had sanctified, and sent into the world. How does the idolatrous fancy of his mother's interposition with him in heavenly mediation, fade away before this clear utterance at the outset! Yea rather, even when she approaches nearest to the inner comprehension of his divine-human purpose, even there will her fallible humanity betray its want of perfect harmony: and the Spirit of the Father in him, provident for futurity, prompts this solemn, and earnest, and decisive utterance, as a witness against all the

* See Oetinger, Schrift von Auberlen, p. 537.

† Though even Bengel thought so.

‡ For the Apocryphal legends concerning earlier miracles are utterly discredited by a word of John (ver. 11)—This beginning of miracles did Jesus in Cana. Ταύτην—who would have imagined this?

§ Thus much we admit—but no more. That Jesus had previously given a hint of his intention, of which Mary only too prematurely reminded him, we hold to be quite improbable as unsupported by any intimation whatever.

Mariolatry of his future grossly-erring Church. Further on, this error is again most distinctly aimed at, in that other word—Who is my mother? whosoever shall do the will of my Father which is in heaven, the same is my brother and sister and mother (Matt. xii. 48, 50). And again: Blessed indeed is she whose womb bare, and she whose breast hath nourished me; but only blessed because she hath believed, in common with all who hear the word of God and keep it (Luke xi. 27, 28). In what way he addressed and how he honored his mother, as her child and son, the Scripture does not record; but it is recorded, that his first word to her in his ministry, and the last to her upon the cross—though the testament of his filial love—terms her woman and nothing more.

The translation "Woman, what hast thou to do with me?" fails in many ways to convey the spirit of the original text. First of all, the appellation should close the sentence, because the reason why she is not termed mother, must at the beginning be indicated in order that such a repulse might be justified to all other women. The Greek γύναι bears quite a different meaning from the "Woman!" of our day; it is an appellation by no means derogatory, but, under the circumstances, very affectionate, as in John iv. 21, xx. 15. Lastly, τί ἐμοὶ καὶ σοί *—more correctly: What have I in common with thee? since his person by right and honor must have precedence—involves no more, no less than this: When my office and its ministry are concerned, is it not for thee to retire, and forget that thou art my mother? "That which in me works miracles was not born of thee" (Augustine.)

This is the first part of our Lord's word, ever solemn and severe as a testimony for the truth in all its near and remote futurity. But no sooner has he, in holy submission to the Father, thus denied the affections of his human filial heart, than he changes his voice, and so modifies his speech, as to console her with all affection for the restriction and repression to which his words had subjected her. The other part of this saying, which is now adjoined, tends to assure her: Thou hast understood me, as I understand thee; I will do what thou meanest. That Mary has so understood him, her own next words to the servants (clinging as they do to his last word, persisting in expectation of a miracle, and more confident than ever) most decisively attest: Whatsoever he saith unto you, do it! Yet it becomes the holy dignity of the Lord to prescribe a set time, in order that Mary, and with her whoever may read this first word at the beginning of his miracles, should observe and take good heed, that all his works are done, only in the manner and at the very time when the Son, under the authority of the Father, wills; that their time and their hour are fore-appointed, independently of human will and wish—My hour is not yet come! And though it were not even a matter of a day earlier or later (as afterwards when he repeats the same saying to his brethren concerning going up to the feast), but, as here to all appearance, about something still less important; nevertheless, he doeth all things great and small alike, at their own critical moment. That is a word of divine value, which is written in Ecc. iii. 11. Hence did the evangelist derive it, when he once and again testified: His hour was not yet come (John vii. 30; viii. 20). He himself knew and bore witness when his hour had finally come (John xii. 27; xiii. 1; xvii. 1; Matt. xxvi. 45).

That was the last great hour of the glorification of the Son of Man in his sufferings: but here he speaks not of that. Of what hour then? Does he refer merely to the right hour and moment for the performance of the miracle at the marriage in Cana? If we have felt the depth of meaning in all the other first words of the Lord, we shall scarcely be induced to believe that this sublime expression, so solemnly repeated by himself at his passion, "My hour is not yet come," means no more now when he utters it first than just to intimate for the present occasion—A few minutes more and then is the right time. No for we observe finally, that the error which was checked in Mary involved something more than the before-mentioned forwardness of motherly longing and interference. There was fundamentally mixed up with it the notion which was to the last shared by all the disciples, of the earthly glory of his kingdom. The error of supposing that he was come to supply all their need, to defend them from all want, to create around them happiness and joy, had in some degree contributed to the expectation that he would now furnish the wine. It is to this that the Lord's wisdom, which looks through the immediate occasion into the widest connections of his truth, and contemplates in the individual circumstances of the present the last futurity which they pretypify, addresses itself now. When he says, My hour is not yet come, he is thinking, we may presume, in his secret mind (we dare so boldly to penetrate the depths of his thought) of that time when all shall be fulfilled, which the wedding-feast at Cana, and the cheerful wine—the first gift of his saving power and kindness—symbolically foretold. That hour of his established kingdom, when the fruit of the grape shall be drunk new, is not yet come—we must say this even yet;* but as surely as the sufferings of Christ did come, and in his Church continue, the hour of glory will come after them.

* This formula e. g. also 2 Sam. xvi. 10; 1 Kings xvii. 18, signifies nothing hard or severe. Whether it was a common phrase of men towards women in general, and not at all for worthy gentlewomen, as Lange supposes, I much doubt, and can find nothing to corroborate it in γύναι.

* And also learn, that the very last hour of need must previously come, when the Church will appear ready to give up the ghost. See the beautiful reference to the impatience of the "English apostles" in Bötticher's essay upon them, p. 102.

Mary's confident faith after this humiliation hastened the hour; so that it was probably for the sake of her word that he turned to the servants. We may say generally concerning the words recorded as having been spoken to the servants, that they are an example of those altogether external, earthly, and merely human words which the Lord must have often spoken amid the circumstances of his life in the flesh, but which are in general not preserved. Yet when we look more narrowly into them, we find the reason why the evangelist who relates so concisely, and with so much omission, the history of the miracles, has not passed them over; yea, rather this example begins to impress upon us the conviction that the Lord can have spoken scarcely any thing without some deeper meaning underlying the manner and matter of his words. He calls the water to bear witness of the existing gift and creature of God, which he will wonderfully change; for every miracle designedly attaches itself to something natural, which it may elevate and transfigure. Only Dr. Paulus' infatuated perversity could suppose, that for a true miracle the wine ought to have been drawn immediately from the empty pitchers. Jesus commands that the whole of the six water-pots which were there for the Jewish purification (out of which the first manifestation of the glory of his new grace should come forth) should be filled, in order that not a little of the miraculous wine should remain over as a dowry; for this was as befitting on the present occasion as in Elijah's gift out of God's fulness, when the oil ceased not, till there was no longer a vessel to receive it. The servants fill them to the brim—strictly complying with Mary's direction, that they should do whatever he said unto them; and now they wait, looking at him and not at the water, which in the meantime is made wine. Then speaks he majestically, precisely defining the instant of the creating miracle: Draw out *now—and nevertheless in his humility discloses not what was transpiring. It would not have been possible for him to say: Draw out now the water, it shall have become wine; or, The water which has now been made wine, as John afterwards says. Finally, his directing the servants to carry the wine to the governor of the feast,† apertains to the entire and gracious condescension of the whole. It stands a solitary example in the evangelical history, of his most full and benignant approximation to human order and custom; and that in a matter which belongs to the slighter things of life, rather to its hilarity than its earnest work.

THE FIRST PUBLIC OFFICIAL WORDS TO THE HOSTILE GUARDIANS OF THE TEMPLE.

John ii. 16–19.

The Lord spoke more than the world itself could have contained, had every one of his words been written in books. Which, then, out of the multitude, should be committed to record for the world and the church? Those which beyond the rest had a special importance, although no word of the Word upon earth could be deemed unimportant. The selection and arrangement were not left with man, but were the prerogative of the Holy Spirit, concerning whom the Lord's promise was, "He shall glorify me, for he shall take of mine and show it unto you." That Spirit took a historical picture out of the Lord's whole life and work from his birth to his ascension, and so shewed it to the evangelists that in their mutually supplementary records, the glory of the only begotten Son shines forth to us full and unimpaired. The Spirit of inspiration in his mysterious control over those records has also so ordered it, that we have likewise received through the remembrance of Matthew and John, the careful investigation of Luke, and the simple ministry of Mark combined, the substance of our Lord's discourses, in a true and genuine abstract. The art and truthfulness of all historical writing, which aims to condense out of an abundance of events a succinct narrative.‡ consists, among other things, mainly in this, that the begin-‡ Schmieder has some important remarks upon this in its relation to Scripture in his Präliminarien zu einen gründlichen Rechtfertigung der biblischen Geschichte (Naumburgh, by Klaffenbach, 1837).

* This now manifestly indicates the critical moment: After ye have filled, look at what ye will draw forth! So that by no means merely what was drawn became wine. Let the text be looked at, in which τὸ ὕδωρ in ver. 9, is parallel with ὕδατος of ver. 7. And why else the specification of the quantity?

† For we must insist that this ἀρχιτρίκλινος is by no means a table-server or kitchen-master (which for Cana is not to be thought of), but the συμποσιάρχης or magister convivii, chosen from among the guests to be president of the banquet, in order to regulate the quantity of the drinking, and to administer all the various usages of social festivity (Ecclus. xxxii. 1–3). How does this graceful mention and acknowledgment of the title of such an office put to shame all our pedants! This man, who is in no marvelling humor, and whose ignorance of the miracle warrants the goodness of the wine, even as the knowledge of the servants does the reality of the miracle (according to Richter's striking observation), makes a light remark upon it—half praising, and half in jocoso blame. From this, as well as from our Lord's disguising manner of speech, ver. 8, we observe, of course, that all the guests were not likely to be acquainted, and were not acquainted with the transaction.

nings and turning points, the buds and germs of development, should be made prominent with as much fidelity to their truth, as skill in their presentation; for instance as we see it realized in that perfect pattern—the Acts of the Apostles. But where beginnings and turning points occur in the earthly history of the Lord's life, we may expect that his words will have an especially outbeaming character. Accordingly we find in the gospels a preliminary series of first words, which the Spirit has selected as the most critical in their occurrence, and most distinctive in their expression.

These are together the critical moments of our Lord's development until he reached the time of his proper teaching and testimony before the people and his disciples: each one of them is indicated by a profound word which expresses the true nature of the crisis. The Lord did actually thus speak them, but his Spirit alone could with perfect fidelity reproduce them in the Scripture, and hand them over to the Church. What he spoke to his parents as their child when he ceased to be their child and entered into the developed consciousness of his being the Son of the Father; what he spoke to the forerunner as a man at his anointing to his office, and what to Satan in that first conflict which immediately followed; how he received the first disciples, and at his first miracle released himself once more from his mother according to the flesh, as he had before done in that word of his childhood, and gave himself entirely up to that eternal Spirit who ordered all things in him their time and hour; all this we have already seen. Now follows his first public official word spoken to the present adversaries of his life and teaching, to the desecrating occupants of the Temple, whom he is constrained by his zeal for God's house to chastise, and who therefore crucify him, by that very act paving the way for the resurrection of the new temple out of the old; another great turning-point in his life, in which we discern, through the light thrown upon it by the accompanying word, the infolded germ and symbol of a future glorious development.

How great is the contrast between the manifestation of his loving kindness before his mother and disciples at the humble Galilæan wedding-festival, and that of his judicial severity before the Jews and their rulers in the temple at Jerusalem. The glory that was full of grace was also full of truth. He who came to diffuse joy, is come also to fan the threshing-floor, and vigorously to correct all that is ungodly in God's people and house. Not here where the desecration reigns did he give the first of his signs; but before he begins in Jerusalem at the Passover to work miracles, he announces himself with all his holy severity in his Father's house, by an act of testimony and authority. And with that act, which is itself, equally with the miracles, a sign, he speaks a prophetic miracle-word, which till this beginning had reached its end in the building of the new temple of the new Church through his resurrection—points to that great miracle as the end and aim of all others.

The messenger sent before his face had prepared his way. Now came to his temple the Lord whom they had sought there in all their worship, the Angel of the Covenant whom they desired; but, they could not abide the day of his coming. He began his refining and purifying by an act of zeal which every true zealot in Israel, whether with or without office, would have been justified and indeed was bound to execute; but no man performed it, the traders and money-changers sat in the temple, palpable signs of its decline and perversion. Then is his spirit stirred by the holy indignation of chastising truth; he does not merely speak, for no simple word alone would have said enough duly to denounce this omission of duty; he begins himself to act, drives with the scourge the men and their cattle out of the temple,* pours out their mammon, overturns those unsanctified tables in the sanctuary, which exhibited to him at his very entrance the Jewish nation of traffickers; then in full self-possession, and by design he softens his utterance, and passes, after affectionately sparing the doves (in which he sees not mere sacrifices as in the sheep and oxen, but also the symbol of the Holy Ghost) to that word which illustrates and explains the deed: Take these things hence; make not my Father's house a house of merchandise.

In this first decisive command, beginning with three majestic words, he neither mentions the temple nor the objects which desecrate it, but merely accompanies the self-explaining act with—These things hence! He speaks the language of emotion and holy, divine-human anger, which must have excited within the minds of all who heard a response that would carry its own conviction—Belong these things here? Remove them hence! This indignation has gathered in his soul from one festival to another, as the disorder met his eyes: the time is now come, and it breaks out in an act, which may partly be regarded as long before projected and prepared for, partly, as the instantaneous product of a sudden internal resolve. This first severe word is followed (as in Cana, to his mother) by one more gentle, which gives ample explanation of his conduct. It is not without a silent remembrance of that word which his Father gave him on his first entering the temple eighteen years before, that he now publicly calls God his Father. He does not reveal himself before the world, however, with an independent and self-asserting testimony—

* He never drives into the temple with the scourge—as it is very thoughtfully remarked in the Evang. Kirchenzeitung, 1845, p. 93. That he moreover, did not merely drive out the cattle with the scourge is expressly stated in ver. 15.

I am his Son! He avoids every appearance of bearing loftily his own honor, and utters it as the unpremeditated and self-understood expression of his inner being; arising, as in the former instance when he was a youth of twelve years old, out of the circumstances of the present occasion. It was, indeed, and must ever have been to all who heard it, a word of new and mighty significance, that any son of man should call the Jehovah of Israel simply and distinctly his Father. It should have been for all the scribes, who, like Nathanael, had learned in prophetic Scripture concerning the Son who was to come, a full and distinct answer to the question—Who art thou, and by what authority dost thou thus act and command? But they who now first heard this word, the most important of all that he said, appear remarkably enough to have scarcely seized its significance, in the heat of their vexation and in the confusion of what was taking place. They stood, indeed, in silence, and listened to every word, when the Lord after his silent act began also to speak; but it was only afterwards that they found calmness rightly to reflect upon the word which they had heard. The Lord had withal referred to a passage of Scripture, to that rebuke which the Lord of Hosts had administered to His people in Jer. vii. 1–11: "Trust ye not in lying words, saying, the Temple of the Lord are these! Is this house which is called by my name, become a den of robbers in your eyes?" But it is only at the second temple-cleansing at the close of his ministry that he quotes this saying in all its severity; for the present he softens the expression, and says instead —Make not my Father's house a house of merchandise! Whether they detected therein the tone of that prophetic saying, must remain a question. We read that the Jews (as John always pointedly designates the rulers of the people in Jerusalem) do not as yet lift up their contradiction—How callest thou God thy own peculiar Father? This declaration they pass over for the moment; they must examine it again and again: it must first excite opposition in the reluctance of their rebellious hearts, before they can strengthen themselves to oppose it in words. We do not read, further, that they committed themselves to any justification of the commerce in the temple, for which subsequent reflection might have placed many arguments at their command. For the impression of his sudden act, and the irresistible conviction of the words which followed it—Take these things hence! have so entirely overpowered them, that they can find no words of defence. But how this man, rabbi, zealot, prophet, or what else, should have the power to assail the time-honored abuses which they themselves had tolerated and even established, and that so summarily, not merely in word but in act; this, although the most superficial part of the whole procedure, absorbs their thoughts, because it is an injury to themselves, an invasion of their official prerogative. Forgetting the word in the act, and in the act forgetting the right of the thing done in the right of the person doing it—as always happens in similar circumstances—they speak in pitiable folly while thinking themselves wise—What sign showest thou unto us, seeing that thou doest these things? Not: Is it then true that merchandise and money-changing become not the temple? but: Who art thou, who bearest such vigorous witness to this truth? (Acts vii. 35). Though he has already told them: I am the Son of God, whose house this is, they come as the official temple-police and rulers of Israel with their question: Wilt thou arrogate to thyself the right of a prophet? Not further than this, but so far at least, must the Lord's act have moved them, that they were constrained to bring back to their thoughts those long-gone times when men of God appeared before Israel, condemning even kings and priests, and vindicating their right to do so by signs from heaven. John the Baptist had already brought the times of the prophets near to them; but he did no miracle, and his word, as the voice of a preacher in the wilderness, had left their temple-trading undisturbed. If now this man (who had been with the Baptist, and many reports of singular incidents in connection with him were circulated) assumes the right to go so much further in reproof than he, his pretension must be justified in our presence, according to the law of Moses for the testing of prophets. Thus their question had the appearance of a prudent and righteous restraint within lawful bounds, when dealing with what was wrong; and yet it was full of folly and blindness. A right was conceded at that time to every zealot or earnest man for the removal of abuses and corruption in Israel, without any miraculous assertion on his part of prophetical dignity: but what the Lord had now done, spoke sufficiently for itself; his neglected word was with the act itself a mighty and miraculous sign of divine authority.

The Lord did not now, as he never afterwards did, show the Jews a sign at their demand: he gives them a sign instead, which, according to the word of Moses (Deut. xiii. 1, 2), should come to pass in its own time; and thus fulfills all legal righteousness, so far as their question was actually grounded upon that. He leaves unanswered the evil of their question, and yet says to them—Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up. A second word of mystery, in which his enemies found much food for their speculation, even till under the cross, and at the stone of the sepulchre.*

* Pity that Hauff (Stud. u. Krit., 1849, i., p. 106) should spoil his beautiful and tolerably correct confirmation of the Johannean interpretation, by

That the comment of the Evangelist—"He spake of the temple of his body"—must through the Holy Ghost be the true one, admits of no doubt to a believing student of Scripture, however hard it may be to understand it. That the Lord when he said "this," should have pointed to his own body, is in itself a strange idea, and is refuted by the instant apprehension of the Jews: Forty and six years was this temple in building—rather, so long has it already been in building! They could not possibly have overlooked so manifest a finger-sign. It is equally certain, on the other hand, that the Lord must have spoken of that temple, of that desecrated house of his Father, about which the question then was: for he proceeds now as ever, from the present circumstance to the deeper truth which he attaches to it; he speaks to the understanding of his hearers, so that they might understand, even where they will not. But no man could have immediately thought of the temple of his body at that time, as even the disciples perceived that latent meaning only after the resurrection. How can the question be solved but thus, that the Lord speaks of both at the same time?

And so, indeed, it was. This mysterious wonder-word has not a misleading double sense; but the two sides of its deep meaning are in reality one. For what is the new temple built by Christ, after that old one, new-built by Herod, was destroyed, but his church, the new people of God, the house of the Father and the Son, the sanctuary of the Holy Ghost? And is not this church his body, raised up and nourished out of his risen body? Again, did not the Jews, in destroying his body upon the cross, cast down their typical temple, and effect and work out its destruction? For this temple on which they in hypocrisy rely, while they honor not its Lord and receive him not when he comes to it, is a shadow and type of the body and the church of the Lord. This is the plain key to the mystery which the Lord's saying, in its sublime and profoundly simple wisdom, gives to the foolishly wise in Israel to think upon. His word points impressively, and as it ever does, in strict harmony with the occasion, from the shadow to the substance, thus opening up the mystery of that substance. He prophesies in the beginning, while they are asking him for proof of his prophetic office, concerning the end; he unveils to them, if perchance they might apprehend it in subsequent reflection, the entire relation of his sanctified person to them and their temple-service; tells them, as the Searcher of hearts, how well he knows that they themselves, who should be the defenders of the temple, would be guilty of its destruction; and yet, that by the marvellous pre-arrangement of the counsel of God, the evil which they should do to the temple of his body would subserve at the same time the removal of all shadows, and the resurrection of the new and abiding, out of the death of the old:—I know what I have to expect from you, and whither things will tend, better than ye yourselves now know: my zeal will still irritate your anger till that takes place for which I came into the world; till through my death at your hands the veil is rent asunder, and in my resurrection through the hand and power of God, the foundation of the true and real temple is laid. For I am indeed not come merely to punish, but to renew; yea, to restore again what ye destroy.

As the obvious literal sense of the restoration of the destroyed temple in three days involved what was utterly inconceivable, and it was not possible that they could consciously and intelligently ascribe such a meaning to the Lord, as he now and henceforward manifested himself to them,—it was necessary that they should think out some solution, and for that very purpose was this word given to them. That they did so, is evidenced by their recollection and use of it at the cross and the sepulchre, where they show themselves to have finally approached very near to a right understanding of its meaning.* Yet there they distort it, and conceal the testimony of their conscience, by perverting the former part of his words in the testimony of the false accusers, as if it was himself that proposed to destroy, whereas he said "Destroy ye!" and in this conscious perversion they betrayed that they had marked whither the Lord's words had tended. Therefore do they clamor in bitter mockery that he be hurried to the cross, thus actually performing what he had predicted.

Destroy! This was spoken prophetically and permissively: I know that it will be in your hearts, and that ye will be permitted to do it—then be it so and let it be done! That their persisting in opposition to the truth of God might lead so far as to bring upon them yet another destruction of their temple, as the due punishment of their own act and guilt—so much at least must immediately have touched their conscience, and it was that which the Lord addressed. That this might take place as the consequence of their putting him to death, became more and more plain to them in the after time. But that his death would issue in a resurrection, and thereby in a demolition of the typical temple in order to maintaining at the outset, that inspiration did not so far secure from error, as to make the meaning of the words of Jesus perfectly plain! To wish to be better instructed than the apostles, is now-a-days the incorrigible folly of the learned.

* What they affirm in Matt. xxvii. 63, the Lord had never uttered in their hearing in so many words; but it may be regarded as their right interpretation of the discourses concerning the building again in three days, and the sign of Jonas, taken together. Lange has well observed against Hase (ii. 3, 1625) how natural it was that they should understand earlier and better than the apostles the Lord's hint that they would put him to death, and how then ex opposito the saying concerning his resurrection would make itself plain to them.

the building of a new one, nay rather to the specific building again in its fulfilled design of that which had been abolished ("I will raise it up")—this is the great prophecy which the Lord utters to them here; this is already the self-same sign which he afterwards gives at their demand, the sign of the prophet Jonas, that one last sign which was chosen as appropriate to the wicked spirit that demanded it.

There now remains only the question whether the Jews then perceived a connection between this temple and the temple of his body, as the central idea of the entire saying; and thence were capable of understanding the double meaning of his word. We must here take into account the whole nature of the case, and the tone of feeling between the Lord and the rulers of the people must be pre-supposed. John had announced the Messiah's kingdom as nigh at hand; afterwards boldly proclaimed that he who was to come after him was already in the midst of the people; and at last had publicly pointed out Jesus of Nazareth. Even if the heads of the people in Jerusalem had received no intelligence of this last open indication of Jesus (which is improbable), yet must that which preceded it have been sufficient to raise in them such a degree of expectation, that if any one should follow the Baptist and strikingly announce himself with the authority of a divine call, this must be the Messiah. To such preparation rightly to hear and understand it, did the first word of Jesus—"My Father's house"—make its appeal; and yet that word is, in the unthinking excitement of their anger, and not without a wanton disregard, utterly overlooked. For it was most clearly and significantly spoken. But when their counter-question, losing sight of the "Son of God," only asks after his prophetical authority; such a reply as this was in the highest sense natural: I am more than a Prophet, as I have already told you, if ye had been willing to hear aright. This is the general tone of the second word, as it strikes their conscience in order to open their ears. It was not spoken to be understood at the moment precisely, but for their subsequent consideration, when calmness should return; yet the scribes in Israel might well understand how the Messiah should speak of the temple and his own person in connection, as if in a certain sense they both were the same. For it was a doctrine that was familiar in the more recent orthodox Biblical learning of the Jewish writings,* founded particularly upon Dan. ix. 24, as generally upon that deeper understanding of typical relations which was not altogether wanting—that the Messiah himself was, and should be called the Holy of Holies. Consequently our Lord speaks, however enigmatically for the present moment, yet plainly enough for after reflection; and admonishes the wicked guardians of the temple to think, in connection with the type and shadow—to which indeed its own honor is due—of that higher significance of meaning in them of which they were not altogether unaware. He deals with the scribes by their theology, with the men by their conscience. The process of thought, which would be excited by this striking and not-to-be-forgotten word, was somewhat as follows: "What meant this mighty one, who acted and spoke before our eyes and ears in so marvellous a manner, that we had no spirit to reply to him otherwise than by the demand of a sign—by that strange saying which he so undisguisedly and with such dignity spoke to us? Assuredly he spoke not as a builder, who could build anew the temple! That we should destroy the temple! Its ruin to be our guilt! Did he mean that it would be through our opposing him, and laying hands upon his holy person? What if he were truly the Messiah! For he spoke before indeed of his Father's house. But can then the Messiah be put to death, may his holy body—itself a temple of God—be destroyed? That second word, again, was so peaceful, so resigned to all that we might do to him and through him to the temple; he appeared not with all his anger and zeal, as if he would oppose us with force. Well, we understand it; it is that he himself is the archetype of the temple, and he signifies, that if we destroy the temple of his body, this that is made with hands will fall with him!" Had their thoughts proceeded so far, then indeed the remaining sentence would have intimated to them: Do this; I shall nevertheless conquer, and in a short time the destroyed temple will be erected anew! I myself, by my own authority will raise it up. But this was more than their theology of the person of the Messiah was wont to attribute to him.

In three days—is by no means a proverbial expression for a short time: but the Lord thus early declares, although like most other prophecy, it was only understood in his fulfillment, what he knew in its spirit from the Scripture; that he should rise again, in order to raise up the Church from his body, on the third day (1 Cor. xv. 4; Matt. xii. 40, xx. 19; Hos. vi. 2). How clearly did he see the future from the beginning! How deep a consciousness had he of the way and goal of his life and death, what an insight of consummate wisdom into the whole counsel and plan of his Father! He knows his relation to the masters of the present temple who opposed the truth, and with whom by this public signal he now begins the appointed warfare of his testimony; he knows, that he himself is the true temple of which that typical one prophesied in its time; that he must yield himself up to receive death at the hands of the Jews, in order that the true sanctuary, after the shadow has in natural consequence passed away, may rise up from his resurrection. He is, finally, prepared to yield himself up; for he knows that thus he shall bear the sins of those who slay him, and who thereby fulfill the design of the Old Testament in order to a new and everlasting covenant of grace, in which the essential truth of the old covenant comes forth to perfection. This still, calmly-sublime preparation for the dedication of himself to that warfare—through blood leading to victory—with the blind ministers of that divine counsel which indeed he only as yet penetrates; this clear all-comprehensive consciousness of the near approach of the end, and fulfillment, and glorification of the Old Testament economy, as also of the inner, essential relation of his own sanctified person to the whole; this is the central spirit of the word which he utters at this crisis of his life. He utters it, assuredly, rather for the hearing and understanding of the disciples who stood around him, and who afterwards, when the sign had come to pass, should think upon it, and should believe the Scripture and his words drawn from the depths of Scripture; than for his enemies, who neither would nor could understand him. But he utters it, at the same time, with the highest dignity, for the satisfaction of his own consciousness of what was just sufficient to that end. What the later teaching of the New Testament fully developes in the Epistle to the Hebrews, is already wrapped up as a germ in this early word of our Lord.

* Here must be sought the historical ground of it—and not in those Gnostic reveries, to which e. g. Hilgenfeld amusingly refers this ναος, (Klementin. Rekognitionen, p. 111).

To prove them, whether they would understand, the Lord spoke this to the Jews; but they would not. They break out again in petulent, hasty, and vexatious objection—which only touches the surface of the matter; and treat the mysterious word, which had been spoken in such majestic calmness, as unworthy of their silent attention and subsequent thought. He therefore keeps silence, in order, if possible, to force them to reflection. They seem to desire no specific second reply; therefore he gives them none, and for this time they separate: he lets them remain, they let him go. Thereupon he actually performs, after their arrogant demand had been repelled, those miracles in his humility which might bring many to believe on his name, although he knows that the faith which hangs upon miracles is not the true one. Thereupon one comes out from among the rulers, who has ingenuously pondered what he had heard and seen; gives his confession instead of all the rest of his colleagues, who had suppressed it as it was rising in their consciences: and receives as the gracious recompense of his coming in the night, that new and impressive word of the Light of the world. Then the Lord retreats with his disciples from the capital into the land of Judea, and baptizes them, as John had done, with a transitional baptism. When the enmity of the Pharasees begins to be excited, he returns back again to Galilee the second time since his appearance to Israel. He speaks in the way with the Samaritan woman, performs in Cana that other miracle, and begins at last publicly to teach and preach in Galilee, having his abode in Capernaum after his own Nazareth had evil entreated him, and thence making the circuit of the land and the synagogues. So that the strict chronological order would require the contents of the third and fourth chapters of John, and even of Luke (iv. 16–30), to be inserted before we return to the Gospel of Matthew. But we are disposed to leave the order of time, which soon becomes indistinct in the details, and is seldom of much importance for the understanding of our Lord's discourses; and for the present to follow each Evangelist singly, with references merely to the parallel places in the others, in order to anticipate in their connection the whole of these profoundedly significant first words. The Lord had already taught in their synagogues all round before his rejection at Nazareth (Luke iv. 15); after that, he went forth still verging towards Capernaum. Matthew briefly indicates this (iv. 13); and condenses the whole Galilean preaching into one general expression, as what Jesus from that time began to preach and to teach.

THE GOSPEL OF MATTHEW.

THE SUBSTANCE OF THE FIRST PREACHING TO THE PEOPLE.

(Matt. iv.17; Mark i. 15.)

Again therefore another first word—the seventh so far as it may be connected with the sixth already touched upon—the first public word of preaching to the people. There intervene, however, occasional testimonies to individual men, recorded by John; and the first preaching in Nazareth, which Luke gives us, runs nearly parallel with it. It is not, further, so much a single utterance, once spoken on a specific occasion, as a compendious summary of his first preaching, which were repeated in words of which these are a type. Thus it may be regarded as an introduction of that connected series of discourses, which Matthew gives us first of all, and with him Mark and Luke.

The Lord commences his preaching with the same words which the forerunner had already uttered (Matt. iii. 2); in order that he may prepare the way for himself and his announcement of the kingdom of God which had now appeared—the Glad-tidings revealed to faith. For he is ever and throughout his whole preaching and prophetic office his own peculiar forerunner; the preparer of his own mediatorial and kingly office. This is the first thing which Matthew records, in order to indicate that same transition from John to Jesus, which we discern also in John's history of the baptism (iii. 26; iv. 1). It is not immediately said—I, the King of this kingdom, am come; nor is it, My kingdom: the Lord preserves the first utterance of this lofty expression for his disciples, in his humiliation (Luke xxii. 30), and before Pilate; leading the way to it by the expression—The Son of Man and his kingdom (Matt. xiii. 41; xvi. 28; comp. xx. 21). The kingdom of heaven—an expression which was then hardly extant among the Jews, but probably originated in the Baptist's words as a most decisive protest against false notions of an earthly kingdom, and thence passed over into the later Rabbinical doctrine to denote the idea of the Messianic kingdom, which had indeed existed from the beginning. This expression does not occur in all the Old Testament, but is prepared for in such passages as Dan. ii. 44. The word of expectation which had been hitherto familiar—the kingdom of God—was taken from the prophets, and indeed transitionally developed in the Apochrypha (Ecclus. x. 10). This continues to be the expression in the Gospels of Mark, Luke, and John (only John iii. 3, 5), and throughout the New Testament, with the exception of Matthew, who, bringing into prominence the opposition between the true fulfillment and the Jewish expectation, joins with "the kingdom of God" the kingdom of heaven, in his record of our Lord's discourses. But the apostles use this word no more, as the prophets have it not at all.*

It is at hand, says the Lord again, as the Baptist had said, and as his messengers were to say at their first mission in Israel, ch. x. 7. It is exhibited as just descending from heaven to earth, where a state of imperfection exists as well as the dominion of sin; afterwards it is said more decisively—The kingdom of God is come to you (ἔφθασεν, ch. xii. 28.), is in your midst, present within you (Luke xvii. 21). But where the expression kingdom of heaven is used, the word always includes a reference to the future of its true consummation, in connection with the secret preparations for that future, as will be more fully seen in Matt. v. 3, 10, 20.

It comes otherwise than Israel has supposed; therefore is the necessary condition of repentance prefixed. It demands a new and heavenly mind, with the rejection of the old spirit; it requires and brings with it, a new heart and a new spirit (Ezek. xviii. 31). That was the impressive, unexpected preaching of the Baptist; but only unexpected, because Israel had forgotten what was the substance and result, the tenor and conclusion of all the prophecy and preaching of the prophets. The last and greatest prophet before Christ utters at the close of the Old Testament this great and comprehensive word; and Christ himself as the prophet of his new kingdom of grace, takes it up again, for it is the essential word of connection between the Old and the New Testaments. It remains also the ever-recurring word of preparation for faith, and the reception of grace; for the kingdom of heaven belongs only to the spiritually poor and mourners in heart. All the apostles preach repentance and faith; purification from all former sins may never be dispensed with till the final entrance into the everlasting kingdom (2 Pet. i. 9–11): and even from heaven the Lord cries to his church below—Repent! (Rev. ii. 5–16; iii. 3, 19).

* For 2 Tim. iv. 18 is a quite different form of expression.

Mark further this "for" between the two phrases, which is the true link between the preaching that demands, and the promise that bestows: "The desire for the kingdom of heaven should be the motive of repentance."* No true and perfect repentance can spring merely from the terror of the law; the law preaches no distinctive repentance, but life for the righteous and death to all sinners. But all the prophets and John had, on the ground of promised grace, exhorted to repentance; thereby, as in a word of mercy, offering also the gift of repentance unto life, even as the Lord and his apostles do (Acts, v. 31; xi. 18). Thus is folded up in this introductory word of the Lord the whole substance, the essential principles of all the exhortations of God to sinners. It binds in indissoluble and inscrutable connection the divine gift and the free acceptance of man: Will ye and Grace! That is here foreshadowed which the Sermon on the Mount only further develops. But he who hears not and does not this, who is not made willing to repent in sincere poverty of spirit for the sake of the kingdom of heaven—to him the kingdom of heaven comes only near, alas! without being his portion and consolation (Luke x. 11).

Mark gives us another compend of this first preaching of our Lord; and announces more fully what the Lord had said on another occasion, when he had advanced a step further into his own more distinctive preaching. The publican Matthew stops at the preaching of repentance, which the Baptist had made so emphatic to himself. He would now lay stress upon it for the people of Israel as the Messiah's preaching also. Mark, on the other hand, takes up that addition which he had received from Peter, the man of faith, and represents the Lord as saying: Repent, and believe the Gospel. In that first brief exhortation, indeed, in which Christ and John hold the same language, faith was understood as the unexpressed middle-term; just as in the believe of the later purely evangelical preaching repentance is always pre-supposed without being mentioned, as preceding, accompanying, and following faith. Both are inseparably and essentially joined in the true μετανοεῖν, repentance, which in the very abandonment of sin presses on to lay hold upon mercy.* Yet Christ's ministry of grace more manifestly exhibits itself in this advancement in the expression, for the announcement of the kingdom of heaven comes forward into the foreground by this addition, especially, Believe the Gospel. This is a new, fundamental, and principal idea. The word which denotes it is found in the Old Testament in a general human sense (2 Sam. xviii. 25); and in a prophetic prefaratory allusion (Psa. xl. 10, בִּשַּׂרְתִּי צֶדֶק— Isa. xl. 9, lii. 7, lxi. 1; Luke iv. 18); but as the most distinctive designation of the last and finished tidings of grace to human faith it is first found in the lips of Christ. That was also glad tidings which the Baptist announced (Luke iii. 18 εὐηγγελίζατο): but it is the Lord who first preaches the Gospel of the kingdom, by proclaiming its actual existence (Mark i. 1; Matt. iv. 23, xi. 5; Luke, iv. 43; xvi. 16). For it was his alone to say: The fulness of the time is come (Gal. iv. 4). The design of the old covenant is accomplished; the set time of waiting and preparation, which, according to the hidden counsel of God, was necessary for the sake of humanity at large, has expired. The Son is born, has grown to maturity, has been anointed and tempted. The testimony of him who was to bear him witness has been uttered, and now he bears witness to himself. Now begins that last speaking of God by His Son (Heb. i. 2), the Gospel, which henceforth is to be preached in all the world till the end cometh (Matt. xxiv. 14). What a glance into the past and the future is this! What an announcement is this, wrapping up in mystery the deep things of the counsel of God (casting down every unlawful question—Why not before?), and yet revealing to the penitent sinner all that is necessary for his faith! The time is fulfilled, the hour is come. I am come—come, then, all to me and see; but come with repentance, taste and see in faith! He does not, indeed, say openly at this beginning, Believe in me! but that this is his meaning was plainly to be understood. For what else could be faith in the coming fulfillment of all that had been promised?

THE CALLING OF THE FISHERS OF MEN.

(Matt. iv. 19; Mark i. 27; Luke v. 4, 10.)

The Evangelists, according to the wisdom of the Holy Ghost, whose influence and direction they only unconsciously felt, were under the necessity of distributing in portions what was allotted to them to record. So here in the calling of the two pairs of brothers from their fishing-nets to the permanent following of the Lord. That their release from their earthly toil and calling was gradual and progressive, as we gather from John, Matthew, and Luke together, might have been pre-supposed as more natural and likely; although Matthew's call afterwards appears to present an example of an almost instantaneous enlightenment and separation from all. Matthew, when he mentions Simon with the addition, "who was called Peter," pre-supposes the giving of the new name at his former confession, of which he could scarcely have been ignorant; but Luke's account (ch. v. 3–5), requires no more than that some such earlier relations between the Lord and these fishermen should be understood by his readers.

* Synod of Bern: "Orders for the regulation of the doctrine and the life of ministers and preachers in the town and canton of Bern," etc., 1682. A most weighty encyclical!

* It is not a proper use of the Lord's word, though otherwise applicable enough to a memorial of Luther, and only too significant for our own age, that upon the monument at Wittenberg the inscription is curtailed: Glaubet an das Evangelium (Believe the Gospel)—without the little word that precedes —Repent!

That Peter, especially, was designed for a distinctive personal position in this approaching kingdom of God—that the Lord purposed to form him into something especial, his new name, according to the analogy of such namings in the Old Testament, had sufficiently foretold. The preparation for this was indicated in the early beginning of the formation of a circle of apostles and disciples around the Lord in such a manner, that the command—Follow me! now developed a still more comprehensive meaning. Yet those, who already surrounded the Lord as "his disciples" at Cana, went back in the interim to their fishing again; and it is at a subsequent critical moment that the Lord clearly reveals to them, that the time is come when they must leave their ships and their nets as an ordinary occupation. Then they followed him altogether, remained wholly in his company; as in past times the servants and disciples of the prophets had done according to custom and propriety, and in a later age the scholars of those who were called Rabbi among the Israelites (Δεῦτε ὀπίσω μου, אַחֲרַי לְכוּ, Come after me; 1 Kings xix. 20, 21). This Matthew significantly records, without relating more concerning the external occasion of it, than simply that Jesus walking by the sea saw them casting their net into the sea, and afterwards the two others mending their nets. Had anything more occurred at the time (as in Luke v.), his account, as we now read it, would bear upon it the mark of actual untruthfulness. Thus the distinctive significance of this critical turning-point lies altogether and only in that internal glance of our Lord, which, regarding them as fishermen, contemplates in this lower calling which is revoked, that higher one, which he now for the first time clearly unfolds to them: From henceforth leave this net; ye shall in my discipleship be prepared to cast the net of the kingdom of heaven into the sea of the nations (ch. xiii. 47); remain fishermen still, but in a higher style—henceforth ye shall catch men!

Two things claim our attention here: how the Lord's profound wisdom lays hold of every thing lower and external to become the image of things and relations in the kingdom of heaven; and also how familiarly his thought and language attach themselves to those Old Testament typical expressions in which the Spirit had already prophetically exhibited all the germs of the New Testament consummation. There is in the discourses of Jesus much more of such reference to the language of the Old Testament than is discerned by ordinary exposition; so much, indeed, that we have never finished tracing it. It is not a casual matter, but a real though secret prelude of the Holy Ghost, that the Lord named, in Jeremiah (xvi. 16), those who were sent forth for the restoration of Israel fishermen; and again in Ezekiel (xlvii. 10) spoke of the fishers who should gather exceeding many fishes into the new waters of the living. That which there pointed into the most remote futurity of the kingdom of God, is here beginning to be manifest; and the previous fisher-condition of the first apostles was itself a pre-intimation; just as it has pleased divine Providence in the case of many other important persons to shadow out their future calling in their earlier relations in life; in David's sheepfold, for instance, his own kingdom and that of his greater Archetype.

Finally: I will make you fishers of men This signifies not merely, I now by my prerogative appoint and call you to this; nor simply, I will from this time forwards, as your new master, train you for this; not merely even, I will qualify you for it, by creating you into some new thing, which I only can do. But there is included the promise: Ye shall, with success and blessing, labor in the ministry of my word, which shall catch men, even as your nets the fish. This latter meaning comes out with especial prominence in the two prophetic draughts of fishes; at the outset in Luke v. more remotely, but with perfect clearness; and in the latter after the resurrection, the symbolical import of which John points out in his own manner, in all its full significance (ch. xxi. 6–11). I will make you into fishers of men, thou shalt catch men—these words are uttered by the Saviour of mankind with the same emphasis of love, with which he afterwards testified, "I am not come to destroy men's lives, but to save them" (Luke ix. 56). How infinitely more excellent and lofty a calling! Whatever else his grace made of these Galilean fishermen, themselves sinful men who had just been by him gathered and saved, even up to their thrones and crowns of apostolical dignity in the regeneration of the world; this one thing remains the climax and the crown of their honor and dignity, that they were made ministers and helpers of the grace which saved mankind.

Now they who would regard Luke v. 1–11 as merely a more specific account of the same circumstance which Matthew has more generally narrated, do it at the peril of dealing with the Scripture as if it were not the holy word of God. This we cannot do. The positive expressions of the latter Evangelist (Matt. v. 18, 19), mark out definitely a situation which cannot be made identical with the account of Luke, without imputing to a fellow apostle actual ignorance of these special circumstances; or actual incorrectness, and not merely concealment, to the Spirit who inspired the Gospels, exercising a divine supervision and moulding the human element in them. The latter to us is still less conceivable even than the former. Peter continues to hold his house at Capernaum (viii. 14), and thereby his connection with his property. He must not be supposed to have sold and given this to the poor, but only given up his ordinary occupation. Jesus many times afterwards sailed in his ship, sent him away as a fisherman with his hook, when there arose a necessity (Matt. xvii. 27); even after the resurrection Peter still speaks quite naturally of going a fishing (John xxi. 3)—though nearer indeed than he then thought to the final call which released him from it for ever. All this makes Luke's account sufficiently plain.

The Lord prayed Simon* (ἠρώτησεν, as in Luke iv. 38, vii. 3–36), an interesting indication of the human lowliness with which the Master was wont to speak to his disciples on even such matters. His language only becomes imperative—though it would always befit it to be so—when he is about, in his wonderful promise, to bless and reward the service which he asked: Launch out into the deep, yet further from the land, cast your nets down εἰς ἄγραν, for a draught, i.e. not as on ordinary occasions, with the design to catch; but it is a promise as in John xxi. 6: καὶ εὑρήσετε, and ye shall find (comp. Luke v. 9). Simon was already a disciple of Jesus, and calls him Master: now whether the Master better understands fishing, too, he can scarcely determine; but he soon turns away from all natural considerations, to simple faith in the word of him who had just been speaking the word of God from his ship. The great multitude of fishes, since the whole night before they had taken nothing, rightly appears to him a miraculous sign; he feels his sinfulness, and shrinks before the power of God; calls his Master now also his Lord; and would as simply as foolishly remove himself in fear from his fellowship.† Yet is his meaning better than his language; he utters "the noblest feeling in the most unskillful words."* It pleases the Spirit of God to give him just at this instant such a deep consciousness of sin as for the time he could not control; and that is the characteristic moment which the Lord seizes for repeating, in order to its further and decisive confirmation, what he had once before said to him: From henceforth thou shall catch men! Now is the promise contained in the word that called them first, made more plain by the miraculous sign; which, occurring at the end of the Lord's sermon, was a fit type of that preaching itself. Now also is Simon's unworthiness and unfitness for what the Lord designed to make him, revealed out of the depth of his heart; and therefore further is that sublimely gracious word added, which the Lord has since then spoken to so many besides the first apostle, which indeed he speaks to us all; that pecaliar word of New Testament mercy, with which the angels in the time of consummation begin anew: Fear not! This word in his lips raises to its highest fulfillment of force and meaning, what had from the very beginning begun to be uttered in the old covenant, where the angels thus speak to terrified and sinful men (Dan. x. 12–19); and the revealing and witnessing Lord himself, from the calling of Abraham down to the latest encouragement sent by the prophets (Gen. xv. 1, xxvi. 24, xlvi. 3; Deut. i. 21; Josh i. 9, viii. 1; Judges. vi. 23; 2 Kings i. 15; Isa. vii. 4, x. 24, xli 10, 13, 14, &c., down to Hagg. ii. 5; Zech. viii. 13, 15). Thus then is this word now uttered by Jesus, at once a word of divine majesty to the "sinful man" Peter (Fear not, Peter! as before, Fear not, Abram!); and a word of kindness from the Son of Man, the Sinner's Saviour, as if there had been already added, Be not afraid, only believe! (Mark v. 36; John xiv. 1).

But when the Evangelist Luke, further removed from the event, closes the history with —They forsook all and followed him; he may be well supposed to have designed to record their special and distinctive call, without a clear knowledge of that earlier one; although his history itself obviously implies relations between the Master and these fishermen which must previously have begun.

* This does not indicate, as Roos supposes, a slight alienation from Peter; for the Lord had certainly many times made requests of his disciples.

† The incident in Luke iv. 33–41, had not taken place just before in order of time, though in Luke's Gospel it occurs just before. Then would Simon's conduct have been strange indeed, as Schleirmacher says quite correctly.

* So far rightly Lange. But that Peter only feared for himself the continued oppressive enjoyment of this present blessing, does not appear. There is rather an actual putting away of the Lord's society.

THE SERMON ON THE MOUNT.

(Matt. v.—vii.; Luke vi. 20–49.)

We* deem it our duty conscientiously to abstain from bewildering ourselves in the strife of the critics, as to whether these sayings of our Lord uttered, according to Matthew's testimony, when he was set upon the Mount, were indeed spoken as one connected discourse. We may not unite with those, who, losing the simplicity of their attention to the one only Teacher in their oblique regard to this doctor on one side and that rabbi on the other, and sacrificing more or less the humility of discipleship to their overmuch learning; yet are skillful and sharp-sighted enough in their own eyes to come forward with their decisions upon what the Holy Spirit has written for the Church, and to decree—"Here there is connection, and here none"—This or that cannot be accepted because inconsistent with the Lord's own style of thought."† We, for our own part, judge not those of our faithful brethren and friends who suffer themselves to be led by an unfaithful system of interpretation, so far from the firm foundation; but to us it must ever be matter of conscience and honor before the supreme judicial throne of the highest criticism, to abstain from putting our own self-willed construction upon that word which we read in common with the Church, and which should be jealously kept inviolate as the holy text of our preaching to the Church. Had not the chair and the pulpit in the present day been so unhappily sundered, the perception of theologians otherwise faithful could not have become so blunted as to allow them to rise from Matt. v. 1, 2, vii. 28, 29, viii. 1, without asking themselves: "Can I expect the simple laity, the believing congregation, to believe me when I tell them,—This is not true in its seeming sense! Will they be either willing or able to conceive, that Matthew or any other could deliberately collect together into one, various discourses uttered by our Lord at various times, and then inventing an imaginary frame to the picture, report it in so many words, as one discourse uttered in one place and at the same time?" Let him believe this who may; to us the thought is incredible; and that as we are persuaded, not through wilful opposition to the light of the truth which would enter, but through a true perception in our inmost minds of the self-evidencing truth of the holy word; not through our dulness which cannot understand the grounds of critical evidence, but from that clearness of discernment which sees into their groundlessness.

Yes, the Lord's Spirit so brought the Lord's words to the Evangelists' remembrance, that though they might not write them down always according to the strict letter and word, yet they were enabled to give us their substance and contents with perfect truth: but the Spirit of truth could never have permitted the slightest untruthfulness to have occurred in their record. Matthew and John had the Spirit in apostolical measure, Mark and Luke, ministers to the word, stand indeed at one remove from them. But even they, although liable occasionally (by way of distinction) to transfer or confuse things of no importance, have never—especially in reference to the time, place, and connection of the longer discourses—in the very slightest degree possible fallen under any such imputation. This every one must be constrained to admit. Much less can Matthew and John be thought to have presumed to treat in any such way the words of the Word, whose eye-witnesses and ministers they were—arranging, adjusting and working them up, contrary to actual and absolute fact.* The deeper we penetrate into the relation which here subsists between the human and he divine, the clearer we discern, having any measure of faith in our interpretation of Scripture, the miracle which must have been wrought by the Spirit in the furnishing of the Evangelists for the task of handing down the discourses and the acts of our Lord; so much the further must we recede from the unseemly thought that this or that was put in

* Not a formula merely; for we speak indeed in the name of many like-minded with ourselves.

† On revision we retract not one iota of this. Wieseler, indeed, very summarily decides, that the first glance of the eye gives authentic evidence of its having been collected from many several discourses; but the glance of our eye beholds it very differently. Let the incorrigible sophistry of such, alas! as Lange persist in asserting—"This or that would be in this way or the other more appropriate—the Evangelist intended or wished, &c., &c.": I know by the testimony of my life-long reading, that every thing is there alone appropriate, where the Holy Spirit, who well understood and truly glorified the words of Jesus, has written and placed it. [The author, however, seems to overlook the fact that at least one of the inspired Evangelists, namely, Luke, himself omits precisely the apparently irrelevant matter here, and gives the most of it in other connections. The difference in point of authority which he intimates as obtaining between the Gospels is a hazardous doctrine. His argument as to the arrangement of the words of Christ in Matthew is untenable, because equally applicable to that of Christ's acts.—Am. Ed.] order simply by man; or rather shifted and deranged, in order that we, learned investigators of later times, might be needed to set it right again.

*Even though the nun of Dülmen affirms it (Sepp, ii. 261), it is not true! and though men of the highest repute have for a long time past (e. g. Kleuker, Menschlicher Versuch, &c., p. 223) maintained it—I will protest from the deepest conviction!

We cannot conceive that Matthew could have wrought up sayings of our Lord uttered at various times into one connected whole, as if they had been spoken at one time; for as the apostolical humility of his own spirit was incapable of such an impropriety, so neither was it possible that the Holy Ghost should guide and instruct him to record any untruth whatsoever for the Church. That which Luke, ch. vi. 20–49, gives us as the Lord's discourse, with essentially similar notification of place, vi. 17, and concluding asseveration, vii. 1, as Matthew's, is manifestly the same Sermon on the Mount in another epitome: whence we should gather that we have only in Matthew also an abstract, though his is more complete. The passages of the Sermon on the Mount which we find repeated elsewhere in Luke are simply repetitions: the Lord did indeed re-utter them at the time and place which Luke mentions; and a sound exposition will prove that their mention there is quite consistent with the connection. That the Lord should have uttered more than once, not simply his briefer moral sentences, but also his longer discourses, is not unworthy of the great Teacher in any point of view; is conformable both to his human condescension and his divine wisdown, and puts to shame the vanity of many a poor preacher who is ever striving to bring forth what, at least in words, will take a novel form. Within the individual Evangelists such recurrence is incontestible. For instance, Matthew repeats what was already in the Sermon on the Mount in ch. xii. 33, xv. 14 (comp. Luke vi. 39), xviii. 8, 9, (Mark ix. 43–47), xix. 9 (yet again in another place, Luke xvi. 18), xxii. 5. Further repetitions are to be found in Luke: xi. 2–4, the prayer given in the same words, but with a more impressive design and meaning; xii. 22–34, the longer discourse against care; similarly ch. viii. 16 (Mark iv. 21), xi. 33, xi. 9–13, 34–36, xii. 58, 59, xiii. 24–27, xiv. 34, 35 (Mark ix. 50), xvi. 13–17: finally, in Mark ix. 24, xi. 25, 26. These very repetitions, which the expositor must first read in the place where they are found, and then refer to their connection in the original discourse, serve to indicate to us the Lord's Sermon on the Mount as what it really is, the preliminary abstract of his doctrine: and he himself, in repeating them, points out to us the especial significance of this his first sermon for the instruction of all people.

The Lord spoke from a mountain—upon one of the level platforms of which he stood surrounded by his disciples—to his disciples and to all the people from among whom he would call his disciples. The choice of a mountain had reference to something more than merely a fitting pulpit; as the mind of the church has testified in the fidelity with which this circumstance has been retained to designate the sermon itself. As the Mediator of the new covenant bringing grace for the fulfillment of the law, opens here his mouth to preach to us for the first time salvation (Heb. ii. 3); we involuntarily and naturally think of that mountain of the law, which preached condemnation. The Old Testament placed foremost the curse; the New, being glad-tidings, begins with blessing. It is not a "second law" which proceeds now from the Lord—who as he then gave his testimonies amid the tempest and darkness of Sinai, now in his love to man, sits down among them that they may sit at his feet and learn his words (Deut. xxxiii. 2, 3)—but is the fulfilling of that one unrepealed law which is here offered by grace, and which is now required through the acceptance of that offered grace (ch. v. 17, 18). Thus the fundamental principles of this compendious first sermon are found in that mysterious word, "the fulfilling of all righteousness," as also in that first public requirement —"Repent ye!" We may further say that the Sermon on the Mount teaches us wherein that repentance consists, whereby alone we enter the kingdom of heaven. It preaches it, however, as a Gospel, since it commences with most gracious promises, with blessings pronounced upon the poor, and those who hunger after righteousness; but it deepens into a spiritual and strict interpretation of the letter of the law (its only true interpretation as authoritatively established by the Lawgiver, the time being now fully come); and requires, on the ground of the promised grace, the righteousness of God for the kingdom of God: yea, it closes with warning and threatening announcement of a future judgment before him who here speaks, and who thus already bears sublime witness to himself as Lord; before him who comes to the meek and miserable with grace as their Saviour, and the power of grace as their Sanctifier, but will then as judge receive such only into his kingdom as have been restored by his grace to the performance of the will of God. This general view suffices to show us that the Sermon on the Mount embraces in its summary one connected design from its beginning to its end; and teaches us to perceive, between its most attractive commencement, where the kingdom of heaven is opened wide to all the meek, and its fearfully threatening close, where the strait gate is shut for ever against all evil-doers, the progressive advancement of a deeply significant development. The gradation of all preaching is here reflected—from promise through requirement to warning; to which corresponds the progress of the life of the disciples of Christ, the children of God. All apostolical preaching of the Gospel must begin with the gracious commencement of this sermon, the conclusion of all apostolical warning and announcement of judgment must coincide with its awful conclusion; but intermediate lies all that progressive teaching and exhortation, which through faith in its fulfiller establishes the law in the believer. This arrangement of the Sermon on the Mount has been seized and reproduced to us with such simplicity and clearness by Matthew—through the Spirit who, besides bringing to his remembrance what he had heard, now gave him to understand it likewise—that we can only ascribe the anixety of expositors to find another connection, or their inability to find any, to a lack of simplicity in reading and apprehending him. We may suppose that the Lord did not utter the individual weighty sayings in a manner quite so detached, but, as was necessary to the hearers of an oral discourse, that he assisted their comprehension by adding many explanatory and connecting remarks; and probably not without pauses at the turning points which would leave time for impression. But the Spirit has taken an exact epitome of its essential contents, and constructed it for the Holy Scripture into one new, and, as it were, glorified word; so that we have, after all, through the intervention of the Holy Ghost, the entire actual Sermon on the Mount, which we may hear and understand even as it was spoken by the Lord himself.

The whole contents of the three chapters of Matthew fall, as we have said, into three sections. The fulfilling of the law—that perfect righteousness of those who, in becoming the disciples of Christ, may and shall become again the children of their heavenly Father (ch. v. 48), and only through such righteousness shall enter the kingdom of heaven—is alike promised by him who announced himself as come for its fulfillment (ch. v. 17), and demanded by him who will only have such disciples, and only bring such children to glory, as receive and retain what he brings and imparts, even to the consummation and perfection of all. But both to the inner, gradual development, and the external patient progress of the disciples, there corresponds a progression in the teaching of the sermon—according to its three main gradations. First of all, there is the general attracting promise, then law with its specific demands (now indeed the law of the Spirit, through the life of grace which has been received), and finally the warning, which in its stern restrictions, rejects the impure and the disobedient. Thus the discourse proceeds from the foundation of sanctification offered as a gift at the outset, through its outward manifestation in the life, demanded as the acknowledgment and evidence of that gift, to the test and proof at the close of the disciples' course, which is exhibited as the most pressing of all motives.

The first division embraces ch. v. 3–20; in which the same three-fold progression already reveals itself as an undertone running through the general promise. Hence we have absolute and special promise, as the origin and foundation of all, in the benedictions (v. 3–12); then, on the ground of their assurance (ye are! ye have!), the evidence and manifestation of that new life and light are demanded (v. 13–16); finally, there is here also a warning, which in its emphatic restriction and rejection, points forward even now to the test at the end of all (v. 17–20). Even this last rigorous test indeed is still under the high note of promise: I am come to fulfill!

At this point, viz., in v. 20, is the transition to the second division, which now proceeds to trace out, in the form of a spiritual law, the outward manifestation of that righteousness, the foundation of which is the gift of grace, ch. v. 21, vii. 14. This is pre-eminently the main body of the Sermon on the Mount. Here the Lord sets forth the righteousness of his disciples through three great contrasts, as they exhibit themselves in their inward organic progress. The first and most obvious contrast, which at the same time is a representation of the spiritual fulfillment of the law: Not as the Pharisees, the men of the letter of the law, and of external appearances—which are, nevertheless, hypocritical. This is, in accordance with the fundamental principle with which the Sermon on the Mount set out, most strictly impressed and most amply illustrated from ch. v. 21 to vi. 18. This is the basis of a spiritual, correct, and cordial understanding of the law. The second contrast springs with still sharper severity of truth out of the former; just as John the Baptist had placed Pharisaic Judaism on a par with heathenism: Not like the Gentiles, the self-seeking men of the flesh and of that good which is earthly and therefore perishable. In the former it had been already premised that the Pharisees were like the publicans, yea, like the heathen (ch. v. 46, vi. 7); this is now more fully established, and in such a way that we can only understand heathen in a spiritual sense as the opposite of the new, true Israel of the Messiah, ch. vi. 19–34. This is the procedure of an obedient, undivided and heartily believing endeavor after the kingdom of God and his righteousness. Finally, what can the third contrast to true discipleship be, but its opposition to the imperfect, insincere disciples themselves, who even in the following of Christ bring with them their Pharisaism: Not as the half disciples and mere professors, the censorious ones who shamefully desecrate that which is holy, ch. vii. 1–14. This is the perfection of pure love, as humble as it is wise; it is obviously, at the same time, the most stringent and severe utterance of Christ's law for his own people, and thus forms a fit transition to the third division which is wholly admonitory.

The spiritual fulfilling of the law, the perfect righteousness, has at length found its simplest expression (ch. vii. 12) in a principle most easy to be apprehended, and which indeed our conscience confirms from our natural love of self; yet is this self-renunciation but the turning of nature to the strait gate in order to do, and to the narrow way for continuance in doing. This leads, by a connection not very manifest, but very express and emphatic, to the third main division of the whole sermon, in which the solemn warning against every bye path, and the threatening of judgment upon all who at the end shall be found not to have been doers of the words of spirit and of grace, reach their highest severity.

Here is shown the test of true or false profession and life, and not all who have said, Lord, Lord, and done many wonderful things, stand in the judgment. The fruits of the grace so freely and graciously offered in the beginning, are inexorably demanded; the one Lawgiver, who wills that every man should submit to judgment and judge himself in order to salvation, appears also as the condemner of all to whom he has not become a Saviour (James iv. 12). But here also, although all has the sound of solemn warning and severe threatening, there is yet heard once more a note of the fundamental promise in the planting of the good tree for good fruit (v. 15–20). Then once more is the law of the divine will stamped as a requirement (v. 21–23). The exhibition of the certainly impending trial, awful in its simplicity, closes the whole; and the fearful fall of the house built on the sand forms a striking contrast with the invitation at the beginning. For the fundamental threefold progression evolved in the organism of life as of doctrine, is repeated at every stage, as will be more manifestly shown in a closer investigation of the particulars from the beginning.

The seven benedictions with an eighth (ch. v. 3–12), which contains the entire original foundation and beginning of promise, are also arranged in their order so as to advance from the first fundamental principle, through a progressive path marked out, to the full assurance at the end. The Lord lifts up his eyes on his disciples (Luke vi. 20)—beholding in these immediately around him, the type and earnest of all those future disciples whom he would call out from the mass of the people—and proclaims what kind of men they must be whom he will receive, and by his further directions prepare for himself; or what they must become who shall enter the kingdom of heaven. Thus first of all there is the internal state of mind, which is the only, the indispensable condition of the regeneration that grace provides, and therefore the basis of discipleship. The promises, with all their perfect fulness of promise, are presented as the objective supply of a felt necessity, the sincere acknowledgment of which, together with the outgoing after help, gives already the certain right to receive them: the kingdom of heaven comes to the poor as a free gift. The susceptibility for this reception consists in the knowledge of need, in the mere knowledge and discernment of it first of all—a conscious poverty of spirit; to which must be added the grievous feeling of that knowledge quickened into life, and the instant and urgent outgoing of the will for help, this again being viewed as the mere willingness of a negative resignation (v. 5), and as raised into positive longing, the hunger and thirst after righteousness.*

Hence in the second place, inasmuch as they who thus earnestly desire it are invested with righteousness, the outward and inward deportment follows, which when that righteousness has been imparted, may be demanded as the witness and proof of our discipleship in our after course. In the former series we have the strait gate of the kingdom of heaven, in the latter the narrow way; as Von Gerlach has so far well said. In this second series the promises become more definite as conformable to a corresponding condition of mind, the actual attainment of which, with its manifestation in acts, alone makes good the claim to keep, increase, and receive in all its fulness, that promised grace. The kingdom of heaven establishes itself in the heart as the likeness to God of those who seek that kingdom and exercise themselves unto it. The outward and inward quality of this advancing righteousness of life consists, first, in this holiness of deportment itself,—as well as in its acts, rendering to others, without the mercy which has been received; that laborious love which resembles God's, and is the beginning and end of all fulfillment of the law;—as also in that purity of heart, which alone from the very beginning gives truth and value to every action, and in the deeds of mercy re-acts within upon itself, to its own perfection;† and then, secondly, as its result, in the efficiency of such a holy deportment (concerning which it is both promised that it shall never be wanting, and commanded that it should be diligently sought), namely, in their diffusing peace as God diffuses it, when his children love as he loves, and are pure as he is pure. Thus have the spiritually poor become so rich in the possession of the kingdom of heaven that they are qualified to bring its peace, or at least to offer it, to the world! (2 Cor. vi. 10). Can it be true, as it has been maintained, that there is no progression to be detected here?

Such are the seven benedictions, which embrace the entire Christian discipleship, regeneration in its development from poverty of spirit into all that is contained in the true and essential filial relation to God. But in this peace-making there was already pre-supposed a transition, finally, to the conflict and opposition of an evil world. There is added, therefore, in conclusion, thirdly, in the form of an eighth benediction extending beyond its immediate object, a declaration of the heavenly reward of God's children presented on earth, which is admonitory, testing, and points forward to the final ratification of blessing at the end of all. The promise which here also is the predominant note, refers only to the confirmed assurance of that first one—The kingdom of heaven is and ever shall be yours: it is at the same time the contrast of victory with warfare, a reward conformable to a worthy qualification for it. Indeed the persecution of the righteous by the unrighteous is the due and the authentic way by which the goal of persevering love is attained. This is further exhibited in the first transition to an application to the disciples—Happy are ye—persecution injures you not, but is rather the proof that ye are true peace-makers, and not false prophets crying, Peace, peace (Luke vi. 26): yet here also we cannot fail to hear the undertone of warning—So they do it all falsely! Finally, the encouragement: Your reward is sure; then be ye, like the prophets before you, and now much more, the salt of the earth and the light of the world! (The transition to what follows.) Thus have we exhibited our view of the order of the benedictions: the reader himself must test it, and prefer, if he will, any other of the multitude of arrangements which have been essayed.* We think, however, that enough has been said to show that it is not our "preconceived determination, that the seven-number shall play their part here" (Kienlen), but that the eighth is really only supplementary to the seven.

* The transposition of the fourth and fifth verses in Lachmann's text, which Neander accepts as "logical" and "suitable to their aim as instruction," and which Von Gerlach and others have approved, we hold to be altogether incorrect. For the meekness here signified follows upon a mourning that has received consolation; and the poverty passes naturally into such mourning.

† Here so soon, as afterwards in his exposition Kienlen's hardihood contradicts itself, in transposing to suit his own scheme, the seventh and eighth verses. The fault of "slight failures of memory" imputed to the evangelists may be exchanged rather in this case, for great failure of understanding in their expositor.

We have already begun in these observations to pursue the whole into its parts, to point out the true position and the profound meaning of every single saying. In the light now thrown upon them the holy words will, even to their minutest detail, clearly and transparently unfold their meaning.

He opened his mouth.†—Disciples and people solemnly waited for the first word which, under God's heaven, with his eye upon the holy land upon earth, and after such a preparation for such preaching as had never before been heard among men, he would proceed to utter. And they were gracious words which here also at the first proceeded out of his mouth (Luke iv. 22), although followed by those solemn and impressive utterances which brought the power and authority of God more plainly home to the sensual man for his conviction. The first word of his mouth is, Blessed!—and again and again he cries, Blessed, before he could proceed to speak in that other style to which sinners and the ungodly constrained him. For who is this that here speaks? He who is come to give blessedness. But he also, who in speaking and dispensing blessedness from stage to stage, at the same time and by that means sanctifies. How shall we poor sinners be made happy unto holiness at the beginning, and holy unto happiness at the end? Here is the answer, here is the doctrine of all teaching for all people upon earth. The blessedness goes ever progressively increasing along that way, which the Saviour here points out to his disciples, if they continue by walking in it to become more and more capable of that blessedness.

Verse 3. This first word of the Sermon on the Mount is, again, pre-eminently the "fundamental formula of the Gospel:" it demands faith in so joyful a message, without mentioning the word; it awakens, rather, and attracts that faith through its confident and encouraging assurance. And how can any one who is truly poor in spirit fail to apprehend and believe this message of mercy concerning the kingdom of heaven, as soon as it resounds in in his ears? If the poor are altogether unable to believe in their being made blessed through grace, it is proof that, in spite of all appearances, they are not yet fundamentally poor enough. On the contrary, it may sometimes appear as if a man could not believe, while there is actually, in his complaining before God, in the seeking and longing after faith of his wretched heart, a secret faith already present: such mourners, indeed, have pressed forwards already into the second benediction. In the first nothing more is as yet spoken of than perfect poverty of spirit, which may be so poor as not to have even a feeling of need, not even a becoming sorrow for sin. And this is indeed that one thing which the Lord at the beginning of his dispensation of blessedness may and must pre-suppose; nothing can the sinner bring with him when he is called by grace, but a sincere consciousness of his wanting before God every thing that avails in His sight, of having no righteousness in himself, no life of the Spirit. Simple and easy is this one condition and requirement; but hard enough, alas! to the pride of nature. All the further requirements and conditions, which now follow as the objects of gracious benediction, are already fulfilled out of that first gift of grace to the poor—one after, and arising out of, the other. The quickening of the feelings into a deep and sorrowful penitence comes not from mere nature: he who can pour forth the tears of his eyes or of his heart, that is, the tears of sincere contrition for his sin, and not only for its shame and punishment, has previously received, though himself might not as yet be conscious of it, as one who has become poor, the spirit of grace and supplication for that purpose. And so further through the whole progressive series every succeeding condition is only required, because the preceding consolation has brought it. But no one step may be overleaped. We cannot begin in the middle; we can neither enforce a godly sorrow by any efforts of our own in order to bring this first to the Giver of blessedness, nor before the contrite surrender of sin attain unto the fervent hunger and thirst after righteousness; we can neither become pure in heart without the practice of mercy, nor again can we exercise mercy before we have received the comfort of mercy ourselves. The new life of the sinner derived from grace is indeed a living plant, which contains folded in itself at every stage of developement all that is to follow; and as soon as the kingdom of heaven begins to sink into the needy soul, awakened to a sincere consciousness of its poverty, and aroused by the Spirit's influence in it, the germ of the peace of God for the making of peace among men enters with it.* But that one follows the other, as the Lord here speaks, even to the full unfolding and formation of the whole, takes place through the growth of time; and the field of man's heart, in which all such fruits by degrees through grace may grow up to maturity, is ever in itself nothing but poverty.

* See e. g. Zeller in the Monatsblatt von Beuggen, 1847, No. 6. as before. 1839, Nos. 9, 10. Compare therewith Kienlen (Stud. u. Krit. 1848. 3)—who indeed prefers quoting Lisco to Stier—where much is to the same effect and equally strange.

† Whereupon Lange says beautifully in his own way, "Man is the mouth of the creation, Christ is the mouth of humanity."

The μακάριοι, blessed, which with such gracious emphasis stands first, has not, down to ver. 11, either εἰσί, are, or ἔσονται, shall be, connected with it, although the translation gives it correctly enough for the obvious sense —Blessed are! In the sacred text it is a simple proclamation (like the Heb. אַשְׁרֵי), and contains as such the whole fulness of what mercy offers for the acceptance of faith, without any further definite announcement or qualification. It embraces alike, they are now immediately blessed, and shall be so ever more and unto perfection. Then as the promises attached look forward to the future from the second saying onwards, so does it also in the first: The kingdom of heaven is yours; it shall be, and will be ever more perfectly your own. The kingdom of heaven and blessedness are but one, so that the first for is a sublime assurance which bears its own witness to itself. Poor in Spirit, Πτωχοὶ τῷ πνεύματι, עֲנִיֵּי רוּחַ, Isa. xli. 17; lxvi. 2; especially lxi. 1, to which Scripture the Lord here refers, as again at his first preaching in Nazareth (Luke iv. 18); yet πτωχοί, poor, answers rather to the Old Testament אֶבְיוֹנִים, needy, (Isa. xxix. 19), so that outward poverty is actually included in it, as is manifest in the not incorrect version of Luke. Yet it is not merely the externally poor and wretched who are referred to, as the τῷ πνεύματι, in spirit, which is added emphatically shows; by consequence the rich and the exalted also, if they are only poor in spirit. But it must be observed, that the persons pronounced blessed are not the subject of the promising proposition; it is not they (as afterwards in ver. 20) who enter and attain to the kingdom of heaven, but the kingdom of heaven comes to them, and enters into them!—its whole fulness into every one, whose poverty opens to receive it. Yes truly, here is it come near, quite near to those who have it not. The first, bare commencement of μετάνοια, or repentance, may dare already to appropriate all to itself, in order to receive all; and thus through the shining of the beams of mercy into the soul, for the first time, and immediately, it becomes awakened to a more lively perception and feeling its own darkness.

Verse 4. The Lord has further in view Isa. lxi. 2, 3, and proclaims the great year of freedom and of grace—to comfort all that mourn. Were the poor (Matt. xi. 5) to whom he preaches the Gospel, actually in the most comprehensive sense of the general invitation all the miserable and the unfortunate, the toilworn and the heavy laden under the burden and need of life; so has this announcement of a general consolation a like unrestricted and extensive introduction: Come unto me, all who suffer affliction; ye may and ye shall find help. But in drawing nearer to receive this comfort, it becomes evident that there must be added—But be ye truly mourners, sorrow on account of the inner-ground and first cause of all evil, sin! The outwardly poor are far from being always and in their inner spirit so poor, as to allow the heavenly gift of God room to enter into empty and destitute hearts: therefore is the impressive τῷ πνεύματι, in spirit, added, which, like the kingdom of heaven, manifestly casts down all Jewish expectation of the Messiah and points within. The same—as a kind of superscription to the whole discourse—is naturally to be understood also of the mourning (or something similar, as "godly," κατὰ θεόν, 2 Cor. vii. 10); it is not, however, repeated, partly because what preceded has made it sufficiently plain, partly because every mourner, in the pure sense of the word, as one humbled beneath the mighty hand of God, necessarily retreats within himself, and is very near at least to the susceptibility of receiving the true consolation. Seest thou one weeping, thou mayest securely address to him the heavenly message of a merciful salvation, in the sure hope and confidence of a hearing for your message. For "mourning and sorrow are in reality the acknowledged and felt contradiction of the nature that is in us, to the divine life which will be revealed in us" (Nitzsch, Predigten, v. Selection). The mourners shall be comforted, (which well expresses the future παρακληθήσονται,) if they only will, if the consolation that comes only finds them true mourners, who will suffer themselves to hear comfortable words. Yea, as surely as the high and lofty One, who declares himself, in his loving condescension to all misery and need, to be the Holy One, dwelleth with those who are of a contrite and humble spirit (Isa. lvii. 15), so surely is the merciful comfort of God immediately nigh to every troubled one in his affliction. It is but a commencement of blessedness, a specific beginning of consolation in the very sorrow itself, as even the world seems to suspect when it sings about the "sweetness of grief," and in its own way pronounces happy those who can weep. But this is only the shadow and slender beginning of that comfort which the Lord intends, and brings with him. And if his unfading and true spiritual consolation is brought to those who sorrow in the world, it, alas! soon becomes manifest that those are very far from being willing to turn in sincere sorrow to the right consolation, they are not found to be meek mourners, who have [not] broken down and given up their self-will, pride, and opposition. It is quite true as Nitzsch says, "I cannot be man, and not have the beginning of sorrow within me"; but the beginning follows, alas! very evil courses in degenerate humanity. There is a sorrow which is very lightly comforted with nothing; there is, on the other hand, a superstitious and proud sorrow, which refuses to take comfort with the consolation of God. To all such mourning as springs not from poverty of spirit, this promise is assuredly not given. For the Gospel which the Lord here preaches pre-supposes the work of the law and the discipline of preparatory grace upon the soul.

* Lange says further, "And in the blessed peacemaking is still poverty of spirit, in its essential excellence, transformed into the most blessed humility."

Verse 5. Our previous general view and the immediate connection have already shown how πραεῖς, meek, which is commonly interpreted falsely or a least superficially, is here to be understood. The mere external exhibition of a passive, unresisting mind is not spoken of here; it is to be understood (as Neander this time sees) only of the internal disposition of heart, into which the Lord's word penetrates deeper and deeper. Still less may we think of an anticipation of the entire and complete virtue of Christian meekness; for the gradual process of the inner preparation of mind is marked out here from ver. 3–6, before the conduct to which it leads is described ver. 7–9. The "patient endurance of earthly affliction" is not, as Kienlen supposes, immediately spoken of here; but passiveness, and the breaking down of natural opposition, regarded strictly as an internal condition of mind. As the poor become mourners, when the consciousness of their need passes from conviction into feeling, so now is it, further, of still more importance, that they in their misery bend and incline their will to the coming consolation. The willingness to be comforted and helped, is indeed better than all outcry on account of necessity, if that go no further. It is, in a certain sense, as we have seen, the test of true mourning, which without it cannot be genuine; but then this resignation is more distinctively developed, when the Spirit Comforter, in order to make the mourner entirely submissive begins at the very commencement of his consolation thoroughly to correct and chastise him. Πραεῖς, meek, is found in the Septuagint version of the Old Testament, for the עֲנָוִים, poor, of the Psalms and Prophets; and in the New Testament, πρᾶος, πραΰς, πραότης, indicates mostly (as besides in the Greek πραύθυμος, πραύνοος) an inner quality of mind. Observe carefully 1 Cor. iv. 21: Gal. vi. 1; 1 Pet. iii. 4; and especially Eph. iv. 2.* Thus is it a willingness and plasticity of spirit, in opposition to the proud, opposing obstinacy of the natural self-will. If those who are poor in spirit, and mourners, are found humbled and broken with the beginning of such a disposition, then shall they, when comforted by their reception of consolation, advance yet farther in this meekness of soul. For he who has experienced kindness is by it made gentle, so that he has become willing to be content with every thing, as Braune excellently says. Here Rambach† hits the right sense, much better than many later expositors: "This is a fruit of the Spirit which is found upon the soil of spiritual poverty, contrition and mourning; a noble flower, which grows out of the ashes of self-love, upon the grave of pride. On the one hand a man sees his own utter ruin, his unworthiness and misery, on the other he contemplates the kindness and benignity of God in Christ Jesus (Titus iii. 2–4). The internal characteristic is a disposition of heart, which, through the keen perception of its own misery, and of the abounding mercy of God, has become so pliant, gentle, mild, flexible and tractable that no traces of its original ruggedness, of its wild and untamed nature remain." Such meekness,‡ taking to itself the word of grace which dispenses blessedness unto holiness, in its correction as well as in its comfort, does James also require (ch. i. 21); but only of those who are already newborn, in whom this word is already engrafted. With the requirements of this the Saviour could by no means have commenced; that would not have have been the right message for poor sinners which should begin with—Blessed are the merciful, or the pure in heart; so neither could this willing resignation be demanded from the natural man, before he has advanced to that point out of his poverty, which is all he has, through mourning and consolation.

With inconceivable grandeur does the promise which corresponds come forward, in order to allure our proud and stubborn natural mind to submit to that death from which it shrinks:

---

* Where to walk worthy of our vocation in long-suffering, forbearance, love and peace, is indicated as its end, but the internal fundamental state of mind by which it is aimed at is ταπεινοφροσύνη and πραότης just in the same sense as Matt. v. 3, 5. Μακροθυμία and ἀγάπη are then the passive and active expression of such a disposition of mind.

† Betrachtungen über die acht Seligheiten.

‡ Not merely (according to Lange) "before men" as the result of mourning before God, but also and especially meekness before God. For are they not the "mourners" of the Psalter

For they shall, they will, possess or inherit the land, the earth! Is not this worth the sacrifice of self, to be enriched with the free gift of such a possession, of such riches? It is an Old Testament promise, which, while it there clings to the typical land of Canaan, extends much further in the design of the Holy Ghost, (see Psa. xxxvii. 11; xxv. 13; Isa. lvii. 13; lx. 21;) even to the new earth which, with the new heavens, God declares that he will make (Isa. lxvi. 22). It is the ultimate and full meaning of the promise to Abraham—to be the heir of the world (Rom. iv. 13). With reference to the hope of their faith, to the dominion of their spirit, it is already said of God's children—All things are yours (1 Cor. iii. 22). But what will it be in the full fulfillment! The first promise was altogether for the present, the second already points to the ever-following consolation, the third stretches far away into the most distant futurity. The kingdom of heaven, ver. 3, which appears not at first in eartly power and glory, but comes into the hearts of the wretched for their consolation and righteousness, is nevertheless in its future, as it here at once openly proclaims, a kingdom of the earth. Thus does the great Fulfiller teach his docile hearers in his very first discourse, how the promises of the prophets, which cannot be broken, are to be understood; and at the same time teaches what it was the design of the law to create in their hearts, and that it is only given to drive the needy to divine grace, in order that their hunger and thirst after righteousness should find its satisfaction. For already in these seven sayings of blessedness the Law and the Prophets are compendiously unfolded.

How manifestly are all these utterances of divine truth, which bears its simple and majestic testimony to itself, opposed at once to the Pharisaic delusion and pride of self-righteousness, to the Sadducee contentment with the present, sensual delight of this world, and to the perverted thoughts of the world and the natural man! Verses 3–5 are three paradoxes, which with all their gracious invitation and promise, are nevertheless to carnal Israel, to the earthly, self-seeking and sensual man, a stone of stumbling thrown in the way. For grace can only bear the testimony of truth to itself, and the Saviour conceals not, from the beginning, what kind of salvation it is that he brings. Happy the unhappy! Well for the mourners! This does violence to the world's sentiments, and constrains it, either to press into the true experience of so wonderful a doctrine, or even at this early point to pass it by for the broad gate, because this door is too strait. "Thou must assuredly be converted unto the blessedness which the Lord pronounces, as much as unto the righteousness"—so preaches Nitzsch. The very first word teaches us that there is a blessedness which consists not in pleasant sensations, or joyful emotions, but that which is to nature most displeasing. The Lord points impressively from without to within from the present time to the future, from the self of man to the gift and grace of God. O that the richly endowed and worldly blessed of our day, to whom the beginning of the Sermon on the Mount must come with the full force of most direct contrast and contradiction, would but meekly hear it, and give up their hold upon "this side" for the sake of that which is on "the other side," that kingdom of heaven which, in its time, shall also be upon earth, the inheritance of the despised, quiet and patient ones of the land, the humble and meek of the "Preacher upon the Mount!" Self-renunciation is the way to world dominion. Give thyself up in passive obedience to divine grace, and it will present thee one day with a crown of glory, after having previously forgiven thee all thy sin, and healed all thy infirmity. But not otherwise! Thinkest thou in thine heart to rule and possess, to sway and enjoy, all things upon earth, at thine own will and in thy unrighteousness, under the eye of the God of heaven and earth? Thou wilt be put to confusion, and bearest about thee already the silent witness thereof. The vir fortis ac strenuus, the hero or genius, the worldling or conqueror may strut in lordly pride with his evil conscience for a while upon earth, until he is doomed to go down into Sheol to all the other uncircumcised; but the meek in the school of Jesus have a title of heirship upon this earth, which no slanderer or persecutor will be able to cancel in the book of their Father and their King: and the day shall come when the lambs shall feed after their manner in their pastures and waste places (Isa. v. 17). The kingdom of heaven is a free gift for the poor, but only for the poor in spirit; a comfort for the mourners, but only for those who sorrow with the right sorrow: it must ever be, and will prove itself also as a kingdom, a dominion, but only for the meek.

Verse 6. Out of humbleness, sadness, meekness (to use the words of Nitzsch once more), grows, finally, greatness of soul, the sanctified and right loftiness of desire which aspires earnestly towards that which alone is right. The future possessors of the earth, and its now rightfully installed heirs, whose is even now the kingdom of heaven with all its reversion, including the ruling upon earth, these hunger and thirst throughout their whole course, even as they did at the beginning; just as the poor to whom the kingdom of heaven is imparted, mourn in the first repentance unto life which they receive as a bestowment of grace, and oftentimes after. But the Lord more and more comforts the mourners, more and more fills the hungry and thirsty soul with the good things of his righteousness (Psa. cvii. 9, cxlvi. 7, lxv. 5, xxii. 27; Isa. xli. 17 [Bar. ii. 18]). He who created this hunger, shows by creating it that its appropriate food is also provided. There is a hunger and thirst in man which God did not create in him, and for that there shall be, after the brief semblance of gratification, the pain of an eternal famishing. But there still is deep, deep in fallen man, a little spark of longing and desire after righteousness; this faintly-glimmering flax, grace kindles into a clear flame, and that is the hunger and thirst which bears in itself the certain assurance that its supply will not be wanting. It is not, indeed, the being made blessed in itself and first of all, or "felicity" as man's doctrine runs, after which the souls that have been shown the way to happiness through self-denial, the strait gate of the doing of God's will, should seek and struggle; but righteousness, the victory of the eternal and just and good will of God upon earth and in humanity, especially, however, in themselves. Deliver us from evil! comes not till the last petition; but the first again and again cries out in longing, Hallowed be thy name! thy kingdom come! and utters in meekness, Thy will be done! They who thus pray receive the daily bread of their souls, and as much as they require it, of their bodies too. No willing and running, no laboring chase after it in our own strength and in our own way, attains unto righteousness: ours is to desire it; it is for God to give it. Yet observe, that as far as the kingdom of heaven is already set up in these poor, they in their new and inner man naturally, regularly, daily —"with the full force of the instinct of the sustenation of life"—hunger after righteousness, just as the old and outward man hungers after that bread, of which the man, however, does not essentially live. This hungering and thirsting is the sign of life of the new-born inner man, quickened from the sleep of death: hence it is the last thing by which the Lord can indicate the internal spirit and disposition of the children of God. The discourse now passes over* to the evidencing of that righteousness, which has been given to those that have desired it, and shall be more and more fully given even till their full and complete satisfaction, till the purifying of their hearts in love, till that is fulfilled which is written: As for me, I will behold thy face in righteousness, I shall be satisfied when I awake with thy likeness (Psa. xvii. 15). In the new earth dwelleth righteousness (2 Pet. iii. 13), and they who one day inherit it, shall then hunger and thirst no more. He who now as a pilgrim citizen of the city to come, earnestly prays over the table of his house and his heart: Make us partakers of thine eternal, heavenly table, which thou hast graciously promised to us in the kingdom,—he shall be satisfied with the kingdom of God and his righteousness, even until the great feast with all the fathers made righteous in faith; nay, he shall be filled here with the supply of both soul and body from day to day: for whatever the necessity of his body requires shall also be given him, just as the soul's necessity, the special plague of every day, is provided for. Thus the hunger for the bread of the soul shall never cease, until the perfect righteousness has come.

Verses 7—9. Up to this point the promises have corresponded to conditions; but these conditions have been no other than the same need developing itself from step to step in increasing urgency, and outgoing fervor of desire: in each case, therefore, that which is promised is most essentially a gift. Be poor, and the kingdom of heaven shall be thine! Mourn, and thou shalt be comforted! Give up thy will, thou shalt dwell in, and inherit, the everlasting sufficiency! Only hunger and thirst, thou shalt be filled! But now begins the unfolding of a new series. The beginning of this does not simply pre-suppose the end of the former and carry it on, but the outward expression and evidence of the inner principles, the fruits of these hidden feelings manifest themselves already simultaneously in the life; so that they who in their poverty acknowledge their need of mercy, and taste the first-fruits of the divine compassion, begin already to exercise mercy; the mourners begin, while they mourn, to wash their hearts clean; the meek also spontaneously to make peace, the hungerers after righteousness to give themselves up to persecution, on account of that righteousness which they as yet only long for. Inasmuch, however, as all cannot be spoken in one word, which pertains to the many-formed unity of the development of the increasing life from its germ to its maturity, it is right to take the ascending order in which the discourse describes it. The eight benedictions, with their conditions, are in a certain sense found united in every child of God, and no member of this wonderful series may be altogether wanting from the time that the first poverty of spirit has received the gift of grace; yet there is an actual and gradual growth of one out of the other. And here the law applies in all its significance, that the gift received must be preserved, exercised, and increased; and that to him only who has, shall more be given in order to his having all, while from him who guards it not, and does not exercise and increase it, shall be taken away that which he has. Consequently the promises of the second series take now the form of reward, the recompense of grace to those who are faithful to what they have received. Be merciful, and thou shalt have mercy shown to thee!* Be pure, so shalt thou behold the pure One! Make peace, so shalt thou be the manifest child of the God of peace! Such requital, such recompense is no less itself mere mercy and the reward of free grace, the divine gift is only in it going on to its superabundant fulfillment; and the qualities, which are the object of recompense, were previously bestowed

* As in the seven petitions of the Lord's prayer the middle one concerning daily bread effects the transition between the first and second table, between God's good and man's need; even so here the fourth of the benedictions mediates between their two parts, and is the transition, inversely, from the need of the poor to the grace, which transforms and glorifies itself in them as righteousness.

* As Luke in another, briefer epitome of the whole Sermon on the Mount, in its few fundamental ideas, exhibits to us, blended with other sayings, ch. vi. 36–39 (Matt. v. 48, vii. 1, 2).

as a gift. For who can show mercy, without having first received mercy? who can be pure in heart, without having contemplated the purity of God? who can diffuse peace, except through that peace of God unto which he has entered?

But—and this is most important—there is here a possibility of the withdrawal of grace, from those who have received it, but are not faithful to its corresponding exercises; just as the parables, Matt. xviii. 23–35, xxv. 14–30, also teach. Therefore do the promises even now begin to sink, secretly warning against such a loss, while the conditions rise.* To the merciful, God has been, indeed, at the outset, merciful; but only they who thereafter forgive also as they have been forgiven, and love as God has loved them, shall obtain mercy, that is, at the final testing of their fidelity, finally and securely retain it. The pure in heart have purified themselves in the sight of God, have drawn nigh to him in living acquaintance with his name; but only if they preserve and increase that knowledge unto the end, shall they who have come to God finally and fully come nigh to him. Only they who as peacemakers have proved themselves to the end God's children, shall in the coming "manifestation of the sons of God," in the separation between the persevering and the apostates, actually be called the children of God, be acknowledged as such (which pre-signifies, ch. vii. 23). Thus does the gate become straiter and straiter, as afterwards throughout the whole discourse. He who sets out, may in poverty of spirit confidently believe—I have it! but the nearer he approaches the goal, the more will he utter another cry—Not that I have already attained!

Not a word is needed to prove that ἐλεήμονες, merciful, in its compendious sense indicates the practical love of our neighbor, all that is done to our brethren from the inward principle of a communicating and helping charity. It is necessary, however, to observe that such rudiments of regeneration, as were to be found even among the heathen—who, though they knew not Christ, yet through the pure impulse of a latent grace, exercised towards others what they sought for themselves—must be included here; in opposition to that narrow dogmatic limitation, which would despise the good works of such as Cornelius, though God nevertheless esteemed them. Mercy rejoiceth against judgment (James ii. 13): this impartial and holy law of eternal love graciously throws open the kingdom of heaven to many coming from the east and the west; even as it rigidly closes it against those children of the kingdom who, with all their vaunted faith, have never learned or retained love. This mercy, however (as Nitzsch excellently preaches), is not that weak and sickly sympathy which ungodly selfishness cannot but feel, and is too willing to plead in evasion as the true Christianity, not that false kindness to one's neighbor which goes hand in hand with the most unbridled indulgence of one's own flesh. Therefore is purity of heart next spoken of as the test of true mercy; not the reverse, as if this presumptive mercy were the guarantee of purity in heart. Pure in heart, Καθαροὶ τῇ καρδίᾳ, בָּרֵי לֵבָב (Psa. lxxiii. 1, comp. Psa. li. 12, xviv. 4–6)—not merely pure in the Levitical typical sense, not merely of clean hands in a Pharisaical or carnally moral sense, but in the inner being before God, who desireth truth in the inward parts (Psa. li. 8). In the position where we find this here, it cannot be a disposition of mind that desires and seeks it, not even the struggle after it out of a deep sense of need, but an actual inner quality, a condition of the inner man that is ever advancing to perfection. The heart is purified through faith (Acts xv. 9); and in love out of a pure heart (1 Tim. i. 5), in faith working by love—to the perfection of which faith works co-operate (James ii. 22)—the purified heart goes on to the consummation of purity. The stimulant and impulse of practical mercy is the mercy of the pure One towards my yet impure heart: the more diligently I now wash my heart in this mercy of God, and my hands by exercising it in return towards my neighbor, the more fully the sentiment of love within me is confirmed by the acts of love; so much the nearer do I come, in the way of a priestly entrance into the holiest (which is, in its degree, an appearing before God already, a beholding of his face), unto the final and consummate fulfillment of that type—To see God, as it is expressed in 1 John iii. 2, 3. Just in the degree that we are inwardly and essentially purified as God is pure, are we capable of a living perception of him. But that perception, when perfect in the glorified, shall be also the actual vision of God; that is, be it understood, of the face of God in the Son, who has ever been from the beginning the face of God turned towards the creature (1 Tim. vi. 16).* Peacemakers, Εἰρηνοποιοί, βουλόμενοι εἰρήνην, עֹצֵי שָׁלוֹם (Prov. xii. 20)—and more than that, for it is the last description of the high aim of discipleship, beyond which there is no higher step to be taken, since this makes the disciple as his Lord. Not merely are they contrasted with those who are contentious, ἐξ ἐριθείας (Rom. ii. 8), not merely do they keep and preserve peace, as much as in them lies, with every man (εἰρηνεύοντες, Rom. xii. 18; Heb. xii. 14), but they make, they mediate peace, they bring and offer to the world out of the treasure of a pure heart, the peace of God. Thus, finally, every disciple of our Lord is in his place, in design if not in in effect, a messenger

* Let a glance be taken backwards through the benedictions in order fully to observe their organic connection.

* So that we may not limit the meaning of the promise to the manifestation of Christ only in this world: "The pure, the upright, perceive in Christ a manifestation of God" (Lutz, Bibl. Dogmatik, p. 48). Quite true, but not enough.

of grace, in word, in work, and in life, to all intents and purposes a bringer of peace in the ministry of the great reconciliation. Such shall, in the final separation and demarcation, be called the children of God, for they have been such in truth and worthy of the name; but not they who have proudly and unlovingly gloried in the testimony of truth against a miserable and sinful world, and just as little they who have, contrary to truth and righteousness, spoken peace where there has been no peace in God's sight.

Verse 10. To the seven benedictions, perfect in themselves, there is significantly added yet another supernumerary eighth, which proceeds no further with the development, but confirms and seals their seven-fold blessedness to the righteous, whose character is perfected through their peace-making in this evil world, against all the never-failing enmity and scorn of the unrighteous. And though ye also suffer for righteousness' sake, yet are ye, and shall ye be, blessed notwithstanding (1 Peter iii. 14). Here is wonderfully blended the fundamental tone of promise and consolation, Fear ye not, rather rejoice! with the earnest note of requirement, that they remain faithful under so severe a test, yea, even of warning against hypocrisy and apostasy: For that righteousness' sake which has now been attained—by retrospect to ver. 6; and there is also a connection with ver. 7–9—Mercy out of a pure heart unto peace. The world will for the most part requite that love with hatred, will thrust this peace from them; and the Lord would by no means conceal this from his disciples in this most gracious first sermon to them The essential idea of persecute, here, is to persist malevolently in seeking to withstand them; to transfer and carry on enmity against God's righteousness, to its possessors and witnesses and ambassadors also. Thus is δεδιωγμένοι, "the persecuted," not only the highest honor of the children of God who are so conformed to Christ, but also a condition of entrance into the kingdom of heaven not less absolute than the preceding (1 Peter. iv. 13, 14; 2 Tim. iii. 12). It is the last and surest token of discipleship; and the tribulation of time becomes to those who persevere, a confirmation of their title to eternal joy. Hereby discern the peace of God in thyself and in others, that the world as such is opposed to it; yea, even rejoice in this, for as it is the natural consequence of thy charitable and peaceful walk, so it is also the testing proof which is needful to its consummation (John xiv. 27; xv. 18–21). According to Luke vi. 26, the Lord further made this plain by a warning contrast. Thus does the Lord set the seal to this discourse, binding together its beginning and its end: The kingdom of heaven is (and abides) yours, even as it was yours at the commencement in poverty of spirit. The ἐστίν, is, presents a contrast with the outward and passing show of persecution, which indeed is more easily apprehended by faith than that first contrariety between the strong assurance and the inward poverty to which it was given. The kingdom of heaven is transcendantly elevated above all the transitory circumstances of this lower world.

Verses 11, 12.—The sentences which proclaim blessedness, are ended. There is now, through a final "Blessed are ye," a transision made to their appropriation; and the address to the disciples begins, which continues down to ch. vii. 20. That this direct address was not used before, resulted from the tone of general invitation which marked the commencement of the discourse. The disciples of Jesus must not be supposed to be separated or distinguished from the other hearers; but the discourse, in a manner, saw in them all, from the beginning, future disciples—graciously taking this for granted. Whoever, among the people that heard the first sentences, is able and willing to appropriate them to himself, is referred to throughout what follows in the general Ye, my disciples! All other men, in sharp distinction from the children of God and messengers of peace who have been described, are included in the unexpressed subject of ὀνειδίσωσιν, shall revile, etc. Quite correctly, therefore, though needlessly, does Luther insert, on revision, men (comp. ver. 16 with ch. x. 17). The children of God are in contrast with men, just as Israel, God's people, with the nations. For my sake; this is, likewise, the first coming forth of the personality of Jesus, the Master and Lord, which corresponds to that first ye; and its identity with "For righteousness' sake," is, at the same time, very significant. The persecution before referred to, is now more clearly traced in three stages: first, reviling with bitter and hateful words generally, then more specific persecution in acts, and finally the pouring out upon the objects of their hate, in wanton falsehood and slander, πᾶν πονηρὸν ῥῆμα, whatever their wicked malice can invent.* The Lord manifestly refers to Isa. li. 7, 8; in which chapter we find ver. 1, beginning with —"Ye that follow after righteousness;" and immediately after in vers. 4–8, this is changed into "My people, my nation, my judgment, my salvation, my righteousness." Consequently, our Lord here already in this lofty "For my sake" speaks in the person of Jehovah, just as at the end of the sermon he reveals himself as the future Judge of mankind. The ψευδόμενοι, falsely, about which there has been so much needless dispute, must not be connected merely with ἕνεκεν ἐμοῦ, for my sake, (as Tholuck thinks); but indicates in itself that most wanton wickedness and unrighteousness which has just been spoken of; though at the same time it contains, in order to obviate the too hasty confidence which this might produce, an undertone of test (as we observed above in the analysis), sounding thus—But look well to it in every case, that they do speak falsely! This expression, to return, exhibits the fundamental principles of all their hatred; which has its origin in the lie that ever opposes the truth of God, though the adversaries may not always be conscious of this. Ye must know it, however, and be firmly assured, that they speak falsely; or the benediction can avail you nothing. For, alas! all the way up to the high elevation of the reproach of Christ, a man may deceive himself, and too readily reckon that as slander, redounding to his own honor, which is but deserved blame. But if ye are surely convinced in your heart and conscience, that the reproaches of those who hate the righteousness of God, are falling upon you for its sake, then rejoice and be exceeding glad! (In Luke, "leap for joy," spring upward in joyful hope toward your reward in heaven!) There is in this, as it were, a most emphatic command, Be happy! for which "Blessed are ye," in the previous verse, prepared the way. It is befitting that the Lord, in his gentle condescension, should speak of recompense and reward (excluding, be it understood, all idea of merit from those words), oftener and more strongly than his apostles might afterwards do.* For your reward: that is, not merely the general reward of grace which in the kingdom of heaven awaits you; but in addition there shall be, for every affliction and for every wicked word which you have to endure as expedient for the confirmation of your faith to yourselves, a distinct, and precisely apportioned requital and compensation—the more ye suffer, the more the reward. For thus royally will one day that righteous Lord and Judge requite his own, who on the other hand will not forget a cup of cold water that has ever been given to one of them! Finally, there is here graciously given to our weak faith another ground of joy in persecution, in that we perceive ourselves by this practical token to be companions of the prophets, the witnesses of God who have been before us; and thus become more and more assured of our citizenship in the kingdom of heaven, in contrast with the prevailing decay and destruction of all things. Christ gives, indeed, in these words an early explanation, that the kingdom of God was not among the people of Israel, as a whole, in the state in which it then was; that it was not what they thought it, after their way and manner; but that it was with the persecuted prophets, and as as they taught it, in the misunderstood former revelation. The reward is reserved in the heavens, ἐν τοῖς οὐρανοῖς, which is not quite the same with "in the kingdom of heaven;" but rather signifies the interval from the gathering of the righteous to the former prophets, till the inheriting of the earth, ver. 5. Him whom they tolerate no longer under the heaven, heaven will receive into itself! Heavens, in the plural, refers to the many mansions of John xiv. 2, and helps our anticipation of the greatness and glory of the reward.

* The daring disregard of truth with which the world is wont calumniari audaciter the children of God, the Satanic cunning with which its lies are woven, would be altogether incredible, if it were not matter of fact.

Verses 13—16. The promise here already in the first part, as we have seen, advances into a demand, that the gifts of grace which have been received should exhibit and approve themselves. The danger of not persevering in persecution has been just before pointed out; but now the discourse strengthens its tone, and insists upon an indispensable continuance of active influence and testimony in the midst of an evil world. Ye—who have been described in vers. 3–10, who in your poverty have hungered for and have obtained righteousness, in order to the exercise of charity and peacemaking; ye—who have been addressed in vers. 11, 12, as having to expect, like the prophets before you, the ingratitude, scorn and persecution of this world as your earthly reward, but an everlasting compensation for all this, as your reward in heaven; ye are, what grace has made you—be, and in joyful confidence continue to be, all that your new nature requires! Let no hindrance prevent this; look well to yourselves, that ye become not again incapable and unfit! In these verses the three main ideas, with reference to which the whole sermon moves on in regular gradation (promise, requirement and warning), are reversed—from the point of their connection with the preceding. First, altogether warning—Woe to the savorless salt! Then again, though in part a promise—The light must not and shall not be hid! Finally, with fuller grace—Let then the light which is given you shine forth!

The discourse, after having looked back upon the prophets of former times, turns at once to a prophetic contemplation of the entire destiny of the new church—the city set on a hill; announces here preparatorily, what comes more plainly before us in the 10th chapter at the first sending forth of the messengers of peace; and just as at the close of this Gospel (ch. xxviii. 19), embraces the whole earth—the whole world. But what is the distinction which our Lord, who begins here to disclose the essential truth of those natural images which were originally provided for all human language, and to use them as the elementary letters of his own superhuman utterance, makes in this passage between salt and light? It would be superficial to regard it as a mere abstract distinction between life and knowledge. Rather in salt the inner essential power and virtue from which the efficacy proceeds by natural laws; light, on the contrary, is the outward expression of testimony viewed in itself. Therefore the earth is opposed to the former as a dead, corrupt mass which must be pervaded by it; the world is the object of the latter, as a dark region in which it must assuredly shine. The middle term between the two is fire, (Mark ix. 49, 50, and Psa. i, 2, 3; compare Levit. ii. 13.)

The salt in itself is properly the power of life in its essence, the imperishable permanence of an abiding essence, inwrought into things as their principle by the Eternal. It can therefore no more become corrupted into saltlessness, than the light can become darkness, either in nature, or in that spiritual kingdom of which it is the symbol. Yet, inasmuch as our Lord has graciously condescended to say of those who have salt in themselves (Mark ix. 50), that they are the salt; and to name those light who are only lamps or lightbearers; in this sense the salt may become indeed savorless, and the light in us become darkness (ch. vi. 23); that is, if we again lose the salt and the light. Salt alone averts corruption, and gives a good and savory taste (Job vi. 6), hence it appears in the sacrifices as the seasoning, and a sign of the covenant of God. Without salt the earth is corrupt before God (Gen. vi. 11), and all who live upon it foul and offensive, an abomination in his sight (see Psa. xiv. 3, נֶאֱלָחוּ; comp. Job xv. 16.) But God gives to the corrupted mass a new salt, has checked the corruption from the very beginning by his grace, and will now in the fulness of his mercy and of his truth, salt again the whole earth—if it will receive it—unto life. The instruments of this great restoration are the children of God through Christ. They are the salt of the earth, for they bear God's truth living within them, which is made their salt, by which they should salt and season everything around them; just as in v. 16 it is also said Your light. They bring and they make peace, that is, in the full sense of the Hebrew שָׁלוֹם* for the healing of all corruption; for they bring the only living and abiding truth in righteousness; and only in truth is peace (Col. iv. 6; Mark ix. 50; Zech. viii. 19). Now, the healing influence of this sharply piercing truth, is foolishly resisted by human nature, and if it should therefore intermit its piercing, through unbelief and indolence in its possessors, and give way before the resistance which it meets; if its point should become blunted in the attack, and that which through the might of God ought most powerfully to bear testimony to and approve itself, should in the bye-ways of false peace degenerate by degrees into a thing which only retains the outward appearance of that truth which is for man's peace, but from whence the power has fled; then is the salt again become saltless, as church history has shown in the darkness of Roman Christendom, and more recently in the no less profound darkness of Rationalism.

* See Roos, Die Lehre Jesu Christi, new edition, p. 764.

The salt without savor has indeed the obvious appearance of being doctrine which has become impotent and unsound; yet, since this can only be the consequence of the loss of power and life in the salt bearers, who themselves are termed the salt, it would be a very false exposition to say that the Lord does not speak here also of persons. That he does speak of them, the treading under foot manifestly shows. It would be wrong to say, that though men once endued with grace may become weak and impotent for external influence in the awakening of others, yet they cannot themselves again be quite lost. That would be through prejudice to do injustice to the word which here, as elsewhere often in Scripture, expressly and incontrovertibly warns against relapse as only, alas! too possible. He only can salt the earth who is himself salted, has become salt; the abiding virtue within, and its energy without, are strictly inseparable. Now he who ceases to salt others, loses also the salt which preserves himself; and after such loss of the heavenly gift no second renewal is possible; there remains only the consuming fire of judgment, which is by no means the same with the salting fire of purifying, saving affliction (Heb. vi. 4–6, x. 26, 27; Mark ix. 49.) Only for the sake of the children of God who prevent its judgment, and co-operate unto salvation, is the earth preserved, though corrupt and full of wickedness, in order that it may be their inheritance of the Regeneration. But those who persist in their wickedness, will not abide that spiritual severity which would work out their welfare, that mighty testimony of the truth which is for their peace. Such salt is too fiery and biting for them; they persecute the righteous, and fight against the ambassadors of peace. Now, herein lies the temptation of these latter to become saltless; and the Lord teaches his own not lightly to despise this temptation. Contemplating the future of his church, he lifts up his warning cry, and proclaims what has since so often taken place. Yet our translation here and in Mark ix. 50, is quite correct; rather than—With what shall one salt? Wherewith will ye season? That would have seemed to refer to a universal apostasy, and have given to the question such an unsuitable meaning as this—If ye fall away, where will be God's children for the world's good? What the Baptist said (Matt. iii. 9), is the fit rejoinder to such view of the question.* No, the Lord most assuredly means: If the salt loses its savor, wherewith shall it, the worthless salt, be salted again? What follows proves this—It is thenceforth useful or fit or good for nothing. The casting out is the lot of that which is useless, which can serve no purpose in the house, and the treading under foot further marks the perfect contempt of that which is thus cast out. No "mending of the way as by manure" is here referred to (as Lange thinks); but the Lord God casts the corrupt out of his house and kingdom again, and thereby gives them over to the scorn of men. The judment upon Eli (1 Sam ii. 30) has been ever fulfilled again and again in an unfaithful priesthood; and what the

* What I have said concerning this in John xiv. 27, and elsewhere (also in Isaiah), may be consulted and compared.

* Hence with reference to Luther's rendering Hamann writes this vigorous application of it: The salt of learning is a good thing; but if that becomes savorless, what shall we season with? With what but the μωρία τοῦ κηρύγματος, the foolishness of preaching? (1 Cor. i. 21.)

Lord here denounces has been true of entire apostate churches as well as of individual faithless men. If the world persecutes, it is because it feels the power of truth and righteousness but when the saltless salt comes in its way, it despises it beyond measure, treads it under foot with scorn—and that deservedly!

He who alone is in an absolute sense "the Light of the world," vouchsafes also to call his disciples so, who yet are only bringers and bearers of the light (φωστῆρες, Phil. ii. 15; λύχνοι, John v. 35; i. 7–9), only lights kindled from above. (Hence also presently ver. 15, καίουσι λύχνον). The light itself can no more be thought of as first lighted, than proper salt as salted. The children of light, heretofore of darkness, are light in the Lord (Eph. v. 8): the light of the world is the sun, and the Messiah is termed by Malachi (iv. 2) at the close of prophecy, the Sun of Righteousness. As such the Lord now proclaims himself to all who hear him even in this word, and before that great I am come! which follows ver. 17. But as instruction in the law is termed in the Talmud salt, and many a Rabbi a light of the world, the Lord may be regarded as taking up the Jewish doctrinal language which was already prepared for him and as announcing in dignity that he, the highest Master, designed to make his disciples also true masters and teachers. Yea, in his mouth alone is that quite true, which from human lips appears presumptuous; the testimony and doctrine of his disciples should actually fill the world with clearly shining, true light of the Light. The city on a hill is not by any means a mere common figure of speech; the Lord derives the expression from Psa. xlviii. 2 (comp. l. 2, lxxxvii. 1) as afterwards that of ver. 35 from Psa. xlviii. 3. He speaks not of Safed (as Sepp again says idly) nor of any other such hill-town in the land; but of his Church or congregation hereafter to be built, of the new Jerusalem, to which will be given the light of the sun, when the old Jerusalem, become saltless, the city upon the hill and all her dependencies around, shall be given over to be trodden down of the Gentiles. Now, however, in this period of development with reference to which the Lord is immediately speaking, his meaning includes all the true citizens of the city of God then living in the Διασπορά, or dispersion. Although as yet scattered abroad, they can no more with their united light be hidden, than if the new city were already built upon the hill, and reflected God's light upon all the lands. Where light really is and continues to be, it must from its very nature, shine forth. The same God, who founds and builds for himself the heavenly city, and kindles for himself its lights, places them moreover upon fitting candlesticks, each one upon its own. We must take the expression, Do men light, and place, in ver. 15, in conformity with the general scope, as the action of men figuratively used for the action of the wisdom of God. The Church of the Lord is to be no secret institution, like the heathen mysteries. The light of the pure word and of holy life is to burn brightly and loftily in it for the dark world, which also itself is, and shall be made a house of God. No human ordinance, no false shame or fear, may place this light under a bushel, which is designed to shine forth from word and work combined. What God has not done, man ought not to do; though, alas! it has too often been done in various ways, but only where God's light and salt are lost. Man's worst bushel upon the light of God is the bar and covering of "temporals"—the bread and pay dealt out too richly or too sparingly for the mystery in the Church. Individually indeed the Lord will often cover up in his wisdom some small fresh-kindled light, that it may burn up in its time and order; but he who cannot tolerate that, and would himself prematurely ascend the candlestick, may easily chance (as St. Bernard reminds us) to be blown out by the wind of temptation. This remains the essential matter, that the placing of the light be left to him who kindled it. He will do it, assuredly, at the right time and in the right manner; for it was never his purpose, when he kindled the light, that it should be hid. Now he who, through fear of persecution or else through sluggishness, leaves his candlestick, and, becoming unfaithful to his calling, wilfully covers his light, shall have his light extinguished: yet concerning that the Lord says nothing further now (as in ch. vi. 22, 23); for he has already referred to this in what he says of the savorless salt. It is now his purpose, less as a warning than in promise, to encourage our shining, as that for which we were kindled. God only covers so long as is necessary for the better burning. But our short-sightedness, which we still retain though lights of the world, may often confound, when self-will blends with our testimony, the bushel with the candlestick. A proverb says very strikingly—The true light will burn, nevertheless, through the bushel.

It is of importance to observe, that it is not said, we must wish ourselves to shine; but as the translation well expresses it, that we should let, freely, without covering or hindrance, our light, that which has by grace been given to us, and exists within us, shine before men, according to its own nature and the will of him who kindled it. The Lord says literally—So let your light shine, and thus expressly distinguishes the true, and only shining light of the Father, which has made us to shine, from ourselves, these bearers of the light. There is a promise in his requirement that we must without any co-operation of ours leave the gift of God to its own self-evidencing power, as if he had said: It will of itself shine, if you cover it not! That spurious desire to shine brings only darkness within and around us. It is not—Shine ye, but—Let your light shine! Before men; as the explanation of the expressions earth and world—even before the men who persecute and revile you; for this must be your only retaliation—love and truth for hatred and lies. And now as to the good works! Are not these especially the word of testimony and confession of doctrine? This is not excluded, as will appear presently; but our Lord immediately refers to the life, because the good word without the good walk is of no avail; a lie before God, it can bear no testimony to truth before men; with the appearance of light it has no power of fire; it tends rather to the temptation of the world, and the dishonor of God. That which, according to Rom. ii. 23, 24, befell Israel, is also repeated in the Christian community. The expression "good works," which explains the figurative "light," forms also the transition to what follows from ver. 17 onwards, where the righteousness of the disciples comes forward as the fulfilling of the law in act and in teaching. What kind of works? Here is already laid down beforehand, as it were, the theme, which is then developed from ver. 20. The external lustre, which proceeds from the inner light, and which alone can be seen, shines forth in genuine good works, that is, in works of light, of love, of mercy; so that here the salt may correspond to the peace, and the light to the mercy, of that pure life of love which was described before (ver. 7–9). And certainly the shining together of all the works in the entire walk is here signified; which according to Eph. v. 8–13, neither should nor can conceal its revealing, witnessing, light-nature. Of the individual good deeds as such it is said on the other hand—Do them not before men! (ch. vi. 1.) Isolated works or deeds do not properly shine; they are rather as flashes in the night, which make the darkness appear the darker; but the entire and persistent doing of all works of pure light and love, is a bright light upon the candlestick of the office and calling. Again, to men, natural men, are these works principally and first of all to be shown: the brother already born of God understands our simple word, and God alone sees the faith in the heart, the inner light itself as such (Rom. xiv. 22). That men should see our works is indeed the most immediate end of our letting the light shine; but the important end within this end follows immediately: And glorify your Father which is in heaven.* Not you yourselves, against which chapter vi. presently lifts up a severe voice—Ye may yourselves be no more praised, than yourselves shine. Not that men, instead of all manner of evil (ch. v. 11), are to say nothing but good of you; but that the Father in heaven (who is here named for the first time) may be acknowledged as your Father through your light, your good works; and that ye may be thus termed his children even now before the world. Whence arises a new and beautiful sense of the promise in ver. 9—as already ver. 7 had implied: They shall receive mercy from those, who, acknowledging their love, love them in return.

* Roos has remarked among others, that here the Lord, after having hitherto spoken of his Father, for the first time appropriates the Father name of God to men.

But now since men are wicked and for the most part so remain; as they reject the salt and hate the light; as they acknowledge or honor neither the Father nor the Son (John xvi. 3); as they consequently refuse the Father's honor in his children, by ascribing that incontrovertible righteousness in them which cannot be defamed, on the one hand to human virtue which they praise, or to the gift of God which they acknowledge; therefore, with the good and shining works the testifying word must not be wanting, which acknowledges the grace of the Giver, and cries out—This is my Father's light through Christ, in whose name I do all this (Col. iii. 17). Then are the clothes rent, and they cry to the people—We also are sinful men like yourselves, but the grace of God is with us (Acts xiv. 14; 1 Cor. xv. 10). The life without the word is not enough, although the backwardness to confession often brings falsely forward this expression of Christ, as if to prove, that it is enough to let the light of good works shine before men. Thereby God's honor is not desired but our own; but when we glorify our Father in our life and in our profession, then we constrain men, at least so far as in us lies, to glorify him also: first of all and at once, by praising the grace which has been vouchsafed to us, and then, receiving that grace also for themselves, by the selfsame good works and light.

Verse 17. "Finally, there is here also a warning, which in its emphatic restriction and rejection, points forward even now to the test at the end of all." As we indicated previously, this conclusion of the first head, so we discern now, again, the close of this conclusion in that most earnest warning—Without a much better, a perfect righteousness, there is no entrance into the kingdom of heaven! (Here, beforehand, just as in ch. vii. 21, though not yet so fully established, but rather set down first as a paradox in order to be fully proved.) This strongly protesting warning (either all the commandments of the law done, or no entrance by any means into the kingdom of heaven) is preceded by one more gentle—Not one of the least of these commandments must be broken, either in teaching or in doing, by any man, or he will be least in the kingdom of heaven! And whence then such righteousness in poor miserable man, to whom a Gospel is preached, yet with such a demand as this? The introduction of the sermon has sufficiently assured us, that he, in whose coming the kingdom of heaven and his righteousness come to the poor as gift, consolation, and food, himself brings with him his righteousness as his salvation: consequently we have here at the outset, as the true foundation of promise, on which alone the requirement is erected, that great, emphatic and critical word—I am come to fulfill the Law and the Prophets, as first in myself, so also in you, my believing and righteous ones!* Because, moreover, this whole conclusion of the first main division of promise is the transition to the severer tone of demand and warning which follows; therefore to this especial and distinct promise of the whole Sermon on the Mount (by which the benedictions are first made intelligible) there is appended a warning and exclusive declaration—Think not that it is otherwise, that the saving grace which hath appeared may remit or relax anything of that whole will of God, which has been testified from the beginning, and waits for its full establishment and performance! Finally, that the whole section (vers. 17–20), may fall into the same threefold form which has become familiar to us, we have between its commencement of promise and its excluding close, the natural middle term of requirement in the simple words—All must be fulfilled (ver. 18). Each least thing, every most isolated precept of the great whole (the Law and the Prophets, ver. 17) must receive its fulfillment.

* It is true, but not by misunderstanding it, to

Thus it will be observed how the whole discourse, constantly rising and reaching forward, evolves gradually its deep meaning—each new utterance springing from the preceding as its immediate consequence. Truths ever new and fundamental, clothed in human language for human apprehension, proceed from the living organ of the one all-embracing truth (I am he, who bringeth to you righteousness) which bears in it the mind of the Lord, and here gives an epitome of its first testimony. This (ver. 17) is the true and essential marrow of that testimony—its immovable foundation of rock. Its clear and luminous declaration is essential to the right understanding of the whole Sermon on the Mount. It prevents us from being terrified by its succeeding requirements into a fear of condemnation; and teaches us in poverty of spirit to seek and find, to ask and receive from him who is come to fulfill all righteousness—who, while he demands, promises likewise, and when he promises demands—all needful grace for the fulfillment of righteousness in ourselves.

And yet how wantonly do those err, who assert that the Lord's sermon contains only the mere so-called morality which he taught, and would thereby get rid of what they call the dogmatic teaching of faith in his person, its divine dignity and sole merit! As they contradict their own heart and conscience, and will not feel that the benedictions at the commencement set aside all righteousness and fulfillment of the law in our own strength, and speak only of grace for the miserable; so now they entirely renounce their own understanding, shut their eyes and their ears, that they may not perceive and read and hear the inscription that is written upon the sublime portal which is once more erected in ver. 17: It is I alone who bring in and accomplish all. Yes, verily, the testimony which is found in John's Gospel, is anticipated here: I am He! Are not all who hear his first word constrained to ask—Who can this man be but the Messiah, who thus announces blessedness, and thus by his own immediate authority administers the kingdom of heaven? His first words are in clear and profound accord with the most expanded predictions and promises of prophecy. And then that lofty and unrestrained—For my sake, ver. 11, which is so naturally uttered! So again immediately that first attribution to his disciples—Your Father, ver. 16—springing from the communicating grace of him who had already openly called God his Father, and continued throughout the entire sermon (all being comprised in Our Father ch. vi. 9), until that most impressive My Father of ch. vii. 21, closes it! In conjunction with this is the sublime—Verily, I say unto you—which similarly pervades the whole, (ch. v. 18 and onwards) placing him who utters it in divine majesty above all the prophets, in the unity of that only Lawgiver and Lord who spake by the prophets; until at last, he who thus speaks announces himself to be the world's Judge in that day (ch. vii. 21–23), as he had in the beginning announced himself as the giver of the world's blessedness. In ch. v. 17, we have the ground of all that high authority which speaks in the preceding and subsequent discourse, in the undisguised answer to the question: Art thou he that should come? (ch. xi. 3).

Twice with the emphasis—I am come—to wit, as one who was in being before he came, and cometh into the world (John iii. 19; xi. 27; xii. 46), knowing from whence he came: who is come forth from above (John viii. 23, iii. 31), from heaven (vi. 33, 38), from God (viii. 42, xiii. 3), as the Father (xvi. 27, 28). This is much more than Nicodemus, drawing back in the paroxysm of his fear the confession which was springing to his lips, attached to it when he strangely enough called him only—Teacher and Prophet. For all the prophets are but sent, he of whom they prophesy and he only cometh from God. As elsewhere there is often appended to this expression—I am come! the aim and result of his coming in a variety of aspects (Matt. ix. 13, x. 34, xviii. 11, xx. 28; Luke ix. 56, xii. 49; John vi. 38, ix. 39, x. 11, xviii. 37), so here also it is directly given: I am come to fulfill.

This, however, is attested with the negative warning—Think not, or μὴ νομίσητε: by no means be deluded into imagining that I am come to destroy the Law or the Prophets. Such an utterance pre-supposes testimonies concerning his person already received, and the existence of misunderstanding and false expectations in relation to it. Wherein did these consist? In a twofold error, as the Lord afterwards shows—in false hope and in false fear. Especially, and first of all, the Lord testifies, in immediate connection with the requirement of good works (ver. 16), against the delusion that the Messiah (himself who assumed to be the be too straitly limited, that the Saviour here "indicated the object of his own life" (Beugg. Monatsbl. 1847, 9),—for he designs at the same time to say—The law must also by you—though only indeed through me—be fulfilled.

---

Messiah) would dispense with the fulfillment of the holy law; for such a delusion more or less consciously pervaded the entire expectation of a carnal Messiah's kingdom, which might instantly be set up with its temporal prosperity and splendor, without repentance and regeneration unto holiness. (Hence once again the μὴ νομίσητε of ch. x. 34). The kingdom of God consists only in obedience to the will of God, only in and with God's righteousness: hence (ch vi. 33) the law remains inviolate—Be ye therefore holy, for I am holy (ch. v. 48). But for the other side of the error which understood not the Scriptures, whether of the Law or the Prophets, he who was come found existing a false fear of innovation, and the destruction of established and ancient institutions. In their blindness to the Law which must abide ever, they forget the distinction between it and the types and the shadows which God's commandment appointed for their own time, and even between it and the precepts which had been added by man; they consequently inferred in their delusion that a Messiah who should invade the then extant Judaism, could not be the true one of whom the prophets had written; for they understood the Prophets still less even than the Law, and had utterly marred their promises by a carnal interpretation. Both kinds of delusion were in manifold ways mixed up in carnally blinded Israel; yet in the mass of the people the false hope of the relaxation of the Law, in order to their supposed fulfillment of the Prophets; and in the Pharasaic heads of the people, the false fear of innovation rather predominated. There lay, in fine, in the hidden consciences of all the people—whose will and not their knowledge was at fault—an absolute dread of the true fulfillment of the Prophets in order to the true establishment of the Law. The Lord's mighty protest against each fallacy that ignorance or opposition of will might beget, embraces all this in its inmost connection, so that every one might take his own reproof; and exhibits the Law and the Prophets in their inviolable unity, as one great prediction of himself, which waits for its fulfillment; as one great preparatory institute which reaches in him, only in him, but certainly in him, its end and consummation, that is, its perfect fulfillment and realization. Now as this preparatory institute was of God, of the self-same God whom the Messiah calls his Father, he could not speak of anything like a dissolution or destruction of that which was essential and true therein.

The superabounding fulness of meaning in this sublime testimony of Christ to himself—whereby he places himself between the Old Testament and the New as the living unity and truth of both—embraces thus the whole doctrine concerning his person and his work, is the epitome of all that Christology which is to be developed from them, as the substance of all theology, the sum of all true understanding of Scriptures and revelation. To deduce this in all its amplitude is not the design of these our hints; we can only affirm and indicate how the understanding of such a saying as this requires an understanding of the whole Old Testament, as it goes back to its very beginnings and roots; and of the whole New Testament as well, inasmuch as it looks forward by anticipation to the entire fulfillment of those of its last predictions which have not yet been accomplished.

"The Law and the Prophets," taken together, are the name of the Old Covenant (as afterwards, ch. vii. 12, xi. 13, xxii. 40); yet not merely in the sense of the current manner of speech which divided the external body of the Scriptures under the titles תּוֹרָה and נְבִיאִים; but with reference to those two aspects of the Old Covenant upon which such a division was based—viz., commandment and promise. These two fundamental elements, however, so thoroughly interpenetrate one another, that the whole, the legal as well as the prophetic word, the legal as well as the prophetic institution, may be regarded as comprising both; the one element commanding the fulfillment of the fore-announced will of God, and the other pointing in prophecy to that future which alone will bring this fulfillment. He who does not thus understand the Old Testament, has not yet even begun to understand it; its double name is its only right name; it is a law, which has not yet found its corresponding obedience, and yet which must and shall be done; it is a promise, which yet waits for its fulfillment. When this has come, it becomes an Old Testament, and gives place to the New. But this New Testament again is no other than the truth and reality of the Old, its fulfillment, which can alone bring it, as old and precusory, to an end. O that our critics of the present day would understand this; whose entire but idle toil is expended upon the vain endeavor to rend asunder the two Testaments of God, to unbind the Law and the Prophets, and then to regard indeed Christ as one who has come, but who fulfills nothing and brings nothing!* Let the Old Testament first be broken, then is broken also the New; as we have seen in the progress of Rationalism into all unbelief; let the Christ be taken away, who has come as he was to come, then is there no longer a revelation, and no more a living God.

To proceed, however, with a more specific examination of this subject—What is the Law, of which the Lord here speaks? Assuredly not merely the unaptly so-called moral law of the ten commandments; for Israel had learned nothing in Scripture of any such improper division of that one, entire law, which the Lord

* Instead of explaining away with their trifling the assertion of our Lord, they had better deal with it as the old heretic Marcion did, and reverse it at once: τί δοκεῖτε; ὅτι ἦλθον πληρῶσαι τὸν νόμον ἢ τοὺς προφήτας; ἦλθον καταλῦσαι, ἀλλ' οὐ πληρῶσαι: What think ye? that I came to fulfill the Law or the Prophets? I came to destroy, but not to fulfill!

had given them in various commandments, moral precepts and statutes. To that same law belongs, in inseparable unity with it, what we term the ritual or civil law; all is together but the one will of God, which is to be established in the obedience of his holy people. The typical ceremonies of the service of God, with all that appertains to them, are all appointed with reference to sin, just as they pre-announce its atonement; the external regulations of the polity of the people and the state, which are not less typical than the former, are for the correction of disobedience, while they foretell the coming of a people and commonwealth of God, which should be the realization of these forms. The commandments of Sinai, again, with all their condemning severity, rest upon the ground of that word of covenant mercy—I am the Lord thy God, who redeemeth thee; and thus direct the hope of faith to go beyond their letter, and wait for that spiritual fulfillment, in which the law will not be given unto death but unto life. The law itself, as such, secretly testifies and predicts a righteousness of God, which should be made manifest (Rom. iii. 21). On the other hand, the language and testimony of the prophets, especially those who spoke after the law, with Moses himself at their head, is always in strict unison with all that word, which from the beginning had been a word of prophetical promise (Acts iii. 21). They speak of the law, as the expositors of its spiritual meaning which the flesh cannot fulfill, and as most inexorable preachers of repentance, of woe, and of judgment—Elias and John the Baptist being their prominent types: but they also with most benignant consolation point to a coming grace; yea, to a grace which already began to be in some measure experienced, but reserved its full proof for the great futurity.* The law requires the righteousness of God in us (Rom. viii. 4), and at the same time predicts, as being given by a God of grace, that he will bestow it. The prophets promise the kingdom of God, and the advent of one as its king, who will fulfill all, yielding a true obedience to the law as a servant, such as no individual servant of God, and much less the whole people had been; offering a true propitiation for sin as a Priest; bringing in the fellowship of God's covenant in all its fulness and reality as the Mediator of the covenant, and the Lord our righteousness! but at the same time every word of the prophets requires, as given by the God of truth, the coming of that future One, and the fulfillment by him and through him of all that was written concerning him. The law is a prophecy pointing to Christ; prophecy is a law, a will of the Father for Christ to do. Of both together in their unity he who was to come speaks: What is written in the volume of the book is written of me, and all is obligatory upon me; I must come to do the will of God (Psa. xl. 8, 9). Did no such Christ come, then would the entire Old Testament, which declares itself to every candid mind to be the marrow of the world's ancient history, and to contain the revelation of the most essential truth of humanity, remain a beginning without an end, a before without an after, a riddle without its key; not merely a longing of the human spirit without is fruition, but a testimony of the spirit of God without truth; an incomprehensible nothing, making an incomprehensible pretension to contain in itself a living germ—a germ, however, that never knew development, withered up in this modern Judaism, the miserable and worthless remains of the religion of that man, who once believed in God, and sought after righteousness in vain!

But Christ is come, and as he now at the first by this most sacred "I" bears true and absolute witness to himself as the end of the Old Testament, so has the history of his kingdom and of his work since then, of the institution founded in the New Testament down to the present day, borne witness to the truth of his word. The actual and surely progressing fulfillment, in the history of the world and the Church since Christ, of all that waited for fulfillment in the old world, cannot be entirely mistaken, but by such a delusion from the abyss, as knows of no fulfillment either of man's longings or of God's commands and promises, simply because it dissolves all things in the Indian Maja, or swallows up all things in a bottomless grave: or rather would dissolve and swallow up, but cannot; for the law of God still abides, testifying against sin, and urging men ever to the words of the prophets concerning the fulfilling and atoning obedience of one man for all. Yea, Christ himself is still in his Church, and asks most earnestly: If I am not come to fulfill, what then is humanity, history, God?

Has Christ, then, in any sense, brought a new, a better, a more perfect law, than the law, to fulfill which he avows himself to be come? By no means; as the whole Sermon on the Mount, his whole word, and the virtue of that law itself in our consciences, attest. All the prophets representing the conscience of the people, which again represented the conscience of humanity, knew of none other than the one, eternal law. But through the Spirit of God, they went on to predict, that one was coming, whose salvation should consist only in the establishment of this law, and its righteousness, and further also, in the establishment in its true meaning and fulfillment of the entire typical, ceremonial and political law of Israel. The Law and the Prophets are at all points internally one. Therefore the Lord does more than merely place them in juxtaposition—The Law and the Prophets; but with deep emphasis—Think not that I am come to destroy the Law or the Prophets, that is, neither the one nor the other, neither of the two which are yet but one. The requirement points to the promise, the promise to the requirement; the latter predicts the Spirit, as the Spirit enforces the latter. But inasmuch as the first and most immediate delusion, to which the entire connection of his discourse is opposed, was only that of supposing that he would relax the Law, he orders his words for their conviction upon that subject: No more will I destroy the Law than I will destroy the Prophets! If ye expect a Messiah, such as the prophets pre-announced, and yet suppose that he will come as a relaxer of the law, ye do greatly err, not understanding the prophets in their central harmony with the law. If I did not fulfill the Law, then would the Prophets also fail in their fulfillment.

* Thus the benedictions themselves were all of them taken out of the prophetic word: see Isa. lvii. 15, lxvi. 2, lvii. 18, lxi. 3; Psa. xxxvii. 11, cvii. 9; Isa. xli. 17, lvi. 2, lxv. 13; Prov. xi. 25; Psa. xxiv, 4, 5, xxxiv. 19; Isa. li. 7, lxvi. 5.

Thus does the Lord disclose the deep common foundation of all that delusion and error, which withstood himself by a perverted expectation of the Messiah. It was simply the Jews who destroyed the prophetic word, by a carnal interpretation of it. It was simply the Pharisees, who likewise destroyed the Law: by teaching it without performing it themselves (ch. xxiii. 3, 4), by sacrificing one part of it to another, omitting the weightier matters, judgment and mercy, while they cared for the externals of its ceremonies (xxiii. 23); by neglecting the spirit that was required, while they were exact in the letter and work of their conscious hypocrisy; finally, by making the most important fundamental commandments of God of none effect through their superadded traditions (ch. xv. 3–6). Therefore he is no Messiah to these Pharisees, who in their evil imagination call destroying fulfilling, and fulfilling destroying. Therefore must the righteousness of his disciples, and of the subjects of his kingdom, be something exceedingly different from the so-called righteousness of these Pharisees; it must spring from the power and grace of his own true fulfillment, which has come, and is ever coming.

What is this, in fine, and how does the Lord fulfill the Law as well as the Prophets? He fulfills the law as its first perfect teacher and performer (ver. 19); who releases the Spirit, which though in it was bound in it, by the confirming testimony of a spiritual interpretation, and the living exhibition of it in word and work; who, as man, made of a woman and made under the law, as minister of the circumcision bound to all the ordinances of Israel (Gal. iv. 4; v. 3), fulfills in perfect obedience all righteousness, and satisfies every righteous obligation which human nature and the creature sustains in relation to God (τὰ πρὸς τὸν Θεόν, Heb. ii. 17). But because this obedience, which was freely undertaken in the incarnation of the eternal Son, is fully accomplished in his sacrifice for us sinners who could not render it; an obedience not merely imputed to us, but implanted in us through our actual union with his humanity; therefore Christ in his entire obedience, suffering in doing from the beginning, and doing in suffering to the end, is the one meritorious and living sacrifice finally and fully presented in death, the true object of the whole typical law, which testified of the necessity of such a sacrifice between God and man on account of sin. He is the righteous one, who bears and overcomes in enduring love the sin which rages against him in temptation; yet the curse of the law is withal fulfilled in him through his mysterious substitution in our stead, but only in order to make way for the blessing. In this is realized the true use of the law, that for which it was given to sinners; that they through the law may die to the law; that the power of sin may be broken in its conflict with inviolable righteousness; that God may conquer in judgment, and yet man not be lost, but be redeemed to a new life in living righteousness. In Christ's flesh, which is our sinful flesh, and which yet through the eternal Spirit is without sin, the flesh is put to death the enmity is abolished, sin is judged, the judgment of God against sin is executed even unto the securing of a new holiness. He sanctifies and offers himself for us, and in this act of obedience unto death he is the servant of God, the Prophet and the High Priest whom the Law and the Prophets foretold. As in his death sin is abolished and its curse is repealed, so also every vain delusion of erroneous expectation in which the blindness of sinners have enveloped the promise, is revealed and destroyed as such; his cross is the death of Israel's carnal hopes of a Messiah. The covering falls from the eyes of those who refuse not to see this, the shadows fade away, the veil of the figure is rent, for its reality is come and is set up. Its further consequence and efficacy is immediately fulfilled in the risen Redeemer, the servant is glorified as the Son, the kingdom of the King and the Lord, of which also all had foretold, begins to appear. The Lord who died especially for the fulfillment of the law, though to that also the prophets contributed their testimony, liveth now especially for the fulfillment of prophecy in its stricter sense; although the promise of the law—He that doeth these things shall live! is realized also in him, who as the righteous One has voluntarily accomplished in himself the command of the law—For thy sin shalt thou die! even to the attainment of a superabundance of righteousness. This life, thus by right as well as grace obtained for us, is one with the blessing of the first promise to Abraham; and thus the righteousness of the law itself, which was for ever beyond our own attainment, turns in Christ into a righteousness of faith for us (Gal. iii. 8–14). The circumcision of the heart which the law required, the profound truth which was testified by the whole sacrificial economy of the tabernacle (for the veil and the foreskin are the same in the inner spirit of the man before God) is, through the obedience rendered by Jesus in his perfect humanity, brought nigh and within reach of us all (Rom. x. 6–10). The law is far from being relaxed, and our being released from it is eternally impossible. We are delivered, rather, from the curse of the law in order to its being established in its due honor. For the power of sin in the flesh is taken away, and the influence of the life-giving Spirit is shed upon us in unrestrained abundance from the glorified God-man (Isa. lix. 19).

When the Lord, in the Sermon on the Mount, said—I am come for such fulfillment as this, all was not yet accomplished in himself which was incumbent upon him; he had within him as yet but the resources of power and willingness for all. His whole work is developed and consummated in and with his person. When he cried upon the cross—It is finished—then was his great work truly accomplished, and all that remained, even up to the ascension, was but the manifestation and completion of the victory which he had obtained. When he had risen again and reached his consummation, he fully explained all that the prophets had spoken of him, and in what sense all had been imposed upon him as a sacred necessity (Luke xxiv. 25–26). But that which is in him accomplished and established for us, must from this time be also accomplished and established in us; in order that the righteousness demanded of the law may be fulfilled in us, and the law be established through faith (Rom. viii. 4, iii. 31). He who has thus shown himself the end of the law and of the prophecy, has become thereby the new and living beginning of a new covenant and kingdom, the old covenant and the old kingdom of Israel having risen again in their great and high reality. There remains yet for fulfillment in the new Church no less than all that is written in the Law of Moses and the Prophets and in the Psalms (Luke xxiv. 44); and since the time that the heaven received Christ, he intermits not the influence of his spirit, nor will he till the restitution of all things which God hath spoken since the world began (Acts iii. 21). The new creation of the Spirit begins immediately upon the day of Pentecost, in simple and gradual fulfillment of what had before been written; the whole typical history of Israel is reproduced in its essential reality in the true Israel of God, and will go on till the new heaven and the new earth are created, wherein dwelleth righteousness.

The ordinances of men, however, which were not the Law, are utterly abolished, as well all the mere human expectations which answered not to the meaning of the Prophets. And not only so, but the actual fulfillment of the old Scripture is at the same time to some extent an abolishing fulfillment, inasmuch as that which was preparatory ceases through its completion, the shadow retires before the substance, and the shell which enclosed and concealed the kernel, drops from it. The servant of Israel, the minister of the circumcision, the Messiah of the Jews, becomes a Saviour of the world, as was indeed most plainly predicted (Rom. xiv. 8–12). That which through the imperfection of the prophetic vision was only uttered with restriction and limitation, is now expanded into most abundant and glorious universality, and thus alone fully corresponds with the meaning which the Spirit in their letter had signified from the beginning. Yet more: as the prophecy has found its end when fulfilled in Christ, so that no more prediction shall go forth concerning him, and we are released from all expectation of another than he who is already come, and of anything else than what we now have, from all the imperfection of fragmentary prophecies which have not yet found their unity; so also is Christ, as the fulfiller of the law, likewise its end, that is, the law in contradistinction from its fulfillment (and as such only secretly predicting a future righteousness of grace, while condemning present unrighteousness) has altogether lost its force for those who are justified in Christ through faith. We are no longer under the law, for through Christ it lives within us and works its own accomplishment; its requirement no longer presses upon us as a commandment from without—Thou shalt! whosoever doeth not all these things, let him be accursed and die! The punishment of the law is no more contemplated than its rewards by those who, through the Spirit of grace in Christ, are made meet to be the people and temple of God.

Finally, there is another sense in which both the Law and the Prophets continue still, and cannot fail till all things be accomplished. Grace itself retains the office of correction, and Christ as the living and life-giving law of the Spirit, chastises sin, indeed, even in his own, until he finds it no longer; but his chastisement is only unto life and peace (Isa. liii). The old law viewed as preparatory, also, has not gone out of the world; but still exercises, as ever, its open or secret office wherever the Christ who has come is not yet preached; and even in conjunction with the work of the Spirit in evangelical preaching, the work of the letter continues upon all hearts and consciences in the outer congregation, before Christ comes into it. The Lord himself as prophet preached the law, to prepare the way for himself; and his servants follow his example.* Similarly Christ himself, in his person and history from his birth to his ascension, is a still-continued prophecy of the fulfillment of his work, of the reproduction of his person in his Church; as the Church again, in its beginning and progress, is still a prophecy of his matured body, of the temple finally completed at the end of the world. This is, indeed, a living prophecy, bearing in itself the power and security of its own fulfillment, but still a prophecy pointing to the future. Waiting has no more ceased than duty; but for all who are in Christ, the former is a progressive possession and attainment, the latter a progressive ability and willingness. In like manner the prophetic word continues to be a standing witness to all who have not acknowledged the Christ as come, even till they acknowledge him. And all things thus go on, till the law and the prophets have reached their fulfillment in the perfect Church, the body of the great Head; until the final decision and separation of the judgment has come, which is every where attested to be the goal of all law and prophecy; and thereby the end returns back to the beginning again, the entire Old Testament appears spiritually yet visibly in the tabernacle of God among men, eternally new; and after the last rejection of the unbelieving, and the glorification of the faithful, nothing more remains to be commanded or threatened, and nothing more to be foretold.

* The law and the Gospel go ever hand in hand, and jointly increase in the clearness and profundity of their revelation. The law reaches its fulfillment in Christ, not only in his bearing its curse, but also in his more perfect revelation of its demand, through his own word and act—even till the final judgment and the kingdom of grace are at once and together fully brought to light. So Schöberlein, Stud. u. Krit. 1847. 1. p. 26, 27.

Thus we have, to some little extent, pointed out the meaning of our Lord's utterance in Matt. v. 17; the enlightened reader will discover how little of its inexhaustible fulness. But we have not once as yet fixed our attention upon the second sentence of this great saying, in which he so emphatically repeats—I am not come to destroy but to fulfill. Is this really a repetition only for the sake of emphasis? Assuredly so in part, so far as it is the Lord's design to impress a more vivid conviction of the infinite contrariety of these two things, and to place in a more striking light the folly of that delusion which expected any abrogation from him. But there is also something new in his meaning, something wider and greater, when he now omits the "Law and the Prophets," and testifies in general and comprehensively: I am altogether and absolutely not come to abolish anywhere any thing that is right and true, but my coming is throughout and entirely to conserve, to expand and to fulfill all the rudiments, preparations and tendencies toward the kingdom of God in humanity. Hereby likewise he throws his unrestrained glance over Israel even into the whole world of heathenism, for which also he is come, and in which there will be found elements of preparation for his coming, which his new revelation may seize upon; for he comes not absolutely to create anew, but rather to fulfill. He looks into the deep things of humanity in relation to God, and surveys its history as presenting a universal aspiration towards himself, and waiting for his coming. And do not these very Scriptures concerning the future Christ, which were given by God to Israel, that copy of humanity, also disclose the self-same preparation for him, though more hidden and darkened, in the other nations of the earth? Is there not something in them all, which we may also term νόμος ἢ προφῆται εἰς Χριστόν, Law or Prophets to Christ? The heathen have a law in their conscience, a worship of God through sacrifice in their religions, codes of morals and rights in their political economy, longings and presentiments in their wise men and poets who are also their prophets (Tit. i. 12; Acts xvii. 28). The Lord brings its fulfillment to every such expectation in the ancient world, and destroys nothing in all this which testifies to the righteousness and truth of God; through its sins and its delusions he destroys every where as being the work of the devil, in order that he may help forward to its development, every, the most secret, germ implanted of God which still existed among them. How gracious and full of encouragement is this word for all in the world, who, as poor as they are sincere, are waiting for righteousness! How solemn and admonitory is the instruction which it gives to all the Lord's servants, his missionaries among the heathen and his preachers in Christendom, that in every relation, internal or external, they must not teach and labor in the spirit of such entire abolition as their Lord here signifies, but bring in every where a universal fulfillment through him who came to be the Spirit of all forms, the consummation of all beginnings, the answer of all questions, the satisfaction of all necessity!

But let not the world think, even the Christian world down to this day, that he came for any other end than to establish the whole will of God, as the Law and the Prophets in Israel especially enforced and foretold it: let this be declared to the world continually in the Lord's own words, both for its encouragement and its warning. Fear ye not this new thing which Christ brings, as being a subversion of all established customs, a casting down of your own vain righteousness, and an interruption of your own cherished peace: he does indeed destroy inexorably the old, which was not from God and avails not before him, yet only as the fulfiller of all aspirations towards a true righteousness in God's sight! But hope not for that grace as bringing a false freedom from law, wait not for his kingdom with expectation that savors in any degree of the blind delusion of the Jewish expectation of Messiah: he does indeed make all things new in the spirit, brings grace, peace, life and blessedness, yet only in order to righteousness in the obedience of God's will. Would you rather have a Saviour who should not establish the law of Sianai, because your evil conscience recoils from it; a Saviour who should leave behind much of the Jewish word of prophecy, because your foolish fancy in the unbelief of a sluggish heart opposes it? then does he most decisively answer you, Such a one am not I!

Verse 18. For all must and will be fulfilled, that is written in the ancient Scriptures, even to the tittle. Of this the Lord gives his yet stronger assurance, and confirms with his Amen, which was first heard in John i. 51, and had since then often been used to individuals as in John iii. 3, v. 11, but now for the first time occurs in his public teaching of the people. The prophets, who testified of him who was to come, and Moses, the mediator of the law, might only say—Thus saith the Lord! But here that Lord himself is speaking, whose way they all as servants had prepared; who, greater than a prophet, expound the true meaning of the law which himself had given (vers. 21, 27); withdraws those condescending concessions which it had made to the hardness of their hearts (vers. 31, 33, 37), and re-establishes and re-imposes it in all the perfection of its original integrity; who, indeed, thus early declares himself (vers. 19, 20) to be the one Lawgiver and Judge, who receives into or rejects from the kingdom of heaven. He it is who thus preliminarily asserts his own authority and the authority of the whole subsequent discourse: I say unto you! Here at once his peculiar method of instruction begins to become more distinctly manifest, in which he excites the deaf ear to attention by striking proverbial sayings which have the appearance of hyperbole, and yet utter nothing but the actual and literal truth, of which no tittle shall be abated, and which he can seal with his Amen!

We perceive immediately, if we will only give heed, how far-reaching had been the Lord's preceding word concerning the fulfillment of the Law and the Prophets; since the fulfillment is to take place not merely in his own person, but further and ever increasingly through him in all who are his, through the whole future history of humanity in all its ages down to the end of the days of heaven upon earth (Deut. xi. 21). He now mentions only the Law, as the more common name in popular usage, which employed both interchangeably; but its connection with what has gone before shows that it embraces also the Prophets, whose prophecies must as certainly be fulfilled as the commandments of the Law (see the repetition of this at a later period in Luke xvi. 16, 17).* Yet when we mark what follows, we perceive that there is a transition in this expression, and that the Lord is proceeding now to bring into prominence the law in its narrower sense, the commandments of righteousness. Heaven is not the heavens of ver. 12; as earth, here, is not the same which is promised in ver. 5, as an inheritance; but the present heaven and the present earth, which await a passing away, παρέρχεσθαι, a vanishing, a growing old (as 2 Cor. v. 17; Jas. i. 10; Rev. xxi. 1), the being changed and renewed, according to the predictions of the Scriptures, which clearly announce this in such places as Psa. cii. 27; Isa. xxxiv. 4, li. 6, lxv. 17; and even in its earliest revelation had occasionally made it known, as in Gen. viii. 22; Job xiv. 12. The first till is just as certain and as necessary as the second—compare the direct assertion in Luke xxi. 33. Thus the substance of the word of God, written before Christ and in him to be fulfilled, with the development of this his kingdom and work, stretches forward to the final passing away of all that is perishable and the changing of all that is mutable; then first, when the world passes away, will the fulfillment of all be complete and established!

Heaven and earth, the form of this present world, are but a transitory creation to endure for their season (1 Cor. vii. 31; Heb. xii. 26, 27); but the word of God abideth for ever (Isa. xl. 8). The world passes away entirely and as a whole; there is coming another heaven and another earth; but the word of God, the slightest minutiæ of which are here compared with the whole universe, must remain even to the smallest point. There is in that word, rightly conceived of, neither small nor great; nothing in it can be lost, for it is, and must ever be, a living whole. And this applies to the word which is written in the letters of human language, to the Scripture which cannot be broken (John x. 35), as the ἰῶτα ἓν ἢ μία κεραία, one jot, or one tittle, incontrovertibly declares. The iota is the smallest letter; the tittle, little horn or point, is the smallest part of a letter, which appertains to the true and established Scripture.* That this strong expression refers figuratively in its special meaning to the least important of its contents, is plainly to be understood: and this saying therefore teaches us that while with the change of the heaven and the earth there will follow also, finally, a change of the form of the word of God, a passing away of the letters and points in which it must till then be contained, its full accomplishment yet remains—Till all be fulfilled. This all comprehends every ἓν καὶ μία, every individual thing, which now exists in the letter, and shall remain in its reality; and assures us of such a fulfillment of everything in Scripture, whether great or small, first or last, in its pure and actual truth, as we cannot now apprehend. The manner of this establishment of the written word in the eternal permanence of the new world, our Lord leaves in obscurity, even as he does the manner of the old world's passing away. Thus much, however, he says, in passing to his subsequent discourse, that this fulfillment begins in his disciples' performance of it unto righteousness.

Verse 19. He therefore now turns more particularly to the commandments of the Scripture, and asserts their inviolable continuance as a whole and in their individual precepts, in opposition to the destructive error of the Pharisees. They are obviously referred to here, though without being named, as he presently afterwards places his disciples in direct contrast with them. The Pharisees understood not that the law is a living whole (Jas. ii. 10), although the many threads united in one border upon the fringes which Moses appointed (Num. xv. 38; Matt. xxiii. 5), might have pretypified it to them. They counted the single commandments as single, just as

* Schleiermacher would very erroneously (on Luke, p. 207) strike out of the Sermon on the Mount ver. 18 as an interpolation from Luke—because it makes the whole uncertain and ambiguous! vers. 17 and 19 immediately connected are so very plain! Surely Schleiermacher finds some σκάνδαλον here to remove.

* And by which alone many Hebrew letters are distinguished, as ך and ך. The yod is often superfluous, yet even then the Jews ascribed to it a peculiar signification.

even yet a blind misunderstanding has nothing better to say than—This God has commanded to us, and this also, and yet further this. They investigated with subtility which were the greater and the greatest commandments; and which as being the least might be left unperformed: just as even now dead systems of spurious morality and ethics speculate about a collision of duties, in which one must give place to another; and dream furthermore of grosser and more venial sins. It was their custom to compare what they regarded as the least commandments with the smallest letters of the Scripture, י or ו, and to this folly the Lord had alluded in the previous remark. They at last, in the excess of their perverseness, treated the especial precepts of holiness (which the Lord himself, more strictly defining his present expression, certainly terms τα βαρύτερα του νόμου, the weighter matters of the law) as slight and insignificant in comparison with the external ordinances and customs, in the frivolous fulfillment of which they sought their righteousness (Matt. xxiii. 23, 24). In opposition to all this, the Lord asserts the equal validity of the smallest of these commandments also, as being always uttered with a like "Thus saith the Lord," and from among them he presently takes his examples. By the admonitory—Whosoever, therefore, shall break one of these, he does not so much aim at the Pharisees, as at his own disciples, appointed to office in his kingdom, who are warned against doing as these did. This breaking takes place, as the connection shows, through a spurious, enervating exposition which teaches it as something unimportant, leading as a consequence to an entire disregard of it, so that the requirement of the commandment is annulled, and it is left altogether unperformed. Whoever of his disciples deals in any such manner with the law, in this or the other department of its precepts, and teaches the people so, let him know that he is a bad teacher, who himself has understood and received but little of the perfect righteousness of the kingdom of heaven. Since he has not scrupled to term some commandments the least, he shall in just requital, here in the true records of the Church, and hereafter, when every man's praise or blame shall be righteously dealt to him, himself be called the least. This is obviously not to be taken in a good sense (it is severer than μικροτερος, ch. xi. 11), but has an almost scornful tone, and verges upon not entering the kingdom at all, though it is not altogether the same.* For the Lord does not refer to full and absolute Pharisaism, but to an intermixture of it in his disciples with error of judgment. But whoever of them, on the other hand, is zealous with all his might and before all things, to do the apparently least commandments of God, and in this spirit teaches the law, shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven, shall be acknowledged as a genuine teacher and master (Rabbi is equivalent to great) in the final and just judgment which shall give to every man his due. Ye must be Rabbis, in a better sense and in the highest truth of the name. Mark, then, accordingly, who are in the sight of Christ the little Rabbis, and the untaught doctors; and who are the great and genuine expounders of Scripture and masters of the law! But art thou disposed to press the matter so far as to cleave to the minutest letter as such, or even to accept this most important expression of our Lord so strictly in the letter as to deduce from the perpetual, external obligation of all those Mosaic precepts, which he, nevertheless, elsewhere has by his Spirit annulled—then hast thou not yet rightly understood the Master, who speaks, indeed, of an abrogation or establishment of the commandments, very different from that which may take place in the letter. We shall henceforward find many more such paradoxes in the Sermon on the Mount, which penetrate into the profounder meaning and harmony of truth. He who, in his exposition of any one commandment, which was written for Israel in the books of Moses, has nothing else to set out with than, "This is now obsolete"—is one of those who destroy the law. But he who discovers in the whole, for himself and for others, an inner abiding meaning and import which even yet applies to us all, is the genuine teacher of Holy Scripture.* He only is a true interpreter of the New Testament who interprets it in harmony with the Old.

Verse 20. How great is the contrast between this declaration, which closes the first part, and the promises which commenced it in vers. 3 and 6! The Lord utters it by way of transition, as a general superscription for the whole development of the second part—Let yours be a sound and genuine and perfect righteousness; and it is especially now said for the first time—Not like that of the Pharisees! If that contrast between the beginning and the end is rightly regarded, and the entering of the kingdom of heaven into us is taken in connection with our entering the kingdom of heaven, we cannot but perceive that even this severe utterance has an essential promise within it. For it then runs thus, being reversed—Unless the kingdom of heaven enter into you with its gracious gift, ye can have no righteousness at all. If ye receive it in your poverty, ye shall be filled with righteousness. But just at this point the discourse passes over to a more rigid requirement that this gift of righteousness be both received and preserved. The strong expression, οὐ μή, in no case enter, goes further than the previous comparison of least or greater in the kingdom of heaven. It is similar to ch. xviii. 1–3.

* There is to us more of irony in the tone, than (as Braune thinks) of love and gentleness, such as might yet consider the object of it to be in the kingdom of heaven. More correctly Von Gerlach: "To be called the least, is generally an expression of contempt and rejection."

* Richter's Family Bible asks, "Art thou not afraid because of thy past treatment of the Old Testament?"

Not all the scribes were at that time Pharisees likewise, or the reverse;* but the Lord blends them together according to their internal points of union, and thus exhibits under two aspects the absolute opposition between every kind of insufficient and false righteousness, and the perfect, genuine righteousness of his own disciples. This opposition is the same to the present day, in all ages and in all places; for the developments of the Jewish people down to the age of Christ, are but a mirror of that humanity into which he enters as a whole. The scribes are every where those who are learned in the letter (γραμματεῖς) and who teach it; and the worst delusion is that of supposing that such knowledge, without corresponding action, is righteousness; it therefore stands first. But it is no better, when even such doing is added as that of the Pharisees. These are in all times the doers of the work in appearance but not in reality, retaining now as ever the disposition to add the ordinances of men to the commandments of God, to substitute their opera supererogationis and ἐθελοθρησκεία (will worship) for the weightier matters which they lightly dispensed with. The book-learned and letter-sifting γραμματεῖς reckon up the precepts of God, as if they were no more than mere letters and points; they determine with keen subtilty which are the greater and which the less; and it is all that they can do, to give instruction in these matters. The Pharisees are zealous, also, in the work; but with the same formal, blind, dead, cleaving to the mere work without any life in it, as that of the former to the letter without any spirit. Though the two are sometimes distinct, they generally run one into the other; and therefore the Lord here unites them together. What then is the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees? First of all, knowledge and teaching without doing; then the doing without heart, as in the accustomed offerings, tithes, their own self-invented washings, etc., and even in the case of the commandments—Thou shalt not kill! thou shalt not commit adultery! And yet shall this, wherein all is hypocrisy and the lie of pride without any the slightest approach to poverty of spirit, be termed a "righteousness." The Lord so terms it indeed, but with that severe scorn of sharply penetrating truth and love which he must ever feel towards all such as they were, down to the end of time. These reghteous ones, these especially holy—as the name "Pharisee" signifies†—think that they exceed other people, and possess abundant righteousness: but the Lord casts them down from their eminence, when, in ironical allusion to this, he cries to his disciples—Let your righteousness exceed; let them be the common people and sinners in comparison with you! The tone of this is more severe than what was said in ver. 19; for it means no less than that their righteousness is none at all, since it gains them not even an entrance into the kingdom of heaven.* On the other hand, that first righteousness which is attained by the justifying faith of those poor and wretched ones to whom mercy graciously inclines, is a true righteousness, although the mourning and the hungering strictly speaking should come after, and their hearts be not yet purified in all holiness. The Publican goes down from his first prayer of penitence justified rather than the Pharisee; and if he proceeds in this righteousness, if he, now that the kingdom of heaven is come into him, constantly seeks the full establishment of the kingdom of God and his righteousness within him, then will the Fulfiller fulfill all in his experience, until he is perfect, as his Father in heaven is perfect. All this is effected through asking and receiving (ch. vii. 7), through that process of self-denial before God and before men, which, though easily apprehended by the mind, is only possible in act through divine grace (ch. vii. 12, 13). The spiritual law of our Lord, as it now proceeds on from ver. 21, ever anew casts down throughout the whole way to its full accomplishment, every presumption of perfection already attained; reveals the still-existing heathenism of nature in the hearts of the children of God; puts to shame all precipitate judgment of others, while self is not judged, all rebuking of the Pharisees without the much better righteousness than theirs, as sheer hypocrisy; and cries to all disciples from step to step, for their encouragement and warning, in order that all Pharisaism may be extirpated—Let your righteousness be still better; let it more and more exceed, until it become absolutely perfect!† This let us do and teach even as our Master did, and take good heed that we abate not his word by a single tittle any where, nor invalidate his "verily I say unto you" by any falsehood of our own.

Not like the Pharisees, the men of the letter of the law, and of hypocritical outside appearances! This is the first great contrast, by which the perfect righteousness of the disciples of Christ is further delineated, that righteousness which is required as the fruit of the

* At least not according to the more general idea which holds good here. But it will be seen to follow from ch. xxiii. 2, that only the orthodox Pharisees held the seat of Moses.

† פְּרוּשִׁים, according to the Rabbinical writings, those who assume to be separate and holy, so that it might be seen from their very garments that they held themselves different from עַם הָאָרֶץ, the common people.

* Similarly in Heb. xi. 4, Abel's better or greater offering than Cain's.

† At the utmost possible distance from the picture which Zeller (in the Monatsblatt) draws of the proud saints who imagine that the paper-money of their own good works must be current, also, in heaven, and be reckoned there at par, at least, if not indeed above par.

grace which has been previously received. The two other contrasts, as we said above, develope themselves out of this—Not as the heathen! Not as the half-disciples, who, being disposed to remain in an imperfect righteousness, fall away again entirely as a consequence, and are put to confusion as hypocrites and evil-doers. Not like the Pharisees! The Lord thus, in the manner of the prophets, connects his teaching with the characteristics of the men of his age, embracing and illustrating by them general and permanent relations. But how is this seen? As the development of these words proceeds in detail, they evolve three other contrasts which disclose and explain themselves organically, advancing from the original principle of Pharisaism to its consequences, and tracing that right understanding of the law which is opposed to theirs into its essentially voluntary and actual obedience. His disciples' understanding of the law is spiritual; to this is opposed the merely literal understanding of the Pharisees: that of his disciples is consequently correct, and is opposed to the false exposition of the Pharisees; their right understanding approves itself, finally, in a voluntary and hearty reception of the law in order to do it, in opposition to the hypocritical legality of the Pharisees. This is the internal arrangement of the discourse from ch. v. 21 to ch. vi. 18; which cannot, indeed, be viewed otherwise, since it corresponds with the most profound relations of the matter upon which the discourse dwells. The error of the Pharisees proceeded from their merely literal acceptation of the law (ch. v. 21–32); and in its origin was to some slight extent excusable, inasmuch as the letter of the commandment was obviously most prominent before them. But if man's sinful heart would sincerely and humbly permit the law to enter, it would soon reveal its spiritual and inner meaning as designed for the conviction of the spirit; it would thus spiritually expound itself, just as all sincere souls have ever understood it: for we must not suppose that Christ gives now an altogether new publication of its meaning.* But in the wickedness of the Pharisaic mind, on the contrary, this literal understanding of the law produced, and, indeed, had for its foundation, a false interpretation (ch. v. 33–48), which, finally, in the progress of perversion, annulled it entirely; so that—Thou shalt love! became in the destroying gloss—Thou mayest hate! In the detection of their error we find its principles becoming more evident as we go further into its outward exhibition. The law is literally understood from the beginning because it has been falsely interpreted. And, finally, as to the third? The law has only been falsely interpreted because it is read and heard not with a view to the simple and sincere doing of it; since the design is not to obey the law in spirit and in truth before God who seeth in secret, but only for the sake of man! Hence, thirdly, and quite correctly, we have the hypocritical seeming-legality of the Pharisees, which developes itself from this false interpretation, and is also found to be its source (ch. vi. 1–18). With this is brightly contrasted the genuine, internal fulfillment of the children of God before their Father in secret; which alone prevails and will receive reward.

If after this general glance we enter more into detail, we find that the Lord further illustrates each of these three contrasts by three examples taken from the precepts and duties of righteousness, and evidently according to a fundamental and necessary order of selection. And here we are met by the division of the law into moral, ceremonial, and civil; a classification which, notwithstanding the essential unity of the three, is based upon truth, and will now be exhibited in its propriety. From the ceremonial law, or the law of the sanctuary and divine service, the Lord takes no particular leading example, because that was given not so much for the conviction of sin, as for the typical satisfaction of an already awakened sense of need of a propitiation. He contents himself in relation to this with merely adding to the first example an impressive caution, referring back to the instance of Cain, against the unhallowed offering of gifts with an angry and implacable heart. On the other hand, he very distinctly brings forward, in connection one with the other, the civil law or the law of the political economy of Israel, and the more distinctive law of holiness, as we prefer calling it, instead of the moral law. He begins naturally with the latter, with the commandments of Sinai, the heart of the whole divine legislation; and presents as the three examples of the first contrast, two from Sinai and one from the civil code. In the second contrast this is reversed; two are taken from the civil code (concerning swearing and judicial retribution), and one returns again to the summary of the moral law, the love of our neighbor. In the third contrast, finally, he very significantly abandons the written precepts of God's word, and takes his illustrations from the three main works of righteousness according to the human Pharisaic idea: almsgiving, prayer, and fasting. The details of this arrangement will exhibit and justify themselves, when we examine them more narrowly.

We now proceed in our more direct exposition to vers. 21–32. The two commandments of the law given from Sinai, are such as exhibit the literal and spiritual acceptation in their rudest collision, and Christ, by his full disclosure of the latter, lays open the very ground of man's evil heart. The civil enactment which follows, concerning the letter of divorce, is one which exemplifies the preparatory character of the Mosaic ordinance, its accommodation to men's hardness of heart; and Christ exhibits his fulfillment of this law, to those who possess his spirit, as being a canceling of that which was imperfect, and a re-establishment of the original and right ordinance. The first two commandments are united—Thou shalt not kill! thou shalt not commit adultery! for the pride of self which towers above all others (involving the denial of all that is not I), and the sensuality of entire devotion to the flesh, are in their essence just the two poles of the same sin. Hatred or murder and lust are forms of corruption in the heart, mysteriously reciprocal and interwoven one with the other, which the two keen commandments of the letter, Do no murder! comm t not adultery! penetrating to the secrets of the heart, will draw forth and reveal. (Let Lamech of the race of Cain be called to mind, Gen. iv. 19–23. Reflect upon the sensuality of vengeance and the murderousness of sensuality, and that both constitute the perfect opposite to that unselfish and pure love, which the holy law of God requires.) But the civil regulation, which permitted divorce, is plainly shut out by the prohibition of adultery, inasmuch as every divorce pre-supposes an act of adultery which is either committed in it or revealed by it. Consequently the essential spirit of the command—Thou shalt not commit adultery! testifies against the letter—Thou mayest practice divorce! so that the law of Moses in its integrity and unity itself contradicts the temporary imperfections of its own ordinances, and at the same time demands and predicts in its fulfillment their establishment in perfection. Thus much for the outset, and now for the details.

* To suppose this, is most fundamentally to misunderstand the relation of the Sermon on the Mount to the law. Christ says even here, only what Moses and the Prophets have already said.

When the Lord designs to cast down the delusion of a legal righteousness, resting only upon a literal and false apprehension of the law without understanding its spirit which judges the inner disposition of mind, he begins, here as elsewhere, with the second table of the Decalogue (ch. xix. 18). For our conduct to our neighbor lies most accessible to conviction, and he who feels that he loves not his brother, may deduce from that conviction that all is not right when, before the Searcher of hearts he says, "I love God." That the discourse in its further progress does thus penetrate to the revelation of the heart's idolatry, will be manifested from ch. vi. 24. On another occasion, when the Lord points out the annulling of the commandments of God by the traditions of men, he uses for that purpose the last precept of the first table, which is the middle term of transition to the second (ch. xv. 4). Here, where the whole discourse, according to the note which ver. 7 had already struck, is to reach its climax in—Be perfect in love, as God loveth (ver. 48), the first commandment of the second table naturally takes the lead, the spiritual significance of which is no other than this—Thou shalt not hate! The Lord lays down first the letter of the command, and its merely literal apprehension, ver. 21; in opposition to this, he expresses the spirit of this letter, and yet, in order to awaken and excite a spiritual apprehension of it, he employs figurative language which cleaves to the letter still, and is not to be understood in its literal import, ver. 22. From this follows, finally, the direct exhortation to love, without which even the offerings upon God's altar are nothing worth; expressed first, in terms of simple exhortation, vers. 23, 24, and then vers. 25, 26, of solemn denunciation, in the figurative exhibition of the judgment which is taken up and continued from ver. 22. This judgment, however, can only be fully understood when referred in its higher sense, as the preceding intimation in the "offering" shows, to the highest and only Judge.

Verses 21, 22. The Lord by this Ye addresses his disciples as before, but at the same time all the people, in as far as they belong to him, may learn what his teaching will be, and this is in a sense the beginning of discipleship. Ye have heard, not read; this latter could only have been spoken to the Scribes; and the Lord does not now at the first address them at all, but warns the people, to whom he speaks, against them. The people only heard out of the law which was read and expounded in their hearing; but, alas! were obliged also to hear their teacher's manner of apprehending and interpreting it (John xii. 34; Rom. ii. 13, 18). That it was said—By whom? According to the earlier and customary acceptation, which Luther follows, this was regarded as designedly left indefinite, because the Lord's—But I say unto you! was intended to oppose all false teaching generally, from whatever source it might come; and it was only defined as the doctrine which had come down from antiquity: hence, that it was said to them of old. Others think that these ancients were the contemporaries of Moses, and that the Lord places his own word in direct contradiction to that of Moses. This supposition is conclusively refuted by vers. 17, 18, after uttering which it is not to be imagined that the Lord would immediately say: Moses has said thus, but I now say otherwise! For that purpose, also, the standing form of speech, "to the fathers," would have been used (Luke i. 55, John vi. 31; Acts iii. 22, vii. 38; Heb. i. 1), from whom the ἀρχαῖοι (those of old time) here are clearly distinguished. Does not the Lord expressly confirm, in ch. xxiii. 2, 3, all that the Scribes, who sit in Moses' seat, teach conformably with the word of Moses? Does he not every where throughout this Sermon prudently avoid stating in contradistinction to his own words, that Moses had said—even, for example, in ver. 31, where this is actually meant (comp. ch. xix. 7, 8), where a preparatory, imperfect ordinance of Moses is abrogated? But here it is God himself, not Moses, who spoke the inviolable word, Thou shalt not kill! The Lord does not say any thing in opposition to this word in itself, but it is against the merely literal interpretation which was immediately attached to it that he contends—"This means no more than that whosoever kills, or inflicts a death-blow, shall be in danger of the judgment." Just as in ver. 43 it is not the commandment of Moses, but its altogether an-nulling interpretation, which is spoken of—Thou shalt love thy neighbor, and hate thine enemy! We quite agree with Lange, that "the first corruption of law is exhibited in its not being developed according to its spirit, but bound down to its literal meaning." Our Lord enters into conflict with all such glosses and teaching as tend to relax the commandments (ver. 18); whatever has been said beyond the word of God, and in false exposition of that word, he contradicts by his own sayings; and thus by the same divine truth and authority he confirms and establishes the true meaning of all which before him had been written or spoken as the word of God.

The notion that Christ contradicts Moses, could only be endured by such orthodox theology as that of our day, which holds so feebly to the Old Testament as immediately divine. The most tolerable presentation of this view, which is very generally embraced, and, alas! has been latterly maintained by the sainted Neander, in the "Deutschen Zeitschrift"—that which could alone recommend it for a moment to our consideration—is the notion that Christ only designed to oppose the law as law, the "legal relation and expression" as such. But the truth of this view must be much more clearly and appropriately unfolded than, e. g. it is by Dietlein;* and, moreover, the discourse does not deal distinctively with this point at all, but speaks, rather, in more rigid terms of an unconditionally necessary fulfillment of the law and its commandments—and, indeed, with a yet more exacting rigor of legal expression of its own. The old Fathers with whom Neander briefly declares himself (in the "Life of Christ") to agree, meant their correctio legis in a very different sense from that of the Socinians and moderns, as Tholuck (on the Sermon on the Mount) has very properly observed.

Most certainly it is not the design of the Sermon on the Mount, if we only hear it and read it aright, to contradict the law, but to expound and glorify it in its fulfillment. Hence it is not said: Ye have heard that it has been read in the law. The common people, whose knowledge of the law was only indirect, would have said with regard to whatever they heard, even though not found written there—We have heard out of the law; that which was written, and that which was said, being blended together into what was popularly valid as "law." But it is our Lord's design now to put a final end to all such intermixture. By the expression which he uses he indicates the entire system of erroneous interpretation,† which not merely might have, but actually had to the greatest extent crept in between the true meaning of the letter (ver. 18), and this hearing of what had been said concerning it. The Scribes read the word "kill," as if it simply meant murder, and as if the limiting addition was strictly proper: but thus they read not aright, either what was written, or how it was written; as the Lord elsewhere, in referring to the right manner of reading the law, emphatically expresses himself—What is written in the law? how readest thou? (Luke x. 26). Further, they did not sincerely tell the people even what their own awakening conscience, in spite of their system, must oft-times involuntarily have perceived in the law. In like manner the people, on their part, did not listen to all that was said to them, but received just what pleased their ears; and thus they limited and weakened it still more, so that the error which understood not the Scripture (ch. xxii. 29), increased as it passed from the saying of the Scribes to the hearing of the people, just as it has ever happened even down to our own time, wherever the people may be said only to hear out of the Gospel. Thus, after having given his assurance that he will not destroy one tittle of the law, if the Lord should say anything different from what thou hast hitherto heard "out of the Scripture," look well to it, and see where the error lay, whether in thy hearing, or in what thou hast heard; and then in the right spirit of hearing let Jesus himself tell thee what is truly written in the Scripture.

Τοῖς ἀρχαίοις must certainly be translated as meaning that it was said by or among them of old time,* namely, that it had been handed down by the masters and doctors in Israel, by the Rabbis of a former age, with the false semblance of antiquity as an immemorial statute. For thus runs the Talmudical formula of teach-

* Das Reich Gottes (Berlin, 1846).—What Rauh also throws out (Deutsche Zeitsch. 1850, p. 360) is more apparently profound than it is well-grounded

† The Pharisaic caricatures of the Old Testament—which they made not as opponents, but as the exponents of the law—as Richter's Family Bible has well said on this point.

* As the ablative, equivalent to ὑπὸ τῶν ἀρχαίων, which construction is preferred by very many, indeed by most expositors. Tholuck regards it as supported by "reasons which deserve notice," though he himself does not accede to it. For ourselves, we regard it as the only possible one, and rejoice that now, in the corrected German Bibles at least, it stands—bei den alten. These ancients are not "the fathers" (Heb. i. 1) to whom God had spoken. It was not Moses (whom the Lord, moreover, would not have referred to by a mere general ἐρρέθη) that had said: Thou shalt not kill, commit adultery, etc. but the God of heaven upon Sinai. (Comp. Matt. xv. 3–6, and all those passages in which Christ places the "commandments" so high, and confirms them so strongly.) We cannot conceive why, as De Wette thinks, our interpretation would have required πρεσβυτέροις to have been written for "elders," (which, however, does not exactly correspond with קדמונים), any more than why, as Von Gerlach thinks, our view would have been expressed—"Ye hear, that it is said in the schools and synagogues." Did they not then refer in these synagogues to the παράδοσις of antiquity? Alas that Alford also, in his penetrating work, should have failed here! Of a contrasted "imperfection of the law and its ancient exposition" (what an unseemly conjunction, as if the latter necessarily sprung from the former), he cannot have spoken who had just asserted ver. 19.

ing adopted by the learned caste, under cover of which they transmitted from age to age error and truth united, under the seal of their own supreme authority:—אמרו קדמנינו, "Our forefathers have said," or merely אותאמר, איתמר, It has been said; which was then as firmly established as if it had been the eternally valid γέγραπται,* "It is written. In opposition to all this, and rooting out all tradition and precepts of men which God hath not planted, stands the mighty Ἐγω δὲ λέγω ὑμῖν, "But I say unto you," which is one with the כֹּה אָמַר יְהוָה or נְאֻם יְהוָה, "Thus saith the Lord," of the Law and the Prophets. Had the contrast been instituted, not with those who had said, but with those to whom it had been said, it would have been ὑμῖν δὲ λέγω, "but I say to you."

The false teachers declared to the people the commandment of God—Thou shalt not kill! but with an explanation which coupled the law of Sinai with a mere criminal statute concerning the execution of a murderer (Lev. xxiv. 17; Ex. xxi. 12), and made the two parallel: as if the Lord God did not in the first place speak of that which came before his own special tribunal, and signify by thou the true murderer, the inner man! Thus they lower the commandment of holiness to the level of a civil statute, just as, on the other hand (ver. 38), they improperly elevate what was only spoken with reference to human judicature, into a commandment of moral obligation. To this exhibition of the literal interpretation of a law degenerating into gross error, our Lord now sets in sharp contrast his own explanation of its spirit and meaning; yet in a manner as attractive as it is emphatic. He most emphatically declares the concealed anger against a brother to be no less criminal than the open offence; or as it might be further illustrated in the popular catch-word: Thou hast heard it said, and supposest that the gallows is the end of a thief; but know that he who only covets his neighbor's goods already deserves the gallows! But he speaks this also to conciliate and win them to the spiritual understanding of the law, since the impossibility which was immediately discerned of carrying this principle into civil jurisprudence must have tended to direct their views to the higher government of God, and to the spiritual law of the Searcher of hearts, whose prerogative alone it is to convict the sinner of his secret guilt before his own judgment-seat. Moreover, the Lord here utters nothing that is actually new; it had already been written by Moses in the same sentence, from which he afterwards extracted the summary of the second table (Lev. xix. 17, 18; comp. Deut. xix. 6). Brother is an intenser word for neighbor; Moses used it as such in the passage referred to, and by no means with that restricted meaning of the Pharisees which our Lord condemns in ver 47. It has been hotly disputed whether εἰκῇ, (whosoever is angry with his brother without a cause, needlessly, to no purpose*) is or is not the true reading; such contention, indeed, is needless. The proposition is correct with εἰκῇ, if this is rightly understood; and, indeed, without this qualification, if ὀργιζόμενος is rightly understood, that is, as signifying that a righteous and holy indignation (Mark iii. 5; Eph. iv. 26; James i. 19) is not only not forbidden, but commanded (1 Sam. iii. 13). It is observable, that such a various reading just here was designed to teach us, that the matter of essential importance is the spiritual understanding of the sense and not the mere letter of the word. Bengel's expression: "This gloss plainly sounds human"—is not satisfactory, since critical authorities are in favor of this gloss. It appears, indeed, more conceivable that a rigorist should have struck out this little word, than that its so frequent addition should have been permitted. We rather hold with Grotius (who quotes Aristotle on unrighteous anger): Merito εἰκῇ additum (the εἰκῇ is properly added). As also Euthymius before him: ἡ γὰρ εὔκαιρος ὀργὴ ὠφέλιμος (for seasonable anger is useful). To be angry and to hate are not indeed one and the same, though Bengel confounds them. He who hateth his brother is assuredly a murderer (1 John iii. 15), and Moses said directly, Thou shalt not hate thy brother in thine heart. But there is an anger springing from holy and jealous love, existing as in God so also in men of God; and we may suppose that our Lord in his severe declaration left room for this by an express word, in order not needlessly to harass the consciences of his disciples He does not concern himself with the possibility of a still further perversion on the part of the Pharisees, who would never be at a loss to find adequate cause for their unrighteous wrath: for all that follows must also be spiritually understood. The letter even of Christ's word demands an interpretation which adheres not to its letter; for a letter that may not, without the Spirit, be misunderstood, is a thing impossible, as is manifestly shown by such subsequent sayings as vers. 29, 30, 34, 37 39–42. Whoever should literally follow out all these, would be at the furthest distance from the Lord's meaning. James addresses the fool, who boasts of his faith without works,

* Correctly and beautifully it is observed by Lange: "This corruption of the Law was gradually and slowly produced by the joint errors of ages which engendered this false tradition. It was not the work of any particular person, but of a general spirit of interpretation (ἐῤῥέθη); but this tradition was ever received and gathered up with diligence by the elders, or those who were antiquity-minded." Correctly as to the matter in hand, though we cannot but regard this so convenient construction of an absolute ἐῤῥέθη with a dative, as too artificial. It is a strange, and almost impossible construction. It was so said to the ancients—by those yet more ancient? Who then were the first of all these ancients, the especial depositaries of this tradition?

* Lange: "ins Eitle hinein," i.e., frivolously.

with an ἄνθρωπε κενέ, Vain man! (James ii. 20), which is literally equivalent to this forbidden ῥακά.* Jesus, like John, termed the Pharisees a brood of vipers, and the Jews even children of the devil (as Paul did Elymas), which goes beyond μωρός, נָבָל, godless. Thus it may be seen that εἰκῇ, which it is sought to take away from the anger, must be supplied in this case also—He who, out of the anger of hatred, and not in love, calls his brother Raca or fool (vain fellow, scoundrel, madman, heretic). The Lord designedly conjoins the slightest invective of a rash but half-jesting petulence,† with the worst and indeed most malignant insult that the language afforded; yet it is not his design to bring this word itself into judgment, but the word as springing from the evil heart. The Pharisee, indeed, asks when he hears this most plain and evident saying: Who is then my neighbor? and goes on with his abatements and qualifications till no one is included whom he thinks his enemy. In like manner he asks —What, then, is anger without cause? by the same process finding means to stipulate for all his ungodly wrath. The Quaker, at the other extreme (to which he has come, notwithstanding his boast of the Spirit, through the selfsame want of the true Spirit), also reduces the spiritual law to a letter again, swears not at all, lets his coat and cloak be taken, and fulfills the Sermon on the Mount in all external gestures and acts. But all this is no more right than Origen's mutilation of himself as a safeguard against adultery, or the unconditional rejection by our latest zealots of any divorce, however necessary still in the Christian state for the people's hardness of heart. But he who will read and hear aright, cannot fail by this first precept of Jesus to learn what relation the directions of the Sermon on the Mount bear generally to the external laws of the state and the Church; that they are given only for free and most spiritual fulfillment in those who have the Spirit within them to that end. Was it the Lord's purpose to erect any human tribunals before which secret anger and the saying of Raca may be brought? where only a brother might always sit in judgment upon a brother concerning the anger without cause? He does not reduce the spiritual law of divine judgment to a criminal code after the manner of men, as the Jews of that time did; but rather elevates all the external ordinances which Moses gave at God's command, into the region of their most central truth, not in the letter, but in the spirit, even as Christians should now do.

Thou shalt not kill; that is, Thou shalt not hate! This is the fundamental meaning of our Lord's words, according to the saying of Moses to which he tacitly referred. He does not, however, once directly express it, but would awaken in his hearers' consciences the remembrance of that word, and the consciousness of his meaning. He therefore points out three degrees in the expression of the spirit of hatred or murder. First, the inward expression, if we may so speak, the rising up of hatred in the heart, as an unrighteous and unloving anger,* selfish and self-willed (for it means, Thou thyself shalt not hate!); and then the progressive outbreak of it in the milder and in the severer word. But the Lord does not go beyond the word of anger; for even the Pharisee would admit that the laying a violent hand upon a brother was amenable to judgment—although he interpreted to "kill" as merely signifying the act of murder, yet was he compelled by reason and conscience to extend the literal meaning so far at least, even at the expense of contradicting himself. Judgment, high council, Gehenna, were the three degrees of penalty in Israel. We read that in the tribes there were inferior courts of judgment (Deut. xvi. 18); in the holy city the so-called council of the Sanhedrim (Deut. xvii. 8), which might cast out of the congregation; and, finally, as the deepest ignominy, the being cast out into the valley of the dead and of all abominations (valley of the children of Hinnom or Valley of Hinnom, where had been the service of Moloch (2 Kings xxiii. 10; Jer. vii. 31). The corpses of malefactors were burnt subsequently, and all the most filthy refuse thrown there; whence in the prophets we find it used as a type of the place of condemnation without the city of God (Isa. xxx. 33, lxvi. 24); and the symbolical Jewish style of teaching, the truth in which our Lord always appropriated to himself, had yet further carried out the figure. But these three degrees of punishment are, as the Lord here utters them,† only intended to convey an increasing emphasis of assurance in the expression (he already deserves the judgment, yea, even more than that!), and by no means the idea of degrees in the actual guiltiness.‡ For how could the word be more guilty than the disposition? A sincere though forward Raca, which might escape from a Peter, might well be a less evil than secret wrath concealed behind the blandishment of words; and in ver. 25 we hear only of one punishment, and that

* Which Matthäi thinks proper therefore to interpret "Grützkopf," blockhead!

† Which "has nothing at all to do with the morality of one's neighbor" (Braune).

* Which he certainly does not "pre-suppose as something unavoidable by the sinful subjects of his kingdom," as Dietlein ventures to maintain, so that this intensification of the law would only lead to the acknowledgment of our sinfulness, and not also to its fulfillment.

† Who does not (as Von Gerlach thinks) merely follow here the usual forms of the judicature of the time, in order to make himself intelligible to the people who expected from him the establishment of an external kingdom; but speaks figuratively, in the long established Jewish manner of teaching, as we observe in the use of Gehenna.

‡ Against which Roos (Lehre Jes. Chris. §138) very well protests; and also speaks with full correctness of the "heavenly Council" of the divine judgment which was typified in the "Sanhedim."

the highest, for the implacable. So that most assuredly there is here only an advancing energy of expression (though degrees of guilt are not necessarily denied): κρίσις, judgment, and συνέδριον, council, cleave more closely to the transitional figure; εἰς τὴν γέενναν, into the Gehenna, points to the ultimate and fearful signification of all these figures taken from human judicature.

Verse 23, 24. Who is my brother? Every fellow-man from Adam downwards, every Abel to whom I must not act the part of Cain, and who is called to glorify the Father in heaven (ver. 16) if I let the light of His love shine before him. Yea, even my adversary, who has, whether justly or unjustly, any thing against one in the highway of life (though he were as Cain himself), and who at the end of it will bring his charge against me before the highest tribunal, If I should have retained any thing against him in my own heart. Thus does the Lord explain his own meaning in the strict connection of his words; and it would be a great mistake to think that vers. 25, 26 do not belong to this place, simply because they are repeated elsewhere. The Lord here lays the deep preparatory foundation for what is fully set forth in vers. 43–48, where the general conclusion reverts back again to the commencement of the discourse.

It was observed above that in vers. 23, 24, the entire ceremonial service, the law pertaining to which is here referred to, is denoted by the offering, which is its centre. It is not, as Luther has it, upon the altar, but, If thou now (consequently, in a state of condemnation before God on account of the anger in thine heart) bringest thy gift to the altar, and unreflectingly preparest to offer it, as if it could then be acceptable. This is spoken once more against the Pharisees, who omitted the weightier matters, while exact in ceremonial observances, and violated the most sacred rights of filial obligations and love to man through their own superadded Corban, (ch. xv. 3–6). The Lord only re-utters what all the prophets had said, especially that most important passage which he more than once quoted (Hosea vi. 6); yea, what Moses had already testified in his history of the first offering. He reproves all ideas of palliating the lack of charity to man by attention to the service of God, as a remnant of Pharisaism in his disciples. Until he has brought in by his offering of himself the abrogating fulfillment of all types and shadows, he retains in his language to the people the altar and its gifts, but his meaning goes forward to the reality which was implied in these figures. It is not τὴν θυσίαν σου, they sacrifice, but τὸ δῶρόν σου, thy gift, because in the New Testament the offering up of ourselves in spiritual consecration is continually realized. This is now the true Christian service of God, with prayer as its centre; the fundamental petition of which for a perpetual sense of reconciliation is a self-contradiction unless there accompany it a placable disposition towards our brother. Hence our Lord at a later period (Mark xi. 25, 26) illustrates his present words, or more fully in this New Testament meaning repeats them. "And there remembered:" before thine and thy brother's Father, with a collected and self-examining mind, in the sacred place of atonement and forgiveness, thinking of the way of life and the end thereof—this being the germ of the thought in ver. 25. Its being first there remembered is not, indeed, approved, but rather censured. "That thy brother has aught against thee:" designedly put thus instead of—That thou hast something against thy brother. For as I must ask—Whose neighbor am I? in order to know who is my neighbor (Luke x. 36); so it is not enough quickly to justify one's self with hypocritical inconsiderateness—I have nothing against thee; while possibly my brother may have well-grounded cause of complaint against me. Probably I have too easily forgotten that there rankles in his mind some Raca of mine uttered yesterday or the third day; or there may be some anger in my heart against which he would complain if he knew it, as that God knows it who looks into the heart which I have brought before him. Yea even if my brother had any thing against me εἰκῇ, without cause, had spoken against me as a ψευδόμενος, falsely, (ver. 11)—this also I should remember in my charity before God (though Braune improperly denies this), and show myself, as a disciple of Christ, in the intention of my heart an εἰρηνοποιός, peacemaker, (ver. 9; Rom. xii. 18). The signification of this "aught against me"* thus grows, as the sensitiveness of my conscience increases; and the letter of this declaration which fully expresses its own spiritual meaning, tolerates no hasty and partial dispatching of the matter, but pierces to the ground of the heart, and rigorously looks for that pure spirit of love with which alone I can abide in the presence of the Lord, and erect in the consciousness of an accepted offering, behold his face with joy. These are fundamental principles embodied in the history of Cain and Abel, to which undoubtedly our Lord here directs our thoughts: so profoundly one is his new word with the most ancient revelation, and so manifest is the folly of those vain enthusiasts who impute to him, in contrast with Moses a new and purer ethical system of charity.† Leave there thy gift before the altar, and lay it not thereupon! Without any delay leave everything lying, if it may be possible, in the holy place; there is such danger in deferring it that even the service of God, which till then is worthless, must be interrupted. Thou standest as Cain before God, if only this aught justly cries out against thee in thy brother. How inconceivably strict does the law of love thus become, though only fulfilling its own original meaning! What we wrongfully call a little thing, condemned equally with the great! By the same Spirit of Christ John likens him who only loveth not his brother to the first murderer (1 John iii. 10–15). Many a disciple might be disposed to rebel against this precept of the Fulfiller, and mitigate it by saying: How can I answer for every matter that any man may bring against me? am I my brother's keeper? Assuredly men (ver. 11) have many things to say against Christ's disciples falsely; and the Lord of course does not mean that we must be answerable for all that they may perversely say. But it is nevertheless true on the other hand, that it is our precious vocation to be our brothers' keepers in love, and to be messengers of peace to them; that in Christ not only should the world be crucified unto us and we unto the world, but in the selfsame cross the world should be reconciled unto us and we unto the world. Go thy way! Thus speaks the Father to that child of his who would approach with an offence in his heart against his holy love: Away from me, thou mayest not thus see my face! So will the Lord dispense, as it were, with his own service and honor until we have rendered to our brother what love demands as due! "First be reconciled to thy brother"—the imperative requirement that for ever recurs as long as there is any, the slightest flaw in this reconciliation. Διαλλάγηθι, be reconciled, forgive or obtain forgiveness, do at least thy best, that so nothing may be set against thy account by the great Judge. For to "mitigate thy neighbor's wrath"* may not always be in thy power, and is not always to be attained. Pray for them which despitefully use thee and persecute thee, when thou bringest thine offering, that so thou mayest have a vital fellowship with that dying settlement of a great reckoning—Father forgive them! which accompanied the one Offering through the virtue of which alone we may bring our offering to God.

---

* Compare the Apostle's word (Col. iii. 13): ἀνεχόμενοι ἀλλήλων καὶ χαριζόμενοι ἑαυτοῖς ἐάν τις πρός τινα ἔχῃ μομφήν, "forbearing one another, and forgiving one another, if any man have a quarrel against any."

† Which folly now again finds acceptance with Christian theologians and expositors—a lamentable sign, whither this crypto-rationalistic, yea this crypto-pantheistic treatment of the Old Testament must infallibly lead.

"And then come and offer thy gift." The first coming avails nothing; now first thou comest aright. The offering itself, however, must not be omitted. The Lord expressly guards against that other aspect of Pharisaism, the Pharisaism of practical virtue; which with equal impropriety sets the duty we owe to our neigbor above the requirements of God's worship, and supposes that this may be dispensed with, if that misconceived charity to man be not forgotten.† Whence hadst thou then thy mercy towards thy neighbor, supposing it to be genuine, but from the mercy of God? Thank Him that thou canst love, and let that be thy offering! The Lord also discountenances every attempt to compound for a deficiency in the worship of God, by deeds of charity to our neighbor: such charity, indeed, being no more genuine than the divine worship was in the opposite kind of compromise already referred to. For "that is not the most acceptable homage, which is offered to God by a man who loses sight of his neighbor altogether, and seeks to sink wholly and entirely into a consciousness of naught but the highest Being, forgetting altogether the testimony uttered against him by the whole time past of his life, in all relations of right, propriety, and love" (Braune).

Verses 25, 26. The reconcilable and in himself reconciled God, to whom we bring our offering, becomes a Judge, or rather continues to be only a Judge to all those who would fain be merely the objects of his holy love without receiving it in their hearts, and rendering it back in charity to their neighbors. This is that rending of his one law which is the last and most subtle Christian Pharisaism. There is an economy of judgment and punishment at the end of the way, corresponding to the provision for offering and reconciliation in the way itself. The penal laws of ver. 22, which are explained in what now follows, being referred to the tribunal and period of their award, assume there their full severity. Now they only hang threateningly over our heads, to drive us to that grace which will take away all our guilt, and extinguish all our hatred and anger. And when after the mention of appearing before God (though God is designedly not named, but only the altar, before which man's conscience should think of God himself), the language of ver. 22 is resumed, we are assisted to perceive its meaning, and the due relation between grace and justice. The adversary (ἀντίδικος, accuser, a judicial term which had been received into the Jewish phraseology) is by no means the Devil (who presently appears for the first time as the keeper of the prison), but simply and obviously the ἔχων τι κατὰ σοῦ, the "one having aught against thee," my fellow-man in the journey of life, whom I must regard as a brother (ch. xviii. 35) whether he reciprocate it or not. But inasmuch as every man who may charge me with omission of the rights of love, does not this by any right of his own (being himself equally guilty), but by the authority of the divine law which takes up and corroborates his complaint; this complaint and this complainant may be regarded as representing the accusing Moses (John v. 45) or the law. Hence in the repetition of the parable (Luke xii. 58, 59), this meaning appears more distinctly shadowed out. Be disposed to agree, ready on thy part for reconciliation, and proposing it to him; thus is the previous διαλλαγηθι now fully explained. According to the Roman law, which the Lord thus recognizes in Israel, the complainant carries the defendant before the judgment-seat—in jus rapit; on the way thither, however, an amicable accommodation, transactio, being possible. So is it with us all on our way to the highest tribunal; and inasmuch as this way is short and precarious, the exhortation has a most urgent fulness of meaning: Agree with thine adversary quickly, before it may haply be too late! If I have done my best towards my brother in the advances of reconciliation, the amicable disposition will be set to my account, even though the other would not respond to it. It is not always possible to go actually to my brother and speak to him; in that case this inward reconciliation will avail for me at the very place of offering and of prayer. But when this is neglected to the last, then comes in the rigor of the righteous law; the just complaint of the complainant, even though himself guilty, has its force, and the blood, not of Abel but of another Cain, cries out against Cain. So, finally, adversaries mutually bearing testimony against each other meet in one common prison.

* As Von Gerlach at Rom. v. 10 explains this place.

† Over the door of a Dessau church is incribed "Preiset Gott hier und durch gute werke" (Praise God here and in good works); but there are many who not only altogether leave out the "here and," but "God's praise" also; inasmuch as their hypocritical way of speaking of good works as being the only worship of God, must be understood in the same sense as when they say: Cease from revelation, reason is the only "revelation,"—that is, none at all is necessary!

Who is then the officer, if God is the Judge? In ch. xviii. 34, βασανισταί are mentioned in the plural, but here it is Satan, the chief of the tormentors, the minister and executioner of the divine judicial wrath—a profound intimation, though only thus given by the way! Verily—here comes in the second great Amen of the Sermon on the Mount, the first having previously confirmed the law, ver. 18. But as the prison of the Devil and of those delivered over to him has its threatening Amen appended to it, so has also the kingdom of the Father in heaven, and of those who are redeemed into it from all evil, with all its power and glory, its Amen of promise (ch. vi. 13). The Amen which confirms the fulfillment of the Law and the Prophets unites both. Besides the three main Amens, there is only found the threefold Amen which seals the recompense of the hypocrites (ch. vi. 2, 15, 16). (A contribution, this, of internal criticism in favor of the genuineness of the doxology, as well as testifying to the connection of the whole discourse.)

"By no means come out thence"—an ἐκεῖθεν which forms an antithesis with ἐκεῖ, there, in ver. 23. If the Judge and the executioner of his wrath were not so manifestly before us, and if the whole was not a representation of strict justice in opposition to grace, the φυλακη, or prison, might have been here as elsewhere regarded as Sheol; and in the admonitory "till" an actual period might have been traced when the sins carried forward into the other world would find forgiveness (ch. xii. 32). But the connection will not permit us to regard the Lord as here speaking of any such prospect. Though not to be excluded in other connections, here it would be quite out of keeping. They who thus interpret the paying of the uttermost farthing, pervert its meaning; for if there be any deliverance in Sheol it can take place only through grace, in the way of forgiveness and atonement: it is absolutely impossible that needy man, possessed of nothing in the sight of God, should ever legally pay the slightest installment towards the extinction of his debt. He has not even the first farthing, to say nothing of the last (ch. xviii. 34, 35). Bengel wonders that the uttermost farthing is not urged in the argument by those who think otherwise, rather than the till; but when we closely look into it, the reality of the former, the ἀποδῷς τὸν ἔσχατον is immediately withdrawn by the latter, the ἕως ἄν, and marked as an impossibility in such terms as we are wont popularly to express what is impossible. To be cast into prison remains therefore just equivalent to the entering in no case the kingdom of heaven (ver. 20).

In the discourse upon the second commandment of Sinai, which now follows in its order in the second table (according to Matt. xix. 18, not as reversed in Mark x., Luke xviii., Rom. xiii.), we find the same process observed. First, we have the letter of the law, the merely literal acceptation of which does not need to be more particularly pointed out; against this is set the rigorous vindication of its spirit which judges the heart, now exhibited more briefly and plainly than in the former case; finally, the corresponding exhortation to an earnest endeavor after purity of heart (as before to love or mercy ver. 7, 8), with the warning once more of the prison of hell for the unclean, in which verses 22 and 25 are blended into one.

Verses 27, 28. The doubtful reading "by them of old time" is, by the authority of internal criticism, now more properly left out; for thus there becomes evident a descending abbreviation of the words down to "it hath been said" in ver. 31; after which the new section begins again (ver. 33) with πάλιν, again, and the full formula. "Ye have heard that it was said," is immediately understood as in the former case to signify that they had been taught the divine law in its merely literal acceptation; as if he only was guilty of adultery who committed the act of carnal uncleanness. Such conciseness in Christ's words was adapted to open the ears of his hearers, and would test them, so to speak, on the second occasion, whether they understood the first aright. Those, however, who were dull of apprehension must have understood clearly enough what had been intended by the "said" and "heard," when the Lord uttered his own contrasted words: But I say unto you, that whosoever only looketh upon a woman hath committed adultery already. Job long ago declared,

In making a covenant with his eyes (Job xxxi. 1, comp. Ecclus. ix. 5–8), that the first provocation to carnal lust was in the eye full of adultery (2 Peter ii. 14). The first spiritual adultery, which was the principle and type of all carnal adultery, began with looking (Gen. iii. 6). In βλέπων γυναῖκα πρὸς τὸ ἐπιθυμῆσαι αὐτήν, looking upon a woman in order to lust after her, is condemned that active lust, into which the will enters. This, indeed, only is sin, not the passive involuntary impulse of that flesh which is our nature, not the "spontaneous observation of the greater beauty of another man's wife"—as De Wette expresses himself.* He who experiences at a first glance this desire, and then, instead of turning away and withdrawing from sin (2 Peter ii. 14), throws a second glance with lustful intent and in order to retain and increase that impulse, commits the sin. He has already committed adultery in his heart; for the proper deed begins earlier than the Pharisees suppose. It is in word or look before the act itself is performed, yea in the heart before the look is cast; for it is there that that inner act of the will takes place, which alone gives its significance to the outer deed. This is a stronger and plainer utterance than in ver. 22, where it is not directly said, "he hath killed him already in his heart." It is the perfect formula applicable to all the commandments, and it was not necessary similarly to quote those which followed, as: Whoso desireth his neighbor's house, has already stolen it in his heart. But so profoundly internal is its application, that it goes yet beyond this: Whoso, only in thought, by a glance of the imagination, looketh on a woman in his heart, who is not present to his eyes! The Lord says simply "a woman" (even if not the wife of another), and "whosoever" looketh (even if himself not any woman's husband). Just as conversely Job (xxxi. 1) speaks of a maid when the married woman is also signified. (In like manner it must necessarily be understood: Whatsoever woman thus looketh upon man, &c.) Has committed adultery—how then, if both man and woman are unmarried? The Lord speaks according to Old Testament usage, in which adultery, in the sixth command and everywhere, indicates and includes lewdness in general.† Marriage is the making one flesh, and consequently every carnal lust which seeks its gratification independently of the union which God has appointed in marriage, is a breach and offence against this sacred order. He who has not recognized a spiritual meaning in the law generally,‡ must at least discern it here, where the Lord evidently includes every concupiscence under the letter of the commandment. And the unmarried by this offence commits adultery by anticipation, sinning against that future marriage for which he should reserve himself; and further in the deepest sense he is guilty of infidelity to himself, and to the Lord to whom his body belongs.

Verses 29, 30. Contemplate it now more closely and observe that there is a desire which, springing indeed entirely from the body, becomes an offence which thou must involuntarily endure: but that, at the same time, there must be a continual victory over this desire and casting away of this offence, or a consent to it which implies the actual sin of positive and active lust. The commandment stands in terms which already explain its meaning (Deut. v.) לֹא תִתְאַוֶּה, Suffer thyself not to desire! The Lord mentions the eye and the hand, and means, as he explains himself, one of our members. This he does, partly for the sake of a decorous concealment of the member to be further alluded to afterwards; partly on the ground of what had just been laid down, that the impulse of lust usually begins with the eye; and partly, because of the general importance of these two chief members in every impulse to every kind of act. (For in the profoundest sense all sin is here included as being uncleanness, spiritual impurity; hence the repetition of this saying with this wider meaning in ch. xviii. 8, 9.) The eye is both the organ of reception through which sensual, and therefore already spiritual, enticement enters, and the most certain betrayer of that conceiving lust which will bring forth the act of sin; the hand is the general organ for its performance and practice. Casting the eyes upon a forbidden but desired object leads directly to the stretching out of the hand towards it (Gen. xxxix. 7, 12, 13), and the rest follows. The eye—the light, the lamp of the body, its most precious and dearest member (Deut. xxxii. 10.); the hand or arm—the strength, the support, the defence of the body, its most indispensable instrument. Now it is quite evident that objects and persons around us may be, through our close connection with them, like an eye or hand, or one of our own members; and that if any of these should become a stumbling-block to us, they must be resolutely cast off (Deut. xiii. 6–10; xxxiii. 9). But it is folly to take that as the only meaning, which is only a right application of it; since this very application must rest upon the internal, intrinsic truth itself. This first and most obvious meaning of the expression is doubtless to be sought in the words "looketh upon to lust" (to long for, and then to reach forth towards), with which it is directly connected, as well as in their manifest antithesis

* Matthai has further and rightly mentioned, that as we must in order to marriage, look upon a woman to desire her; so only the adulterous, sinful "desire" can be referred to.

† As in ver. 32, fornication stands, conversely for adultery.

‡ Although the last Sinaitic commandment already and expressly forbids coveting. No one but Ernst Meier, with his universal perversion, could have concluded that because Christ brought in a purer morality than the Old Testament, therefore he could not have spiritually understood this לֹא תַחְמֹד, Thou shalt not covet (Dekalog, p. 73).

—thy whole body. The expression which is so readily termed figurative, is, as usual, very literal and real in its meaning, though obviously not in the bare literality of an external accomplishment. It is not the eye or the hand that we are to pluck out and cut off, but the offending eye, the offending hand, and this leads our thoughts to those members of that inner body, of that internal organism of sin, which corresponds to the external members, and which might continue all the more vehemently to look and to lust and to strive, if those external members were actually plucked out and cut off. (As a eunuch embraceth a virgin, and sigheth, Ecclus. xxx. 20.) They are πράξεις τοῦ σώματος, deeds of the body (Rom. viii. 13), which we are to mortify, and this, indeed, is only possible through the Spirit of life, without whom the body of this death brings us into captivity to the law of sin in its members (Romans vii. 23, 24). How it is to be accomplished, we are taught by the experience of grace—of that grace which, preparatorily given, had taught men before the coming of Christ; having from the beginning placed enmity between the woman and her seed and the serpent, and from the time of Cain downwards provided, in the very exhortations which it uttered, a certain gracious power to resist sin in the will, and conquer it. But that such inward mortifying of the members which in idolatrous, adulterous desire mind and aim at the things of earth (Col. iii. 5), is demanded by the rigorous voice of the law—Thou shalt not!—and that the ceaseless process of sin from within outwards can only be checked by the suppression of that lust which is the root of all its acts, must be manifest to every sincere hearer of the law who observes that his eye is not himself, and yet that the commandment of God says—Thou shalt not! The important word is not ἔξελε or ἔκκοψον, pluck out, cut off, which are figurative, but that which is attached to both, the βάλε ἀπὸ σοῦ, cast from thee—renounce in thy will and deny the ὀφθαλμός σου and δεξιά σου, thine eye, hand, declare thy member to be not thine, place thyself as far as may be in contradiction to thy member, hate thyself, that is, thy flesh, thine own life, so far as it is bent upon sin! Yet cast from thee with earnest detestation the offence of thine own dear body and life! Every unconditional Thou shalt not! is accompanied by the tacit addition—Not even if thou must die!*

But because every creature in every condition, and fallen man also in his ruined estate, cannot and may not cease from loving self, so that even the self-murderer only destroys himself from a conviction that it is better for him to die, and the diseased man will undergo amputation rather than that his whole body should perish; therefore to the commandment —Hate thyself! there must be appended—Only by so doing dost thou love thyself in truth! The requirement to cast from us an eye or a hand must derive its force from—It is better for thee. Not merely—"It is good for thee" (συμφέρει carries with it a comparative sense); still less is it merely—"It will hurt thee not." Thy whole body should be cast into hell—that fearfully greater evil, to avoid which the lesser evil becomes an advantage; that essential death in death, from which only a "dying to sin" before death can redeem us. Thy whole body; just because thou regardest it with false kindness as thine own, and wouldst not kill its sinful members. Cast out thyself from Jerusalem, because thou wouldst not cast from thee thy offending members. One sin developed into dominion draws the whole man after it. The body is the organ of sensation for future punishment at the last, when the prison of Gehenna opens to receive the eternally corrupting and burning, who in dying shall never die; even as it is now the organ for the commission of their sin. Hints are here given us in passing, the far-reaching significance of which we can only now forecast. In everlasting life even the body has become spiritual, and enjoys the life of God received through the Spirit; in everlasting torment even the last remains of spirit are entirely absorbed in the body, and thus the condemned man experiences bodily that death, which is the wages of sin. This death is something very different from that perishing of our members, by which the casting them from us is immediately explained. Their present perishing is the means of avoiding that eternal death. And the member which has offended in the sinful life withers away, but is spiritually given back as in a present resurrection.

Finally, let it be observed that the sacrifice of "one of thy members" is demanded, definitely and inexorably it is true, but yet with a certain forbearance towards cases in which man's soft nature would shrink from the exaction of an eye or a hand. He who does not shrink, but accepts it in all its rigor, will evermore experience that it is through many such acts of mortification that the way of life is won. He finds, indeed, at the same time, that this exaction does not proceed once for all from the eye to the hand, but that it is ever beginning anew. As it is intimated in these words, which simply mark the commencement of it, it advances from the hand to the arm, from the arm to the heart, and thus all the members and the whole body must submit, lest as the body of sin it should be cast into hell. And yet such dying is not death, but tends to true life in the overabounding restoration of all that is thus sacrificed. What the Lord says in chap. xviii. 8, 9, concerning the entering into life maimed or with one eye, is spoken in yet stronger and more striking proverbial language, and with yet more condescending accommodation to the position of those addressed; but it has its own deep truth which may be viewed under two aspects, as the hearer may accept it. The old body, as the old, must undergo entirely the process of healing destruction: thus viewed, the language is that of severe irony—Shrink not, at the beginning of thine entrance from becoming maimed or from losing one eye! The new body, however, will be perfectly restored, for all who inherit eternal life: and thus viewed, the language assumes a character of affectionate appeal to their shame—Art thou then foolish enough to think that thou wilt remain halting in the resurrection, or that anything will be wanting to thee in the kingdom of God, which thou mayest have given up in order to enter it?

* Which might literally be the result of an instant cessation from some accustomed vices. How profoundly spiritual, moreover, the application of this mortifying of our members may be made, and how comprehensively it may meet every man's distinctive individuality, may be seen in Oetinger's exposition of plucking out the eye: Does thy studying offend thee, lay it by for a while; just as Paul was blind for a season.

Verses 31, 32. When our Lord turns from a commandment given by God upon Sinai to a civil ordinance connected with it—which latter may be regarded as given by Moses in God's name, but the former rather as given directly by God through Moses—when he passes into another region of law, where its precepts in the nature of the case assume a more transitory character, he designedly adopts that most general and concise expression—It hath been said. Neither Moses is mentioned nor the ἀρχαῖοι, those of old time; although Moses actually spoke what is here briefly quoted from Deut. xxiv. 1. Thus vers. 31 and 43 stand in conjunction: in the former a Mosaic law, and in the latter a human ordinance immediately attached to God's commandment and entirely perverting it, are joined under one general, "It hath been said." For the Lord's saying is opposed in the most comprehensive sense to every kind of false reading, or teaching, or hearing, out of the law. We have observed above that the Mosaic precept concerning the letter of divorce was closely connected with the Sinaitic prohibition of adultery, and by it alone could be rightly explained, the fulfillment of the Mosaic ordinance in its spirit, being itself the abrogation of its letter. Marriage is the most sacred of human relations, in which pure love, that in which one person loves another as himself (Eph. v. 28), finds its highest expression; and impure carnal lust, which conceals in itself the spirit of hatred and destruction of another's personality, its most perfect cure and prevention. So that this question of divorce most appropriately follows in strict connection with ver. 27, as well as with vers. 21 and 22. Marriage is the foundation and nursery of all social relations, and therefore the bond of that civil order which, deranged by sin, is to be re-established through Christ according to the design of the Creator at the beginning of the creation (Mark x. 6). It was quite natural that the letter of the Mosaic law in relation to this would be miserably perverted by sinful men, since every law, in proportion as it descends more directly into the details of common life, becomes more liable to abuse through the spirit of literal interpretation. And here we are encountered by an actually false exposition of the law, in addition to the merely literal acceptation of it; the transition being thus effected from the first to the second department of examples. For what was only a permission is regarded as a law, as if it had been said, Thou shalt, and not merely, Thou mayest, be divorced (ch. xix. 7, 8); whereas divorce was in no other sense tolerated than that in which polygamy was, which is still more directly opposed to the design of God's original creation. The precept was read, expounded and practiced as if it had been written כָּל-דָּבָר, every cause (κατὰ πᾶσαν αἰτίαν, ch. xix. 3), instead of עֶרְוַת דָּבָר, some uncleanness (Deut. xxiv. 1); and thus it was altogether falsified, every thing being made to depend, according to the mind of Moses thus interpreted, upon the the observance of the mere formality of divorce. But as Moses at the beginning took care, in immediate connection with his precept, to prevent that wanton and abominable divorce and remarrying between the same persons which would have been the worst consequence of such perversion (Deut. xxiv. 2–4); so also the last prophet Malachi, who at the close of the Old Testament (iv. 4) enforces the whole law of Moses with its statutes and judgments till the coming of him who was to come, bears similar witnesss against polygamy and divorce, alleging the high example of Abraham. Deal not treacherously, he says, with the wife of thy youth, who is thy companion (helpmeet) and the wife of thy covenant, for the Lord hath been witness between thee and her; that is, in effect, what God hath joined let no man put asunder! (Prov. ii. 17). Take heed to your spirit, he says, that ye apologize not by the letter of the law for your sin against its spirit. "If he hate her, let him put her away, saith the Lord"—that is the wicked language of your own spirit, but it is also said, "Evil will defile his garment, saith the Lord" (Mal. ii. 14–16). Mark here again, that the Sermon on the Mount utters or lays down nothing new, even where it seems most to do so; but where in any sense it annuls the commandment, actually fulfills it in its harmony with the prophets.

As, further, in the Sinaitic commandment the letter of the law was first laid down, which expressed the extremest development of the evil in act (kill instead of hate, commit adultery instead of lust), thus manifesting a condescension to the position of that hardness of heart which would only thus apprehend it at first; so do we also find it in the further statutes and ordinances of the civil law. The spirit of the ordinance to which its letter must give place, is not an abolition of it, but rather its re-establishment in the spirit of the original command—Thou shalt not commit adultery!

Hence we shall sufficiently understand in what sense the Lord speaks when he proceeds—It hath also been said (by Moses), but I say unto you: Divorce either pre-supposes past adultery, or contains and involves it; ye shall not in any case practice divorce! (in the absolute manner of ver. 34, to which indeed this is a transition). He who is divorced from his wife, saving for a λογος (equivalent to דְּבַר in Moses or αἰτία) πορνείας, that is, the cause of fornication in the woman which had already taken place, not only himself commits adultery by his unjustifiable divorce (which is not mentioned, as being self-evident), but is the cause that she also commits adultery through another marriage or illicit intercourse without marriage; especially, however, in the former case, which therefore is additionally explained. The man himself sins who puts away the divorced woman, the woman so divorced sins, and, in addition, the other man who marries her thus divorced; so that from this wantonness of divorce nothing but perpetual fornication can follow—nothing but the weakening, annulling, and contempt of the inviolable sanctity of marriage, which is the essential and distinctive meaning of "adultery."* It is clear that the Lord here designedly says fornication instead of adultery, just as in ver. 28 adultery, on the other hand, included fornication. Yet the expression has a wider scope, and does not, for example, exclude the incontinence of the wife before marriage, if she should not be found a virgin by her husband, or impose upon his paternity an illegitimate child.

But let us see to it that we rightly understand the Lord, and fall not into the same error of a too literal understanding of his new law. Let us take heed that, while he in abolishing fulfills the old law, we do not conversely, in thinking that we fulfill it, abolish the new law which he has given us. What then is the relation of the New Testament age to that of the Old Testament in regard to the law of outward ordinances? It belongs to the perfection of the New Covenant that it contains no longer any external statutes immediately given by God, no theocratic constitution for society and the nation. And wherefore not? Because those who are in the fellowship of the New Covenant stand and live in the Spirit. Thus for these his disciples, so far as they are, or aim to be, perfect, the Lord lays down the original commandment of God's pure ordinance as his own new commandment, doing away with all that conventional license which had been given in condescension to an imperfect state. But only for these, as they have his spirit for its fulfillment. Now if any should pervert the letter of the new legislation for God's spiritual commonwealth to an external use, instead of spiritually subjecting himself to its judgment and rule; if he should impose it as a yoke upon the neck of those who have not yet received the requisite spirit, and thus transform the law of liberty into an ordinance of bondage again; could he be said to deal with it on New Testament principles, and according to that love, which is the abiding and true spirit of all fulfillment of the law and application of the commandment? That would be rather the re-appearance of a New Testament Pharisaism, the Quakerish observance of the Sermon on the Mount, which, in the corresponding aspect of the opposite extreme, coincides with the Catholic externality of the church of Christ. And the well-meaning zealots who would elevate the Lord's command into a church ordinance, have by no means escaped the Catholic error, which goes only one step further beyond the express letter of the Lord's word, and holds every marriage to be indissoluble, forbidding every re-marriage. Wherefore then do they not expound the whole Sermon conformably? Is it the Lord's design then, as the letter of his word plainly seems to run in ver. 34, to abolish swearing as a necessary regulation in imperfect human society? He himself swore! Is it his design in ver. 38 to banish the jus talionis, which is the divine basis of all requiting justice, from the tribunals of Christendom? No, he will not abolish in matters to which it must ever appertain, the rule laid down in Lev. xxiv. 19, 20, any more than what is said in Exod. xxi. 12: He that smiteth a man, so that he die, shall surely be put to death. As the law in its Sinaitic letter condemning sin continues its function in the Gospel, so also does the law as wisely restraining sin in the Mosaic ordinances. Is it the Lord's design to forbid to his disciples in his discourse (vers. 39–42) all protection of themselves, their interests, or their property; and to impose upon them such all-endurance and all-abandonment as would require them to go out of the world in which they must nevertheless live? He has himself obviated this gloss, for he did not turn the other cheek! and as all this is to be understood, so also is his word concerning divorce. The unconditional ordinance, which the Mosaic account of the creation reveals, runs in simple terms—Let no man put asunder! (ch. xix. 6). Now, if sin or fornication has sundered, may not enduring patience and forgiving love join them together again? God himself in his covenant of grace takes back again that which was separated from him. Or, if adultery has been committed, may not the unoffending consort retain the offending one in the bond of love, and receive her back if penitent? The Christian church from the beginning has determined that he may, and practiced accordingly.* And God himself takes back his adulterous people to himself, becomes anew the husband of the adulteress (Hos. ii. 1–20), and continues to do himself what he has forbidden in his precept (Jer. iii. 1). But we should, and we must love perfectly, as our Father in heaven loves. So if thou wilt be perfect, thou must not divorce even on account of fornication. Wherefore, while we find once more in Matt. xix. 9, "except for fornication," παρεκτὸς λόγου πορνείας (in another expression), it is wanting in the parallel passage (Mark x. 11, 12) as well as when the Lord a third time alludes to it (Luke xvi. 17, 18). This is not accidental, but an intimation of the Spirit which goes beyond the letter. The Lord constrains us, by this change of the letter, to understand its meaning spiritually: for both are true; on the one hand that fornication, or any infidelity, gives the right of divorce, since that has already in effect taken place; but that also on the other, neither the man nor the woman in the church of Christ ought, generally speaking, to exercise that right. When the apostle, again, having the Spirit of God, quotes the Lord's word with emphasis in ver. 10 of 1 Cor. vii., and then immediately after, in ver. 15, gives his more liberal decision (not by commandment, but, on account of sin and infirmity, by permission), that a separated person, having been left and repudiated by the unbelieving partner, might marry again; is not that also a no less manifest intimation how this commandment of the Lord is to be understood, and that it is not to be carried out literally in all its rigor and literal compulsion in the external church, mixed up as it is with heathenism? What then, finally, is fornication and adultery in our Lord's mouth? Shall we be willing to limit the word just in this place to the gross act, after he himself has in ver. 27, 28, immediately preceding, expounded it otherwise? Will the Lord abate from the עֶרְוַת דָּבָר, "some uncleanness," which is written in Moses, one jot or one tittle; will he not rather provide for its being retained, like the whole law, but for right use? (ἐάν τις αὐτῷ νομίμως χρῆται, 1 Tim. i. 8.) What other shameful things of various kinds might not in Christian matrimony be brought forward as a ground of divorce equally valid with the accomplished act of infidelity!*

* It is clear to us, that ἀπολελυμένην, "divorced," signifies only the unlawfully divorced; and thus that the re-marriage of one put away because of adultery, lies under no prohibition here. We find in this no such "obscurum," as Augustine in the place here cited by Alford, De fide atque oper. c. xix.

* Though not always, for in the Const. Apost vi. 15 we find: Ὁ κατέχων τὴν παραφθαρεῖσαν φύσεως θεσμοῦ παράνομος. Luther on the other hand confidently urges that the unoffending party should forgive. Hengstenberg (on Hosea) speaks of great criminality on his part, if he do not use every means to bring about repentance and reconciliation.

Our Lord's new law of marriage, consequently, like all the laws of the Sermon on the Mount, is not uttered with design to abolish the wholesome relaxation contained in the Mosaic institution of divorce, viewed according to its original spirit. It does not intend to do away with it once for all by a compulsion which works from without inwardly, but by a fulfillment of its design working gradually from within outwardly. This is its true relation, conformably with God's will, in every external national church down to the present day. The secular law of the state (albeit Christian), and no less the ecclesiastical statute also (which should not be violently sundered from the state), not only may exercise a Mosaic forbearance, but must do so, where the same reasons are pre-supposed as those for which the Lord by Moses exercised it. "Divorce may no more be removed than the oath." It is impossible that Christ should command marriages sinfully contracted, such as were properly no marriages and therefore dissolved themselves, to be made binding by force; and equally so that he should intend to oppose the sin which might afterwards break in, by any thing but the power of the Spirit. When severity, through the infirmity of the flesh, might aggravate the evil, he still may relax the law. For such ordinances of nature, as this—Man shall not divorce! are in their externality not on a level with the commandments of holiness uttered on Sinai, which are fulfilled inwardly in the spirit, and which alone unconditionally admit of no relaxation. The external church, which in a sense is still partly after the spirit of the Old Testament, condescends, like Christ himself, to sinners in many ways, with all its severity of testimony; and has for the unconverted a confirmation, for the unworthy (whom she in most cases has not the power to judge) a Eucharist, a marriage service for those who come in wanton carnality to marriage; but she must give up all this, and by a licensed civil marriage separate herself in this also from the state, if her doctrine of divorce were otherwise. A presbytery, synod, or consistory, standing to mediate between the law and the Gospel, bears witness of the commandment of Christ, with all the spiritual force of his words, to the consciences of those who should hear it; but those who insist upon separation, even when no future marriage can take place, are sundered and granted a bill of divorce—for their hardness of heart! and the Church under certain circumstances may have a blessing for the second marriage of those who are thus separated, bestowed upon them in the hope that now the true grace of matrimony may find its true New Testament entrance into their hearts.

The false interpretation of the law more distinctively considered now follows, as the developed result of this literal acceptation of it. Of the three examples which are given in illustration two are taken, as we have already shown, from the civil code, and one from the law of holiness. Viewed yet more closely, the first two deal with our words and deeds, the third with our disposition of mind. Thus the error is exhibited as advancing from a too close and insincere straining of the letter of the precept first, onwards to the complete perversion and destruction of its meaning, such as is seen in the antithesis which is unscrupulously added in ver. 43, and which entirely subverts the precept of love with which vers. 21–26 set out. The first example concerning our words goes back in its ultimate allusion to the Sinaitic precept—Thou shalt not bear false witness, not speak falsely; but conjoins this with the commandment of the first table which forbids the taking God's name in vain; and mentions particularly swearing or a protesting use of that holy name. The false exposition or application of this Mosaic ordinance borders upon a too strict adherence to its letter; but the perfect disciple of Christ in reality stands by that ordinance. In ver. 33, we have the letter of the ordinance, with an intimation of that abuse which being well-known is not directly mentioned; as was the case in vers. 27, 31, after the pattern of ver. 21. Against this is set vers. 34–37, what in a certain sense may be considered a new and severer rule, yet perfectly in the spirit of the old one: The disciple of Christ need not in general swear at all! although he may, on account of evil (having to do with the sin and untruthfulness of the world), swear by God, yet is he never to do this without strict necessity and solemn earnestness. By things independent of God (and here was the Pharisaic abuse of swearing most manifest, particular examples being named of their perversion) he may not swear at all! Neither by things out of himself (heaven, or earth, or Jerusalem, the place in which both meet), which are altogether God's; nor by any thing in himself, since his head (his life) and even his hair (the highest individual thing belonging to him) is also and only God's. For the disciple of Christ must speak the simple truth in its most simple possible expression.

* Maintaining this, we are not perplexed by any such rigorous views as Sixt has lately once more defended (Stud. u. Kr. 1845, 3.) The Kirchliche Vierteljahrsschrift declares its agreement with us, and Rothe's Ethik often quotes us with approbation.

This general analysis would give a clue to thinking minds for all that should follow; but however anxious we might be to keep these hints within concise limits, they must become here a little more diffuse, on account of the evil of false interpretation, which underlies, even in Christendom, the word of Christ.

Verse 33. The πάλιν which now meets us, equivalent strictly to again in English, indicates the commencement of another series of examples of a different kind, as an arrangement of the discourse has already shown. It speaks once more of our words, as ver. 22 did; for in word as well as in deed our holy dispotions must manifest themselves, and perfection excludes every sinful word as well as act (James iii. 2). Our speech must be sanctified in truth, as our deeds in love. But that which the ἀρχαίοι, "those of old time," in this matter taught the people, as if out of the law, did not immediately and directly refer to the decalogue, but to the Mosaic ordinance concerning oaths and vows given to the holy commonwealth of Israel. This, indeed, is yet more closely connected with the second (properly the third) commandment of the first table, than the ordinance concerning the letter of divorce was with the seventh—Thou shalt not commit adultery! Yet the Lord does not directly cite Exod. xx. 7 as he had done Exod. xx. 13 and 14; but he makes what we may term a collective-citation of the Mosaic ordinances, designedly changing the expression* in doing so—because it is not what was written there that he opposes, but its incorrect apprehension. He refers to Lev. xix. 12; Numb. xxx. 3; Deut. xxiii. 21, of which the last two places deal more especially with promissoriis or vows. The first passage connects itself immediately with the decalogue—Thou shalt not desecrate the holy Name; in the other two also τῷ Κυρίῳ, "the Lord," is expressly inserted; hence arose the false interpretation, that an ἐπιορκεῖν, "forswearing," consisted only in the express mention of the divine name, and the consequent shameful abuse of other kinds of frivolous and deceitful protestations. This unrighteous limitation our Lord indicates in the concluding sentence which he cites; Ἀποδώσεις δὲ τῷ Κυρίῳ τοὺς ὅρκους σου, "But shalt perfom unto the Lord thine oaths;" i.e.—Thus you have heard it said out of the law, as if only to the Lord was signified! If we place οὐκ ἐπιορκήσεις, "thou shalt not forswear," in juxtaposition with οὐ φονεύσεις, "thou shalt not kill;" ver. 33 will here have a meaning similar to that of ver. 21: Ye vainly think that killing only is murder, and that only a lying and faithless abuse of the holy Name is perjury. But as the letter of the law in the former case had reference in its spirit to perfect love in disposition, so in the latter it refers to perfect truth in word.

Verses 34—36. Μὴ ὀμόσαι ὅλως, "Swear not at all," that is, assuredly, by all means, generally or absolutely swear not. To expunge the comma between ὅλως, "at all," and μήτε, "neither," and read: Absolutely not by heaven, earth, Jerusalem, or the head—is, whether we regard the language or the matter, extremely forced, yea, decidedly false; for it overlooks the sharply defined antithesis between μὴ ὅλως, "not at all," taken by itself, and the simple οὐκ ἐπι-ορκήσεις, "thou shalt not for-swear." And in any case there would still remain in ver. 37 the unconditional prohibition of every word that went beyond Yea and Nay—consequently of any oath. To say with Stäudlin (Geschichte der Vortstellungen und Lehren vom Eide) that the apostles afterwards in their permission of the judicial oath deviated from the Lord's interdict, does not touch the point. But what, then, is the relation of these, one to the other?

That Christ forbids to his disciples as such, and in their intercourse one with another, every form of protestation, including God's name; that he abolishes them al as useless, because without their aid his disciples should speak the truth, is most manifest, in spite of all invalidating misinterpretation; hence James (ch. v. 12) thus repeats the Lord's commandment: μήτε ἄλλον τινὰ ὅρκον, "nor any other oath;" yet more irrefragably strengthening his Master's μὴ ὅλως, "not at all." But are we therefore, with a Quakerism which is only the re-appearance of Pharisaism on the spiritual side, to set up externally the spiritual law of Christ alone and contrary to its spirit in the midst of an evil world; to apply the perfect ordinances of Christ for his perfect ones to the regulation of churches and states which are in a condition in which imperfection so largely mingles? and may we, similarly, thus summarily send abroad peace in the earth (ch. x. 34), where yet the angels' word (Luke ii. 14) must excite conflict among men? The Christian should not divorce, but on account of fornication he does it, and it is then not a divorce which proceeded from himself, but the outward expression of one that had already unhappily taken place. The Christian should not utter "Raca" or "Fool," as the language of hatred or anger, but, nevertheless, on account of the vileness and foolishness of men, he may, in his holy hatred of sin and in the anger of his zealous love, term them what they are, even children of the devil. So also he swears and confirms his word by oath on account of the deceitfulness and incredulity of men, and the strife which thence arises; and this he can all the more readily do, as all his words should be and are Yea or Nay—words of truth spoken before God, that is to say, oaths. Consequently in the perfect kingdom of God the oath-ordinance ceases simply because the oath has no longer a distinctive or special force, beyond any other utterance of a man's mind. Hence, again, it is written by the apostle, and his words are not a relaxation of the Lord's prohibition, but when rightly understood actually include it, just as that prohibition itself includes some such abatement as the apostle's seems to be: "Men verily swear by the greater, and an oath to them is an end of all strife"—a confirmation of truth and love, only the Yea and Nay more effectually said (Heb. vi. 16). That can by no means be wicked or sinful in itself, since God himself, on account of our unbelief, oftentimes swears by himself (Heb. vi. 13, 17, vii. 21; Isa. xlv. 23, &c.); since the Son of God incarnate not only takes a judicial oath (Matt. xxvi. 63, 64), but even in this Sermon on the Mount, as also elsewhere, appends his Amen to his words; since the holy angels (Rev. x. 6) swear by him that liveth for ever, and the apostles frequently by the Lord whose coming they announce. As Christ, according to ver. 17, does not destroy the Law and the Prophets, so neither does he abolish that unconditional toleration of the oath which we find in the Old Testament. The Sinaitic commandment permits and enjoins the right use of the name of God, in that it condemns its profane abuse; in Deut. vi. 13, x. 20, the swearing by his name is actually commanded to Israel as the avowal of his worship; in Psa. xv. 4, swearing and changing not, is attributed to the true and spiritual Israel; and, finally, in the prophets, Jer. xxiii. 8, Isa. lxv. 16 swearing by the God of their deliverance, by the God of truth, is vindicated for the distant future of his kingdom. Consequently the εἰκῇ, in vain, too harshly rejected in ver. 22, may be added also in this connection, if it be rightly and spiritually understood. As pure love would prefer to say "Brother" only, if for that brother's sake "Raca" is not necessary, so pure truth would prefer the simple Yea and Nay, if stronger confirmation were not necessary in order to its overcoming the falsehood to which it is opposed.

*Ἐπιορκεῖν is not found in the LXX. canonical Old Testament—only in Wisd. xiv. 28. Similarly for נְדָרִים, the LXX. never have ὅρκοι but εὐχαί

We should certainly be very far from discerning or exhausting the full meaning of Christ, if we regarded him as merely prohibiting that profuse and frivolous swearing to which the Jews were addicted in common life, in contradistinction to judicial swearing. That might be the preparatory instruction for catechumens, whose apprehension could go no further. There might, indeed, be light swearing even in a court of justice, and the Christian man "in common life" may stand and make his appeal to the judgment-seat of God, if there be need. Yet assuredly Christ in what follows does take account of the customs of his age, and draws his examples from them. It is his design to exhibit and to condemn Pharisaism in the aspect which it assumed before his eyes. "As heaven and earth pass away, so pass away all vows by heaven and earth," was a saying uttered in Israel at that time. Thus while they abused the name of his throne and footstool, yet because they barely evaded the name of God itself, they dared to think that they avoided the lie and the sin! Thus they forgot that heaven and earth should be changed but not pass away; that they were rather to become more plainly manifest, the heaven as the throne of God's glory, this lower earth as his footstool, before which all his enemies should be bowed down. Hence Christ, designedly sustaining his word by Scripture (Isa. lxvi. 1), traces back all such formulas, here as in ch. xxiii. 16–22, to the name of God; and by so doing gives us in his wisdom much else to reflect upon (let Isa. lxvi. be read carefully again). After heaven and earth have embraced the whole universe of the first creation, he most significantly mentions further the holy Jerusalem (Rev. xxi. 1, 2), as the type of the new creation of grace which brings heaven down to earth, designating it out of Scripture as the city of the great King, which is himself.* It is in direct contradiction with the rightly understood meaning of the oath generally, if I, instead of mentioning his name, by whom we swear, simply because heaven and earth, and Jerusalem especially (as a citizen of which I know his name), are his; if I, instead of naming this great Ruler of the creation and King in his city, make mention of some particular portions greater or less of his kingdom, and think that I thereby avoid mentioning him, and that this effects him not! As if aught could have significance when conceived of independently of God, so that to swear by it without thinking of God were reasonable and right, or that such an oath might innocently be trifled with! The God of truth, who will not let his name be falsely used, will not permit any particle of dust in all his universe to be thus dealt with. If I indeed know his name, then must I also know that heaven and earth are his, as well as I know that my head and its hair belong to me, though not essentially and only to me. When I pass from things out of myself (things which in their true sense are holy, being sanctified by God), to myself, and swear by myself; there is more significance in this than the former, though that significance is altogether godless, since I thus regard myself as my own, pluck self from the authority of God, and wickedly usurp God's own prerogative—to swear by himself.* "By my head"—borders closely upon—"By my life! By my soul! As I live!" and then the sin becomes most manifest, for none of us liveth to himself. But even the smallest hair of the head or the beard (by which they also swore in the East) is not mine, as I may soon discover if I attempt to change its color by my own power, though this is still less than making one hair grow.† I may, indeed, with deceitful dyes give it a brighter or darker tincture, but nature reasserts its original color in the hair which grows afterwards. I can no more make other hair grow the length of a line, than add a span to the measure of my life (ch. vi. 27). We see, consequently, that Christ here interdicts to his disciples first, all swearing generally, even by the name of God, inasmuch as it is enjoined upon them as their perfection to speak perpetual truth in the name of God, without the necessity of any confirming appendage whatever. As the consequence of this, the oath which protects truth is supposed to be abolished in the intercourse of Christians by an influence working from within outwards, just as the locks and bolts which protect against thieves. Secondly and especially is forbidden all swearing by things independently of God, be they appertaining to ourselves or otherwise; because we should think of God and give his name its honor in the mention of all his creatures; because he only has and he only is the confirming Amen of all truth; because his name only is above the Yea of any creature.‡ Finally is prohibited all inconsiderate and useless swearing, all confirmation and corroboration of our Yea and Nay without cause. As this was miserably current in the Pharisaic Israel of that age, so it attests the hypocrisy of men in every age: for by adding such strengthening appendages to our discourse, we confess ourselves to be, without them, untrustworthy.* But when adequate reason for an oath occurs, it is not only permitted but even commanded, as a service to God and our neighbor, to corroborate our plain words by such confirmation as may maintain the truth and advance the cause of charity. Consequently the judicial oath of the Christian citizen is justified under such circumstances, as well as the oath with which the apostle, the preacher, the disciple may solemnly confirm his testimony.† He who, in what he is constrained to say before man, looks up in his spirit to God as his witness, may and indeed ought openly to avow it. The true New Testament oath, however, must ever retain its own formula—I call God for a record upon my soul (2 Cor. i. 23). On the other hand the formula—"So help me God"—if it mean, "Otherwise may he not help me! May God punish me!" though under the old covenant of the law's severity it might have been tolerated ("The Lord do so to me!"), must under the covenant of grace be absolutely avoided as being a self-willed invasion of the future, like the language of Cain (Gen. iv. 13).

* Hamann contra Mendelssohn (see his Works, by Roth, vii. 120), found, and not without some grounds for it, a far-reaching meaning of general significance in this prohibition to name Jerusalem needlessly and irreverently.

Verse 37. Our communication should be Yea on the lips where Yea is in the heart, Nay on the lips where Nay is in the heart, and therefore sincere, not like the devil's or the liar's, or what according to Shakespeare is "no good divinity," consisting of Yea-nay and Nay-yea. This is the first and most obvious meaning. But then it must be only Yea or Nay, that is, of course, not just necessarily this little word, but affirmative or negative without περισσόν or "more," without any superfluous corroborating additions, therefore simple and definite: What I say I say and believe, and let me be trusted! James' expression embraces both (ver 12): The more sincerely we speak, the more simply also shall we be able to speak, since others will have learned to rely upon our word. Further there should only be Yea or Nay in our speech and in our heart, where there is Yea or Nay in the thing itself, as it is before God, as the eternal truth of God says Yea or Nay: consequently our communication must be true, according to the reality of the matter we speak of, so far at least as with our best ability and in good conscience we can discern it. Finally, for this cannot be excluded, more particularly as the discourse

* As Cæsar by the "Fortuna Cæsaris," and the young Doria in Schiller's Fiesco with his "Donner und Doria!"

† But we much doubt whether this is to be regarded (with Sepp) as meaning that they swore: "May I become gray, if it be not so!"

‡ To swear by the life of the king, Pharaoh or Solomon, was in a sense tolerated in the Old Testament as being a type, which referred to the greater, the only King (Psa. lxiii. 12).

* It is worthy of remark that the ἐπιορκεῖν which is here used meant originally to swear merely, or to swear often, and thence naturally passed in its signification to false swearing—just as oaths, the more frequent they are, the more frequently are they perjuries also.

† Indeed "the sanctity of the solemn adjuration is exalted by the prohibition of common and gratuitous swearing," as Von Gerlach says. Compare also Rothe's theory in his Ethik, iii. 576-586, which agrees with my exposition.

had just run upon the keeping our word and vow; we may not afterwards say Nay, where we had previously said Yea, or the reverse, and consequently our communication must be consistent and steadfast and trustworthy (2 Cor. i. 17). Thus does the Lord set before us, himself using the simplest possible form of words, the ideal model of what the holy speech of God's children might be and should be, if the sin that is in the world and their own remaining sinfulness be left out of the question. It does, indeed, exclude even the oath by the name of God, and relatively abolish it; but it is not unconditionally done away, for after the preceding words μὴ ὀμόσαι ὅλως, "swear not at all," this, as being the only oath permissible, was not expressly mentioned. What then is the meaning of the following position? It evidently modifies the former part of the sentence. The literal observance of the former clause is necessarily connected with a false interpretation of the latter, as if the Lord had said—Whatsoever is more than these is sin. But this he did not say, nor could he have said it, without subverting the system of the world as arranged since the entering in of sin, and reflected in the law of Moses; nor, indeed, without condemning himself. Not only is every oath a περισσόν, "something more," but so also is the Amen of Christ which strengthens the Yea (2 Cor. i. 20), and even that second Yea which on this occasion the Lord adds to the first. Every confirming addition of any kind may be said to be only a second, more emphatically repeated Yea. All this cometh of evil, the Lord says: and we are not to understand ὁ πονηρός, the wicked one, as immediately referred to in this place. (As also not in ch. vi. 13; John xvii. 15; comp. Rom. xii. 9; 1 Thess. v. 22.) Often enough it does, indeed, spring from the sin, the evil that is in the speaker himself, just as "Raca" springs from his malevolent anger, and divorce from his own infidelity. But not always: the speaker may thus utter in truth and in love, what is forced upon him by the world's sin, with which he has necessarily to do; just as the manifold and incessant protestations which pervade the entire Holy Scripture must be accounted for. Such conformation is consequently permitted and necessary, that is, where and so far as it is directed against evil. The "Yea, yea" and "Nay, nay" of God, which his servants must maintain and protest against the Nay-yea and the Yea-nay of wickedness, comes not, therefore, in an evil sense from the evil of him who utters it, although it is spoken on account of evil and therefore may be said to originate in evil; it is essentially good in itself and cometh of good, even of the very zeal of the good to overcome the evil.

The second example, passing from the word of truth to the work of love, has reference to the Mosaic judicial ordinances concerning revenge, which had been subject to a still worse interpretation and application than the former. For although before the tribunal of the sinner's Judge a strict and righteous requital or retaliation of evil inflicted will take place; yet it is both perverse and perverting to appropriate to oneself the prerogative of such requital in private life. The Lord gives a fundamental example, which illustrates strikingly the relation of the external, legal ordinance, to the internal fulfillment of the law according to its spirit—Christian love. The disciple of Christ should, in patience or passive love to his enemy, rise superior to all revenge for the evil inflicted on him: and this forms the wisely preparatory transition to the injunction which follows, of active love towards our enemies, as being the sum and end of the spiritual law, loving as God loves The Lord first specifies the falsely applied and wickedly misunderstood law of Moses, by simply quoting its letter just as in ver. 31, pre-supposing and intending that misunderstanding and perversion of it, as the contrast which follows makes evident. He commands his disciples rather to endure evil or injustice; first, by a general prohibition of resistance, and then by a corresponding command, which expressly and precisely indicates the spirit which he requires, by the act which is the test of it. To do this he lays down three significantly chosen examples, and closes by a requirement, ver. 42, which being in its letter incapable of being fulfilled, draws our minds from the literal to a spiritual acceptation of it, and leads the way to the active love of our enemies.

Verse 38. These words occur thrice in the law of Moses: first, among the first fundamental precepts given to Moses immediately after the Decalogue and still upon the mount (Exod. xxi. 23–25); where it is defined by what rule the arbitrators shall be guided in a particular case (and the proverbial maxim goes on—Hand for hand, foot for foot, wound for wound): then in Lev. xxiv. 19, 20, where the general judicial law for injuries, and their compensation is laid down—If a man cause a blemish to his neighbor; as he hath done, so shall it be done to him: finally, once more in Deut. xix. 21, where this principle is laid down with reference to a particular case, not being one of injury, as a rule of proportion to be rigorously applied—Thine eye shall not spare! To administer this compensation of like for like, is entrusted to the judges as אֱלֹהִים or "gods;" for it is and must ever be the fundamental law of the eternal and divine government of the world, and as such is confirmed afterwards by our Lord in ch. vii. 2. Consequently it is not our Lord's design in what he now says to condemn the application in every commonwealth of this perfect rule of justice,* which provides against all excess or deficiency in punishment, for judgment and justice are to be administered in the name of God by the magistracy in every human society, and the pattern of that administration in every state must be sought for in the government of the great King over his people. What he designs to condemn is the reading and enforcing and obeying the statute, as if it had been written—He, the injured man, may exact like for like from his neighbor, in the exercise of a private revenge which is guided by hatred and anger. As even king Solomon in his time, though not unmindful of what appertained to magisterial authority and judgment, knew how to teach it in his exhortation—Say not, I will do so to him as he has done to me; say not thou, I will recompense evil: but wait on the Lord, and he shall save thee (Prov. xxiv. 29, xx. 22; compare Ecclus. xxviii. 1–3). So that the Lord here again utters nothing new, but that which Moses and the prophets had already uttered; in confirmation of which consult further Lev. xix. 18, and mark what is there said in connection with that other law which the Lord is about to bring forward in ver. 43. Our exposition may now become more and more brief, since this example has found in part its illustration in the two preceding; and the three great fundamental principles for the understanding of the Sermon on the Mount are now firmly established in our minds; viz., that the Lord does not abolish the law, but fulfills it; that he only demands a perfect obedience to it from his own, through the power and grace which his fulfillment of it has obtained; and that his requirements to that end are by no means to be externally and literally put in practice in this evil world and mingled Christendom, but all the Mosaic laws and ordinances continue also to hold their place. And if in these we find the idea of law as opposed to Gospel, and of strict right as the antithesis of patient, forgiving love, made prominent; so also will it be made clear that in the present condition of this world, love can only very gradually and in restricted measure have its perfect exhibition; nay, rather, that while the children of God are supposed to possess the spirit of patience, they must, even for love's sake, maintain and enforce punitive and protective law.

* Especially, of course, directed against the excess, though not that alone as Augustine supposed Non fomes sed limes furoris est (Contra Faust. xix 25).

Verses 39—41. Τῷ πονηρῷ is not to be understood as in the masculine, the evil one, the Injurer, any more than in ver. 37. The expression is indeed related in the two verses, but it advances the meaning here, for τὸ πονηρόν is not so much evil or sin, as the evidence of it in the injury and injustice actually inflicted upon myself. We must of course oppose the sinner as such, and his sin, even as we resist the Devil, the wicked one whose malignity shows itself in each individual sinner (James iv. 7). Τὸ πονηρόν is the fundamental principle generally of that evil which opposes, injures, oppresses and burdens the children of God in the world. Thus is chap. vi. 13 to be understood, where misery, and sin its cause, are united in one grand and comprehensive expression; as, on the other hand, in Rom. xii. 21 τὸ κακόν makes prominent the evil distinctively, as sin, yet not without including its consequent suffering. The fundamental words and ideas of Scripture must be apprehended in all their depth and universality of meaning first, and then their distinct and critical meaning in individual passages will obviously and naturally present itself. To resist not evil! So does the Lord absolutely, in the infinitive mood, lay down the law of his kingdom for his disciples. What means this ἀντιστῆναι, to resist or to oppose? Were the word expunged, we should probably, looking at the connection, supply its place and its meaning by render back like for like, or retaliate; and this is the actual signification of the passage. As we might say: Ye shall not put yourselves in opposition (ἀντιτάσσεσθαι, James v. 6), not strike again, not revile again, not take again (ver. 38), not inflict injury, in retaliation for injury, or in defence against it. This latter is necessarily involved, inasmuch as he who thus defends himself, anticipates the functions of the magistrate. (If we could requite without reference to self, not in our own person but in the stead of God, then might every man be his own blood-avenger and arbiter.) The three examples, which illustrate the general position, are so selected as to descend from the worse evil to the less: actual personal assault, spoliation of property, forcible constraint to a service not due. The Lord, indeed, refers only to things comparatively unimportant, in order that his words may find their easy application to ordinary life. He does not begin, for instance, with the dashing out of the eye or the teeth, or with any such wounds and bruises;* for the sentiment and conscience which his word necessarily awakes, testifies against the instant exercise of private personal vengeance in such cases, as being sinful and like the haughty violence of Cain (Gen. iv. 23: I have slain in my retaliation a man who wounded me!): but he would teach us, that we must also patiently receive the smiting on the cheek, without permitting ourselves even in things so slight as this, any measure of self-revenge or retaliation. This is one side of the case: according to another view, however, the slighter injury is oftentimes more irritating and more fraught with temptation than the greater, since we are led by the natural impulse of fear to retire before the enkindled rage of one who would assault us, unless our own rage be as hot and violent as his. In this case it is not so much the pain which is to be taken into account, as the shame of a scornful insult: hence among all people, and in all times, smiting upon the cheek has been in proverbial use in such a sense as this (see in the Old Testament, Lam. iii. 30; Job xvi. 19; Isa. l. 6; and in the New 2 Cor. xi. 20). The general usage which puts the members of the right side first, will explain the circumstance that the right cheek is mentioned first, and not the left, which would receive a blow administered by the right hand: in Luke the one and the other are used instead. Immeasurably more important than such a remark as this is the rigid and most impressive contrast which must be noticed between the requirements—Turn to him the other also! and that heathenish law of honor, which will not accept the very slightest indignity, but even in the midst of modern Christendom, demands the duel itself. To this point d'honneur stands opposed the patient acceptance and endurance of insult, as the genuine Christian courage and knightly honor. Offer him the other also—that is, in thy heart, and in the disposition of thy mind; calmly and patiently wait if he may strike thee another blow, and be ready to receive that also; so far let thy spirit be from opposing, or declining or avoiding it! This is all that the Lord intends to say by this emphatic expression, the figurative, proverbial letter of which must be understood in its spirit, just as we saw in a similar case before; for the actual turning of the other cheek might be no other than a challenge to continued sin, consequently itself sinful, and opposed to the love of our neighbor. There might even be a proud despite in it, or a mere hypocritical affectation. Christ interprets his own word by his own act, in John xviii. 22, 23, where he gives to the rude officer a gracious word of gentle admonition in return for his blow, which, according to Isa. l. 6, the Lord's Spirit would, however, have suffered him to repeat. The inquiry in the next example is of little importance as to the relation between the χιτῶν, "coat," and the ἱμάτιον, "cloak," used conversively in Luke vi. 29, which gives a slightly different presentation of the discourse. We must regard Matthew the apostle as giving the more precise words of our Lord; the Spirit in Luke, in another grade of inspiration, teaches us that literal exactness in such details is not strictly necessary. Luke's view is more general, referring to an actual seizure (αἴρειν), and this begins from the outside garment (Mic. ii. 8, in the Heb.); but Matthew's refers to an unrighteous process at law (κριθῆναι), to obtain possession of the property; and the closer body-garment is therefore first mentioned, because the law of Moses contemplated the taking of the outer garment also, as the last and most aggravated evil* (Exod. xxii. 26, 27). So that it means: If any one would unrighteously rob thee (τῷ θέλοντι), and aims to do it under the impudent guise of right; even if it touches thy necessary clothing as nearly as the blow on the cheek touches thine honor, thou must rather be entirely stripped than manifest a disposition, in the spirit of discord and violence and personal enmity, to defend thy rights at law. We cannot but understand, however, that this speaks of express outward conduct (which could not always be externally maintained), only as the figure and the test of an inward disposition, which should ever be prepared so to act. To every one who would go to law revengefully, selfishly, stubbornly, or out of a weak devotion to this world's good, it may be said, as the apostle wrote to the Corinthians, "There is yet utterly a fault among you (ἥττημα); why do ye not rather take wrong? why do ye not rather suffer yourselves to be defrauded?" (1 Cor. vi. 7). But if thou art conscious of the indwelling of forbearing love in thy heart, that very consciousness will enable thee, with all the more propriety, to withstand the sin which would wrong thee by defence of law, and hold fast thy property, as God's steward, for a better use.* The ἀγγαρεύειν, again (to demand service as messenger or guide, to lay claim to it by force as the only right; a word which passed from the Persian usage and speech into other languages, since the same thing every where takes place, Matt. xxii. 32, where this word occurs, being an example), violently trespasses upon personal rights, so that a high spirited and unloving man might well defend himself against it with all his might, on the common principle—Thou hast no authority to demand this of me, I am not under obligation to render thee this! It might indeed, in some circumstances, interfere exceedingly with one's own wishes and business. But yet it is, in comparison with the blow on the cheek and the robbery of one's garment, the lesser thing, and therefore the Lord's injunction is more imperative—Art thou compelled to go one mile, go with him twain! shouldst thou serve any one for an hour in any matter, add yet another hour! This goes beyond the mere negative endurance that went before, and with ver. 42 begins already the transition to the exhibition of active love, ver. 44. Say to the impetuous maker of the demand, but say it with thy heart as well as with thy lips—Although I am not bound by any obligation of external right or law, yet am I, according to the spirit and law of love, both willing and obliged to serve thee and every man; that which thou art disposed to enforce from me, I will do for thee in free will and in double measure, preventing thy sin by my kindness! Such conduct is actually practicable in many cases; and how effectual is the rebuke it administers, how it tends to peacemaking and the prevention of sin!

* Hence Braune speaks at least without sufficient precision when he says that bodily injury stands first, because it is hardest to bear and most swiftly provokes revenge.

Yet it is not the Lord's will, when such a motive is out of the question, or anything else might stand in the way, to impose it upon

* Roos thinks, that perverters of the law having no conscience, might have taken away the lesser garment, imagining that so the letter of the Mosaic law would not be transgressed.

* Kieuker: "Where Christ's aim is attainable, there the means to it becomes a duty—that is, though Christ specifies it not, where such means are means really to that end; and where the spirit of Christ's aim cannot be attained, the mere mockery of the means to it, is unreal and unnatural, even though seemingly coming under the Lord's specification."

his disciples as an absolute necessity to render every service that may in this evil world be demanded of them, any more than he requires them to allow all their property to be taken from them, or to tolerate every kind of personal insult. He enjoins only the requisite disposition of mind. As he himself often before his hour was come, withdrew from the sinners who assailed him and hid himself; as he counseled his disciples to flee before persecution (ch. x. 23); as Paul availed himself of his rights as a citizen, and made his appeal unto Cæsar; so it is permitted also to us to do in all respects the same, and even indicated to us as better so to do, for the sake of the world's sin, even though we would sincerely prefer to suffer. The Jews made the regulations of public justice the rule of private life; but Christians must not elevate the sacred private prerogatives of love into statute law before the time. The spirit which this would require being absent, nothing but disorder can follow. As the office of the magistrate continues in existence for punishment of evil and protection from wrong, it is our right and our duty to avail ourselves of it. However willingly I might suffer myself to be smitten, so far as myself and my cheek are concerned, yet I must maintain also the honor of that office, and not let presumptuous outrage go unpunished. I have not the less fulfilled the Lord's command in its spirit, though I make my appeal and go to law for my right, being compelled thereto by another's wrong, and resigning myself patiently to litigation, which is directly opposed to my principles of forbearance.* Even absolute self-defence is not excluded, where a man assumes the office of judge himself: it is observable that the Lord did not say—If any man will kill thee, defend not thyself, but let it be so! There remain cases quite sufficient in which patience may have her perfect work, and Solomon's word may have its force—Wait on the Lord and he shall help thee; as well as Christ's example, who committed himself to him that judgeth righteously. "A father says to his children: Bear what your brothers or sisters may do to you, and hurt them not in return; will one of them take away your fruit, give him your bread also rather than engage in quarrel with him. But it is tacitly understood that the father means—I will presently compensate the patient child, and visit the wrong upon the other."† The Lord will render judgment and justice to all who suffer wrong; vengeance is his, he will repay, and that in the full measure of the most rigorous jus talionis.

To these three examples of deepening wrong which is inflicted upon us, the Lord adds yet another word, which requires a more profound consideration than at first sight appears. Asking seems obviously after demanding to be an inversion of the order; for it is the gentlest kind of desire, which acknowleges my right and submits to my volition. The Lord's saying, indeed, is in the same strain with that of Moses in Deut. xv. 7–11, where it is commanded to lend and give to the poor brethren, and forbidden to harden the heart or shut the hand against them; just as it is commanded by the apostle, 1 John iii. 17. Compare also Ecclus. iv. 4, xxix. 2; Tob. iv. 7; in harmony with which passages we have here the admonitory: Turn not thou away! Yet this asking may be in an imperative style; and many ungodly ones are eager enough to borrow, who never think of repaying (Psa. xxxvii. 21). Must I then be ever giving and giving, contrary to all propriety, encouraging every hardy beggar; and must I suffer to be begged and borrowed from me all that I have for mine own proper use, to the glory of God and the true service of my neighbor? Here becomes most manifest the utter impossibility of a literal accomplishment of all this. He who should thus give, would indeed give no good gift to such unrighteous ones, but would violate the law of love to individuals and to human society at large. Consequently we must regard our Lord as only laying down this saying of Moses and of Sirach, in order that he may point out and enforce the spiritual and not the literal fulfillment of this commandment of love, which has become a maxim among all nations: he speaks figuratively as in the former instances. The transition from them to this is plain in this obvious connection: Do to him who violently compels thee, what he asks, just as if he had requested it.* Whom does the Lord, in his deep meaning, intend by him who asketh of thee? No other than the "whosoever" of vers. 39–41, just as the "adversary" of ver. 25 was the "brother" of ver. 24. Not merely he who expressly and in words asks of me; that would be a Pharisaical cleaving to the mere letter: so interpreting I might let my benevolence wait till asked, and keep the commandment by not turning from one who never asked me; or with hypocritical, proud or heedless dispatch send him away with "There, thou hast it," which could only do him harm. (Give also to him who asketh not of thee—is as valid against this as, on the other hand, Give not to every one who asketh of thee!) The asking, which I must be accessible to, is need itself; the seeing my brother in want. The needy one speaks by his very presence to

* Rud Matthäi: "The disposition to reconciliation must be as strong as life, unquenchable as the soul —the act of forgiveness should be as discriminating as the distributing of any pearls. If thou wouldst actually heap coals of fire on the head of an enemy, and thus confirm the neighborhood in faith and love, thou mayest also literally turn the other cheek, and go the two miles, &c. But where thou wouldst only cast thy wheat amid the hemlock which would choke i, keep it for better soil, and stand upon thy right."

† Philosophische Vorlesungen über das sogenannte Neue Testament (Leipzig, pub. by Junius, 1785); an original book of Pfenninger, too much forgotten.

* Which connection in Luke vi. 29–30 is yet more obvious: Let the taking away and robbing be like asking from thee.

my heart—Help me to the best of thy ability! And, finally, in the spirit of the word, what is it that he who injures and constrains me seeks of me, without saying so or being conscious of it? Nothing less than the best and highest gift I could bestow, the proof of my love, which he in his hardness of heart so pressingly needs as an example for his reproof and amendment. And that I should give him in the form which may seem best to the wisdom of my charity; either by enduring or resisting, by giving or withholding. Thus much remains certain after all is said; whoever opposes the evil which comes against him by any the slightest exhibition of evil, that is, does any thing to the evil-doer which is opposed to the spirit of enduring, forbearing love, himself commits evil, so far as in him lies—aggravates instead of amends it on the other, and denies that example of righteousness and of love which his neighbor's unrighteousness and uncharitableness demanded at his hands. That is the most profound significance of the "but" in ver. 39. Oppose not πονηρόν to πονηρόν, evil to evil, but good to evil, patience and love to evil-doing! Every enemy as an enemy asks of me to overcome him with love, to heap coals of fire on his head; that thus I may take away his enmity by the requital of abounding love, according to the highest examples of my Father in Heaven (vers. 44–48; Isa. lix. 17, 18; Psa. xli. 11). It may probably be found to be only a lending of love, which will come back to me in rich return: but I should be disposed to impart it also to the ungodly, who would borrow it without ever repaying; and unweariedly to impart to every one from the inexhaustible capital of my love, and that without hope of interest in the return of love. Consult Luke vi. 32–35, which, in a more extended discourse, perfectly confirms the view that lending is a figurative expression for love.

How abundantly has the Sermon on the Mount hitherto drawn out of the depths of eternal wisdom its fundamental far-reaching principles of truth! In what luminous words of its own has it set before us its new teaching, which is yet only the kernel of the already extant word of God in the Old Testament released from its shell, and in the unity of fulfillment is one with the Law and the Prophets! How majestic in its independence does every isolated word stand, and yet how does one hang upon another, and spring from it in a living, harmonious organic progression! Could the publican Matthew, or any other hand, successively have woven together this fabric from detached and single words, after the manner of men? Or could the Spirit of Christ himself have blended them together by the apostle's instrumentality under the untrue superscription: He went up into a mountain, opened his mouth, and taught them saying—? No, the Lord did verily speak from the mountain, and in this very manner did he open his mouth for his first most solemn discourse.

It may be hoped that we are now more able, the further we proceed, to enter into the meaning of the Lord's words and manner of teaching. The two examples taken from the Mosaic statute and penal law were intended, in opposition to the Pharisees' false exposition of the law, to point his disciples to such a fulfillment of it in its spirit as should, by working from within outwardly, render those ordinances useless; while at the same time it should assign to the legal, judicial element in them, its proper place, and vindicate for it its true use. Now follows the third example, which returns again to the moral law, or law of holiness. As this is to close the distinctive reference to the commandments, it is not one of the individual commandments of the decalogue that is introduced, as the first quotations had been; but the epitome of the whole second table, as Moses had already specified it; viz., the law of love, of that one central disposition of mind, which should evidence itself in every word and every work. In this case, in which the wicked principle of natural selfishness not willing to understand the law, comes into direct collision with its clear and unmistakable terms, the mischievous perversion takes the form of an arbitrary addition, which mutilates the precept and entirely annuls its meaning. The misinterpreting appendage at ver. 21 was actually a precept of the Mosaic ordinance; the error consisted only in bringing down the Sinatic—Thou shalt not kill! to the level of a mere sentence upon homicide. But the daring addition to the divine precept—And hate thine enemy! is no where found in Holy Writ. This human and wicked selfishness, which would assert its hatred in the very face of the commandment of love, is met and opposed by the fresh disclosure in its clearest expression of the central spirit of the old law. Thou shalt love just as God loves, that is with the love of mercy, with the active love of thine enemy. That is the holiness which is to be established in thee. The whole aptly fits in with that which began in vers. 21–26; where the adversary was manifestly a brother, with whom I should be reconciled in the love of God. Ver. 44 merely lays down the command to love our enemies with its evidences, as the express opposite to the perverted addition; ver. 45 immediately follows with its foundation in the example of our heavenly Father; then the importance of the subject demands a reference once more to the contrast of those who, with all their selfishness, yet make their talk and their boast of love (vers. 46, 47). This, however, is no love; but the Pharisees prove themselves to be no better than the publicans, the arrogant, self righteous ones in Israel no better than the despised sinners; yea, even, the heathens (this latter paves the way for the second main contrast in ch. vi. 19–34: Not like the Gentiles!). These are two convincing questions, which presuppose, notwithstanding all their hypocritical perversion, a right understanding in their conscience; the one points forward to the reward, which will presently be discussed (ch. vi. 1, 4, 6, 18); the other points back to the exceeding righteousness which in ch. v. 20 was required. Ver. 48 forms the sublime conclusion—the first of those three fundamental laws (or in the superficial language of modern times, principles of morality) which are laid down by the Sermon on the Mount; the second and the third being found in ch. vi. 33; vii. 12. This first one points towards heaven, and the fountain of mercy in the divine love to enemies (Rom. v. 10), as the source whence our love should flow. It also at the same time prepares the way, in passing, for that which ch. vi. introduces: Let your righteousness be in the sight of the Father, who looks to the hidden thought of the heart; and not terminate in hypocritical acts in the sight of man.

Verse 43. The beginning of that wicked and wanton misunderstanding which is here condemned in Pharisaic Israel, was their restriction of the commanded love of our neighbor to their own people only, and their contempt of the heathens as enemies whom they might, and indeed should hate. This was the all-pervading false interpretation which their uncircumcised hearts put upon God's revelations and institutions for his own peculiar people. But as the Jewish, like all other national pride in general, is only an expansion of the selfish haughtiness of the I into that of We, the limitation did not tarry at that point, but the "neighbor" became more narrowly interpreted even within their own bounds as a people. It has been assumed that Moses does indeed often so speak as if the neighbor were only the fellow-Israelite; but this was only so far the case as such was naturally the most obvious application of the term in common life among a people so isolated and self-contained. Let it be noted, moreover, how expressly, in the very chapter from which our Lord derives the compendious law of brotherly love (Lev. xix. 18), the strangers are included in that law (vers. 33 34), just as in ver. 10, they are coupled with all other poor.* And does not the constantly recurring רֵעֵךָ, "thy neighbor," point back to the decalogue, the commandments of which are recapitulated in the beginning of this chapter (Lev. xix)? But where is the expositor who would venture to say that it was lawful for Israelites dwelling in heathen lands to bear false witness against the heathen man outside the land of Israel, or to covet his wife or his house? Thus in this chapter (Lev. xix. 18), "the children of thy people" and "thy neighbor" cannot be one and the same; but the latter part of the sentence is the general law upon which is based the more limited application in the former: Thou shalt not bear grudge against the children of thy people, for thou shalt love every man! and no less than *as thyself! It is in the highest degree characteristic that the Lord imputes to Pharisaism the omission of just this word; although the doctors of the law tolerated and included it in the dead letter, they utterly disregarded it in effect. What means it other than this—that I should place myself in thought in the place of the other, and do to him what I would desire to have done to myself? (ch. vii. 12). Thus apprehended it gives of itself an immediate and sufficing answer to the cavilling question—Who is my neighbor? Every one, assuredly, by whom I would be loved; and would not the Jew, needing charity and its kind offices of help, desire them even from Samaritans and Gentiles? (Luke x. 29–36).† But here, instead of this rejected appendage, which condemns all selfishness and opposes all limitation of the precept, another is substituted which absolutely sets self upon the throne, above our neighbor and against him, with all its bitter wilfulness—And hate thine enemy! Who then is my enemy? Every one, in fine, whom it pleases me so to term; for some cause of enmity sinful man will never be slow to discover or invent. But the law says rather—Thou shalt not hate; that is, on thy part thou shalt have no enemy, thou shalt regard and treat no man as such. Thou shalt not hate thy brother in thy heart (even when he sins against thee), but rebuke his sin in the spirit of sincere love:‡ thou shalt not bear grudge nor avenge! (Lev. xix. 17, 18). Even the adversary in judgment is continually spoken of as a "neighbor" (Exod. xviii. 16; Lev. xix. 15). But the Pharisee who will insidiously evade the law without tampering with its letter, gives its meaning a rash and narrow interpretation, until, finally, nothing remains but—My neighbor is he, who loves me (ver. 46). And since this love, so eagerly desired, very easily admits of any cause of interruption, he is only my neighbor so long as no offence causes me to declare him my enemy. Thus is the godless perversion of the precept perfected in an express contradiction of it; just as now-a-days the proverb too often runs among Christians —Every man is his own neighbor!

Verse 44. In sublime contrast to this is the mighty re-asssertion of the law which must be fulfilled: But I say unto you! What terms

* Zech. vii. 10 includes the stranger among others, who are called brethren.

* There can be no more mischievous perversion of Scripture, or slander of the Old Testament, than what Dietlein maintains: that the law commanded hatred of an enemy, not merely permitted it—and that the enemy whom the Mosaic institute commanded to hate was every stranger! Formerly the Rationalists only spoke thus, and every Christian man contradicted it.

† Observe hence once more, how falsely Christian theologians impute hatred of an enemy to the Old Testament law. Against Von Gerlach let the great difference be remembered between hating "the enemy" and "thy enemy." Where in all the Old Testament is the latter found?

‡ The enemy is just so far our neighbor, as he most of all harasses and occupies us" (Lange).

more entirely harmonize in the natural mind than enemy and hate? It is the full, undisguised heathenism of the carnal mind which the Pharisees condensed into an express precept, a genuine essential precept of man, and then appended it to a commandment of God as its exposition! But when that commandment said—"Love thy neighbor," it also signifies no less—Love thine enemy! impossible as it may still be to human nature to reconcile the two. All heathens have been conscious, that the love of an enemy was a beautiful and a noble thing: and it is actually asserted throughout the Old Testament, in its histories, proverbs and precepts; see, for example, Exod. xxiii. 4, 5; Job xxxi. 29; Prov. xxiv. 17; xxv. 21, 22. Thus it is not anything new which the Lord announces as his law. He only brings new grace for its right fulfillment, as he thus erects brotherly love into a new spiritual commandment. After having, in the impressively simple antithesis—Love your enemies! laid down first of all the internal sentiment, which was of chief importance; he exhibits its progressive operation in three degrees, which through word and act lead back to the inner disposition again. As enmity advances, the maintenance and proof of love must keep pace with it. Bless them that curse you, oppose words of love and peace to words of scorn and insult! If the word of blessing suffices not (which is mostly the case), proceed further, to deed answering deed; do good to them that hate you, that show themselves by more than a single curse, by persistent conduct, to be your haters! And when the good deed is not sufficient (which again, when rightly understood, is always the case), continue nevertheless to preserve that disposition before God, which was the love spoken of at the beginning: Pray for them which despitefully use you* and persecute you! Bless them not merely in words but in acts—which is more difficult: the answer of kind words might be in vain without the proof of deeds. Let it not be thought enough to say—I will not revile again, but will speak affectionately; yea, not enough to dispatch it quickly by saying to God—Let them curse, but bless thou! But there must be a real earnestness in the prayer, as it is uttered in the prophetic Psalm (cix. 28): Bless thou through me, by my well-doing to them! and when even this does not overcome the enmity, and cause the despiteful treatment and persecution to cease, continue, nevertheless, in intercession: Bless thou! This is the last and severest test of the pure spirit of love, without which the blessing and the doing good could never in God's estimation bear the name of love at all. The putting one who hates to confusion by abundant deeds of kindness might even be a matter of Pharisaical and hypocritical pride, a sweet revenge under another form; but he who can pray for his enemy, loves him indeed. This penetrates that secret region of which cl. vi. 4–12 speaks more at large, and is the transition to what immediately follows concerning the Father in heaven, who looks in his children's hearts for love like his own.

Verse 45. That which in vers. 9 and 16 was preparatorily spoken, is summed up in one word—The children of your Father which is in heaven! The regeneration that underlies this, and is procured through the grace of the Son (John i. 12), is, in the Sermon on the Mount, a mystery unspoken, but which betrays itself to our notice, or at least to our anticipation, in the very foundation of the discourse. For the faith of any one who heard it might have concluded: He who discloses and condemns with such severity the sin of the heart, and exacts such lofty acquirements, himself designs to bring the kingdom of his Father to the poor, and with it satisfy those who hunger and thirst after God's love as their righteousness. That the Lord sets up the perfection of merciful well-doing after the example of the Father, as the high aim of an ever-growing exercise and appropriation, was already intimated in the progressive series of the benedictions, as it is now again in the ascending stages of ver. 44. The mercy of the Father comes to us freely and preparatorily: he who exercises to others that which he has obtained, experiences thereby more and more the purification of his heart from every thing which is contrary to that mercy; as we there apprehended and expounded it. So that we may here also, without hesitation or fear, lay the stress either upon the ὅπως—in order that ye may be so ever more and more, that ye may approve yourselves more and more fully, and at last in absolute perfection as children resembling their Father; or upon the γένησθε—in order that ye may be so. Our Lord designedly does not refer to the spiritual exhibitions of mercy to sinners as the pattern of the divine and fatherly benevolence; but, in order to work a more instant conviction, appeals to that general testimony of nature which was as open to the heathen as it was to Israel (Acts xiv. 17): for it is his purpose to reduce Israel and the heathen to the same level, in relation to the law and to grace, even as the Baptist had done before him. Moses and the prophets had demonstrated the goodness of God from his sending down rain and the blessing of heaven which made fruitful the earth (Deut. xi. 10–15; Psa. lxv. 10, 11; Jer. v. 24, xiv. 22). The heavens cannot rain of themselves, and we should not be content with an unmeaning "it rains," which places Nothing in the place of the living God; for it is God who rains, or who causes rain (as Israel sadly learned in the frequent shutting of the heavens), even as it is his sun which he causes to rise. His manifestation of himself as the mighty Creator and Lord, is also, as such, the revelation of his goodness: "for he is mighty and despiseth not any; for he is mighty also in strength of heart" (Job xxxvi. 5). His loving kindness in nature is further the type and the promise of the spiritual gifts of his grace for the innermost necessities of the heart of man. Rain, in the prophetic Scriptures, is often referred to with this meaning (Psa. lxxii. 6; Isa. xlv. 8; Ezek. xxxiv. 26; Hos. vi. 3, x. 12), and also the light of the sun, as the Lord had already intimated in ver. 14. Christ himself, according to the concluding promise of the Old Testament (Mal. iv. 2), is the sun of righteousness, and in him beams forth in its fullest radiance the divine love towards enemies (Rom. v. 8–10). We who now know this, detect such meaning in his words; but he then spoke, even while the light of grace was graciously beaming in his face, only of the light of the natural sun. He did not say: That ye may be my disciples and my brethren (as afterwards John xiii. 34, 35, As I have loved you; and the apostles, Eph. v. 1)—but in his labors and his lessons of love glorified his Father in heaven. He blessed those who reviled him,—even in rebuking he blessed them; he persisted in works of benevolence and healing in spite of all opposition; and he openly prayed for the evil-doers, who inflicted upon him the last injury, as he had prayed for them all his life long in secret (Psa. xxxv. 12–14, cix. 4). That he here magnifies the Father's goodness to the evil and the good, the just and the unjust, is to be understood partly as referring to the relative proportion in a mixed multitude between the seeming good and bad; and partly as if it had been said—On the evil and the unjust, who deserve it not, as if they were good and just, without any reference to merit and worthiness.* For who is just and good in his sight? We are none of us worthy that his sun should shine upon us. Hence Luke briefly expresses the fundamental idea—He is kind unto the unthankful and to the evil.

* Ἐπηρεάζοντάιν is not "slander" or "revile," for that would be no advance in meaning upon cursing and hating, but according to Hesychius it is equiv. to βιάζειν, inflict injury. The persecution points back to ver. 10. Or we should have with Lange (iii. 386–389) to oppose the secret intercession to the secret and quiet vilification—but how could this be philologically established?

Verses 46, 47. Returning once more to the contrast of the Pharisaic spirit, we have an advancement in the idea, a full revelation now for the first time of their unrighteousness and want of love. Before, it was—they hated their enemies, thinking that that was lawful, provided only they loved their "neighbor." But they really love not at all, in strict truth, these their so-called neighbors, friends and brethren. They have so far narrowed the circle, that not merely those who hate them are excluded from their love, but also those who love them not. But if ye only love those who love you, can this be indeed called love, which is in its very nature anticipating, and abundant, and universal, like the shining of the sun? Is it not rather a seeking of your own, and in its principle simply a loving of yourself? This question the Lord presses upon their consciences, which cannot refuse to give back a true answer. If he speaks of this as "love," it is with that severe irony which he may use towards hypocrites; they are said to love, in the same sense as they are called righteous and have righteousness attributed to them (ver. 20). This is, indeed, the sense of all mankind: no man ever yet hated his own flesh; he that loveth his wife loveth himself, and seeks his own personal comfort (Eph. v. 28, 29); he that loveth friend and brother is not impelled by any voluntary disposition of his mind, but by the mere natural feeling that it is his own friend and brother that he loves. This is the so-called love of his neighbor which the natural man is said to entertain. If he attempts to plead it in justification, however, in the presence of strict law, the mask of "more than others" is plucked away by the Lord, who shows it to be only the common Pharisaism which extends even to publicans and heathens. No man is so wicked and abandoned, no sinner is so essentially devilish, as not to have some objects of his selfish election, of whom he may say—I love them because they love me. Do not even the publicans the same? In Luke this saying is expressed in another form, which simply gives the general principle involved in it—Sinners also do even the same. But here the Lord's expression deepens its emphasis in the second question—Do not even the heathens the same? (which reading is both on external and internal grounds to be preferred.) For the Pharisees always placed the publicans on a level with the heathen (Matt. xviii. 17); as they were seen to be no better than the publicans, the second contrast (afterwards again in ch. vi. 7) is ready to be introduced, by which the Lord will teach his righteousness—Not like the heathen! Therefore he had not said that the Father caused his sun to rise and sent his rain upon Jews and heathen; because this Pharisaically-apprehended antithesis is merged in the one, true distinction of just and unjust. Ἀσπάζεσθαι, to "salute," to count worthy of greeting and friendly intercourse, attaches itself to the εὐλογεῖν, "blessing," of ver. 44; not without allusion to the fact that a Jew only gave his שָׁלוֹם, "Peace!" to a Jew, a Pharisee, certainly never to a publican. Your brethren is ironically spoken, even as the love here apparently conceded is to those whom you regard and acknowledge as such; whereas (vers. 22–24), from the days of Cain and Abel every man is every man's brother! Alas that the disciples of Christ in the present day should need so much to be warned against a Pharisaism still extant—Let not your brotherly love fall short of love universal! (2 Pet. i. 7, τὴν ἀγάπην simply, which is alone the truly catholic love.) What reward have ye? A precarious and transitory reward in man's praise and in his fleeting favor, but none from the Father in heaven: which prepares the way for ch. vi. 1, even as it looks back to ch.

* Which is also indicated by the interchange of the leading word—the evil are mentioned first in the former, the just in the latter.

v. 12. Similarly τί περισσόν, what more? refers to ver. 20, where a περισσεύειν, or superiority of righteousness was required, beyond that false one of those "saints" who were like all other sinners. Thus progressively the inner connection of the fundamental idea of the Sermon on the Mount exhibits itself to our view.

Verse 48. Τέλειος, "perfect," is primarily, according to the usage of the LXX. equivalent to תָּמִים, but ὥσπερ, "as," gives it such an elevation of meaning that it becomes equivalent to the קָדוֹשׁ, "holy," of God. It is used here in the sense of that fundamental commandment which comprised within itself the whole law of Israel, as well the external ordinances as those moral precepts with which they were inwardly bound up: Ye shall therefore be holy, for I am holy! (Lev. xi. 45, xix. 2, xx. 7, 26.) It is to this that the Lord now refers on closing his citation of separate commandments, reducing the sum of the second table to the sum of the first table and of the whole law. This is the distinctive περισσόν, "more," of the children of God (Deut. xiv. 1), through which they are sanctified and separated from an evil world to the honor of the ever-praised Father. But what is that virtue of his holiness, of which he will make his children partakers? God is holy as the condescending and merciful One; his highest, most perfect praise is that it must be said, He is love, in a sense in which it is not, and cannot be said, He is omnipotence, he is justice. Love is even in him the bond of perfectness, the essence of all his other attributes and perfections. We may be, and we should be, not almighty as God is, but merciful as he is; and Luke with perfect propriety used this word instead. This is our perfection, this is our being entire and complete before God and in God. For children are indeed only perfect as children. This is set up by our Father as the goal of our attainment—Be ye therefore; and as this command contains a latent pre-announcement that the holy One designs to make us holy, the perfect One to make us perfect, so now in the Son is the fulness of the Godhead, the plenitude of divine love brought down, in order that it may enter our needy souls through the Spirit. If we believe on his name, we are already regarded, through the imputation of righteousness to our faith, as πεπληρωμένοι ἐν αὐτῷ, "complete in him" (Col. ii. 10). If, apprehended of Christ, we press towards the mark with full earnestness of spirit and walk according to the rule, we are now τέλειοι, "perfect," in the principle of our mind and will; though not yet τετελειωμένοι, "perfected," in consummation and attainment (Phil. iii. 12–15). But the living law of our Lord gives us a sure and comforting security in this ἔσεσθε—Ye shall be perfect, if ye abide and increase in love. This, however, does not set before us a general prospect of an unending progress towards perfection, without a definite goal of completed perfectness; but the God of peace will sanctify us until we are actually ὁλοτελεῖς, wholly perfect (1 Thess. v. 23), until in the perfect work of patience we have become ἐν μηδενὶ λειπόμενοι, wanting nothing (James i. 4.) To that end it is said, Εἰ δέ τις λείπεται σοφίας, αἰτείτω παρὰ τοῦ διδόντος, If any man lack any thing, let him ask of him that giveth (James i. 5)—as also in the Sermon on the Mount our Lord opens to us the path of prayer, which leads to the fulfilling of all the commandments.

The discourse, which set out at first with the most deep-drawn, fundamental principles of truth, the pregnant language which embodied them demanding most rigorous attention for its exact interpretation, becomes henceforward more easily intelligible in its phraseology, and descends to a more popular style of teaching. There fellow, however, at intervals, sayings the meaning of which is somewhat disguised in figurative and obscure expressions, and is not immediately obvious, such as ch. vi. 22, 23; vii. 6. The section ch. vi. 1–18, may be termed a sacred example of popular reformer-polemics—if it is allowable thus exactly, though in unidiomatic language, to express our meaning.

The third contrast with the Pharisees fully discloses, as our general survey showed us, their hypocritical and external legality, as the complete development of that false system of exposition which originates in an adherence to its mere letter. This is exhibited, that is to say, as the original internal principle, and essential quality of their pseudo-righteousness. There is designedly and appropriately no further reference to individual commandments of the divine law and their fulfillment; the appealing reference to that which is written, and to what they of old time substituted for it or perverted it into, was brought to an end in ch. v. by a most searching and comprehensive contrast. The three leading examples, however, which are now to follow in conformity with the Lord's prescribed plan, are taken from the three meritorious works of righteousness, so to speak, the highest acts of all so-called righteousness according to universal human estimation, heathenish as well as Pharisaic. For this whole section aims, in transition, to exhibit the Pharisees as, in their natural state, heathens in the true sense of the word. These examples are the three works which even Christian Pharisaism, especially in the Romish church, has on similar grounds reproduced: Almsgiving to our neighbor, prayer to God, fasting for ourselves. See them thus united in Tob. xii. 9. It may probably be thought that prayer would have more fitly been placed last, as thus the contrast between the hypocritical and the sincere performance would have been more direct, and the transition more immediate to the fundamental idea which follows in vers. 19–23, viz., the single-minded aim and pursuit after God's own righteousness. But the order in which the Lord places them is, nevertheless, that of their natural development, whether in the good or evil intention of man. He who seeks righteousness, begins with external good works (instead of the right commencement, which is directly in prayer); then proceeds to prayer, that his God may regard his good deeds, pardon their deficiency, and be pleased to strengthen him for their performance; and finally, in order to further the devotion of prayer, he fasts and exercises himself in keeping under the flesh. Thus we find it with Cornelius. Acts. x. 2, 30, 31; and precisely the same with hypocrites, although in caricature of the truth. Yet at the same time almsgiving was most immediately included in the divine statutes for Israel (ch. v. 42; Deut. xv. 11); fasting, on the contrary, was for the most part optional, since there was only one fast-day appointed to Israel, the day of atonement, to which very early were added other times of general fasting (Zech. viii. 19), till in process of time came the fasting twice in the week of the individual Pharisee (Luke xviii. 12).

In ver. 1, there is laid down a general warning against such a performance of the duties of righteousness, such a righteousness of works, as consists only of hypocrisy and semblance, inasmuch as it is exhibited only in the sight of men, and to be seen of them; an apparent contradiction to ch. v. 16, which, however, really explains it. The preliminary—Your righteousness of ch. v. 20, here recurs. The reference to the Father in heaven, and the only standard of worth and of reward in his sight, is here continued, following ch. v. 46, 48. He who was there in ver. 45 exhibited as the highest exemplar of perfect holy love, is also the Rewarder of all true righteousness, which consists in similitude to himself ("Before Thee nothing else has any value, but thine own likeness"). He is merciful to the merciful, and gives the pure in heart to see his face. Hereupon follows in order, first of all almsgiving, distinctively by the Pharisees termed "righteousness," but here taken as a general designation of good works towards our neighbor. Now occurs for the first time the expression—The hypocrites—so often cast in the teeth of the Pharisees down to ch. xxiii. For they are no better, who are like the publicans, and yet arrogate to themselves a special and exceeding righteousness, throwing the veil of an apparent sanctity over the wickedness of their hearts. The same is uttered again, in connection with prayer, ver. 5, and fasting, ver. 17. Thus it is the leading idea of this section, although in the central part of it concerning prayer, ver. 7, the reference is extended—Like the heathen. In opposition to this our Lord tells his disciples, that they should, so far as possible, perform their good works in secret even to themselves, to avoid all imagination of having by the deed in itself done any thing. For deeds of charity by their very nature neither can nor should be altogether concealed; they cannot indeed admit of concealment at all. It is somewhat less so with prayer to God; hence afterwards, Enter into thy closet, and shut thy door! Finally, exercises of self-restraint and discipline cannot by their nature be concealed from ourselves, and they should on that account be all the more closely hidden from others, for here is the greatest danger. Ascetic discipline, not hidden, loses all its value; consequently, in ver. 17, there is commanded even a holy disguise of fasting, as the only and effectual antidote to a wicked hypocrisy. These are the three stages of concealment before man, of which the righteousness of Christ's disciples admits.

Prayer, again, is the centre and soul of all acts in general that pertain to the service of God. In connection with this, as the point of most importance, the contrast developes itself more plainly as twofold: not before men first, but also not before God and men together, which is the consummation of these Pharisees' hypocrisy, and of the wretchedness of the blind people who follow them—By much speaking! Word-making, instead of prayer from the heart, whether before men or only in the closet, is ever the direct opposite of true prayer. Our Lord sets against this his own sacred model of prayer for the children of the Father; which teaches that they must in the simplest terms, before and after, and in connection with all their earthly necessities, pray for the establishment of his kingdom, in the doing of his will, to his own glory (the fulfilling of his law), as the gift of his grace; that thus through prayer they may fulfill the commandment. We see this in a very different light from Neander, to whom it appears evident that vers. 7–16 are altogether foreign to the organism of the Sermon on the Mount. To us, on the other hand, it is manifest that this prayer, inserted in the very midst of the second division of the discourse, is its proper centre, the key to all the mysteries of its demands, by which the way to their fulfillment is pointed out. To ask is all that is required of us in order to the performance of every requirement (ch. vii. 7–13), and the command thus to pray, with the promise involved in it, is the heart of the evangelical law. Hence the Lord's Prayer, as we shall see, is arranged as the counterpart of the ten commandments. Here does our heavenly Father exhibit himself the third time as the hearer of prayer and giver of righteousness; as in ch. v. 45 he had shown himself to be its pattern, and in ch. vi. 1, 4, 6, its rewarder. In vers. 14, 15, the fifth petition is again repeated with the most solemn emphasis, for in it is especially fulfilled the law of love through the asking and receiving of the love of God; yet, as is strictly appropriate here, with a warning against the hypocritical conceit, which might lead them to imagine that such prayer as this is already heard even without any such condition.

Finally, in vers. 16–18, concerning which we have almost said enough already, we have fasting as significant of all asceticism and abstinence of every kind. There is a simple repetition of the terms of the first contrast, which thus, after the apparent interruption of the pattern-prayer, closes the section as it was begun.

Verse 1. Δικαιοσύνη, righteousness, for which ἐλεημοσύνη, alms, has been substituted as a well-intentioned but mistaken gloss, does not here convey the meaning of liberality or almsgiving; as the equivalent, צְדָקָה, does in the Pharisaic usage which pervades the whole Talmud, though never in the Scriptures of the Old Testament.* The Lord speaks assuredly according to the Scriptural usage only, and δικαιοσύνη ὑμῶν, "your righteousness," can be no other than that of ch. v. 20, to which this fundamental position looks back before it is followed out into more specific detail. It is consequently quite similar to ch. xxiii. 5: All their works they do for to be seen of men. Therefore is added the admonitory προσέχετε, take heed! as this was also contained in ch. v. 20; and the third contrast with the Pharisees now deepens, according to the general fundamental plan of the sermon, into a tone of warning. Yet the Lord at the same time addresses himself generally to the poor misguided people who blindly followed these hypocrites, as well as to his own separated disciples, in order that he may open their eyes to the cunning treachery of their guides and examples, and thus awaken and secure their desire for his discipleship and its better righteousness. A slightly ironical ambiguity in the expression, which rather lay in the word as understood by his present hearers, than in the Lord's own design, paves the way for the mention of that ἐλεημοσύνη or almsgiving, which to the Pharisaic Jews was the most eminent δικαιοσύνη or righteousness. It is not the "before men" which is forbidden as such, but making that the improper aim, in opposition to the proper aim in ch. v. 16. Hence θεαθῆναι, "to be seen," is quite different from ὅπως ἴδωσιν, "that they may see," in that, and contains a bye-reference of an evil kind to θέατρον and the like, a mere show before the world. Hence afterwards, in vers. 5 and 16, the yet more severe ὅπως φανῶσι, which plainly expresses an empty appearance without any truth within. But the reference to the everlasting reward of the Father in heaven detracts not by any means from righteousness, but rather belongs essentially to its reality, since it is wrought for God's sake, for his approbation, and in order to blessedness in communion with him.

Verse 2. As the you had already in ch. v. 23, 29, 36, 39, passed over into the thou of a more specific application, so does it uniformly now in each part of this section. The Jewish over-estimation of almsgiving begins already to show itself in certain otherwise well-intended Apocryphal sentences, such as Tob. iv. 11, 12, xii. 9; Wisd. iii. 28, xxix. 14, 15, which themselves seem to lean on such canonical sayings as Prov. xix. 17; Dan. iv. 24. The truth which lay at the foundation of this error, but which was, alas! perverted and altogether lost in Pharisaism, Christ himself acknowledges, for instance in Matt. x. 42, and also his apostles, 2 Cor. ix. 9. The sounding a trumpet or letting it be sounded cannot, in harmony with the connection, be regarded as a mere figure, denoting, it may be, "loud and shrill begging-litanies" (according to Lange), but also an actual custom of that age, of which nothing further is distinctly known to us:* for the Lord is now describing the hypocrites and their work strictly after the life. Before thee, the saintly man, the great benefactor—as descriptively as it is scornfully spoken—that thy name and fame might be trumpeted forth! This were then also thy reward, dismissed with which no other awaits thee.

Verses 3, 4. But when thou, a child of God, doest alms—which must no more be omitted than the offering of the gift according to ch. v. 24—let it not be with ostentation, but keep it rather, so far at least as the act of giving will admit, a secret from the world; no artificial concealment is necessary, however, or that thou shouldst show that thou art ashamed of it by false anxiety or affected modesty. Especially take care—for that is the main point—not to glory in thy act, which should be as natural to thee as shining is to light. The saying concerning the right hand and the left is manifestly proverbial; forget it, if it may be, even while thou doest it; let it be far from thee, while the right hand is giving, to hold in thy left a trumpet, or to stretch it out for reward and praise. If the hands know nothing of it, the soul knows nothing—we may say with Von Gerlach. That is at least more simple than to regard it, with Lange, as referring to the solicitous counting from one hand into the other before the gift, and the clapping of hands afterwards. Take ch. xxv. 37 as its best exposition. Be not afraid that thy good work will be done so secretly, that even God will not know it and find it again for its reward. He forgets no work of love (Heb. vi. 10). If thou thinkest of this, and at the same time of the strong temptation on thy part to forget and to lose it while receiving the praises of men, thou wilt prefer ever to do thy work in secret: thus shalt thou be more sure of that secret and true estimate in the sight of God which alone gives its value to what may be termed good. Not as the Chinese proverb runs: Give thy alms in the day, thy reward

* The transition is seen in apocryphal passages, such as Tob. xiv. 9, φιλελεήμων καὶ δίκαιος, xii. 9, ἐλεημοσύνας καὶ δικαιοσύνας, where also in ver. 8 the whole three occur together, prayer with fasting and alms.

* Compare, however, Sepp, Leben Christi, ii. 183. Moreover σαλπίζειν is not merely tuba canere, but tuba cani curare also, according to a general usage, which Meyer cannot well deny.

will come in the night—but just the reverse: Give in secret, and thou shalt openly receive the true divine recompense, partly even in this world (Eccl. xi. 1), but in all its fulness at the resurrection of the just (Luke xiv. 14). As again the Mohammedan proverb says: Hast thou done a good deed, cast it into the sea; if the fish finds it not, yet will God see it. He reckons to thee capital and interest in rich return; for every deed of love, done from a pure heart, as unto him, bears its fruit unto everlasting life.

Verses 5, 6. Sincere worshippers pray, indeed, in the synagogues, and there is nothing wrong in that; but they who prefer to pray in the congregation, instead of the closet, are thereby convicted as hypocrites. How much more so when it is in the streets, to which, with rare exceptions, prayer is not appropriate—and even at the corners of the streets, where is the greatest concourse of passers by. There stand they, the wicked ones, who pervert the most holy act of secret, interior communion with God—concerning which, therefore (according to Braune's deep and striking remark), Moses gave no direct precept—into a mere matter of ostentation before the world. They have artfully so watched their opportunity as to be at the street-corner at the hours of prayer; they then continue standing there as if it were a matter of conscience not to omit, even there, the holy hour. For without any such pretext and occasion, to stand in the street for prayer would appear even to the world to be such frenzy as the essential, indelible feeling of the truth in the most wicked hypocrite would be ashamed of; manifest as it is that prayer is out of place in the street, hypocrisy itself requires another cloak to hide the same which clings to it. They have their reward: they pray not indeed to God, and seek not to be heard; therefore they have only just what they desire and seek. But thou, if thou truly prayest to God, must know that while the temple is a house of prayer, and the synagogues places of prayer also, this does not prevent the equal sanctity of all other places, where the Lord may be near to all who call upon him, and dwell in the heart of the contrite ones. Thou shalt not be ashamed of the public prayer under fitting circumstances, but shalt in addition especially and habitually retire into solitude, where nothing must interrupt, hinder or tempt thee in thy devout abstraction. Go into thy closet, if thou hast one (Judith ix. 1, viii. 5; Tob. iii. 12); or else seek one under God's own heaven, which may become to thee a Bethel. Shut to the door, if thou canst and it should be necessary (2 Kings iv. 33); but in any case the door of thy senses and thoughts, that no distraction may interpose between thee and thy Father. So pray to thy invisible Father, himself concealed to thy sense (τῷ ἐν τῷ κρυπτῷ as before in ver. 18), and he who out of his secret place looks into secret, will openly reward as well thy prayer as thine alms, each in its kind. Reward is here the common middle term between the ideas of recompense and simple grant.

Verses 7, 8. Frightful and shameful, but alas! true, was it that the Israelites, the holy Israel, in their very prayer to their God, have become like the heathen, because they actually do not pray to him at all! The heaping up many words is essentially the manner of all heathenish prayer, which supposes that God must be awakened by human cries (1 Kings xviii. 27), as all the babbling of the heathen shows to the present day. This is, however, so deeply rooted a mischief in the heathen mind of the natural man, that it may follow the disciples of Jesus even into their closets. Therefore it follows: And when ye yourselves pray in the closet, before God and not before men, beware of this same folly, which would convict you either of hypocrisy in your own hearts, or at least of unbelief in a present and living God. Even Sirach (vii. 14) said long ago: "Make not much babbling when thou prayest!" and the Jewish teachers abounded in good maxims to this effect, though they were neutralized by others of opposite tendency, such as—He who multiplies his prayers, is sure of a hearing—Whoso lengthens his prayers will not return empty—Every man should daily repeat at least eighteen prayers—and so forth. To these clung the hypocrites of that age with their long prayers (ch. xxiii. 14): but the same evil breaks out in every age where simplicity and truth decline, as the confusion of Paternosters, Ave-Marias and Rosaries among the Catholics bears witness; and no less the pious babbling of many a pietist keeper of the hours, of many a devotee in the closet, relying on his enforced opus operatum. Nothing indeed is farther from the Lord's meaning than to repress the prayer which is ever welling from the full heart, the spirit of persistent wrestling with God. But the multa locutio wherein there is not multa precatio (to quote Augustine), the words which are not urged from a vehement and overflowing heart, he esteems a vain heathenish work; and condemns as an idle delusion the imagination that any words, as such, might contribute to the acceptance of prayer (Isa. i. 15). For our object in prayer is not to inform the Omniscient of what he knew not before. The universal subject and matter of our prayer is—that which we have need of for body and soul, in general and in specific things. This the Father knoweth before we ask him, yea better than we can ever ask or conceive; for poor fallen man knows no longer what he is in need of, first generally for his soul, and then in particular, at least very often for either soul or body (Rom. viii. 26.) While we are thinking before God what he may know to be our real need, we shall also remember to trust it entirely to his hands. In this utterance, finally, so stern in its condemnation of all that is not simple in prayer, and yet so encouraging to all that is so, the Lord solves that ever-recurring doubt: Will God, in deference to our prayer, interfere with the order of the world? He has already in its arrangement provided for the answer of every prayer, as generally for every foreseen expression of human freedom, and for every necessity of his creatures known to him from eternity. Superstition, which can only take root in hypocrisy, supposes that words must do this; unbelief into which superstition ever degenerates, for it is essentially one with it, expects no help to acceptance from the words of prayer. Neither knows aught of the living God, in whom true faith only can confide for the knowledge of its need and the willingness to help it, and therefore alone can truly pray, even as children ask of their father.

THE LORD'S PRAYER.

(Matthew vi. 9–13).

Verses 9—13. But where shall we begin and where shall we end with the exposition of the Lord's Prayer; not his own, that is, ("after this manner pray ye!") but our prayer who are and would be the Lord's, given to us as the children of the Father, by his Son our Lord?* What has exposition to do, we had almost said, with the words in which the wisdom of God descending upon us in perfect love, has condensed and enshrined for us neither more nor less than all, all which ever has ascended, does now or ever will ascend from human hearts in prayer to heaven? Yes, verily, whatever may not be included in this, cannot be fit subject of prayer, and may not be asked. Such unlicensed prayer is indeed no prayer at all in spirit and in truth, for God's Spirit has not prompted it; neither can it be real communion of the heart with the living God, for presumption and error have never the confidence of faith. Think of and utter aught which it is in thy will or thy power to ask, and thou wilt find it already spoken for thee in this prayer of prayers. Whatever from the beginning, since men first, on account of sin and evil, lifted their hearts and hands to heaven, has been in their minds to ask, is here reduced, in the simplicity of the new and everlasting covenant, the last utterance of God to us in his Son, to one word, which will remain man's last utterance also to God, until heaven and earth are divided no more. All the cries which go up from man's breast upon earth to heaven, meet here in their fundamental notes; and are gathered into words which are as simple and plain for babes as they are deep and inscrutable for the wise, as transparent for the weakest understanding of any truly praying spirit as they are full of mysterious meaning for the mightiest and last struggles of the spirit into the kingdom and glory of God. Whatever Israel may ever have prayed in words given by the Spirit of God or shaped by the spirit of man; whatever there was of just and sound in the contents of any Jewish formulary or collection, any Kaddish or Machsor, which was extant in the time of Jesus, was but the preparatory aspiration towards this most living of all formulas, full of spirit in its letter; this most comprehensive of all epitomes so marvelous in its brevity; into which our Lord and Master condenses now for his own, all that those words imply: When ye pray, say! Thus has his Spirit expounded it for nearly two thousand years to those who have prayed in his name; and all that it has ministered to their thoughts and they have derived from it, is the comprehensive fulness of its real contents. Learn to make it thy prayer, and it will interpret itself to thee with ever-deepening impressiveness, from the Father-name which it places upon thy lips down to that Amen of faith, which having first impressed it upon thy heart, it draws to thy lips, that out of thine own mouth thy heart may be strengthened; but all through the power of God the Spirit, without which the most consummate words to those who resist it—remain but words. Let the reader receive the exposition which will now be given, only as a finger-post to indicate where the paths of profound thought go on to their endless development; especially as giving some very necessary hints for the unity and the harmony of those paths, which as the individual petitions open them up, proceed in compact and harmonious progression towards the one great end.

After this manner then pray ye—the Lord says, in immediate connection with the prohibition of heathen babbling. In the most obvious meaning, therefore,—thus briefly and simply, embracing in plain and sound words whatever thy heart prompts thee to utter before God; not going round and round for the mere sake of saying many words, as if he did not understand. But when we see presently after, that the Lord, in giving a pattern of its form, incorporates in it at the same time the substance of all prayer for which words can ever be required;* and in so doing goes entirely out of and beyond the immediate connection of his discourse in order to condense the whole meaning of the Sermon into this prayer as its kernel;—we shall not be disposed to agree with many who unwisely think that he only designed to commend to us by an example simplicity and brevity in the expression. He who should cordially assent to this might well despair of matching this by any other prayers, and therefore rest entirely in the given form itself. Did the Lord by, "after this manner," signify these very words, or only their substance and their manner? No rational man can think that it was his meaning that we should use these words exclusively. But that it was his design that they should be adhered to and used, as his church has understood him and acted accordingly, we have most decisive proof in the repetition of the same words upon a subsequent request of his disciples for a form of prayer (Luke xi. 1–4.)* For there they wished for a directory and form for daily use—As John also taught his disciples. The Lord did not refuse it, but most emphatically referred them in their need to that which he had given a long time before: he knew nothing and had nothing better for them, and now says more distinctively than on the former occasion—When ye pray, and have need of prescribed expressions, then say ye the same words! There is a prayer of the heart without word, but let him who should think himself so qualified and capable for that at all times, as to be able to despise the prayer of words, reflect upon this saying of our Lord: When ye pray, say.† Further, the Spirit of prayer does give the special and ever new and appropriate words of prayer: yet this does not remove the necessity of the weak to fall back upon a given form of words, yea, even of the strongest who are, sometimes at least, equally weak, and know neither what they ought to ask nor how to ask it. In any case, there remains, finally, the great necessity of a common prayer of general consecration and promise. Therefore, the Lord's commandment—Pray thus, and say! is the actual appointment of a letter sanctified and blessed for the church's spiritual prayer, the institution of an almost sacramental word-element resembling that other—Do this! For as we have need of the Lord's Supper, well nigh in like manner—I say not more, for there is yet assuredly a difference—have we need of a word of prayer full of promise to be placed in our lips, that we laying hold of it may by the word excite the Spirit, in the name of Jesus, who has himself commanded us thus to pray ourselves from the poverty of receiving faith into the full confidence of being heard and accepted. And this confidence is especially strengthened by the fact, that we offer the same prayer in fellowship one with another, whether an external or internal communion. In that request of the disciples a purely human need uttered itself, which the Lord could not have left unsatisfied, yea, well knowing what they needed, he had already provided its satisfaction. If, on the one hand, alas! this most sacred prayer has been desecrated into a most profane formality of babbling by the misuse of it in endless Paternosters and Our-Fathers in the many tongues into which it has come; yet on the other hand an unlimited experience attests the gracious and condescending will of the Lord to bless these words, with which he has connected, and into which he has inwrought, a sanctity beyond that of any other prayers that we may use. In them the little child begins to spell out the rudiments of its prayer, and when the church unites, in its loftiest festal assemblies, to pray, these words and none but they are still its most perfect concerted utterance, sufficient for the most sublime occasions, and beyond which nothing can be expressed. All that is needful for every act of divine service, and all that any man may have especially in his own heart, is comprised in this prayer; as the ecclesiastical formulary (which we do not blame although Nitzsch does) so excellently says.

* How Braune can suppose that the Redeemer himself often used this prayer is to us inconceivable; particularly on account of the fifth petition, and also on account of the sixth and seventh—for "evil" must be pre-eminently sin. from which Christ redeems us, but he never needed himself to be redeemed from it.

* "Not so much a sacred formulary, as for divine instruction as to what petitions are universally good, universally necessary, universally acceptable," says the Beuggen Monatsblatt with perfect correctness, although it cannot be gainsaid that the Lord set out with the immediate design to inculcate simplicity and brevity in the expression.

Thus the Lord over and above the how teaches us abundantly the what, and not merely teaches it, but gives us the petitions which he commands us to pray, as simple promises, for the encouragement of our confidence in asking, if we laid hold upon them in faith But it is indeed only a prayer for us poor sinners, who have need of forgiveness and deliverance. He himself, as the Son, prayed otherwise to the Father, and has opened a way whereby we, having become children of God through him, may have liberty to pray to his Father as our Father too. Thus does he turn our asking into receiving, and makes our prayer the way and means of our fulfilling the commandment. This is the meaning of its position here in the Sermon on the Mount. Jehovah cried upon Sinai amid the thunders of his majesty—Thou shalt be holy! Jesus on the Mount of Beatitudes gives to the people, who sit down at his feet and receive of his words (Deut. xxxiii. 3), the word of living power from his own mouth: Ask and it shall be given you to become holy, yea, finally to be holy for ever in your finished redemption to the glory of God!

Hence it may be presumed that this central word, containing the very heart of the Gospel as the life-giving, self fulfilling law of grace, would stand—through the marvelous wisdom of the Holy Ghost which has so ordered it, that all things in the great whole of revelation correspond and are fitly joined together—in immediate relation with the decalogue, the authentic expression of the law of commandment for all ages. And so it manifestly does. First of all, it is obvious to every one that in this, as in that, there are two tables, and indeed in a similar manner referring to God and man. As the commandment begins—I am thy God

* As certainly as the Sermon on the Mount was spoken by our Lord in the form in which Mathew gives it, and the Our-Father is an essential part of it, so certainly Luke's is not merely a "more particular account of the circumstances under which the prayer was given." Alas that the excellent Harms should thus express himself upon it, from whose valuable expositions in his Sermons we have elsewhere received much that is useful! [The same view, however, is taken by a large class of evangelical divines.—Am. Ed.]

† As Dr. Schurf answered some such one.

thou shalt consecrate thyself to me alone, but not in any forms of thy own devising, and regard as holy my name, my day, and my representatives (my image, in their united human life, thy father and mother), and then descends into the circle of man's relative duties and obligations; so also in the prayer, after the invocation come first the petitions, which, as they ascend to the Father, utter only "Thy," and afterwards the others which may also say "Our." If even there the gracious covenant-word—Thy God—preceded the commandments, how much more must all the petitions here have that first word of appropriating faith before them—Our Father! Further, as there the precept concerning parents (according to right reckoning the fifth), while it essentially belongs to the first table, is yet the middle-term of transition to the second, so also here the fourth makes such a transition from Thy to Our. It does, indeed, say "our bread," but at the same time—Give it to us as thy good; while in the following petitions we ask only for the turning away of our evil. To honor God in the person of men, is the internal principle of the loving our neighbor as ourselves (submitting one to another in the fear of God, in honor preferring one another); the filial feeling is the foundation of family life, from which society and the community grow as a more extended home in which thou shouldst do thy neighbor no harm, because he is thy brother. So also the filial petition for the true bread from the true Father, is the beginning and foundation of all further petitioning for all our need, as will presently be shown. Finally, as there we have ten words (עֲשֶׂרֶת הַדְּבָרִים), so here, though the petitions —to distinguish the new above the old—are contained in the holier number seven (repeating the most holy three); yet the prayer itself is found to be also comprised in ten words, or sentences, if we include not only the invocation and doxology, its commencement and its close, but also, as is fitting, the single vow, which appears as the condition of the fifth petition. It is that "as we forgive," which is in itself something distinctive, as the Lord's immediately following repetition teaches us; yea, in this member of the prayer is its essential heart to be found, for we attain to this love, which is the fulfillment of the law, only in the way of asking and receiving from the love of God.

Thus the one prayer runs through both: Be our God and give us all thy good; take from us all our evil, in order that in us also thine may be the glory! give thy grace, take our sin; give thy glory, take our evil away. But as the prayer bears the relation to the commandments of an abounding fulfillment of them, the invocation does not merely correspond with that first word of the covenant—I am thy God, but at the same time transforms the first two commandments into a prayer which fulfills them. Every other God, and every self-invented likeness and image, is already excluded, when we cry in faith—Our Father which art in heaven! The first petition for the hallowing of the name embraces in itself the true principle or beginning and the final end of all prayer, but it aptly corresponds also to the next commandment—Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain. The New-Testament order of conception, however, enters here. Now in the great fulfillment we pray down from heaven to earth the kingdom which is come and is coming, and we pray the good and gracious will of the Father into the hearts of ourselves and all his children. The first three petitions are inseparably triune. The Old Testament already contained at the law-giving, in the hidden back-ground of its word,* reference to the sacred Three in God; but now there comes into clearer prominence the name to be hallowed, of the Father just now invoked, of the Son whose kingdom is to come, of the Spirit through whose inworking the children of God are disciplined to do his will. The three petitions are inseparable, while each introduces and includes that which follows; yet do they, at the same time, exhibit the development in which they are fulfilled, through beginning, middle, end. For the first invocation and petition already hallows the name, then comes the kingdom more and yet more, until in its perfection the will is fully done.

Such is first and essentially "that which we have need of" (ver. 8). The following supplication is grounded on this, and follows from it, as Olshausen rightly seizes the connection between them: "In order that this may be, give us daily the bread of life." Thus may we understand the true meaning of the fourth petition, which mediates between the two tables, though so often, alas! wrested from its connection: Give us thy good! It is, in some sort, as a condescension that it begins with the expression of our earthly, bodily need; it designs to signify more than that, however, elevating bodily need into the figure of spiritual: Impart that to us whereof we live; give thyself to us for the good of our hunger, for the satisfaction of our desire. This is essentially the central word of all prayer: Supply our need! Here is also the proper meaning of the much contested ἐπιούσιος, "daily," in its plain position before us; that which is necessary to our οὐσία, or existence, the sustenance of the creature derived from the power and gift of him, who alone is himself ὁ ὤν, the Existent. But man lives not by bread alone; and as the Lord has spoken at the commencement of the Sermon (ch. v. 6) of a hungering and thirsting of the inner man, so now in its centre, yea, in the innermost heart of the prayer which is its very kernel, he most assuredly does not bid us pray merely for the need and nourishment of the body, but speaks also of the bread, which the Father giveth from heaven, just as in John vi. 27–33, iv. 34. The details will follow upon the individual* petitions.

*Namely first: אָנֹכִי יְהוָה, I Jehovah, the Father; אֱלֹהֶיךָ, thy God, in the Son, אֲשֶׁר הוֹצֵאתִיךָ, who brought thee out, through the Spirit's power. Then again: No other Gods before me, the Father; no likeness besides the Son, in whom my name is; the Sabbath for a sign that I sanctify thee, and will carry on in thee the work of my Spirit (Ezek. xx. 12).

We also see plainly how the three petitions of the second table further describe and explain that bread of life, for which we, on our soul's behalf, must pray. As the first table of petitions is from above downwards, invoking all from heaven, to which he who prays has risen in his invocation, until the earth in re-established obedience becomes like heaven; so now the prayer returns back, rising from the confessed and expressed necessity, into which the Lord's merciful answer descends, towards full satisfaction and accomplishment, and, indeed, in the order of a sacred three, corresponding to the former: our trespass is that we have not done the will of the Father, and reconciliation is the bread which we first and most inwardly need; then comes temptation, opposing, through the might of the wicked one, the coming of the kingdom; then the evil, under which we sigh, to the very last opposing of the full glorifying and hallowing of the name of God in his saints. All that we here pray for is indeed embraced in order in the Son: the true wisdom of the children of God which is to pray for bread from their Father (in the first four petitions, but especially expressed in the fourth), is taught in the doctrine and life of Jesus; this leads us to his death, which is our justification from guilt; then to his resurrection in order to our sanctification against all temptation; finally, to his ascension and return for our full deliverance from all evil. Yet are these petitions on the other hand inseparably three-one; so that in the first we already perceive the last, and each prayer petitions for a spiritual sacrament, in which there is forgiveness of sins, and also victorious life, and salvation to blessedness in hope. Thus we pray for health and life in place of decay and death, for that true and only deliverance, in which the Father forgives his children for his name's sake (1 John ii. 12); the Son strengthens those who are his against the evil one; and the Spirit perfects the deliverance unto glory.†

As, consequently, the fourth sets out with the expression of bodily need, which is to be developed into a spiritual meaning; so the seventh petition obviously first of all refers to spiritual evil in its principle, sin and temptation (as the connecting ἀλλά, but, evidently intimates); but it also includes all the external, bodily evil which sin has brought and is bringing, and authorizes us in this legitimate way to pray for deliverance from it.

Thus has this general view placed the two petitions concerning which opinion has been divided in the true light, harmonizing all differences; and it has pointed out our way for the right understanding of the particulars, to which we must now direct our attention.

How much more is that which the Son now puts into our mouth—Our Father! than that former—I am thy God! He graciously tells us—Thus say ye! well knowing that the permission—Thus may ye say! would have been by far too little for our diffidence. Would the disciples have been able after the Sermon on the Mount to lay hold of that permission and diligently avail themselves of it? It appears, from Luke xi., that every one would not; and therefore must the Lord repeat for all, what that one had not heard or had not understood and embraced. We may place our little children's hands together, and teach them—Say ye. Well for every one, for whom this is early done: it is not too soon, as early as the child can cry—My father and my mother! (Isa. viii. 4), and lifts up his eyes to heaven as a child of humanity. How perfect is the simplicity of this beginning of all prayer, descending to the root and principle, already naturally present in the heart, of all sense of love, and trust for gift and help! In "Father" the Creator is at once included, but the glance towards heaven immediately adds: Who hath made all these things! Me, with all other creatures; this beginning of all prayer given by our Lord himself should be proof enough to all, that it is his will to build up his church in families and in nations from the very commencement of life, and every Our-Father in the mouth of a child of Christianity (and should we then by any means suppress it?) asks the question—Can any man forbid water, that these should not be baptized, who are already taught by the Spirit to cry Abba? But again, if the simplicity of childhood has departed in after time, and sin has broken out, how hard is the return to it and the becoming again as little children! We might almost without qualification say that he who has never trembled at the invocation, and confessed that he dared not take it upon his lips, has never yet learned to utter it from his heart. Then does the word of grace attract the spirit and overcome—Have I not brought it down to thee in thy sin and misery, do I not give it up to the common use and even desecration of all men, in order that those who receive it in faith and are willing, should learn to use it in spirit and in truth? Then we hear the appeal to those who are parents—If ye then, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your Father who is in heaven! And then comes that knowledge which can never be enough learned, that we, through the Son, have also a Father, who is never weary of coming and laying hold of us through the power and impulse of his Holy Spirit. Only begin with this encouraging assurance, and let every Our-Father anew from your lips to your heart declare—that he who hath given thee the word, gives also the faith, the grace and the spirit of prayer to use it. Thus the Gospel goes forth among the heathen in this prayer, laying hold of their innermost and first natural feelings after God—"On high above the stars a good Father dwells!" and transforms the presentiment into assurance, in every one who receives it to his heart.

* It may be taken for granted that it is no design of ours to exhibit the initial petition for bodily necessity as a "common petition among the other more elevated" (Rothe's Ethik, p. 339), but we admit, at the outset, its full significance and justness as such. Yet the position of Karrer (our Lutheran critic, to whom we shall again revert) that the true meaning is only the earthly bread, and that it is perpetrating robbery upon poor Christians if they are not allowed to use the prayer in that individual sense, seems to be pushing the matter to an extreme. I am entirely misunderstood, as if I only tolerated the most obvious and bodily reference, with little approval.

† The reader must consider whether this disposition is the logical construction which Theremin deprecates (Abenstunden, p. 439, 3d ed.), and also whether, besides this not absolutely necessary arrangement, other quite different combinations are supposable, as is there conceived. But we very much doubt whether the parallel with the commandments, which our critic Karrer gives (Zeit sch. für die luth. Theol. 1848. 3) can be regarded as preferable.

Further, what an inexhaustible meaning is there in the conjunction, in this first glance towards heaven, of the Father-name, which is inborn and sweet to every child of man, with the universal compass of all things and the hosts of the universe! He whose are all the heavens, and not thy own earth merely, is the Father, is thy Father! All true prayer from under heaven goes up to him, even though eyes and hands be not lifted up, even though the heart should return into itself to seek the Thou of prayer. Yet whoever would in the wilful delusion of his spirit seek it there alone, is at the very first appealed to by this prayer of our Lord: Not so! Not in thyself! every good gift cometh down from above! The heavens give not showers (Jer. xiv. 22); the sun, and the moon, and the stars have no power in themselves and can impart nothing, but the Living God in his own world. By this is all pantheism condemned, which, having first miserably compressed and shrivelled up this universe of things, knowing no other spirits than the spirit of man, knowing nothing of secret things beyond the history of the earth; then proceeds to make this scanty "all" into the god of its idolatry. Every child who can utter "Our Father which art in heaven," may put to shame such vain thinkers, and teach them a lesson of faith (Heb. xi. 3).

But the Lord at the outset does not teach us merely to say—In heaven, as afterwards in the third petition it is used in contradistinction to earth (Matt. xxviii. 18): this would have been ill adapted to inspire the confidence of prayer, and would have removed him who is nigh at hand to a far distance again. But he teaches us to speak according to the language which described the creation: In the heavens. It would be well if the Lutherans would take that again from the Reformed. Where God is, there is heaven; and where is God not? When these first words are more deeply pondered after this first upward glance, there is found to be no antithesis in them to the here below of him who prays, but they rather suggest a responsive descent of heaven to earth, and into the heart of the petitioner. I dwell in the high and holy place, with him also that is of a contrite and humble spirit! Here is the heaven of prayer, which opens to the petitioner when the high and lofty One, whose glory is sung by all principalities and powers in his temple, and in his house of many mansions, bows down in his holy mercy to the abject ones, who otherwise could never by any struggles and endeavors rise to him. He whose are the heavens is the Almighty Father; as he can help as God, so will he help as Father. He is the true Father, in a sense beyond that of his faint images—the fathers upon the earth He is the universal Father; high and extendec as the heaven is above the earth, so universal is his presence to praying hearts, opening up in them every where the countless heavens of his manifestation, like the suns in the drops of dew. The Lord had, however, previously said: But thou, when thou prayest, enter into thy closet, and pray to thy Father—for the "thy" must have its own prior claim, and it is obviously understood that he who prays, first of all prays for himself. Yet he now gives us a common prayer—Our Father! And even in the most essentially personal supplication and wrestling, which would only cry—My bread—My trespasses—Deliver me—we must ever bear in mind that we do not alone thus pray. If faith utters the word "Father," then love, without which faith cannot be, immediately associates with it "our," that all its prayer may go into the great fellowship of supplication, and all its petitioning be intercession also.* There is here an anticipation of the subsequent—As we forgive our debtors (Mal. ii. 10). If with all others, but also all others with me and for me, in the presence of the one common Father of us all. Just as if thou wert to enter in diffidence and fear the audience chamber of thy king, and foundest there hundreds else with whom his majesty was kindly speaking; so should thy closet be large enough for all to enter with thee who pray under heaven, that thy faith may thus gather strength: Where all are will I be, I will wait with them and with them be heard and be blessed!

But now to the petitioning. Between every word of true prayer, which does not remain the mere conversation of the heart before him, but becomes communion with him, God speaks in answer. Listening to these answers the soul is moved to the most inward progress of its utterance. Thus now, after we have boldly uttered the invocation, the first voice of Majesty speaks from his throne—Am I a father, where is mine honor? (Mal. i. 6). Then comes the confession, in common with all who pray, and on behalf of all who pray not: Alas we are not yet thy true children! we are yet under the heaven, and where the "Holy! Holy! Holy!" of the highest heavens fills not yet all lands and all hearts. Holy is the first word, which we are taught to learn in the Lord's Prayer, the vocabulary of all fundamental and elementary ideas in which man must speak of God and to him; and it can only be learned in speaking to him, out of the invocation that is first uttered. He has not made us shrink back terrified by his—I am holy! He has indeed by anticipation impressed this upon our hearts in the Father-name, but he now demands that which he has given, not indeed as yet by his solemn—Be ye holy! but by the prayer of his own Spirit proceeding from our spirit: We would be holy—O! that we were so; that we may be, help us, good Father in heaven! Hallowed be—the race of thy fallen children, mankind, upon earth; they who call upon thy name, as well as they who do not call upon it, yea know it not as yet. This is its meaning, but it is not so said. Not for our own sake do we pray, so much as for his name's sake. We have taken it into our lips with all the boldness of permitted and commanded confidence, and now meets us the solemn—Not in vain! Befitting lowliness and reverence are joined with this childlike confidence, and we only pray for the honor of his name. Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but to thy name give the glory! By this is the self of the natural man, which even in prayer would ask and have for its own sake only, cut up from the roots; and the first and last principle of all prayer, is laid down in the first petition which so far includes all the rest. The prayer proceeds from the individual heart, and then goes forth, with a—Hallowed in us—which must be understood, over all the world, even as far as the "Our-Father" reaches. It has its degrees of meaning, and three in particular: for children who begin to learn it, as for heathens and all who know it not—Reveal thy name that we may know it, and utter it! for all who know it, but hold that knowledge in error and human delusions—Take away man's lie, which hangs around thy name! finally for all, who know it but deny it in act, who acknowledge it, but not from their hearts—Take away that most grievous dishonor of thy name, that those who call upon it, sanctify it not in their lives! Thus do we here for ourselves and for all the world lift up our confession and our vows: Glory be to God in the highest! In this all is included in one compendium; and the Pharisaical—Mine be the glory! which has a tendency to rise in God's children's hearts, is for ever condemned. For the name is, indeed, not merely the word of appellation by which we address God; neither is it (as a false catechetical tradition in its pretended wisdom runs) God himself in his being and nature, but the acknowledgment and the praise of God, revealing himself to us and in us.* But he reveals himself through him, in whom his name is (Exod. xxiii. 21), the Son, in whom the Father himself is honored, in whose coming God's kingdom comes.

* As Lange says: "Even childhood is not without its distinctive feeling of human brotherhood," though this expression seems to embrace too much, when "all good spirits" are incorporated into this great brotherhood.

The kingdom is come, as the Lord's first preaching announced in another sense; but he here teaches us also that it is not yet come, but ever continues coming until the time when there shall be no more room or reason for such a prayer upon earth. The kingdom of God, by which he rules the world, is not here signified: that stands immovable and admits of no coming. But it is his kingdom of grace, which not only judges but extinguishes sin, and re-establishes his honor, his Father-honor again in the sinner. It comes, indeed, of itself without our prayer, inasmuch as, if it did not descend as a free gift for the poor in spirit, they could never have prayed for it, much less have drawn it into themselves by their prayers; nevertheless it comes not without our prayer, but in it and with it. The supplication which is excited and nourished upon earth—Thy kingdom come! is itself the evidence of its coming, its fruit at once and its seed in continual mutual co-operation between God and man. Thus it begins to exist, and goes on progressively until the kingdom of grace is consummated in the kingdom of glory. Until this is accomplished, the prayer thus given to us retains its value and force as a promise. Again, as it is not we who are hallowed but the name of God in us, just so it is not—Help us that we may come into thy kingdom! but—Let thy kingdom come to us! Whoever with a kind of selfishness supplies in his heart—To me—and seeks even in the kingdom of heaven his own blessedness as his, is at once and always condemned by the language of this petition, which does not here mention "to us" at all. It does indeed belong to it, and not merely in the sense of the narrow "even to us," but, in earth, yea upon the whole earth, where as yet far other than thy will reigns! That Christendom has prayed this second petition so long, and prays it now so much, without the corresponding missionary impulse, and missionary work, is the most mournful evidence that could be adduced of the great blindness which opposes every where this prayer and its clearest words of light. Where, however, this blindness is only that of the understanding, the horizon over which the eye may range being limited upon this subject, the prayers for the coming of the kingdom which have issued from believing hearts may, notwithstanding, co-operate to the good of the heathen. From the beginning they may have been sowing secretly and unconsciously the seed of future harvests, even as the children's Hosanna contributed to the destruction of the Adversary.

* Assuredly the first petition goes out from the previous invocation—"Our Father," continuing its invocation and adoration; yet it is not the same with it, in the sense of being its application, or, as it were, a customary doxology appended to it. It has an actual petition of its own. We cannot concur with Laufs (Rheinische Monatsschrift, Nov. 1847), who, following older precedents, would deny this, and refuse to admit that veneratio and laudatio may be made, in any sense petitio.

Finally, where is the kingdom, and where does it come? Where the will of the King is done. The three petitions, without any "and" interposed, are inseparably three-one, as was said above; and as we pass from one to the other, we become more and more convinced of the deep principle that underlies them all. Thinkest thou that his name is hallowed at least in this place or that, so that one might confidently cry out concerning it, Lo here or lo there? then look narrowly whether the kingdom of honor and glory be indeed fully come, and pray on! Thinkest thou that the kingdom, too, is come here or there? then question profoundly whether it be indeed inwardly set up in the children of the kingdom, whether they do the will upon earth as it is done in heaven, voluntarily, and entirely without any evil will or device openly or secretly contradicting it, and pray on: As it is in heaven; where there is no disobedience, nothing disorganized, nothing but the will, the kingdom, the honor of God. As in the courses of suns and stars, so among the morning stars and sons of God (Job xxxviii. 7), there is the festal service of those who, active in rest, shout for joy in the ranks of blessedness. So should it be upon earth; vast is the meaning which carries the promise in this prayer far above all the stir and tumult of humanity, inviting and urging all the children of God to unwearied wrestling in praying and receiving, and fervor in doing his will! By this petition, if he ventures to take it into his lips, the Godless man condemns himself; with it the sufferer comforts himself, and is assured that through the gracious will of God all evil shall lose its hold upon the meek, who already have in hope the earth for their inheritance; by it the slothful man invigorates himself, the self-willed rebukes himself, and by it the will of the Spirit, which must conquer, prays itself through all the impediments of an imposing flesh, to perfect victory. The Forerunner himself, in the weakness of our flesh, prayed this prayer before us, yet without sin.*

In this manner have we, arrived thus far, prayed down and prayed away through the invocation and right confession of God the Father, all false selfishness of mine and ours, though without naming it, from the most impious and devilish pride of self-glory which reigns in the world down to the slightest and merest volition of poor individual humanity. Let him who has not in this sense used this prayer, begin it entirely anew. In the first three petitions all that follow them were profoundly included; where then was the need of these after the former were fulfilled? The gracious giver of our prayer permits and requires us to speak move plainly, and, after having spoken of the honor of God, to unfold our own need, and our own plague. The prayer, which aims to lift us up to heaven, does not accomplish this at once, but we still sink back in our misery—still on earth! it therefore sets out again afresh, taking its stand on earth. Well might we in the former have essayed—"I would go up to thee in faith!" the attempt could not be in vain and without profit; but its best effect was to strengthen and excite us still more urgently to proceed—"Come down to me on earth in love!" This is the central turning-point of transition between the two halves of this prayer; the fourth petition in the heart of it indicates that transition.

How runs it? Give us this day what we need, the bread which pertains to our being and life! Bread as such? Poor man in the flesh upon earth thinks immediately of the wants of his bodily life, the supply of which it is not in him to create; he may think of it, for the gracious dictator of our prayer designs not to prevent this petition, nay rather puts it in his mouth. Yet is it, according to man's fallen nature, the first genuine prayer, with which we all begin, whereas the prayer for God's glory should be the first. With a profound reference to our earthly condition and our earthly need, does the second portion of the prayer commence; and sets out afresh, by teaching us, as the first elevation of man's head toward heaven, the table-prayer, as Claudius incomparably lays it down: "Man is not a cow or a horse, but he is among cows and horses, and must eat with them; therefore when he is fed, he rightly lifts up his head above them, conscious that he is thus fed and in order that he may never forget that he is." Are ye not, in your heavenly Father's sight, much better than they? They who would altogether take away the earthly meaning of the fourth petition, scarcely know what they say: is it not necessary that they should thus pray, and can we suppose the Lord not to have included so necessary a petition in his all comprehending prayer? In this sense the simple words have a large and profound meaning. It is at once evident that "bread" here means what man absolutely needs, excluding the slightest superfluity, and as opposed to all "not being content;" including, however, according to its proverbial use, food and shelter, in addition to nourishment sufficient or suitable for our subsistence, (1 Tim. vi. 8). Ἐπιούσιος, substantial (improperly "daily" in our version), i. e. ἐπὶ τῇ οὐσίᾳ ἡμῶν αὐτάρκης, ἁρμόζων, sufficient or suitable for our subsistence, is not the daily (Chrysostom ἐφήμερος) bread which is already included in σήμερον, this day; hence it is in Luke, το καθ' ἡμέραν, day by day. We may not care for the morrow, and never pray into the future. Still less, therefore, is it to-morrow's bread, ἄρτος τῆς ἐπιούσης ἡμέρας (as in Gospel of the Hebrews, מחר).*

* Hamann to Herder calls this "Fiat voluntas tua" the true lapis philosophorum in the Pater-Noster.

* Comp. upon this Delitzsch in the Luther. Zeitschrift, 1850, 3, p. 469.

But it is just a translation of לֶחֶם חֻקִּי, "food convenient for me," as it runs in Prov. xxx. 8,* except that here in the Greek ἐπιούσιος, the idea of need is somewhat more prominent than that of appropriateness, proportion and sufficiency. Both, indeed, concur in one, according to the parallel cited by Lange out of the Gemara: "To every man what he needs for life, and to every body as much as is needful for it." We are also, in addition to this, reminded by σήμερον, to day, καθ' ἡμέραν, day by day, of the uncertainty of our earthly life, that we might with every to-day reach the term of our course, and know no morrow: and thus there is even here reference to a need that goes beyond our earthly life. But that we need our food for every to-day, the ἐπιούσιος, for subsistence, boldly acknowledges. The Father gives it without prayer, even to the evil, and adds to it much more besides; but his own children may not only thus receive it, they bring with them the prayer to which they are bound as the expression of their thankfulness, as acknowledgment of their obligation. They also should remember that God may at any moment withdraw what he has given, and consequently their "Give" includes—Continue to us and preserve! Thus poor and rich are alike petitioners before God's gate, all the care of poverty, and all the security of possession alike dissolved in this daily asking and receiving. Finally, the "our" in this more outward meaning, gives rise to two very important thoughts. It points to necessary labor, the true way of asking and receiving according to God's original appointment for man in Gen. iii. 19, independently of which we eat not our own bread (2 Thess. iii. 12; 1 Thess. iv. 11, 12) but another's.† Similarly, it points to the obligatory communication and fellowship, since as we in "our" and "us" pray with and for one another, so we may not hold any thing that we receive exclusively and covetously for ourselves alone. (Isa. lviii. 7, "Deal thy bread to the hungry;" comp. 1 Sam. xxv. 11.)

But with all this it is not admitted, that earthly bread is included in this petition; and by no means, that the children of the Father are not to think of more than this in the word of Jesus. A petition only for earthly bread, we insist, would stand alone, interrupting the course of the whole prayer for spiritual gifts; and would neither have connection with the preceding, nor be a fit transition to the following, petitions. What the Lord says in Matt. vi. 33, must be the key to the exposition here: it is in the sense of that saying that he commands us to pray for bread. As certainly as the weak beginners begin with the earthly bread, a prayer which is granted to us all; so certainly must the petition have a wider meaning for such as no longer, at least in many an "Our Father," care for or ask for earthly bread, because they know that it already falls to their portion. Or are there none who thus petition, and who find out what further the Lord intends, their hunger and thirst after righteousness interpreting the word—Give us the bread of thy strength, the gift of thy grace, which we need that we may live in thee and to thee! To them indeed the distinction between the one and the other vanishes, and this may indicate the truest and most consistent use of this petition; they care only to say, Give us thy gifts, O Father, that we may possess and enjoy them; fill thou all our human need, whether of body or of soul! But as much as the soul is more than the body, we should learn to give the pre-eminence to the spiritual in our thought and in our prayer.*

Thus are we taught by the sacred three of the following petitions, strictly united as they are by "and:" they assuredly are designed to give us a more detailed explication, and individual exhibition of the general "Give us" which preceded.

This "and," which from this petition forwards, unlike the first three, forms a link between each (in the concluding one passing into the still stricter conjunction, but), thus appears to have in the first instance a twofold sense of connection, and that whether the one or the other meaning of bread is assumed. If thy thoughts rested simply in the idea of bodily necessity, this "and" comes immediately to excite the acknowledgment which is needful in order to the humility of that prayer—But we are altogether unworthy of what we ask, we have not deserved to receive, but must expect it only from thy mercy. Thus the prayer placed in thy lips constrains thee, immediately after thou hast paid thy bodily need its tribute, to bring to God thy soul's need likewise: the continuous "and" becomes a self-recollecting "also," penetrating forcibly the heart and conscience. But of what avail—shouldst thou say in thine heart—is the food which perisheth, if thou didst not in in addition and more especially heal the hurt of my soul, in order to life and refreshment of my inner man? But if thou hast, on the other hand, as a disciple of Jesus, lifted up thy prayer, according to his instruction and exhortation elsewhere, for the "bread which cometh down from heaven," then is the "and" which follows a mere transition to the more express acknowledgment and specification of that which thou meanest, and requirest, and prayest for, and receivest by that prayer for the bread of the soul.

The forgiveness of sins is and must ever be the first nourishment and refreshment, the first gift of God's grace even to his children. To them indeed the whole prayer is properly given, for only they can truly say "Our Father." The first cry and supplication of a returning prodigal son, does not so appertain to the Lord's Prayer as to find its place first of all in this fifth petition. That has been uttered before and independently of it. I am not worthy to call thee Father! The confidence of an enjoyed reconciliation is presupposed in the invocation, and the first three petitions which are developed from it. He whose conscience is first aroused to repent of and turn from his sins and misdeeds by the fifth petition (though it may, indeed, condescend to the exertion of this influence), has at least uttered all that precedes without sincerity and truth. This itself has added to his sin, and it would have been better for him to have begun with "forgive me" before and in the first "Our Father," in order that he might truly be included in the "our." Hence the Lord does not here say, Our sin and iniquity or our transgressions (παραπτώματα, as afterwards in ver. 14); but he uses the much milder expression, ὀφειλήματα, debts. We may indeed strictly say that his first forgiveness every man must supplicate alone, for himself (my sin, my sins!); he may not include his own absolution in the wide and general "our," and should not cast in his sin at once with the petition which the congregation of God's children here present. This refers rather to a daily-recurring need like the fourth petition, and all that daily repentance in order to daily forgiveness which is needful even for the children of God. Here then the prayer comes close home to that which is our own, that evil in us, which the Father alone can take from us, while he imparts to us his own good; for sin is essentially our own, and must be considered as our guilt, before we can speak of a further healing. Under these "debts" is included all that over which the saints have yet to mourn, down to the minutest shortcoming and intermission in doing good and the practice of mercy, down to the most secret defect of unholiness or imperfection in good works. It teaches us to ask forgiveness even for our "secret faults," and for that very reason, because they are secret to ourselves. And if we should imagine that overlooking of such infirmity in us is necessarily to be supposed and taken for granted, this petition strikes down all such rising thoughtlessness, presumption and pride at once, by teaching us that the remains of sin in us require the same forgiveness through grace that we received at first. Hence the Lord, when in Luke xi., he repeated the prayer, solemnly explained his meaning by substituting ἁμαρτίας, sins, and it would be well for us sometimes to impress it upon our memory by changing the term: Forgive us our sins!

* Which Meier too (Die ursprüngliche Form des Dekalogs, p. 42) has this time rightly seized.

† Man lifts his imploring, empty hands to heaven, and God lays work upon it—Thus hast thou thy bread!

* We cannot understand how, as Alford thinks, this higher, mystical meaning of ἄρτος, bread, is excluded by the addition of ἡμῶν, our. for it is just the inner man, who prays for himself, even in the case of bodily need.

And now, in the very heart of this prayer for that mercy on which we all daily live, and that acquittal which we all daily need, stands the single vow, which the Lord has inserted in direct contrast to all the vain and precipitate condition-prayer of man's invention. It is only in the spirit of gross and presumptuous misunderstanding and perversion that a nameless author (Die Evangelien, ihr Geist und ihre Verfasser, Leipz.) maintains that no subtilty can explain away the Pharisaic self-righteousness from this appendage to the prayer. For it is not anything that we bring with a view to merit forgiveness when we say we forgive, but our purpose, and that we are now willing to forgive. While in all the petitions such vows lie concealed—We would fain have it so, we will let thy name be hallowed in us, we will do thy will in thy kingdom; there is here, though only here, an openly expressed—We will! That ἀφίεμεν, we forgive, is in this place, first of all, such a vow, viz., to render the mercy we receive to others, and to do to others as God to us, is quite evident; for who ever forgave his brother from his heart, who had not previously learnt by receiving it, what forgiveness is? But the promise further, even while we are praying, becomes a present fulfillment, in the joyous avowal—Yea, we do forgive. Whoever brings his sins before the mercy-seat of God in genuine contrition, consents by that very act to the death of all his revenge and all his wrath, and is already reconciled to every one, who might be termed his debtor. Here is the root of the Law's fulfillment in us through the power of divine grace entering our souls; this love, thus forgiving, can do no evil to a brother which he would have to forgive. This is so entirely and essentially necessary in itself, that it required no express statement or resolution to be uttered, no legal—I will because I should, I will not what I should not. As the first invocation put away all idolatry and image-worship, so is all murder and anger, adultery, stealing, slandering, and whatever other evil to our neighbor there may be, put away from the heart and will of him, who prays the fifth petition, and abides in it.

But that abiding is of the utmost importance, and thus, finally, the added sentence assumes the character of a warning condition: If ye forgive not, neither will your Father in heaven forgive! Here lies the emphasis of—As we forgive. In this all living, dogmatic theology, which has faith in order to justification through grace as its vital heart, and all living moral theology which knows only of love, are joined together and harmonized in that one word which the heart utters to the Father in secret, a word so simple that the weakest may understand it, yet at the same time a word of inexhaustible meaning, the applications of which know no end. Who has sufficiently admired the wisdom of the Lord's love in the placing of this petition? A little child, who has just learned to distinguish between good and evil, and to feel sin in the conscience, may apprehend it; again, the congregation of the saints, having sin and discord within it, needs only to urge the fifth petition in all the fulness of its meaning—peace is re-established, and the sin put away. On the other hand, he who forgives not his brother, testifies against himself that his "as" must be turned against himself into a frightful imprecation—Forgive not me also! Dares man, then, pray to God: Forgive me my sin, but this man or that, mine enemy, forgive not? If we say: Forgive us—we have already included all for whom God's mercy waits, and have therefore prayed for our enemies, as the Lord requires. And should we refuse that love to those, whom we acknowledge to be prepared with ourselves to receive the common mercy of God as his enemies and debtors? It is only, however, in condescension to our estate, that they are regarded as our debtors. Sin is not committed against us, but against God alone, with whom forgiveness is; and he who duly remembers this, will only say to his enemy in accommodation for the sake of his importunity: I forgive thee—but he must also at the same time say, in effect, with Joseph: Am I in God's stead? (Gen. l. 19). Finally, if thy heart be thus rightly affected, and yet thou art troubled with weakness of faith, doubting whether God will forgive thee this thing or that, then does the fifth petition give thee strong consolation; assuring thee that there is forgiveness with him in heaven, even as there is with thee on earth, and that God's heart is not harder than thine own, which, indeed, his grace only has made so soft (1 John iv. 7, 16).

Have we now reached the end of our petition? We might have put this question at each petition, for every one in a certain sense includes all the rest in itself. We should, indeed, have reached the close now, after having received mercy from the Father, and rendered it again in love to our brethren, were it not that sin, as it is guilt, so also is corruption in ourselves and in the world. What lies in the past we have put away, and may forget it, even as God no more remembers it; and so even for the future, we have pledged ourselves to a continuance in the life of love, wherein sin shall no more find place. But, however sincere the heart that has done this, there still remains the sin, harassing us from within and without, so that we may yet again fall into a state of guilt before God, and again trespass against that neighbor with whom we had confirmed our peace before the mercy-seat. We extend our thoughts towards what awaits us in the future, and that same sincere heart is constrained to acknowledge that God's grace alone can protect, preserve and sanctify us. The evil world in which we live is full of temptation; the tempter is its prince: and in ourselves there is yet the evil concupiscence, the treacherous infirmity, the fleshly susceptibility: should we not fear the world, the devil and ourselves; should we not betake ourselves to urgent prayer for help and salvation? The more fully we experience, day by day, that we yet need the fifth petition, the more fully do we press forward, in watching and prayer, into the realization of the meaning of the sixth.

But how does the Lord ascribe temptation to the Father, who tempteth no man to evil? Partly, because all things which may befall us are under his dominion and permission, and then because he would have the uncontested right to permit our falling, to subject us to tests which we could not sustain, and trials in which we could not stand. This right we humbly concede to his justice, but we know, that while we ask according to his command and promise, his mercy, the same which forgave our sin, will not leave us to our corruption, to contract fresh guilt. Although he sees fit to prove, to discipline, and confirm his children through conflict with sin, so that we, as his children, may not altogether pray against and deprecate temptation; yet may we say in humble confidence and encouragement—Μὴ εἰσενέγκῃς, Lead us not so deeply into temptation, that we must succumb to it; not beyond what we are able, so that no way shall be made for our escape (1 Cor. x. 13). (Comp. ἵνα μὴ εἰσέλθητε, Matt. xxvi. 41.) And in our thus praying we are secured. This prayer suppresses all that presumption and pride which threaten us, and which would say with Job—When he hath tried me, I shall come forth as gold (ch. xxiii. 10); but it also removes all despondency lest confidence and strength should fail: the Lord knoweth how to deliver the godly out of temptation (2 Pet. ii. 9). Further exposition of this comprehensive and significant petition, would lead us away from our object (which is here only to exhibit the connection and train of thought), into all the depths of the Christian doctrine concerning sanctification and its appointed means. We make only a few further remarks which are obvious, and immediately derived from this petition. He who thus prays, yields not himself up to temptation, but, when it comes, uses the armor which God provides; he who thus prays for himself and for others, desists from all condemnatory judgment of others' sin, since he in himself only too well knows, that the Searcher of hearts alone can estimate the might of temptation.

Thus has the sixth petition at length led us, in language increasing in plainness and significance, to the root of all our misery and corruption, the eradication of which alone will make us perfectly sound, and holy and happy; for the most internal, persistent temptation, without which no temptation from without could do us harm, is the lusting of the flesh against the spirit. Now at last does the Lord comprise in one finished concluding petition, which is itself the sum of all prayer, our sin and the whole world's, with all its connections and consequences; one great word embraces all—τὸ πονηρόν, the evil—and from it we are taught to pray to the Father for full salvation and deliverance.* The ἀλλά, but, which closely connects this petition with the preceding (Lead us not into, but entirely out of), teaches us, indeed, so much as this, that the real evil which is first of all referred to, is that sin which is still present in temptation; but it does not by any means forbid us to extend our view further. The Reformed divines, in reckoning six petitions, not only break the sacred number seven which should certainly be held fast, and the yet more express arrangement of the prayer, as we saw above, in relation to the Ten Commandments; but they further introduce an unacceptable tautology in making the two sentences one. When, further, they understand τὸν πονήρον in the masculine as the evil one, I trace the same lack of liturgical feeling and perception which attaches so much in other respects to their church. This is the liturgy of all liturgies, and here it reaches its sublime close, which through the deep lowliness of the believing—Deliver us! immediately passes on to the heavenly doxology—Thine is the kingdom! And just at this point must the conqueror confer that honor upon the vanquished enemy, to name him with his threatening power? Are the believing children of the Father, already redeemed, for ever to be subjected to the contumely, at the end of every private and common prayer, of mentioning him? Let him believe this who can; our inmost sense of holy propriety recoils from it. The Redeemer has left his own name unmentioned, though himself the ground, and medium, and end of every prayer; and can he be thought to have expressly mentioned Satan? We may and we must, indeed, have thought, as at first, of the Devil's kingdom and will, so now of the tempter and original of evil; but none of this was uttered in word. I would suggest to such interpreters: Try the experiment, close your prayer at any time, let it be in the most joyful festival of the divine service and at the sacrament, but uttering in plain words the cry of distress—Deliver us from the Devil! and would you not instantly feel how harshly that sounds. Further, there is nothing personal in the whole of the second part of the prayer, the πονηρόν, evil, must correspond with the ἄρτος, ὀφειλήματα, πειρασμός, bread, trespasses, temptation. Should we be disposed to understand thus also τὸν πονηρόν, the evil one, in John xvii. 15, against the accompanying ἐκ, out of (other than 2 Thess. iii. 3), and the internal connection of the discourse in that place? We rather look there for the true explanation of this last petition, as also yet more definitely in 2 Tim. iv. 17, 18, where, according to our conviction, the apostle, just after he had mentioned the raging lion, passes on to the all-embracing ἀπὸ παντὸς ἔργου πονηροῦ, from every evil work; and (as the ῥύσεται, will deliver, shows) quotes actually and expressly the last petition of the Lord's Prayer with the Doxology and the Amen pertaining to it.*

* Our request to be preserved from temptation rises into the longing for full redemption, as Lange well expresses it.

What is then the evil which we finally name? We can only apprehend it in the same way as מָוֶת, θάνατος, death elsewhere in the Scripture are understood: it is sin itself and all its consequences, from the first pang that it inflicts, through all the necessities which it creates so long as it remains, to the damnation where it rests for ever; no less than the whole of this combined. Thus it is the fit conclusion and sum of all petitions, and the deliverance which is asked for is a full redemption into the heavenly kingdom (σῶζειν εἰς τὴν βασιλείαν τὴν ἐπουράνιον). It tells us that only by the taking away of all sin can this evil be taken away (as the position of the prayer after all the others also indicates); it points us most impressively, when the ἀλλά, but, is rightly understood, to the fundamental evil of all, bids us think of that, and to ask no other deliverance than the being delivered from it. But does there not follow from this the deliverance from all guilt, all need, all care, all strife, yea from every kind of pain and suffering? And could an all-comprehending prayer, which gives a place to every petition of human infirmity, exclude that?—Make us happy! save us! Take all need from us, and every plague! This is a prayer equally permitted and equally indispensable to God's children upon earth, as that for daily bread. The natural selfishness and blindness of men lead them to begin with this prayer, without reflecting how and in what way it can alone be answered: in his wisdom the Lord has, therefore, placed it at the close. And as he in the weakness of our flesh used this prayer for the taking away of his bitter cup, so will he give words to his disciples which shall express their weakness, their sighs, and their sorrows. But when a member of the Reformed Church cries to his Father in any lesser, though violent, trouble—Take it away! and finally in the agony of death—Put an end to my pain! where does he find such a perfectly justifiable prayer in his Our-Father?

Moreover, we Lutherans know as God's children the prayer which preceded: Thy will be done! We know full well, that happiness and rest before the time, without the κακία or "evil" of every day (ch. vi. 34), might be an evil, which the Father would not and will not give us, even though in our ignorance we should ask it; that good days may well be more full of temptation than evil ones, and we have prayed against all temptation. We do not therefore say: Father, be no Father to us! chastise us not for our profit, that we may be partakers of thy holiness (Heb. xii. 10). We know that external, temporal, salutary evil both is and brings deliverance from evil properly so called, eternal evil; and we are able to give such a meaning as this to the petition —Strike hard that we may be saved, give us the cup of our healing which we must drink to the dregs! But this does not prevent us from rejoicing in the prospect of deliverance from all need, leaving it to our heavenly Father's righteous will with perfect confidence; in our infirmity we may with his permission offer it with our thought fixed especially, at some seasons, upon our sufferings; we may boldly give expression in these words of our prayer to that never-absent prayer of the heart of all, which cries for help, and longs for perfect rest and peace within and without the soul.

* Lange has recently very cheerfully and disinterestedly, admitted the interpretation of τὸ πονηρόν which we have espoused.

Thus have we in the seven petitions—and not beginning with the seventh—prayed ourselves gradually up from the depths of our ruin and misery. We ascended at once to the Father in heaven; we further called upon his name, before we spoke of our own sin and earthly need, for the coming of his kingdom and the accomplishment of his will; then first we came down to earth again, and drew down by our supplications the gifts of the Father's mercy—forgiveness, strength and deliverance. If the last petition had been placed first, the tone of lamentation—From evil! would have predominated; but because it is the last, the joyful emphasis falls rather upon the equally confident and humble—Deliver us! as if we should say: Yea, thou wilt deliver us! or: Deliver thou us in the right time, according to thine own counsel; other deliverance than that we desire not. We acknowledge that evil remains, and that we feel it to be evil, (woe to the man, who is so well with the world and the flesh that he can deride Luther's "Jammerthal," the valley of woe, and dispense with the longing look towards heaven!) we acknowledge also that we neither would nor could deliver ourselves; but we rest upon the prayer which the Redeemer himself has given us, and are already saved in hope.

And now, can it be that the thanksgiving and ascription which sets the crown upon all prayer, is not genuine, that is, that it was not given by the Lord as he gave the petitions? Euthymius so early was of this view. But if there is anywhere an internal criticism which may maintain its prerogative over the external testimonies of the manuscripts which we have directly received as historical monuments, it is in this place, as similarly in 1 John v. 7. All the orthodox, who, submitting to the apparent results of all external criticism, concede that the Lord did not himself append this conclusion, yet give it place in their exposition as if it belonged there, find it most excellently appropriate, and involuntarily confess how aptly and profoundly it connects itself with the petitions of the prayer. For ourselves we rest calmly in hope, that one day, when all that is lost is found again, and the patchwork of history is a completed whole, it will be made clear how it has come to pass that this doxology early fell away, and was omitted from the manuscripts and the fathers, which now certainly confound us. Then will the verbal correctness of the Peshito be confirmed, and the abbreviation in the Apostolical Constitutions be seen to be manifestly an abbreviation of the words given by the Lord, just as Paul, according to 2 Tim. iv. 18, received them, and yet does not quite exactly reproduce them. In Luke yet more is wanting, and probably not by Luke's fault; it is at least quite as conceivable that similar causes have been at work in the case of Matthew's Gospel, as it must be in every view inconceivable that the Lord actually closed with—Deliver us from evil! "Such a conclusion comes naturally to the praying heart;"* the church has ever possessed it, and will never more let it go; this is to us an irrefragable argument that the Lord has given it to every heart and to the whole church.† If we were disposed to go so far as to say that the Lord had to that end subsequently given it by his Spirit to the church, yet must we pause doubtfully before we hazard such a view. For apart from the question, why should the Lord have left this as an afterthought of his Spirit, we cannot bring our minds to think that he could have given a form of prayer without at least an Amen. (We have previously discovered the Amen of the prayer to have aptly counted into the Sermon on the Mount.) But the true Amen, according to the custom of all the Jewish prayers, which found their originals in the Scriptures of the Old Testament, carries with it invariably an expressed ascription of praise; similarly, according to the New Testament canon (Phil. iv. 6), no prayer is complete with prayer alone, without giving of thanks. This may be an answer to Bengel, who does not think the thanksgiving appropriate to the period at which the Lord gave the prayer. His prayer would have indeed had its introduction without it, but not its fit issue and outgoing; it would not have been, strictly speaking, a complete prayer, and the joyful concluding petition, if it did not issue in such an Amen, would lose its joyousness again, and would become an unanswered, resultless cry. Use the Lord's Prayer thus for a quarter of a year, evil being its last word, it will become intolerable to thee, and its conclusion will victoriously force itself upon thee. Yet once more, if such internal criticism may not maintain its prerogative, where is its place, and where are its rights? It may be matter for consideration, whether it be only an illusion, that with the doxology the Lord's Prayer includes ten words; that with it the us and our flow back again into thine, as thine flowed from our; that only with it the whole is rounded off and finds its true close. It may be asked, whether David's prayer (1 Chron. xxix. 11, 12) was not here by the Lord taken up, and for ever sanctified?

This conclusion manifestly unites the two tables of the prayer, once more presenting the sacred three-number, which could not be varied from. The kingdom embraces the first table by that one word which occurs in the middle of it; the power signifies the transition which we found in the gift of bread; the glory or honor is the end and goal of the fulfillment of the petitions of the second table, the δόξα or glory of God shining from his redeemed and sanctified creatures. When all is finally fulfilled, evil, temptation and guilt done away, all desires gratified, the will done, the kingdom come, the name hallowed; then will there remain on earth as in heaven naught but everlasting praise. With this he who prays returns to the first invocation, which included the Amen of all petition for faith, as in the preparatory trusting confidence which said: Art thou then our Father? before the particular petition broke forth: Be so to us, show thyself to us as our Father! Now again, and with the fullest confidence of strengthened faith, it is more openly spoken: Yea, verily, thou art our Father! "By this little word for, we set as it were, our foot upon one step of the throne, upon which he sits, reminding him of his matter, for it is his, and not ours alone!" Thine is, and can and will be in us, too, the kingdom, the power and the glory—will be in us, if we in harmony, acknowledgment, and obedience give it to thee, and this we have done in this our prayer. So, although we yet see it not (Heb. ii. 8), faith cries in defiance of all evil that yet remains, of all wicked devices and contradictory will: Thine is the kingdom even now, as it will be for ever! Thus does the Amen of prayer, every time it is uttered, anticipate the great universal Amen of all creation.

* Harms, Das Vaterunser in Predigten.

† [The author argues as a theologian, rather than as a critic. The genuineness of this doxology cannot be sustained against the evidence of the MSS. and versions.—Am. Ed.]

After all that we have hitherto discovered, there remains much more. The seven petitions, besides the full meaning of each separately, indicate, at the same time, the progress of human life in individual man, and the history of mankind as a whole. The child cries out to his Father, and learns his name, that it may be sanctified in him; the kingdom begins to come in him, the will begins to be revealed to him in instruction and discipline, that it may be done; then grows up the adult into life, to eat his own bread, who should not forget, in praying for it, his spiritual necessities—rather should all the more fully discern the gift of God which is infinitely necessary; then follows, commonly, first in the second half of life, the thorough seeking for forgiveness, the warfare of temptation; finally in old age the longing, ever-increasing till death, for deliverance from all evil, which is the closing petition of the dying man that emerges into the doxology of heaven. In the history of mankind at large began similarly the calling upon God's name (Gen. iv. 26); then came the kingdom in the beginnings of its preparation, the will was revealed in the law. In the midst of the years the Lord revived his work (Hab. iii. 2), when he who once spoke from Sinai came in the glory of his grace, and descended in Christ as the living bread of heaven for the hungering world. Then came the preaching of the word of reconciliation in all the world, then the hour of the great temptation upon all the world (Rev. iii. 10), specially upon the Church of the saints; finally, in the end of days will be the universal, closing deliverance, when suffering and pain and lamentation shall cease, all shall have become the kingdom of our God and the dominion of his Christ, and the glory of his glorifying Spirit shall shine from the redeemed.*

Such views may not be despised, for the wisdom of God exhibits strange phases in the word. We should be disposed, further, to investigate to what extent the fundamental principles of all divine doctrine, especially of New Testament preaching, may be developed from the simple ideas of the Lord's prayer. This would be better apprehended, if we could realize the conception of a people to whom nothing but this prayer had been at first given. Let us be permitted yet once more, and in conclusion, to parallel the seven petitions with the seven benedictions. The name of the Father is hallowed when the poor and wretched receive as little children the kingdom of heaven as a gift of prevenient grace. The kingdom of the Son, as such, is now made fully known to them, when they as mourners find comfort. The divine will is done already through the Holy Spirit, when the meek know themselves by the will of God to be the heirs of the earth. The bread is given for the supply of all who hunger and thrist after righteousness. The trespasses are forgiven to those who forgive, for the merciful receive mercy. Temptation is overcome by all those, who have no other will than to see God's face, as pure in heart. Evil, finally, is done away, when the children of peace, as children of God made manifest, dwell for ever in eternal peace with him in glory.

THE SERMON ON THE MOUNT—CONTINUED.

(Matthew vi. 14—vii.)

Verses 14, 15. The Lord recurs now to the subject of the fifth petition, because, as we have already said, the prescribed prayer leads through it to the establishment and fulfillment of the Law. Will theologians never come to read in simplicity, and perceive here a key to the whole of it? The centre of the Lord's prayer regarded in itself is the fourth petition, as we have seen; but it is in the fifth that that fundamental truth, which is its root in the Sermon on the Mount, first finds its full expression. That which in ch. v. 7, 23–26, 44–48, became more and more clearly prominent, and afterwards in ch. vii. 1, 2, is repeated as the head of a new section, stands here, as it were, in the very middle of the whole discourse, piercing into and laying hold of the central heart and living source of all true love, disclosing to us that point of union in which "to love as God loves" is seen to be as certainly given to us by his grace as it is demanded of us by his holy righteousness. This saying, which is so perfectly easy in its literal meaning, is at the same time so important and so in-exhaustibly to be learned anew, that our Lord in Mark xi. 25, 26, when he is speaking of the gift of faith, inserts it again in similar words. But it is also so deeply engraven on the conscience of men, that the son of Sirach, for instance (Wisd. xxviii. 1–5), could expressly say the same thing.* Forgiving on our part is so absolutely an indispensable condition of God's forgiveness, that it must not be viewed as the mere fruit which results from it, but rather as indicating the necessary internal disposition and feeling of our heart at the moment in which we actually seek and find his mercy. God forgives us, when we, receiving his mercy, are at the same moment disposed and in the frame to forgive others. Although he, on the one hand, knows before the thoughts of the insincere, and the stiff-neckedness of those who will afterwards fall from his grace (Deut. xxxi. 21, 27, 29), yet, on the other, he says in his preventing and anticipating faithfulness—Surely they are my people, children who will not lie (Isa. lxiii. 8). He intrusts, as it were, the gift of his love even to those who will not retain it, in order that he may justify his own goodness against the unthankful and the evil. From those, indeed, who afterward forgive not as they are forgiven, that which they received shall be again taken away; as the parable of Matt. xviii. 23–35 once more inculcates at large.

* Compare Von Meyer's Blätter für höhere Weisheit, v. 388.

Verses 16—18. This has been as a whole already explained and shown in the light of its general connection; it only remains now to refer somewhat more particularly to the details. The Lord by no means rejects fasting in itself, the humbling of the soul (עַנּוֹת נֶפֶשׁ, Lev. xvi. 29, xxiii. 27; Num. xxix. 7, xxx. 14) by taming and reducing the body, as an aid to repentance and prayer; any more than he rejects almsgiving as the demonstration of love, or uttered words for the exercise and realization of the inner spirit of prayer. Although in ch. ix. 14, 15, he opposed a new and free manner of fasting for his disciples, to the fasting oft not only of the hypocrites, but also of the well-meaning disciples of John; yet did he himself fast forty days at the beginning, as certainly many times afterwards, and recommend prayer and fasting for such emergencies as required thorough earnestness for the overcoming of evil spirits (ch. xvii. 21), just as the apostle in 1 Cor. vii. 5 pre-supposes as well known, and confirms, its Christian exercise. The early church laid much stress upon fasting, but should have left it to the freedom of every individual without any ecclesiastical ordinance; we Protestants, alas! have slighted it altogether too much, and have scarcely more than the name of our fast-days remaining. The prudence of freedom is necessary, however; hence comes forward the warning again: Not like the hypocrites! See it already in the word of prophecy (Isa. lviii. 5). Pharisaism had here also perverted all into a specious external work,* forbidding among the rest any greetings during the time of a fast: with such things in his view the Lord here paints the hypocrites from life, and sketches their whole character by one vigorous trait—They would appear unto men σκυθρωποί, of a sad countenance, and therefore disfigure their faces! Such as this in our day is the pietistic sour look, downcast head, and penance-wrinkled face, which, while they mar the shining of the true light of piety before men, also betray too much of the Pharisee remaining in those who make such exhibitions. The Lord unsparingly condemns all affectation in its minutest form, and counsels his disciples, in order that they may more securely avoid this sad danger, to adopt as a defence against it, where they have only to do with themselves in the sight of their Father in secret, a certain directly opposite dissimulation of face. This, however, is no hypocrisy, but the simplest truth; purer, indeed, in its principle of love than its faint type in the social life of the children of the world, the courtly and gracious external demeanor covering a different disposition within. The children of God should ever through faith rejoice in their God; and it should be their systematic habitus to exhibit this pleasant aspect to men. Feelest thou within thyself a necessity and constraint to afflict thy flesh by mortification and abstinence of any kind, do it if possible without any interruption of thine external cheerfulness. Yea, rather than detract in the slightest degree from the reality and the efficacy of thy secret humiliation before God, by any such external evidence of it as but too easily glides into ostentation; thou shouldst with more care than ordinarily anoint thine head and wash thy face.† Before trusted brethren thou mayest, even as before God himself, exhibit what thou art secretly aiming at; but men, as they are found in general, understand it not, and would only mar thy fasting by their censure or their praise. Finally, let it be well noted, that this rule, in its present connection, is only laid down for an actual, bodily fasting, in the ordinary sense of the word; such as a man himself, though under the influence of the Spirit, imposes upon his own flesh. Quite otherwise is it, when God appoints to us a day of fasting, for the weeping of the soul (Psa. lxix. 11, in the Hebr.), when the bridegroom's presence is withdrawn; then we fast in the deepest sense of the word (Matt. ix. 15), and it is obvious of itself, that the stranger in our company must perceive that we are σκυθρωποί (Luke xxiv. 17, in the Greek). In this there lies no danger of hypocritical seeming before men. But if thou hast already oft experienced, that by it he who was taken from thee is restored again, and if thou wilt be perfect, then hold such weeping of thy soul also, through the power of faith, in secret places (Jer. xiii. 17), and let not thy countenance cease to be outwardly anointed, or thy mouth to utter peace and love through the whole of that conflict which thou shouldst gradually learn to regard as joy. Thus shalt thou find consolation in thy secret mourning before God, and experience the fulfillment, even in this respect, of the beautiful and pregnant words of the hymn: "A stage of blessedness it is—the secret place!"

* Yet, indeed, when we look more closely, not without one of those errors in the expression which betray the apocryphal—as if we forgive first and then should pray.

* See Buxtorfii Synagoga Judaica, cap. xxx.

† The Essenes never anointed themselves, which may be mentioned in contradiction of the old folly that would make Jesus an Essene.

"And thy Father, who seeth in secret, shall reward thee openly!" This the Lord utters three times, vers. 4, 6, 18, and designedly indicates in this third instance the similar application of his discourse concerning the three works of righteousness, the uniformity of which the interposed prayer only seemed to break. This he does before he begins, by a striking interruption of the external connection, a new line of remark which, however, is internally in strict harmony with it.

Our former general arrangement of the whole has already disclosed to us this internal transition from ver. 18 to ver. 19. The opposition between Christ's disciples and the Pharisees, is closed with that most absolute contrast between the hypocrite who mortifies himself before men and the child of God who humbles his soul in secret—the seeming devotee and the earnestly devout. There now follows (what had been prepared for in the preceding, and was a strict development of it) the second great contrast—Not like the heathen! The better kind of Pharisee (or rather the Israelite, inasmuch as Pharisaism took its rise in the true Israelite position), did, indeed, seek at first to establish, like Saul, a righteousness before God derived from obedience to the Law; in this there was earnestness and sincerity, and so far this Old Testament preparation led the sincere and upright to the new covenant of grace, even as his almsgiving, fasting, and prayers prepared the proselyte Cornelius for the reception of forgiveness and the Holy Ghost. But Pharisaism proper, as it was further developed in the evil hearts of men, performed its works of righteousness only to be seen of men, and not at all in the sight of God: thus the Pharisee has inwardly become like the heathen, while abhorring him in his pride (Rom. ii. 22); through dependence on earthly good and attachment to earthly pleasure, an idolater as well as he. It will be borne in mind, how often in the Gospels the covetousness of the Pharisees is made prominent; and this will help us to understand why it is that with which our Lord begins when he is about to exhibit his own new Israel as in contrast with the heathen. It is not merely the heathen so called among men, who are to form the second link in this present discourse, but also, as is now sufficiently plain, the heathen in Israel (Psa. ix. 5, 15, 17, x. 16).

The discourse now passes more directly to the internal disposition of mind, which is at last shown to be the region of separation and distinction. There is now no more distribution of special commandments and good works, classified according to their principles. Yet it proceeds in a threefold order, though in a different manner. This is seen in the three leading ideas: Distinguish clearly between perishable treasures and possessions upon earth, and the incorruptible treasure of heaven! (vers. 19, 20). Seek this alone, walk with thine eyes singly fixed upon the true treasure! (vers. 21–23). Thus surrender thyself up to God's undivided service and trust, seeking first his kingdom, without care for your earthly need! This has the most extended treatment (vers. 24–34). Herein there is exhibited an inverted reference to the three fundamental groundtones of the whole Sermon. The first immediately casts a warning glance forward to the test at the end, where all shall be put to shame who have not put their trust in the living God, and all heathens, or earthly-minded men (these are in their deepest principle one and the same) shall perish. The second demands and urges, a sincere progress towards the goal. The third speaks in language of promise and encouragement, presents to faith the internal principle and commencement of a life not heathen, and thus most plainly indicates who are the true people of God, who the true heirs of the promised kingdom. But this whole section carries on and developes the principle which we have seen in the beginning. For it was absolutely necessary that a firm foundation should be first of all laid, in the right understanding of the Law according to its internal spirit and true meaning; in the full perception that naught would prevail but the strict practice of righteousness before God in secret (Psa. li. 8). Upon this foundation, is now built the devotion of the heart to God alone, and then we have further (for the development of the principle makes the principle itself more plain, and at the close the rigorous warning becomes strongest) the most urgent dissuasive from the attempt to join another service with his; the turning away of the heart, and the turning away of the eye from all that appertains to earth, in order to our living for the heavenly kingdom.

Verses 19, 20. A strong contrast is here seized and exhibited in the two words, earth and heaven. The Lord is standing in the midst of Israel according to the flesh, and his glance, which penetrates through the type into its reality and hidden truth, discloses to us another and a sure distinction: they who live for the earthly and the perishable, they are the heathen; they who live in faith with reference to the future, heavenly and eternal, are the children of the Father, the subjects and the heirs of the kingdom. In this deep generality, fully set forth at the close in vers. 32, 33, we have the commencement of a new discourse, which unfolds the germ, and includes all the principles of the apostolical sayings in Col. iii. 1–4. It was to his hearers of that time a clear testimony to the character and nature of the Messiah's kingdom, as the kingdom of heaven, spiritual, hidden, and looking for a future manifestation; the kingdom which, then only perfected when the seven petitions are fully fulfilled, begins in the heart with the first look towards heaven, and cry to the Father. Now it is before the Father in secret, then will the reward be open. The emphatic expression of this general view is to be rightly sought in the plain words which, for every man's conviction, distinguish between the earthly and the heavenly mind, describing him as laying up for himself treasures, possessions, goods, and seeking his enjoyments and happiness either here or there. In heaven: that is, by contrast, as the place and region where the true, eternal riches, the deposit against the day of revelation, are laid up, but also as the place and region, in which the heart that lays up this treasure already lives in heavenly aims and conversation: for where your treasure is, there will your heart be also. The better and enduring substance in heaven, we already have in our own possession and in our own hands (Heb. x. 34).

Perishableness is the quality of every thing earthly, hence, as Bengel critically saw, the little word ὅπου, where, has a distinctive emphasis as upon the earth, where nothing either is or can be other than corruptible. He who heaps up silver as the dust, and prepares raiment as the clay (Job. xxvii. 16), shall find out, that all the earthly and transitory possessions of mortal man pass away as they themselves who dwell in clay, whose foundation is in the dust, which are crushed before the moth (Job. iv. 19). The getting of treasures by a lying tongue is a vanity tossed to and fro of them that seek death (Prov. xxi. 6). The proverbial and popularly used expressions, moth and rust and thieves, men have been disposed to refer to the three main kinds of layed up goods in the ancient world—clothing, gold, corn. They have been referred, also, respectively (as by Braune) to that which is hostile in the inanimate world, in the animal kingdom, and among men; for which, however, a transposition would be necessary. It is only in the former reference that any truth lies; the moth which consumes garments is among the Scriptural figures. (See Job xiii. 28; Isa. l. 9, li. 6, 8; James v. 2.) But, as regards the next, the question rises, what βρῶσις, rust, is distinctively and to what it appertains. But since gold and silver receive no specific injury from rust, it has been supposed that the thieves (who διορύσσουσι, dig through houses [Job. xxiv. 16], breaking through walls) are the enemies of the treasured gold, and consequently that βρῶσις must be referred to the granary and full barns (Luke xii. 17), being the אוֹכֵל or "devourer" of Mal. iii. 11 (where the LXX. have βρῶσις), weevil or some other enemy of the corn. James, however (ch. v. 2, 3), evidently quoting the Sermon on the Mount (as we saw above also, on ch. v. 34), attributes the moth to the garments, but the rust, ἰός, to the gold and the silver, having previously used the general expression—"Your gold is cankered" (ὁ πλοῦτος σέσηπε). This gives us the right clue, and teaches us that we must not lay so much stress upon the threefold distinction of worldly goods (save that the breaking through may be especially referred to the underground ἀποθήκας of ver. 26), as upon the general idea of perishableness which they together convey. Βρῶσις is thus simply the consuming away, corruption, mildew, rotting of any kind which takes its rise from within the nature of this world's goods, as σής, the moth, on the other hand comes from without. Then rises before us the deeper meaning—all earthly good is subjected to corruption. It is essentially perishable, since either the moth comes upon it as upon a garment (echoing those well known Old Testament passages), or it finds within itself the element of another kind of blight. And what worm and rust consuming from within or without may spare for a while, is still insecure in the possession, not guaranteed against the thieves, who know how to break through the firmest defences. Thus James appropriately laid down his σέσηπε first; then he introduces the Lord's words, which he fundamentally explains, while saying in the style of oxymoron and in apparent contradiction with the reality of things, that gold and silver are cankered and rusted, by showing that this rust signifies in a wide sense that corruption of everything earthly and earthen, which like a fire shall eat the flesh of the rich men themselves. If we thus expound it, not overlooking the connection of the figure with the reality, yet giving its letter a spiritual interpretation, we may extend its range of application further, and think of honor and human glory (whereof the discourse had been speaking) as having its moth, and rust, and thieves. All this is obliquely aimed at, although the first glance, which gives character to the expressions, turns towards the Mammon which is afterwards especially named, and therefore points to earthly treasures in the narrower sense. And how impressive, in this view, is the contrast which is now first instituted between all these and the imperishable, and secure treasures of heaven, which are beyond the reach of corruption and the thief! (1 Peter 1–4; Luke xii. 33): βαλάντια μὴ παλαιούμενα, θησαυρὸν ἀνέκλειπτον, bags that wax not old, a treasure that faileth not. That first, again, we have treasures in the plural, is simply a transition to the next sentence in which it is significantly said —Your treasure; for in earthly good there is multiplicity, and variety, the heavenly possession alone and especially is a unity, a great whole (Matt. xix. 21).

Verse 21. What then is, thus considered treasure in heaven? The future reward from the Father, for this is the whole of vers. 1–18 collected and condensed into one; thus also it is praise, honor, and glory in God's presence, in opposition to all that vain show before man, in which the hypocrites found their reward. That giving which was commanded (vers. 2–4), is itself the true laying up! So spake, in old time, Sirach and Tobias concerning the fruits of righteousness and good works (Sir. xxix. 14; Tob. iv. 10). We may, moreover, regard this verse under two aspects: Are your treasures upon earth, then will your heart also rest upon the earth. This lies, however, more in the transition from the last sentence than in this passage itself, which dignifies only the heavenly reward and the heavenly good, with the title of treasure, properly so called (Luke xvi. 12, τὸ ὑμέτερον, the true and only property, in distinction from which all other passes away as another's). Alas for those, who become thieves against themselves, to rob themselves of their own eternal and enduring substance! Do not ye so, O men! is the Lord's warning entreaty here. Have ye truly begun to apprehend what and where your true treasure is, then never take away your eyes and your hearts from it again, to turn them upon that which is naught! Ἔσται, will be, following ἐστίν, is, here, has the force of a contrast, and contains requirement and promise at once in itself, similarly as ἔσεσθε, ye shall be, in ch. v. 48. Your treasure is, safely laid up, perfectly ready for you, in heaven; let then your heart ever more and more perfectly and undividedly be fixed upon it and absorbed with it there! (See the continuation, Luke xi. 35.) Has the kingdom of the eternal inheritance of grace come to you poor, then let your heart, your whole heart, rest upon it and upon nothing else with it! That great word heart (which in ch. v. 8, 28 was regarded as the seat of holiness or unholiness before God) comes before us now in all the fulness and depth of its Scriptural meaning.* In the heart dwells the individual guiding principle of a man's life; his perception, feeling, and will in their indivisible unity: the heart determines how, for what, and for whom a man is living. Determine and devote your heart towards the measure, the inheritance, the reward of heaven! This most impressive requirement, which in the former part of the sentence (ὁ θησαυρὸς ὑμῶν, your treasure) brings with it its own foundation of promise, is in the following two verses more fully established in its principles; in positive encouragement and promise ver. 22, but then ver. 23, in warning contrast, which forms a transition to the subject which follows.

Verses 22, 23. In the heart is the life of the whole body, Prov. iv. 23. But the mediating instrument between the central principle and all-regulating direction of life in the heart, and the outward life of the body, is the eye, as it immediately follows in Prov. iv. 25, 26; compare, besides, Prov. xxiii. 26. The body lives and moves according to the guidance of the eye, by its light as a lamp; even as the eye sees according to the desire and impulse of the heart. When Eve beheld the tree, that it was a pleasant tree, the lust after it had already commenced in her heart, and as the result of that, her eye had become a traitor. Hence there might have been interposed between our Lord's former saying and this, the thought—And where your heart is, there does your eye turn also. This is as true with regard to the beginning of every sin, as it is that in its progress, the heart, in return, follows the eye (Job xxxi. 7): the one is tested and known by the other. But such an intervening thought the Lord could scarcely here have more circumstantially expressed; the natural process of his discourse led him, in order to rivet the awakened attention, and to excite preparation for his heart-penetrating word, rather to present striking and vivid figures to the mind. First came the very simple saying concerning the treasures in earth and in heaven, the meaning of which would be most obviously apprehended; then followed the equally simple and deeply convincing injunction—If your treasure is in heaven, then let your heart be there also! (which is grounded upon the principle taken for granted, and assented to in every man's breast, that the heart hangs upon that which it reputes its good and happiness.) And now follows the unconnected and emphatic—The light of the body is the eye. This indeed is obviously true in external things, but the immediate application which the Lord makes of this to the inner man (he spoke indeed from the heart), involves in it profound mystery, which does not instantly yield up its fulness of meaning. Our version has used "light" for λύχνος, which signifies the instrument of illumination, as a lamp or candle; but that does not help the matter, since the Lord presently after interchanges this with φῶς, which means the light itself: that translation does no more than carry out the same interweaving of the figure and its meaning which pervades the whole discourse.

The light of the world and of each body in it, is, indeed, properly speaking, the sun and its effulgence; but, this shining becomes the light of any individual body, by and in which it may live and move, only through the medium of the eye, formed for the reception of the sun's light. This is its light-organ, not so much here for the purpose of beaming forth light from within (ch. v. 14–16), as for that of receiving the light first from above and around, in order that by it the body may be enlightened. Of what avail is the sun to the blind man, the light of day to him who shuts his eyes? Every thing, then depends on the eye, when we speak of light. Even in the bodily eye there lies much mystery, as natural philosophers know full well, to whose researches light is a wonder and an enigma on the confines of the material and the spiritual world; and so also the interior eye which corresponds to it in the body of the living man, the most perfect mystery of the soul's influence on the mechanical organism.* In the eye also there is an actual inner light which corresponds to the outer: hence its not fully explained glimmering through the material fabric. It is, at the same time, the outshining manifestation of the soul in the body: we read in the eye what no word utters, the hypocrite can only in the least degree, yea, not at all disguise his look; a right confronting glance looks through him. Hence is not this the natural image of the manner in which the inner man is reflected in the outer? The heathens termed the understanding the νοῦς, or intellect, the light in men,† as also Solomon more correctly and truly says: "The spirit of man is the candle of the Lord, searching all the secret chambers of the inner man" (Prov. xx. 27). In this general sense the expression of Jesus here may well admit of an application: If thy understanding receives rightly the truth of God, it will enlighten thee; if thy understanding is unsound, how foolish and ignorant will thy whole being be! Yet we should much mistake in making this our Lord's meaning in its present connection: he is speaking, indeed, of the mediating instrument between the heart and the body, or the most internal, fundamental direction of the being and the walk, the life and the deed. Thus the eye of the inner man is more correctly that which determines the main scope of the whole section (vers. 19–34), the practical understanding, so to speak, which regulates the whole conduct, the fundamental design which is kept in view in the most proper sense of the word, what a man seeks (vers. 32, 33). The body, inasmuch as with hands and feet, and other members it stretches forth, moves, acts and exhibits all the energy of life, is consequently the further figurative expression for the whole action of the man. (Just as, according to missionary reports, the same word in the dialect of the Sandwich Islanders, signifies both body and action.) As thou lookest and towards what object, so will be the act and movement of thy body.

* Which Beck lately, in his Bibliechen Seelenlehre, has plainly assumed.

But the Lord, further, with profound discrimination does not say—If thine eye be open or shut: for this is a point which has nothing to do here with the inner man; and the Lord, as we have already seen, entirely blends together the figure and its meaning in this discourse. The eye may indeed be already, or may be still more, opened in many senses, but here it is not ἁπλοῦς, single, that is not sincere, not true, sound, not rightly measuring or seeing, what is in the light visible to it. Seeing is sound, if both eyes (which is also itself a physical wonder and mystery) see together precisely as it is, the one object at once which is before them: hence we say, the eye—although we have two eyes. The first note of unsoundness in the eye is the seeing double, or looking athwart (ver. 24), and that leads to blindness. "If we see in singleness, the soul is light; if we double see, we lose our sight." Ah! well it is said—"Sacred simplicity, wondrous grace! Not soon is this perfected in us. Alas! much is required to this, and long, long do we sometimes wait before this is reached!" Ver. 22 contains a description of the goal towards which we must struggle, and not merely a condition and requirements insisted on at the outset. In a certain sense and measure, indeed, must our eye singly, from the very beginning, be fixed upon God, his kingdom, and righteousness, upon the treasure in heaven; but is it not consummate holiness when this is perfectly realized, and there is no oblique or other regard? Yea, by such simplicity of the eye shall the whole body be φωτεινόν, full of light, that is not merely enlightened, in the true light rightly living and moving (John xi. 9); but in its inner meaning—illuminated, glorified, all its actions sanctified in the light of God's truth (which is very emphatically expressed in a supplementary manner by Luke xi. 36). Hence, finally, the otherwise dark mass of the body shall in this glorification become all eye. Thus again the ἔσται, shall be, is here as in ver. 21. And on the other hand: if thine eye sees altogether falsely, thy whole body shall be full of darkness. The Lord sets the extremes in contrast, as they are consummated in perfection, on the one hand, and in entire blindness of heart (πώρωσις τῆς καρδίας, Eph. iv. 18: Rom. i. 21) on the other; in order that he may exhort us urgently to seek the one, and warn us against the other; in order to point out to us the way, in which our eye should ever be becoming more and more single.

He once more speaks of the eye as the light of the body, in order to indicate the peculiar significance of the image in regard to man's nature generally—The light that is in thee, that which should be thy light, indeed in some degree ever is so, that is, in the ordinary, general condition of mankind, before it has become totally darkened. This is not said to the new-born child of God from the beginning of his state of grace (Acts xxvi. 18), but actually in a certain sense to the natural man. For "the natural light extends just so far as to reveal the natural darkness." Even the unconverted has some degree of sincere respect to everlasting good, and regard for that which avails before God; just as the converted man long retains some degree of unsoundness and obliquity in his eye. But if thine eye is entirely (this must be our Lord's meaning) πονηρός, evil, the light in thee become utter darkness: then indeed is the whole body dark, as much so as if thou never hadst an eye, as if it were wholly shut: yea, rather worse than that, in the case thou thinkest that thou seest, and reckonest thy darkness for light! Then wilt thou by all means and always err, and go astray, confounding far and near, good and evil life and death, and thus grope thy way into the abyss! Once more we have a mournful oxymoron: the light become darkness, just as in ch. v. 13 the salt becomes saltless, to which saying this seems as it were a supplement. This is the condition of heathenism at the worst; alas! also of many apostates, who, not advancing in singleness of internal eye, have lapsed through impurity into the opposite ruin. Of this the Lord cries in language of lamentation and terror: Τὸ σκότος πόσον, How great is that darkness! what a total darkness of the whole body, if its light becomes darkness! In this there lies yet another specific thought which Luther's "the darkness itself" (after the Vulg.), aptly brings out. Τὸ σκότος, that darkness, (with the article) is opposed to τὸ φῶς τὸ ἐν σοί, the light that is in thee; and the Lord distinguishes two parts of human nature, which he terms light (at least relatively so), and darkness. As the body viewed as a mass dark in itself, has yet its light in the eye, just so is it with the corresponding sensual animal life of man, which eats and drinks, receives pleasure and disgust in close connection with the lower creation. This dark dominion of the life of man sunk into gross matter, into the flesh, may itself, through the seeking after righteousness, through spiritual aims, become spiritualized, illumined, sanctified. But if this light is darkness, how great must then the entire darkness of the sensual life become. Compare such passages as 2 Pet. ii. 12; Jude 10, 19.

* Hence recently Hanne (Vorhöfe zum Glauben, etc.,) points his rigorously convincing application of the peinciple of life in organism, to the formation of the eye in the fœtus.

† Aristotle: "As sight in the eye, so the intellect in the soul." Galen: "Just as the eye in the body, such the intellect in the soul." Philo: "For what the intellect is in the soul, that the eye is in the body." See in Grotius.

It remains that we endeavor to lay hold of the point of connection and transition between this word of warning against total darkness, and what follows in ver. 24. We find it in a partial application of the rigorous word which we have just read, and it is expressed in Luther's translation "ein Schalk," roguish, which, however, softens the full and proper meaning of πονηρός, evil. We cannot regard the Lord as having designed in his rigid contrast vers. 22, 23, to teach, contrary to all experience, that by an unconditional alternative man must live altogether in light or altogether in darkness, that the eye must be either quite sound or quite evil. It is his design rather to excite men by that contrast to earnest striving after the one, and diligent defence against the other. He proceeds, indeed, to lay down another equally definite and rigid alternative, and testifies: No man can serve two masters. But literally true as this must ever be for every individual moment of our internal disposition of mind, and of the action which flows from it and is estimated by it, as well as for the final distinction in the judgment; yet we also know full well that we all are too long tainted with this double-service and doubleness of aim. Thus the expression in ver. 23, standing in manifest connection with ver. 24, likewise includes in itself such a mournful, twilight middle-state, though it only indicates the frightful end of such a state if it be continued in, or, since that is impossible, if the by-service of Mammon, instead of being struggled against and given up, issues in entire apostasy from God. He recommends to us, in this manner, the simplicity of the inner eye, and urges us most impressively to an even more and more decided decision; not designing to condemn and frighten us back on account of our shortcoming, but graciously and mercifully to pluck us out of a state of wavering and halting between two sides. Such words must often be received, and are ever exerting new influence: all is not ended with the first declaration of the great alternative, though it must be uttered every time as if it were so. This is the nature of the word of exhortation which our necessities require.

Give up yourselves then in pure and undivided surrender, with the devotion and trust of your whole heart, to your Lord and God, to your Father in heaven, who promises to give you the kingdom and its righteousness, as the food and raiment of your new and inner man. As he gives, so also he exacts. Empty yourselves, and he will fill you (Psa. lxxxi. 10, 11). The fundamental promise—I am the Lord thy God! bears with it the fundamental command —None other shalt thou serve! Neither can this be otherwise, whether in respect to God or to man: the majesty of God, which will not tolerate any rival near him, demands the whole heart as its due; and again the need and the desire of the human heart can only find satisfaction in the simplicity and purity of dependence upon the highest, perfect, and only Good. This section (vers. 24–34) which as part of the greater one beginning with ver. 19, has in it the emphatic tone of requirement, will nevertheless, as we saw above, lead us back to that of promise, and set forth the first commandment of the first table in the spirit in which it was given to Israel—Thou shalt not! but based upon the foundation of that redeeming, condescending, prevenient—I am he (just as we saw in our earlier expositions of the individual commandments of the second table). Again we perceive a threefold division in the discourse which thus leads back towards the promise. First is the commandment itself in the testing, warning expression of its exclusiveness; but even here the—"Ye shall not" assumes the gracious form of—"Ye cannot." However dexterously, and with whatever subtilty ye may act on the persuasion which you may reach, that God will tolerate somewhat beside him, on which the heart may hang and which the life may serve—it must ever remain a thing impossible. Idolatry, which Pharisaical Israel abhorred in its external forms, is shown to be present in their hearts. The service of Mammon, in other words, is the most universal note of true and proper heathenism, and that service is nothing else than the devotion to earthly good and earthly enjoyment.* Then follows a transitional paragraph, which enters more into the spirit and detail of this, for the poor to whom the Gospel is now especially preached: Take no thought for life and the body (vers. 25–30). Thus the language of requirement leads on to that of encouraging promise, which assumes its full tone in the concluding words (vers. 31–34).

Verse 24 contains a fundamental declaration, which is as deeply rooted in the context here, as it is again at Luke xvi. 13, where the Lord repeats it after a parable concerning the children of the world who live for the earth, and the children of light who care for and live for the eternal, with application to the covetous Pharisees. In this passage we have the basis of all our catechetical instruction on the first commandment. Comp. Col. iii. 5 (there as here it is after the general distinction laid down in vers. 1–4). Matthew has prudently left מָמוֹן or מָמוֹנָא, Mammon, untranslated; a word of obscure derivation in the later Jewish language, which is not found in the pure Hebrew of the Old Testament, but is used in the Targums for בֻּצִּע, lucre, כֹּפֶר, ransom, שֹׁחַד, gift, הוֹן, wealth, equivalent to riches, possessions, money. When our catechists tell our children that the name was derived from a Syrian god of riches, they say what is not historically true indeed, but would have an appropriate sense; for the Lord designedly makes the word the name of an Idol, giving it a personality in contradistinction to God, in order that his words to the hypocritical Pharisees might have this force: Ye are verily idolaters, ye serve another besides God—will ye hear his name? It is Mammon! And as the truth and justification of this personification, there lies in its back-ground an allusion to the Prince and God of this world, the false god who is concealed in the enticements and deceitfulness of the creature. בְּלִיַּעַל, Belial, has a similar allusion in the Old Testament. The discourse very strikingly begins with a simple proverb, which is exalted to its most elevated meaning, that the wisdom of the sanctuary may be illustrated and confirmed by the wisdom of the street. Whether men may ever be obliged or be able to serve many masters at once, is not the question here. That proverb, universally used where the true devotion of the whole service is meant, finds here its highest truth. (The Chinese even have their sayings: Lay not two saddles on one horse; A true subject serves not two sovereigns; A virtuous woman takes not a second husband.) Here that which is taken for granted as an essential truth, admitted in the proverbs of all, is urged in its highest application; viz., that individual actions flow from the character, from the inner disposition of mind of the entire man, and receive from that their value as actions. Hence there is no such thing as an undefined "freedom" of determination by which a man may turn now to the right, now to the left, or could depend upon and serve at one time this master and at another time that.* An emphasis of deepest meaning is in master and serve; but the two following sentences of alternative are by no means tautological, nor is the distinction between them, properly speaking, to be sought in the advancement from loving to holding to, from hating to despising (which is only an explanation of the former, by a deeper disclosure and more convincing enforcement of its meaning in the latter); but in the alternative itself, which indicates, by the transposition of the two expressions, a changing of the persons served. Either at any one time, in one course of conduct and action, in one performance of service to hate God and love Mammon, or at another time again, to hold to God and despise Mammom. This gives us, without affecting the permanent, inmost condition of the heart generally, a softened sense of the word to suit the exhortation which follows, to the people, the children of God: Ye are not like the Gentiles! This is the exhortation to those who halt between two opinions (1 Kings xviii. 21; 2 Cor. vi. 14). Here we have the deep significance of עַל-פָּנַי, before me, in the first commandment, literally, "over and above me." For every thing out of God is a "besides me" which he will not tolerate in his presence—yet finds he much of that idolatry even among those who address him with Our Father.

Verses 25—30. After such severity the discourse now turns to a most gracious appeal: Act not thus, for your God and Father is essentially enough for you, and will give you all you need! This exhortation, which convinces and puts to shame, stands first (ver. 25). Then follows the proof of the Father's care of his children's earthly need, derived from his providential care, as their Creator, for the lower animals around us; just as in ch. v. 45 his love was proved from his general benefits in nature. This is shown according to the order of the two leading words—soul and body, where the soul in the body signifies, according to the correct language of old times, which did not give it two meanings, the sensitive, earthly life in the body.† Verses 26, 27 treat of the life and its nourishment (Psa. lxxviii. 18, אֹכֶל לְנַפְשָׁם, "meat for their lust," lit. food for their soul); verses 28, 29, of the body and its clothing. Whence we directly gather the only true signification of ver. 27, according to its necessary connection, in opposition to a false reading which has closely adhered to it.

* "The fundamental characteristic of heathenism is the living for the present." Tholuck quotes this expression of that great heathen in Christendom, Göthe, but without noting how beautifully it illustrates our Lord's sermon at this place.

*. Compare Jul Müller. The Christian Doctrine of Sin (in Clark's Foreign Theological Library).

† That is, according to the natural language of the sensualist, which the Lord adopts; as if the soul were not much more besides, as if to care for the soul must not necessarily lead to the caring for the higher life, the ζωὴ ψυχῆς or life of the soul.

Thus is this the plainest and most popular part of the Sermon on the Mount, just where it goes into the depth of the heart: there is endless matter of preaching here, but little of exposition. Once more we hear the lawgiver's emphatic—I say unto you! of former sections, which seems, as it were, to have its faint echo in ver. 29. It is not found again, not even at ch. vii. 12, where the exposition of the Law is closed in one final sentence, still less at ch. vii. 7, where the decisive concluding promise is given—it is reserved in this discourse to mark the requirements of his laws as he teaches them. I say unto you—that is, to the disciples of the Lord, the children of the Father, with all, who by his instruction, would become so. Nourishment, τροφή (all that is included in eating and drinking together), and raiment—the two main necessities for the life and the body; see Gen. xxviii. 20; (so that it almost seems a redundancy, if the apostle, 1 Tim. vi. 8, includes in his σκεπάσματα, covering, the shelter of a dwelling, as well as the defence of raiment.) Any one who is disposed to look for its inner meaning, may understand without exposition what the thought is, which is forbidden; inasmuch as it divides and distracts the soul (as μεριμνᾶν etymologically shows), while thought and prevision without care are not forbidden. The best interpretation of it is found at Luke xii. 29: μὴ μετεωρίζεσθε, let not yourselves be restless, driven, wavering hither and thither. There it is the antithesis to the soul's rest, here the contrast is with the soul's unity of aim, for only in unity is rest.* Just as evident and convincing is the sense of the two question-positions: Will he who gave life and body as the greater gift, keep back the food and clothing which those gifts need?

The birds of heaven, the flowers of the field—how simple, how beautiful this contemplation of nature, as Adam before the fall beheld it in Paradise! A single eye thus beholds the creature as bearing evidence of its God; the evil-eye, on the contrary, perverts all it sees to its own lust. Bird and flowers agree together harmoniously, though they are distributed between heaven and earth. The birds of the heaven, עוֹף הַשָּׁמַיִם, often referred to as such from Gen. i. 30 downwards, unsubjected and free (like the flowers of the field), for whom no man generally cares, in their pure life and song have more affinity with heaven than the flowers, point more directly than they, above. Sowing, reaping, gathering into barns: the three main points of husbandry, which is to man in a state of nature the immediately appointed labor (Psa. civ. 23, עֲבֹדָה, "work," as also Neh. x. 38; 1 Chron. xxvii. 26). The fowls of the air are not like you: in which words, to avert all misunderstanding and perversion, labor for man is manifestly enough confirmed as his lot. Your—not the Father of the fowl: which forms a transition to the question that follows—Are not ye, even as men, as the lords and laborers of the earth, especially as children of the Father, much better than they? Toil then according to your human dignity; be not, however, contrary to that dignity, subject to care, but know, that without the gift of God all that you can do is in vain. Of what avail would food be without the life? Do ye suppose that man lives of bread, if he have enough of it, and that he will live longer for the forethought that he takes? As God gave you life at the beginning, must not he also, in whose hands your breath is, preserve it to you by his care? Is it in your power, with all your forethought, to live one moment longer than God wills? Thus verse 27 fits well here, and connects itself with verse 26 concerning the nourishment of the life; verses 28, 29 proceeding with the clothing of the body. This decides the meaning of ἡλικία, which certainly here means length of life, as in John ix. 21, 23; Heb. xi. 11;* not the body's "stature," as only in Luke xix. 3. (For at Luke ii. 52; Eph. iv. 73, stature and life are comprised in one.) The common translation introduces something altogether inappropriate, and even monstrous into the plain, well-arranged discourse of our Lord; so that one is tempted to ask in reply to it—Whoever took thought about such a thing as that, to add a cubit to his stature? To change the color of the hair (ch. v. 36), or, at most, to think of growing an inch, would be another matter. The stature of the body is altogether unsuitable to the meaning in Luke xii., for in the supplementary explanation the addition wished to the ἡλικία is termed ἐλάχιστον, least, though to add a cubit is so monstrous, in

* The common interpretation, which Luther also adopts, is false; viz., that proud exhaltation, presumption is intended, as 2 Macc. v. 17. The idea of restless tossing is not only found in Wisd. xxvi. 9, ἐν μετεωρισμοῖς ὀφθαλμῶν, by ogling eyes, but also among profane authors, e. g. Thuc. lib. 2. μετέωρος ἦν ἡ Ἑλλας, Greece was in a troubled state.

* Theophylact, in his time, on Luke xii. has rightly: ζωῆς μέτρα παρὰ μονῷ θεῷ, καὶ οὐκ αὐτός τις ἕκαστος ἑαυτῷ ὁριστὴς τῆς ζωῆς, the measure of life is with God alone, nor is any individual the determiner of his own life. Many exegetical writers have always been of the same mind, and among our more recent practical expositors, Von Gerlach, Richter, Braune, whom Alford has not reckoned. Lange is disposed to mediate between the two opinions by ingeniously uniting them both into one: ἡλικία neither age simply, nor stature simply, but "the full unfolding of every individual in every respect according to its capacity—the mature manifestation of itself in general." We much doubt if this popular gnomic saying will admit of so deep a meaning.

the proportion of human stature, that it is a very rare thing for a fool to lift his wish so high. The Lord must be supposed to signify some common matter of care to the children of men, and what is more frequent than the vain wish of the dying to protract their lives, at least a little longer. Is it thought that life should have come after cubit? our answer is, that it is omitted just as distance in John xxi. 8; and in this most natural image πῆχυν ἕνα, one cubit, stands as if we should say—a few paces, a span longer—and as in Psa. xxxix. 6, a handbreadth.*

And now first, as the newly commencing and indicates, the discourse turns to the body, to which the ingenious structure and growth of the flowers correspond, and to which the clothing belongs. Καταμάθετε, learn, this second time is stronger than ἐμβλέψατε, behold; look attentively, study diligently! No species of fowl was mentioned (as at Luke xii. the ravens, and Matt. x. the sparrows), but now the emphasis is more specific—the lilies, which name, proverbial already in the Old Testament, embraced many kinds of white and colored flowers, and was specially connected with the crown imperial. Lilies of the field (not of the garden), growing of themselves, innumerable as the birds of heaven, like the grass (to which they belong, ver. 30), little regarded, blooming but a brief space, presently withered away and burned. For that reason overlook them not. See how they grow up without your aid to their slender height! They toil not. Agriculture was referred to before, as the fundamental toil of men; now a glance is cast upon that further toil of man in art, which provides for itself out of the material of nature.† Further, there lies in the words toiling and spinning a reference to men and women respectively;‡ the former (κοπιᾶν) is rather every kind of energy put forth in acquisition, the latter (νήθειν) naturally has a specific reference to clothing. The lilies have leaves and texture so finely spun, as no human cunning can counterfeit; and yet they spin it not in human fashion, but are clothed therewith by God. In the growing spoken of previously, there is hinted a question concerning the body corresponding to that in ver. 27 concerning the age: Who among you can by any care or effort of personal will grow a fingerbreadth higher! Not the slightest stalk can man raise up!

But this is passed over unsaid, in order that the words may go on to rebuke the vanity of man, who makes out of his clothing, which is, properly speaking, the mere modest covering of his nakedness, matter of personal ostentation. Solomon's glory was in the Israelitish proverbial language the ideal of magnificence in apparel; but why is this not like the beauty of the lilies? The Lord leads us by the last λέγω ὑμῖν, I say unto you, to a profound thought which we must not fail to discern in it: the flowers grow directly with their essentially connate, not merely put on and invested, clothing (περιεβάλετο, arrayed, is in slight contrast with ἀμφιέννυσιν, clothe); this is the beauty of nature and innocence, which in the slightest object shows more beautiful than the most magnificent array, that must be fastened on. "Thy lily belongs to the paradise of God, Solomon's glory to the hothouse of art" (Kleuker). O that men would understand what is signified in this! O that they would learn from the flowers, the beauty of growing silently, by the internal law of their nature operating through God's gifts and power, up into a full preparation for that blooming in future glory, which is set before us as the goal of our glorification!

When man is once more elevated by the words πολλῷ μᾶλλον, much more, above the grass and flowers of the field, which to-day are and to-morrow are cast withered into the oven, we discern in this a sublime appeal to faith, inasmuch as, to all appearance, man's sensitive, earthly life is just on a level with the withering grass. The Lord literally refers to Psa. xc. 6. And here he makes the transition to the full assurance and promise of eternal life in the kingdom of God, by that henceforward oft-recurring, and graciously admonitory—O ye of little faith! קְטַן אֱמוּנָה or אֱמָנָה, little of faith, was also an expression of the Rabbies,* but what power and significance it assumes in the mouth of our Lord, requiring only faith and yet again faith, great faith, large and wide as the grace and goodness of God himself! Here this once in the Sermon on the Mount does the Lord touch lightly that great word, and that in the right place and with deep earnestness.

The end leads us back to the beginning, in order to embody in most clear and simple expression the whole of what has been meant from ver. 24, nay from ver. 19. The commandment is once more repeated, but now most plainly: Seek ye obediently, undistractedly and trustfully the kingdom of God! Trustful for what? The general and inviting promise is given of the supply of all earthly need, as being necessarily included in and added to the promise of the free gift of the kingdom of heaven. The contrast with the heathen or

* In Stobæus (xcviii. 13), from Mimnermus: πῆχυιον ἐπὶ χρόνον, for an ell long time; in Alcæus (Athen. x. 7): δάκτυλος ἁμέρα, a finger-length day.

† By spinning men supply what the field may not give—Hamann writes his pithy application to his friend Herder about his winter-study: that he would take in the summer, and repair by spinning what he may not have been able to get by sowing and reaping.

‡ With far greater propriety may vers. 26, 27 be attributed to the men, who till the field for the sustenance of the household; and vers. 28, 29 to the women, who particularly provide for the clothing.

* Eg. Rabbi Elieser the great: He who has a morsel of bread in his basket, and asks—"What shall I eat to-morrow?" is one of the men of little faith.

Gentiles, which has been contained in this whole part of the discourse, is now fully expressed; but we find it at the conclusion, not as in the contrast with the Pharisees (ch. v. 20), where their description came first. For the Pharisees, so terming themselves, were visibly before his hearers; but the internal heathenism of the heart must first be detected and disclosed. Here again, as always, we have three positions. The first reiterating at the conclusion: Therefore take no thought, for thus do the Gentiles! The second: For ye are God's children, his people, the chosen heirs of his kingdom! The third, once more: Take therefore no thought! Yet with a weighty qualifying reference, appended to the promise, to the indispensable and wholesome necessities of every-day life even in the case of the children of God.

Verses 31, 32. The οὖν is not simply such a therefore as we had in ver. 25 (διὰ τοῦτο), but it is a very emphatic deduction. Else this is a repetition of ver. 25, with a strengthening addition of saying to taking thought;* and this is connected with the saying—For after all those things do the Gentiles seek; which has a very comprehensive reference. For it means first, that in God's presence there is such a distinction: Ye are not as the Gentiles! Then, with reproachful test, reversing the words—Who seek after these things are Gentiles: therefore, should ye not be like them! Will ye then retain heathenism in your hearts? Finally, it is a gracious exhortation, which becomes a permission: Leave all such care to the Gentiles, who have no Father in heaven; who know not, that they have a Father! For your heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of all these things; an intenser repetition of what had been preparatorily uttered in ver. 8, following ver. 7. The stress of emphasis falls upon the knoweth: Ye have a living God, who knoweth! But in addition to his knowing, his willingness is already secured in the name of Father; so that we may say, every single word in the whole sentence utters a ground of assurance and strong consolation.

Verse 33. This is the middle one of the three great fundamental laws of the Sermon on the Mount. The first (ch. v. 48), pointed up to the Father of love in heaven. This second bears witness to, and assures us of the descent of heaven to earth in that kingdom, which is already come, and is open to violent entrance. But it adjoins the condition of seeking in order to the laying hold of the treasure held forth (Phil. iii. 13, 14), namely, through the righteousness of God which alone avails in his kingdom, the actual having and performing of which remains ever the straight gate of entrance to it. This paves the way for the third great law (ch. vii. 12). Let us observe and weigh well the retrospective view, comprehensive and concentrated, which is taken from this vantage point of the discourse! The kingdom and righteousness together remind us of the petitions, ver. 10. The kingdom of God embraces the entire introductory ch. v. 3–20, where at first the kingdom of heaven came down to the poor and remained at last only righteousness. God's righteousness—comprehends all from ch. v. 21 to ch. vi. 18, with especial reference to ch. v. 48 and ch. vi. 1. For ch. v. 48 closed the first part ("Not like the Pharisees") by way of anticipation just at the point where the induction of the commandments ceased; and found in the following chapter only its further development: Before the Father in secret.

It has been made matter of wonder that the Lord only says "first" and not "alone"—exclusively. He says, indeed, elsewhere—One thing is needful; and in its profoundest principle this πρῶτον, first, is also a μόνον, alone, But here we discern a certain softening of his gracious utterance at the outset; experience will bring out its rigorous strictness afterwards. Only begin to seek the kingdom of God first; and ever let it be first! If thou hast ever thought in thy heart that when thou art fully furnished with this, every thing else will be superadded, it will become evident to thee in due course that thou canst never be thus fully furnished. This one great concern will so fill up the heart, that no room will be left for aught else. The righteousness of God is to be understood here strictly according to its subsequent Pauline use, as indicating both that which he requires and which alone avails before him; and also that which he imparts, since he himself feeds us with the establishment of his will in us, as with the true bread (ver. 11; Rom. xiv. 17).* In Luke's repetition of the discourse (ch. xii.), the express promise is connected therewith: Fear not, little flock; for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom—with the righteousness which appertains thereto. Which promise is here included in meaning and probably, as Matthew does not record absolutely every particular, might have been uttered by our Lord on this first occasion also. Is not this heavenly feeding more than the earthly, even as much so as the true, eternal life of the soul is more than that of sense? Is not this clothing of the inner man more than the covering of the mere body? Consequently, further, in the highest application of the former conclusion: Will he who gives you the eternal good, suffer you to lack that which is temporal? Faith answers this—*Προστεθήσεται, it shall be added. It is only the wantonly presumptuous who, in mockery of God, would reap without sowing; and seeking first the perishable riches of earth, fondly imagines that the eternal good will be added to him over and above.

* The Lord forbids two things: taking thought—and then saying, giving open utterance to the same; because the taking thought weighs down and dispirits the heart of one only, but the saying infects others also with despondency (Zeller, Monatsblatt). Or is saying here only a Hebraism for thinking?

* Thus much, at least, as Roos remarks, is now clear, that man must not make for himself a righteousness, but by hunger and thirst seek it; and that such a righteousness as will cause him to be reputed, not only by the council-chamber of his city, but by his God, a righteous man.

Verse 34. This closes once more with the original word (ver. 25). All undue care goes over the immediate present into the future; but we can only be said to be assured of this day (ver. 11) in this uncertain life, and for to-morrow have so little to care, that it is not included in our prayers. That applies even to the spiritual life: be only every day faithful, obedient and righteous, no more is wanting. How much more for the earthly life, as the daily manna in the wilderness daily sent foreshadowed. You might lose the very last day of your time of grace, taking anxious thought about a morrow that is not to be yours. If the morrow comes, it will provide for its own. Are we to understand that God, who sends the day and all that it bears with it, arranges all things rightly and forgets not one of its necessities? This is in part the meaning, but the words go further and are still stronger: Let the morrow care! Further does not the Lord refer to a care of every day as it passes, and with the same expression (μεριμνήσει) which has hitherto denoted the forbidden anxiety? Assuredly, and this forms the transition to the final saying, containing allusion to that necessity of human life which, for sin's sake, even the heirs of the kingdom will not shake off till the days have reached their end. The word is thrown out, as it were, enigmatically, as we here find it; probably the Lord added some further elucidation and development of it. We catch its meaning in all its depth, with the progress of the inner life. Κακία, "evil," is in general just what τὸ πονηρόν, the evil, is in the seventh petition, and serves for its interpretation; the evil and the trials of life upon earth, the ills and infirmities of the body in the flesh, all troubles external and from within. So that this evil must be taken into the account with the daily bread of the body and the soul, and is equally with that your need, better known as such to your heavenly Father than to you, and may in no case be put away by taking thought! Be not so foolish as to double and multiply your plague and disquietude; every day's evil is enough for itself; will you add to it that of to-morrow, and the third day, and yet further? But the more fully we learn to cast away that μεριμνᾶν, "taking [anxious] thought," for earthly things which is conceded to the weakness of to-day, and give up all disquietude about all that pertains to eating and drinking and clothing, health and sickness, and all things bodily and of earth—so much the more does it become impressed upon us that there is a deeper, unexplored meaning yet in the Lord's utterance. That very seeking God's kingdom and righteousness, that ever-new devotion and sacrifice of the will to an entire obedience, must be to the children of God, while they live in the flesh and in the world, the trial of every day, the daily cross of self-denial (Luke ix. 23). With this we are content; we would not presumptuously burden ourselves beyond the will of our Father in heaven, nor throw off any of his load. This is the perfect spirit that should be aimed at by all who are pilgrims to the kingdom, till they finally enter it (Acts xiv. 22).

Ch. vi. 19 showed an apparent break in the discourse without any expressed connection, and this is much more the case with the beginning of the seventh chapter. It appears, indeed, as if down to the fourteenth verse, it was composed of successive, unconnected fragments; and hence many, who are incapable of tracing the mind of the Spirit and of supplying what is left to be understood, are rash enough to say that all connection is here entirely lost, and that the Evangelist has undoubtedly only strung together the sayings of various times. Yet as the connection has not hitherto eluded us, we shall find it still even to the end. Let our preliminary view be brought to mind, which laid it down that after the two contrasts—Not like the Pharisees · Not like the heathen! were exhibited there followed a third, viz., Not like those of my disciples, and those of God's children, impure and imperfect, who instead of carrying on in their own inner life the pursuit of God's kingdom and righteousness, and regulating their outer life in accordance with that pursuit, fall back into that Pharisaism again, the roots of which were not eradicated, and thus either unrighteously judge or improperly proselyte others! Is not this the last and most stiff-necked Pharisee remaining yet in the Christian man? Yet let it be observed whether the statement (vers. 1–6) concerning censoriousness and desecration of that which is holy, does not perfectly adapt itself to the natural progress according to which the delineation of the perfect righteousness of a disciple of Christ is yet to be completed. Are they not half-disciples (we know not how better to term them), who act thus in a manner against which the Lord warns, and who thus are in danger of relapsing into mere hypocrites, mere Pharisee-Christians? And does not the law of Christ for his own people rise into its most rigorous and restricting expression, in these warnings which follow, in harmony with the internal progression of the Sermon on the Mount in its dealing with the needs of man's life?

* What Braune advances is superficially correct, but goes not to the depth: "How is that? Quite naturally. For they who seek the kingdom and the righteousness of God, are not careless, thriftless, idle, spendthrift people," &c. Certainly, but the meaning goes far beyond that labor, and thrift, and economy which save God's people from want. An apocryphal saying of our Lord extracts its meaning more fully: Αἰτεῖτε τὰ μεγάλα, καὶ τὰ μικρὰ ὑμῖν προστεθήσεται. καὶ αἰτεῖτε τὰ ἐπουράνια, καὶ τὰ ἐπίγεια προστεθήσεται ὑμῖν—Ask the great things, and the little things shall be added unto you; and ask the heavenly things, and the earthly things shall be added unto you.

We must look closer, that our observation may be both developed and confirmed. The goal of discipleship which, as we advance towards it, rises ever higher before us, is after all that has been said, no other than the perfect righteousness of pure and unselfish love, as it will be announced in ver. 12. This goal of pure love is now indicated by means of two warning opposites; it is love as humble as it is wise (vers. 1–6). These together form the first part of the section. And as to the way, or rather the ever-repeated beginning, by which this goal is to be reached—what is it, as we have already seen, but prayer to God for his grace to that end? This is, therefore, rightly the second part (vers. 7–11). And what may and must be the third (for every where we find triplicity), but the condensed compendium of the whole great middle portion of the Sermon, containing all that is made obligatory for fulfilling the law, as we find it in the last all-comprehensive requirement: Therefore walk in this way to reach that goal! which is the actual and literal meaning of vers. 12–14? Let this be pondered well, and it will be found that it is not an imposition of ours upon the text, but an exposition of it.*

That the Lord's requirements should now be indicated by warning contrasts, we have more and more prepared for since ver. 19, and indeed it naturally corresponds with the character of the close as containing the rigorous exclusion of all the impure and imperfect. Thus through the opposite error is first discriminated that pure love, in virtue of which every disciple of Christ is according to his capacity to become a peacemaker, a witness of the truth and ambassador of the kingdom (ch. v. 9, 13). This is first exhibited as an altogether humble love for the salvation of others, after and in connection with a thorough judgment of self. We should assuredly judge, but only for others' benefit, from a principle of love, not in the spirit of condemnation, and never forget ourselves in the same regard. Whether we can do this in general is first of all and most rigorously to be tested and proved within the circle of discipleship: hence the mirror is here held up for the relation of brothers to one another in a more restricted sense. First, the fundamental principle itself, expressed almost as an absolute prohibition, yet with some slight recognition of the opposite and not excluded duty of the disciples—Judge not! (ver. 1.) Then follows the ground and confirmation of this warning, which at the same time encourages us to mete with the right measure, that of mercy (ch. v. 7), and thus to the judgment of charity, which tends to amendment, like that of God's mercy. In ver. 2 this prohibition or command is yet more clearly placed upon its true foundation, in the intuitively convincing explanation of ver. 3–5, which presses home with thou instead of ye. Here again we have warning first, then requirement. The warning (against judging without humble charity) puts two keen questions: Is not the principle of such censoriousness, that thou forgettest to judge thyself? (ver. 3.) Comes not hence the utterance of it, thy proud and presumptuous saying—Let me pull out? (ver. 4.) May we not then point out and correct a brother's fault? Certainly, but only after and with a searching judgment of ourselves. Thus there now follows the requirement of a true exercise of our brotherly obligation, the pulling out the mote (John xiii. 14), not merely the seeing it; with the necessary title to do so added: First judge thyself; after that with wisdom—look well, how thou pullest it out! (ver. 5.) Here we may narrowly observe the transition which is interwoven in these words, to the following remarks concerning the wisdom of charity.

The Lord's discourse suddenly turns from the most internal principle of the sincerely seeking, faithfully devoted heart, the clear and single eye, to the external deportment, and—inasmuch as we have only to do with God or with men—to our deportment when we are constrained to see around in our fellow-men and our own brethren, imperfection and sinfulness. Did the Lord orally interpose, at such points of transition, any words of connection? we have a right to presume generally, and a comparison with Luke, whose report of so important a discourse the Spirit could never have left open to falsification, drives us to the conclusion, that our Lord uttered more than is recorded here. But it may very well be doubted whether any additional words would take the form of our modern way of discoursing, which takes care to show the process of the thought, and aims to lay it bare in its internal arrangement. This is opposed to Orientalism generally, and to the genius of the Hebrew in particular, which, as it exhibits but little conjunction of individual sentences, so also it has but little expressed logical connection of its discourses as a whole. It is opposed, also, to the necessary, and more highly natural character of prophetical utterance, that language of the Spirit, as is meets us every where in the Old Testament, even where the discourses were written by the prophets themselves. This manner of speaking, indeed, as it came down from Solomon's original use of it, to the Rabbinical style of teaching and laying down their sayings as the Lord found it, is essentially the natural and universally human method. The thoughts of the teacher who speaks from the fulness of his heart, when art (or artifice) has not yet learned to adjust them to the limitations of words, flow forth livingly in their own simplicity, and are bound by no obligation to give a strict account of their sequence and order. And, finally, such discourse is more likely to be understood by the right kind of hearer, for it makes a rigorous claim on his attention, it excites his own thought and keeps it on the stretch. As a book exacts something from its reader, and leaves something for him to supply, so also does a discourse require something from the hearer. Our Lord's Sermon on the Mount presents in this respect a reproving example to our occidental and modern style of sermons.

* That holds good for New Testament criticism also, which the departed Drechsler so keenly and clearly laid down against "unscientific treatment:" The great problem is to perceive the object of what is transmitted and testified. But here the authenticity and unity of the Sermon on the Mount is the before-attested object which we have to discern.

In consistency with this our Lord at ch. vi. 19 assuredly did not say: "The Pharisees, as it has been shown, are in their hearts before God no better than Gentiles; therefore I say to you further—Live ye not after the manner of heathens an earthly life, but deposit it before all things in your hearts, as a fundamental principle, and in order that your righteousness may exceed theirs, that ye must depend upon God supremely, according to the first commandment, and seek only the treasure and reward of his kingdom." We feel how human and unlike himself such explanations and deductions would be in our Lord's lips. Consequently he does not say here: "And if ye are now decided and entirely devoted, determined for yourselves to seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness; see to it that ye do not blunt the keen edge of your self-judgment and self-renunciation, and finally altogether lose it, by hasty and unholy, that is, uncharitable judgment of those without you, by censure and correction of others, seeing that not only in the world but among your own brethren, sin and shortcoming enough will obtrude itself upon your notice and be your temptation. The more clearly you see this, the more earnestly guard yourselves against sacrificing your charity; for if ye would be my perfect disciples, then must your righteousness, as perfect love, be ever humble in bearing and forgiving, wise and thoughtful to heal and take away the sin that it sees." That we rightly seize the connection in this place, we are additionally assured by an explanatory saying of our Lord recorded in Luke (ch. vi. 40) similar to this but more detailed. But we may be assured that the Lord did thus unconnectedly set out with sudden appeal—Judge not! just as Matthew has abruptly recorded it. He spoke indeed not for his disciples and that people, then on the mountain, but for the Church of all ages, which should afterwards investigate his words. But even a hearer of that time, who should recall to mind those words, which from their proverbial form would cling tenaciously to the memory, would well understand how they were intended.

Verses 1, 2. It is in consequence of the evil-eye of the natural man, that he ever prefers to apply the rule of right, which he perfectly knows, to that which is without rather than to that which is within, himself; that he seeks out and bemoans the sins of his neighbor instead of thinking upon his own; and thus losing his charity towards his brother, loses also his humility and sincerity before God. Every one knows, and vindicates for himself, what men should do to him: and so far this beginning is internally connected with the concluding word at ver. 12. Further, to judge others and not ourselves, is the spirit of Pharisaism as developed from this natural principle of evil, the spirit of that misapprehension and misuse of God's law which the Lord had before disclosed, and against which his whole discourse, even in the second and third contrasts, which only more fully removed the mask from what was the Pharisee still, had from the beginning been directed.* Read Rom. ii. 1–3, 17–23. The Pharisee, himself at heart a heathen, would yet condemn all the world; himself no better than a publican, would yet uncharitably censure and cast from him the poor people around him. And this Pharisaism pursues the disciple of Christ, adheres to him long, even as worldly care and the worship of Mammon do. Therefore: Would ye be perfect, then put this utterly away! The very perception and experience which the new man has of the evils of his old heart brings with it a revived temptation and tendency to such an evil: hence censorious judging, as the usual transition-weakness of the new-converted, breaks out now though it may not have been manifested before.

In vers. 1, 2, then, as a maxim expressed in general terms, the object of this censorious judgment is the whole evil world without us, from whom we feel ourselves to be separated as the children of the kingdom; but in ver. 3 there is a manifest restriction of the reference to our brethren in a narrower sense (to whom in ver. 6 those who are without stand opposed). For otherwise we should not hear of motes in the eye, but of a more entire blindness and wickedness.

That the Lord in this prohibition of judging refers to a disposition and posture of the heart, and not to the utterance of it as such (as previously in ch. v. 22), is obvious of itself, especially since he has (in ch. vi.) penetrated so deeply into the heart's sentiments. For we are, as the witnesses and ambassadors of his kingdom, to preach his truth, which condemns the sin of the world—his Gospel, according to which unbelievers stand condemned before God. But it is one thing to testify as his humble ministers the Lord's word in Mark xvi. 16, and altogether another thing to say presumptuously, yea even to think in our hearts: This or that man is condemned, or to address to him the direct appeal—Thou art condemned! This is ever forbidden to us on the simple ground that we can never say, as searchers of the heart: Thou believest not, thou wilt never believe, though the love of God by us or by others may continue to strive with thee. Sin itself we should term such, when we perceive it and where it concerns us, as well for our own sake as for the sake of others; for the Lord also requires of us, that we judge righteous judgment (John vii. 24), and the apostle says: He that is spiritual judgeth all things (1 Cor. ii. 15). But this ἀνακρίνειν or judging of is very different from that κατακρίνειν or judging against, which belongs only to God (Rom. xiv. 4). We, who are sinners and expect ourselves the judgment of God, may not judge before the time, until the Lord come, who will bring to light the hidden things of darkness in us and all the world (1 Cor. iv. 5). Let us only be ourselves doers of the law, the Lawgiver himself will be the judge, according to his own supreme authority and righteous distribution (James iv. 11, 12, which is again an inwardly and spiritually apprehended general citation from the Sermon on the Mount). What is then in itself, as the prohibition stands in its literal severity, the judging that is forbidden? The Lord pre-supposes the cognizance in our own minds of the sin which is to be condemned, but it is his will that in all the judgments which we pass upon it, we should not condemn the individual for the individual's sake and as such, that is, that we should not regard and deal with our fellowmen and brethren independently of the forgiving love of God, which is free for them as well as for ourselves, so long as that goal is not reached when he will say—Depart from me! (ver. 23). Beware of men, beware of false prophets, yea, of dogs and swine (ver. 6); that is judgment severe enough, and yet which involves no judgment unto condemnation, out of our own assumed authority, no rejection on our part, as if we already were assessors with him upon his judgment seat, and the final separation were already come. This sense of his words our Lord himself has more fully explained in Luke vi., since there he adds as an an epexegesis—*Μὴ καταδικάζετε, condemn not; and then lays down the opposite—Forgive rather (ἀπολύετε) and give, that is, out of the treasure of grace which is in yourselves: and Luke in his epitome wisely puts this in close connection with the preceding—Be ye therefore merciful, as your Father also is merciful! For does not the Lord here actually point back, though according to Matthew he had said much else in the interval, to ch. vi. 14, 15 and ch. v. 42–48? Is it not his purpose to teach just here in all its fulness that perfection of pure love which he had there enjoined upon his disciples?

* Generally speaking, as Braune says, the judging others is the foul stain of social life. Hence the otherwise innocent expression "jemanden bereden" ("to speak of one") has come to mean "to speak ill of him." For the falseness of all men (Rom. iii. 4) reveals itself, at the same time being uncharitableness, in their intercourse with one another.

That ye be not judged! as in ch. vi. 15. The fundamental principle of this is here pre-supposed: As ye have not been judged, as ye have been forgiven, and as ye are ever being forgiven. But in addition to this there is the threatening of the withdrawal of the mercy which had been received, as had been already gently intimated at ch. v. 7, in the opposite case (James ii. 13). Consequently the requital here referred to signifies of course requital from God; although its type and beginning, the measuring again on the part of man, is by no means excluded, nay, rather, is used for the sake of founding upon it a convincing warning. That sinful man should requite upon his fellow man the evil that he has done to him, is in itself sin (ch. v. 38, 39); and yet this right of retaliation thus wickedly arrogated, is but the utterance and reflection of that eternally valid principle of justice which the Lord God has given to those who are judges in his name, and which he himself observes. So that he who unrighteously judges another in his own name must, when he is thus judged in return, reflect in his conscience: This injustice of man is only my due in the sight of God, and one day he who has the right to do so, will thus deal with me! The maxim which the Lord lays down in ver. 2, is a fundamental law, so universally recognized, so fully exhibited in the perverted estate of the world, so well known in man's natural conscience, that all the heathen express it in the same way; it is found variously laid down in the Old Testament, and even the Jewish Talmud, in other respects the very perfection of perversion, has retained it as an indelible proverb.* But when our Lord takes it up, an dsays: Ἐν ᾧ κρίματι, ἐν ᾧ μέτρῳ, With what kind of judgment and measure—he gives us, in transition, to understand that we should indeed judge with right judgment, and measure again with the righteous measure of truth in the spirit of love. For the κρίνετε, judge, which is admitted in ver. 2, has manifestly another and a wider meaning than that which is forbidden in ver. 1. Forgive, and ye shall be forgiven: give, and it shall be given unto you.

Verses 3–5. This more specific figure of the mote and beam the Lord found also ready prepared, as we see it in the Talmud in the form of a Rabbinical מָשָׁל or "parable." He whose word of truth gathered to itself all the anticipatory, preparatory truth in the world and especially among Israel—he, who in all things came not to destroy but to fulfill, disdains not, in his holy love and wisdom, to speak sometimes as a Rabbi what other rabbies had spoken. He after their fashion constructs his own parables and figures—new, intelligible to the people, and taking fast hold of their minds. This he could always have done, but he rather condescends sometimes to use their unsavory similitudes of beams in the eye, and camels through the needle, in order that his word may enter their minds, and direct the fools to the yet extant remains of their own wisdom. How does the great Teacher put to shame us the under teachers, who must fain speak in original, and elegant and characteristic words of our own! Yet the old becomes new in the lips of our Lord, and the extant words of man are replenished with a higher spirit. Thus here the beholding a brother's eye derives a profound meaning from its reference to what had been said concerning the eye in ch. vi. 22, 23. An entirely single eye has no mote, no beam in it; in the eye are to be sought the peculiar faults both of the judged and of the judging brother. The Lord reproves such beholding another as is proved to be wicked and severe, by the very fact that it does not see what should first have been seen, personal evil in self. (See Luke vi.) Βλέπειν, to see, and καταvοεῖν, to perceive, are used together with their distinction. One sees without himself the mote in the brother's eye, but marks not the beam in himself, which lies nearer to him, and is even to be felt. (Καταvοεῖν is to be cognizant of, to observe accurately, rightly to take account of.) A keen and critical eye for the veriest mote, the slightest trifle, in the brother's eye, where (which the Lord leaves unmentioned) there may be no mote present; but the same eye, so keen in looking without itself, is obtuse and insensible for self-scrutiny! The gnat is strained at, the camel swallowed. Is it not so? Is it not made manifest that it is so too often among brethren? This is the meaning of the convicting or, by which the discourse passes from the principle to its exhibition; comp. the subsequent ver. 9. If it were not so, how couldst, how wouldst thou, whom I now signify, and with whom it is thus, proudly and imperiously and dictatorially say: Stand, and let me pull out the mote out of thine eye? I will do it and I can; I demand that thou submit obediently to me! Why else is the appearance and language of such assumption? Yea, the beholding was already a blamable, unjustifiable thing: thou shouldst first have cast thine eye inwards, and beheld what thou in thy blindness hast overlooked; the beam is in thine own eye! The definite article is used in each case in connection with mote and beam: the existence of the mote is not denied—but what is the beam? Just what thou now so actest; thine incompetent, hasty, uncharitable, assuming judgment is this beam. Let this be well noted in opposition to that superficial exposition which supposes that in order to lie under the sentence of this saying, one must have a great failing in himself, and know himself to be guilty, in a higher degree, of the sin which he condemns. Rather the supposing that I am in this matter better than thou, and therefore may bear myself reprovingly towards you—is just what is here termed a beam. The figure goes enormously beyond actuality, but the Lord retains it, for it suits excellently well the idea of proportion which he designs to give.* In Luke vi. 39, blindness is spoken of, and certainly a beam in the eye makes blind. But if the blind man will yet lead others, and will keenly think to search out motes, then is he more than blind (John ix. 41). Hence: Thou hypocrite! This is cast into the face of the disciples, much more severely than in ch. vi., where it only stood—Be ye not as the hypocrites! The disciple of Christ, so far as he is in this sad state, again becomes a true Pharisee. The πρῶτον, first, in part reminds us of that great πρῶτον in ch. vi. 33. First become thyself righteous before God, stand thyself sincere and lowly before the judgment-seat of God (Sir. xviii. 19; Gal. vi. 3, 4). Art thou so well able to pull out little motes, use thy skill upon thine own greater ones! But it may be said, in what sense can our Lord ascribe to us the purifying our own eye? We answer, that he is not here speaking to the merely natural man, but to his disciple, who, as such, has the requisite grace, though he will not use and seek its increase. It is no other than if He should say: Let me pull out, first, the beam out of thine own eye!

* Not, indeed, as a climax, according to Alford's still more subtle distinction, who concludes that κρίνειν in this passage of Matthew is by no means fully equivalent (according to generally-received opinion) to κατακρίνειν, but that it is forbidden, in general, to form authoritative judgments of others.

* Countless times we have במה שאדם מודד בה מודדין לו or the like.

Καὶ τότε—and then comes the time to discharge the brotherly duty of rebuke for amendment. That duty is imposed by love, only that it may be effected in love, with spiritual authority, yet in the spirit of meekness, so that he who has been overtaken in a fault, may truly be restored (Gal. vi. 1). Now comes out first the deep and hidden significance of the figure that has been used. As the beam in the eye is found in the internal sight and direction of the heart, not in this or the other manifest vice; so also we should there seek out and find the motes and beams of our brethren. Seneca (De vit. beat. c. 27) addresses the censorious thus: "Papulas observatis alienas, obsiti ulceribus," You observe others' pimples, yourselves covered with ulcers. This is directed to the outward appearance, though well intended: but the disciple of Christ must not, in his neighbor's case, and especially in his brother's, * Braune: "Mote and beam, are of one matter and of one kind; the one is not a precious metal: the only distinction lies in the greatness." That is, not that the censor has the same fault greater in himself, but, first of all, he has only such acuteness in detecting the failing of another, because he knows it well from the monition and sting of his own conscience; and then, again, it becomes to him a greater fault, a beam, inasmuch as he "would appease his own conscience by censorious judgment, and repel the word of God, which comes to his own heart, as the cold rock gives back the echo." Alford further observes upon men's false estimate, who would discover in others beams only, in themselves only motes. Daub, again, differently: "The perception of a mote is rendered more acute by the feeling of a beam" (Judas Isch. ii. 349).

look at the external countenance, mien, and appearance, at the movement of hand or foot, and applying the standard of his own deportment, pass judgment upon his brother for differing from himself—dictatorially saying: This man acts thus, and consequently his heart must be evil, acts differently from me, he must be wrong; for the outward appearance deceives, and there is much variety of manner, as there is much variety of circumstance, to be considered in judging of the actions of men. Look with a single eye into thy brother's eye, that is in a brotherly spirit, and if thou canst not but see a mote there, help him from it! Here our Lord's commandment (Matt. xviii. 15) out of the Law of Moses (Lev. xix. 17), is placed in its true light. Τότε, then—all before this is also before the time, before the Lord's coming in judgment to thyself. But τότε διαβλέψεις, then shalt thou see clearly, not properly speaking, as a command, but as a permission, as is sufficiently obvious; a permission, however, further accompanied by promise: So wilt thou, with purified eye, see clearly and rightly how the matter is. (Διά, in composition, literally through, is intensitive, but not in the sense of an artificial carrying out of the figure, such as Bengel's: "Thou wilt see through, after the removal of the beam that intercepts." But see what? Merely the mote? But the true discernment and wisdom lie not in that, though many seem to think so, and consequently lay more stress upon the saying—Let me pull out! than upon the actual pulling out itself. And yet this latter is the main concern. Luther's interpretation, seizing the spirit in the letter has it: Look, how thou pullest it out! For the ἐκβαλεῖν or casting out the beam, the thing successfully, tenderly, and prudently accomplished, is now the real object of the διαβλέπειν or seeing clearly, as previously τὸ κάρφος, the mote, was simply of the βλέπειν or seeing. He who lives by the grace of God in the continual exercise of self-judgment, he who has retired from the footstool of mercy, delivered from the old and evil beam, knows well how tender an operation such purification of the inner eye is; and it must be attempted by man with such exquisite delicacy that the diseased brother, marking the hand of God, may submit without any command of thine; that thus the evil may not be increased by unskillfulness on thy part and opposition on his, for the one, alas! provokes the other. Begin not at once with that saying; the surgeon only does this when he is obliged: help thy brother rather, if possible, from his mote in such a manner that he may not discern thy hand and will; say to him afterwards what thou hast to say, or not at all. But if without thy bidding him, he will not submit, take good heed, that in thy bidding no little mote of pride may glance upon him from thine eye, but the pure light of love beaming upon him from a brother humble before God. Is not this certainly the highest and severest test of the spirit of a disciple, only to be demanded within the narrow circle of brotherly fellowship? If the children of God thus acted always in relation to one another, the motes and beams would finally be all for ever done away.

With this the transition is made to the other main property of that charity which would compassionately save the world and the brethren from their sin; to that wisdom, which accompanies humility. But on that account the mirror is held up to the disciples in their relation to those that are without (Eph. v. 15; Matt. x. 16). Within the circle of the disciples themselves friendly correction takes place according to and in connection with a thorough judgment of ourselves; in our intercourse with the wicked world, however, the opposite test is brought in as to whether we can also keep silence, or can speak, exhort and rebuke under proper restraints, according to and in connection with a true perception of susceptibility in others and calling in ourselves. Then follows, again, a severe prohibition of the contrary, exhibited in most mischievous and striking examples.

Verse 6. Bengel says quite correctly: "Here comes in the other extreme"—but this observation must be more strictly defined. The Lord here turns from the brethren, in exhorting whom, the more lovingly it is done the more effectual it is, to the dogs and swine, who only repel the mild words of love. These are to be first rebuked and disciplined to repentance, by those who are called and qualified from above so to do; and the Gospel is not to be directly thrust upon their acceptance. To do this by misapplied and inappropriate preaching of it, is the general error of the newly converted, inclined as they are to a too easy and unwise proclamation of it to all the world. It is by no means contrary to humility, but only righteous judgment, when we discern how evil the state of mind of the wicked is, and regulate our deportment towards them accordingly. There are to be found dogs and swine among men; this is the Lord's own assurance even in the midst of his gracious preaching; and he gives us his injunction to mark them and distinguish them, between the warning against censorious judgment and the encouragement to prayer. Dogs in the East are not esteemed as they are among us, they belong with swine to the unclean and contemned animals (2 Peter ii. 22). It was a proverbial way of speaking among the Israelites (and is now among the Turks), that those who are without are dogs; and this is referred to its right meaning in the New Testament (Matt. xv. 26; Phil. iii. 2; and, finally, Rev. xxii. 15). Thus the sense is: Such as in their present condition are unsusceptible of good influence, grossly sensual, proudly contradicting sinners. What then is meant by that which is holy, and which is not to be given, nay, not to be offered to such people, remaining in such a state? It is essentially explained by the opposite: Give that which is holy to the holy, or at least to those who acknowledge its holiness, and accept it as such. But this apparently abstract expression must also have here a sensible foundation, which will make it appropriate to the figure; just as the holy flesh of the offering (Hag. ii. 12; Jer. xi. 15), was not to be cast to the dogs, but to them was to be thrown that which was carrion, or torn of wild beasts (Exod. xxii. 31).* The saying blends profoundly the figure and its signification: hence pearls are introduced, with a latent allusion—These are not acorns for the touch of swine. The holy thing is God's, and that it may not be desecrated, preserve it from the profane! But it has become also our treasure and property; hence it is added in the second place, your pearls, partly in the same sense as ch. xiii. 45, 46, partly with a specific design in the plural form. So act for the sake of God's honor that the holy things may not be despised; take care that your treasure and the good that is in you be not evil spoken of (Rom. xiv. 16), for your own sakes; exhibit your special experiences, the precious things of your inner life, before God, and not before such people as understand no more about them than swine do about pearls. This warning of our Lord thus condemns many things in one word, with an advancing meaning and heightening application. It forbids, first of all, the imprudent, unprofitable, yea, injurious preaching of the Gospel, where the law and its discipline are first required; it further goes on to condemn all reckless pouring out of the secrets of the life of grace before the world, without discriminating reference to time and place, with all unseasonable relations of conversion, and confessions, and experiences, and colloquies of the devout. The latter, however, is less referred to since it is the practice of the hypocrites, with whom the preceding—Thou hypocrites! already connected them. This vilest mockery of devotion our Lord leaves unmentioned, just as before the seeing of motes not existing: he pre-supposed, there, the presence of the mote, and here that they are our own pearls which are in our hands.† But he warns against that thoughtlessness, which is rebuked by its consequences; the evil that is done itself crying out—Fool, thou shouldst have thought that this was not appropriate here! He tells us this, in his wisdom, in order to anticipate and prevent the evil.

A wise man's heart discerneth both time and judgment (Eccles. viii. 5), and doth not instruct a fool, when his incorrigible folly refuses instruction (Ecclus. xxii. 5–7; Prov. ix. 7, 8). Many of the children of the world remain altogether thus till their hour comes, many at least are such at times. Who would preach the Gospel to a drunken man, or make the gentle appeal to a man raging with the frenzy of wrath, and ask him to be reconciled to God? There is much that is analogous to this, albeit in cases not equally monstrous, and the spirit of wisdom must decide them as they occur. The mournful results show us that there are more dogs and swine than we had supposed, and this should ever teach us the lesson of prudence. The figure has been further interpreted as if the swine more particularly trod thoughtlessly the precious things under their feet; the dogs, on the contrary, turn again and rend us. In this case the former would be the worse; but the latter would indicate, as all opposition does, that there was some understanding of the thing rejected. But in 2 Peter ii. 22, the dogs are regarded as unclean inwardly, the swine as outwardly unclean; a distinction which the Lord does not make.* In the concluding sentence he adheres only to the swine and the pearls (as the αὐτούς referring to μαργαρίτας shows), and his twofold saying concerning trampling under foot, and rending (for the swine may be as ferocious as a dog) contains something much more important for the meaning of the whole—They despise and destroy both the precious gift and the well-intentioned imprudent giver. Ye have then needlessly handed over the holy thing to prostitution, and exposed yourselves to mockery and persecution! Finally in the στραφέντες, turn again, which is certainly not the mere finish of the figure, lies the inmost point of the discourse. They would have remained at rest, had you left them alone; but you have provoked them to sin against God and man, ye have through imprudence multiplied offences, whereas they ought to have either been silently tolerated, or more wisely attacked.

This word of our Lord therefore puts, as it were, a limiting restraint upon the universal zeal of our charity, which would without further condition be disposed to let the sun of grace and truth shine upon all the evil; so that it is also a limitation of the law given in ch. v. 48. It is not for us, indeed, to do as men, what God in Christ has done. Luther, in answer to the warning—Give not that which is holy unto the dogs! cries out Atque, O Domine, jam habent! (But, O Lord, they now have it). And Zinzendorf thinks that the Father in heaven has himself given that which is holy to the dogs, and cast his pearls before swine, in surrendering his beloved Son into the hands of sinners. That is true, but hence came the world's redemption, and the sanctification of the Father's name through the determinate counsel of the highest wisdom. Therefore says also the Lord—who exposed his own silent meekness to the contempt of the soldiers and his bitter cry to the scorn of the bands of the wicked—Ye shall not do thus, for ye are not saviours of the world. But though in a certain sense the children of the world are dogs and swine, yet no man is to be given up by us, and cast out as reprobate; and it is, indeed, clear that they who sometimes fall under the application of this prohibition, yet may have the holy things offered them through the grace of God, and that we may be required to offer it to them, we who are never directed, in unconditional rejection of any fellow sinner, to retain our pearls merely for ourselves. Thus this prohibition touches rather the time and manner, than the testimony of the truth itself, which we are ever bound by obligation to all men to utter; the emphasis lies upon the inconsiderate, indiscriminate giving and casting about of these treasures, in such manner as itself to hinder their being accepted. But wherever we find susceptibility, our duty is to utter the —"Peace be to this house!" (Matt. x.; Luke x.). And at all times should we speak God's word, as sinners are able to hear it (Mark iv. 33); yea, our enforced silence bears in it a concealed love and mercy, of which in due time they may become sensible. That Pharisaical perversion of this word, which makes hypocrites keep the holy things so entirely holy and hidden, that there is no place in the wicked world, as they term it, and no time found for offering them to any, was at the utmost distance from our Lord's thoughts.

* Alford reminds us of the primitive Christian use of the expression τὰ ἅγια to denote the elements of the Eucharist.

† Lange's interpretation of the hypocrites, who thus desecrated the good things of the Church in their dealing with them (iii. 85), is a more widely extended application, true enough in itself. The Lord, however, speaks to his own actual disciples, when he says: Ye shall not do in like manner, as the Pharisees! ye with your pearls!

* That the dogs (according to Lange) signified the "untrustworthily servile," is quite opposed to the fidelity universally imputed to them.

Have we been cast down by this paragraph (vers. 1–6), and driven almost to the anxious question: How shall we poor Christians attain such perfect humility and prudent love, as to hit the precise and narrow way between the evil judging on the right and the squandering of blessings on the left, among our fellow-disciples and in the evil world; how may we, without exalting ourselves over our brethren, yet put them right, and while not provoking the dogs and the swine, yet take all stumbling blocks out of their way? The Lord answers the question with his never failing grace, and calls upon his disciples once more to pray, to petition! This is the open way to the goal of perfection, unbelief and lethargy in prayer are the one only secret of our unperfectness. This gives a supplementary illustration of the sense and meaning of the prayer (ch. vi. 9–13); this gives the beginning of the discourse (ch. v. 3–6) its full explanation, and brings out in its clearest expression what was intimated there. Persevering prayer will assuredly conduct every one who has begun in sincerity, through this way of earnestness, to perfect righteousness and wisdom.* First, there is a general promise, which follows in strong contrast with the rigorous law, vers. 7, 8 (and, indeed, ver. 7 is requirement with promise, ver. 8 conversely is promise under the condition of the asking which is enjoined). Upon this we have, once more (just as vers. 3–5 followed upon vers. 1, 2) a convincing analogy, which pointing to our own love even while evil, by the highest possible elevation of the argument forbids us to doubt the all-perfect Father's willingness to give, vers. 9–11. Who among you repels his asking child? How much more will the Father in heaven hear prayer! There is much that might be preached to the heart from this word of our Lord, so transparently clear in its overflowing grace and condescension, but there is little room for exposition to the understanding We might, indeed, have said no more upon it, but that there is much misunderstanding which needs to be rectified, and the profound meaning of every one of the plainest sayings of the eternal Word in this so entirely human discourse requires to be pointed out.

Verse 7. Most sublime is the simplicity of this repeated—Ask (not like James i. 8). Whom we are to ask is self-understood—him, who knoweth all that we have need of (ch. vi. 32. 8). The Father in heaven is first mentioned at ver. 11. Neither do we hear at once for what we are to ask; that being obvious in itself—for the grace needful for righteousness, for the good gifts of the Holy Spirit (Luke xi. 13), that we may attain to this humble and prudent and sincere love. This great utterance was not given in the foregoing chapter, where the discourse was of earthly need, but was reserved for this place. It is understood, moreover, that having now received it, we may apply it in all its universality (as Mark. xi. 24) with every other reference besides that which it has especially here; as for instance, in the case which we have before us, when we pray for those wicked men (ver. 6), to whom we are not able to give more than our prayer. The Lord gives a threefold encouragement and promise: there is the one general strong assurance first, and in the subsequent seeking and knocking there is no heterogeneous element introduced (as seeking in the Scriptures, &c.), for the similitude that follows unites them all in asking simply. The three expressions refer less to three distinct apprehensions of our general need (although that has its truth*), than to an advancing, persevering asking, which makes it a labor, to the process of the internal wrestling (comp. Psa. xxvii. 4, שָׁאַלְתִּי and אֲבַקֵּשׁ). The seeking points back to the ζητεῖν of ch. vi. 33, and reminds us of that fundamental promise to Israel: Then shall ye find me, when ye seek me with all your hearts (Deut. iv. 29). The discourse has all its significance in the seeking generally, in the seeking again of the highest good which was lost (as Lange says): as to the opening to those who knock, who seeking already have come nigh, we have it fully disclosed afterwards at ver. 14; and it is the appointed gate of life, the entrance into the kingdom of heaven, the strait gate that is referred to. Our Lord's teaching knows nothing of that Quietestic abandonment and stillness which finds rest in God before the time, without asking and seeking, as having already entered and no more needing to knock; the injunction to ask goes forth over all the way of life, unrelaxed and unceasing prayer is itself alone the way to that high end. The promise stands fast: Ask, and it shall be given you—though it be first but the impulse and power to inward seeking! Seek and ye shall find—first, it may be, only the strait gate to knock at!

* This is the profound connection here, and it is the only one. Alford exhibits in a very strange way: that we should not be terrified as if God would keep back from us in our impurity and unworthiness his holy things, but should ask in full assurance.

* Menken: Ask what ye need and have not; seek that which is lost and hidden; knock, ye that are without. This last is scarcely expressed aright, for so viewed it should have been placed first. Somewhat better is that of the Reuggener Monatsblatt: He who has not should ask; he who has had, but has lost again, should seek; he to whom the way out or in is shut up, should knock. But seeking (ch. vi. 33) does not signify just what has been lost again.

Verse 8 seems to be a repetition, but adds much to the strength. The πᾶς, every one, is designed to encounter the specific unbelief, by which men may except themselves and their own present prayer. It leads further to the following similitude, inasmuch as that is made to concern all men, even the wicked. Hence in Luke xi., it is placed between two parables, showing how importunate petition, and the prayer of children, avail with men. It is very needful that men should be exhorted to give to those who ask (ch. v. 42); they do not always do this; but in most cases the defect lies rather in the lack of persevering urgency in the asking. "Asking wins" is in things generally a proverb of encouragement to persist even among the children of men.

Verses 9—11. Or, is it not so? Is not that true? The same turn to the discourse as in ver. 4. Alas! proud men are not disposed to ask and ask much, in the full sense of what we mean by asking; but children, at least, feel not thus, the τέκνα of ver. 11, they ask. What man is there among you, who would not give to his son (or daughter) who asks him? that is, if there be such, he is not to be called man. With special graciousness does the Lord work out the moving similitude, but there is not a touch or a word, that is merely pictorial and without its spiritual meaning. Bread and fish are taken from the Galilean manner of life (Mark viii. 6, 7; John xxi. 9). The bread is unconditionally necessary for their hunger, the fish is the additional good which the children's confidence asks. (In Luke's repetition of this, ch. xi., the children venture to go further, and would have an egg, as it were for gratification.) Will the father, instead of bread, reach out (ἐπιδώσει, give away) a useless stone, similar in appearance but uneatable, or the serpent, resembling the fish, but hurtful? (Yet stronger in Luke—Instead of an egg, a scorpion!) What man would thus bitterly and unfeelingly mock his asking children? Thus ye know how to give good gifts unto your children; οἴδατε, equivalent to—You have learned it from the instinct and impulse of nature, implanted in you by God; ye are able thus to treat them, comp. Phil. iv. 12. The ostrich, which is hardened against her young ones, as though they were not hers, is also without the wisdom of animal instinct (Job xxxix. 16, 17). There is more, however, in this, inasmuch as it contains the transition of the reference to God: Ye know how to distinguish good and evil for your children, so that you freely give, and indeed only good, gifts, which only are truly gifts—how much more your Father in heaven! This has a deeper significance than might first appear. The not hearing, and not giving, might at first have seemed to be analogous to the offering stones and serpents; but now the wisdom of God's love does not always give that which is asked, for his foolish children often ask, in matters pertaining to the soul, what would be only the stone and the serpent—and should the Father answer such prayers? He no more does this than a father upon earth would in such a case, which is lightly hinted. He gives us always ἀγαθά, good things, the true bread of the soul, the only wholesome food to accompany it; and were it to assume a form of scantiness, this must be steadfastly believed. He gives to them that ask him! not merely the words which would have corresponded—to his children, or to you; for his Father-love extends so far, that every one who prays to him is by that circumstance as a child in his regard. Consequently, from this there arises the great conclusion, the strong argument and assurance: He who thus gives, is your Father, and if ye ask him, shall it be in vain?

But the inconceivably important ὑμεῖς πονηροὶ ὄντες, you being evil, comes into strong contrast with this address to the disciples as distinguished from others. The praying children of God are, as to their nature, placed among the ἄνθρωποι or men generally, and, in the midst of his most affectionate tenderness, he testifies to them, that they are in themselves evil and niggardly (for good is communicative), and thus that all natural goodness and love are only the contradiction which an equivocal instinct makes to the corruption of our ruined nature—and not genuine and pure love. Thus, as was before said, our own evil love (which in children loves only our own flesh and blood), is merely a figure, which through the antithesis of πόσῳ μᾶλλον, how much more, points to the pure love of God. Was it possible to bind together the testimony to God's mercy and the essential testimony to our own utter corruption, more expressly and emphatically than is here done? Thus does the Most Blessed, with all his grace, yet speak concerning us men, concerning our human father-and-mother love! This word cuts deep and inexorably into all the beautiful soft sentimentality which talks about "good men;" yea, this word appears to me the most rigorous dictum probans in all Scripture,* for original sin; and, at the same time, one of the strongest testimonies to the superhuman dignity of our Lord, who, excepting himself from the whole race, can say to all mankind: Ye being evil! (John viii. 23, 24).

From this point let a general view be taken of the manner in which the person of the "Preacher on the Mount" exhibits itself and bears its own witness, in ever increasing majesty throughout the whole discourse, so that all that the Lord afterwards uttered concerning himself (Matt xi. 27, 28), and all that John has recorded from his lips, seems already involved and asserted in this sermon. Its first words distribute blessedness, impart the kingdom of heaven. Who is he, that hath such authority? He says in ch. v. 11—For my sake, as quite one with—For righteousness' sake. He calls his disciples the light of the world, the salt of the earth—what must he be, their Lord and Master! He begins in ver. 16 the oft-recurring: Your Father in heaven; but he avoids, here as well as throughout all his discourses in the Gospels, placing himself by any—"Our" in conjunction with them, before the Father. It is only—Pray ye—Our Father! He remains the only One who can, by his own high authority, give them this command. He is come, to fulfill all things; he utters his testimony as no prophet had ever done—Verily, I say unto you; he knows what will take place till heaven and earth pass away, who shall enter the kingdom and who shall not, who shall be called great or small therein; he opposes his own—But I say unto you, to every other saying; he knows the entrances to hell, and the laws of the everlasting prison house; he lays down requirements which enter the heart, and go far beyond man's ability whether to do or to bear, while he gives corresponding promises of grace from his Father in heaven, which embrace the whole heart and the whole life, all time and all eternity. He gives (ch. vii. 7) full assurance of the answer of every prayer; remains, while among men in most gracious condescension alone, above, and apart from the whole of humanity, being evil; testifies, as if he saw at one glance the whole of mankind as viewed by God, how many are in the way of perdition, how few are in the way of salvation. He arrogates, finally, to himself the right to receive the name of Lord from men, and presents himself as the judge of all the world at last; who will at that day utter the words of final decision for eternity, even as he now utters his present words that, hearing and doing them, men may not fall into fearful, irreparable ruin. O ye Rationalists, who take so much complacency in the morality of the Sermon on the Mount, hear and appreciate its dogmatic teaching too!

Or will ye have nothing but its pure ethics? Then here you have it at once in nuce (ver. 12). It appears a very simple saying, and yet the Lord cries: This is the Law and the Prophets! But the same Lord requires also hearing and doing for this his so ethical, so intelligible saying. Be it so—do ye it in very deed? O beware, ye false prophets, of the false prophet in your own evil hearts, of the arch-liar, who beguiles you into the deluding supposition that you do this, that you can do it—without Christ, without the righteousness of God, which comes through faith in Jesus Christ, as it was before testified by the Law and the Prophets. The Lord places this great requirement, so well understood by all, yet only through him by any to be fulfilled, between that one word—Ye men being evil, and that other—Here is the strait gate, the narrow way: it is here that asking, seeking, knocking avails.

This is, as we may see, the distinctive and comprehensive final expression of the law of Christ, which perfect love imposes upon us, who even in our love are evil (in our love as parents, ver. 11, as brothers, and as enemies, ch. v. 46, 47); but only through the life-giving grace which is both promised and imparted. This is the concluding requirement at the close of the whole great section of the requirements: Walk in this way towards this end, the only way, narrow but sure! The goal is contained in ver. 12, the way thereto in ver. 13, 14. The Lord here lays down in the simplest manner the *substance of the law of perfectness in regard to our neighbor; for it is only another expression of the Mosaic command—to love thy neighbor as thyself—passing from the love itself to the confirmation and approval of it in deed. It embraces in one the whole second table of the decalogue (as that from which all the rest proceeded, ch. v. 21); in the same manner ch. vi. 33 embraces the first table; and ch. v. 48, both in their central unity. It is uttered with respect to the outer and the inner life (for, as we saw in ch. vi. 1, the Lord accounts no doing of the law as genuine but that which is internal), for the greatest and the slightest cases in which the general law becomes a specific commandment. It refers to our own self-loving sense of duty, in which that which is most difficult to do is yet easily seen to be right. It is the expression of the third fundamental law, which points us, and urges us to that self-denial which can only be attained through the grace of God, to the deliverance from that internal, deep-rooted self-contradiction of evil human nature which would desire from others what to others we deny. (See Lev. xix. 18, in its connection with this.) And it is just at this point that the great—Enter ye in! (ver. 13), is attached, embracing the promise of the opening of the gate, nay, the assurance that it is already opened. And immediately upon this, as the ground of that solemn and simple sentence which had just been uttered; for there is no other gate, no other way, all beside this is the broad way that leadeth to the wide gate of destruction! (vers. 13, 14). This immediately paves the way to the remaining third main division of the Sermon, which draws the final limits between the good and the bad, setting forth the great tests and separation at the end of all.

* And, indeed, as a matter of pre-supposition, and not now to be first asserted and maintained! (Comp. 1 Kings viii. 46.) The same who were before directed to say Our Father, are in themselves evil children, though themselves fathers. Chrysostom in vain denies, that the Lord speaks this as διαβάλλων τὴν ἀνθρωπίνην φύσιν, κακίζων τὸ γένος, accusing human nature, depreciating the race and in vain would merely understand it of the ἀντιδιαστολὴ τῆς ἀγαθότητος, interval in point of goodness, between us and God: for πονηροί, evil, admits of no ἀναθότης, goodness, at all.

* The particle οὖν, therefore, on which much exposition has been expended, is just the indication of the result of all, summing up what had gone before. In this sense it does not merely connect the sentence which it begins with the immediately preceding, but takes a sweeping retrospect of the whole.

Verse 12. Is this any thing new, to teach which, as a higher and more perfect morality, the Lord must come down from heaven? By no means, rather is it the primitive commandment, extant among all nations, by which every man who sincerely looks within his own soul, must utter his own condemnation. It is found in the Talmud: for example Rabbi Hillel thus speaks to one who would become a proselyte: "Whatsoever is hateful to thyself, that do not to thy neighbor: in this is the whole law, all else only comes out of this. Go and be perfect." We find it in Sirach: Νόει τὰ τοῦ πλησίον ἐκ σεαυτοῦ καὶ ἐπὶ παντὶ πράγματι διανοοῦ, "Judge of thy neighbor by thyself, and be discreet in every point" (Ecclus. xxxi. 15), and in Tobit: Ὃ μισεῖς μηδενὶ ποιήσῃς, "Do that to no man, which thou hatest (ch. iv. 15). In Isocrates we find: Ἃ πάσχοντες ὑφ' ἑτέρων ὀργίζεσθε, ταῦτα τοῖς ἄλλοις μὴ ποιεῖτε, "Whatever things you are angry at experiencing from others, these do not to the rest of men!" But the tendency of our selfishness to extract the keen severity from the testimony which it is constrained to bear against itself, is betrayed in this, that in nearly all cases the negative only is seized: What thou wouldst not have thyself, do not thou to thy neighbor! The Lord on the contrary fetches it up from the depths of conscience as an inexorably positive demand: "Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye also to them"—as unlimited a requirement, therefore, as the will and the desire of self-love itself. We said rightly: our own self-loving feeling of duty—although this is just as much a contradictio in adjecto, as our own love, being evil, in ver. 11 was. It is, as it were, the theoretical and practical side of that self-contradiction, which is our natural condition. With strict propriety has Luther said: "Here Christ lays the Bible upon thine own bosom, and so clearly, moreover, that thou needest no gloss." But to how many limiting, apologetic glosses and imaginations has natural conscience resorted, to silence, in unrighteousness and self-delusion, the great accusing gloss: I am not thus! I cannot do this! Selfishness perverts the relation between me and my neighbor, so that, notwithstanding all, the most-loved I comes before and comes after my neighbor, and remains above him. Why am I to do good to my neighbor? That he may do mo good in return—this clings to the evil heart. So runs the common proverb: First comes myself, then my neighbor, then myself again—or more plainly: By my neighbor I mean only myself. The Lord refers not to this perversion, but to the great truth that lies at its foundation. He goes back to the Mosaic כָּמוֹךָ, as thyself, in unconditional equality without any before and after; confirmed as it was by an אֲנִי יְהוָה, "I am Jehovah," for in the sight of God no self of the creature can have place.

The Lord's meaning is not that which a superficial misapprehension of his keenly penetrating rule would make it—as if he only spoke "of the external, material, obvious actions of life," and consequently "had not in his purpose to set up a principle of morality" (Neander). The Lord, in all that he lays down, will be understood according to the internal principle, and never gives "external tests, merely, of character and life." He neither acknowledges nor alludes to any other act than that which is truly such, springing from the heart. It is his aim, that the consciousness of equality and of mutual need (as Braune better says, though without fully reaching its depth of meaning) should exhort and urge us to the practical love of our neighbor.

In this πάντα ὅσα ἄν, whatever, is included and summed up with most significant definiteness every individual case that could prompt the question: What is here my duty to my neighbor? It is this—Let the relative position be changed, conceive thyself in his place, and he in thine! That fellow-feeling and sympathy which naturally is excited by the sight of another's sorrow, which may be almost called the conscience of our physical nature, will show me the way, since it makes me feel as if I were in his place. Then do to him, what thou wouldst desire him to do to you, were you in his case! But who is there that does not stand mid-way, instead of going the whole way and entering through the door—who doeth this? Who doeth it before God, as the genuine and true acting of love, which would do no ill to his neighbor, nay, not by the omission of any good that he might and ought to render him? He who thus loves, has fulfilled the Law, the whole Law, for the fulfillment of the second table is only possible through the fulfillment of the first—who can love independently of the love of God? The commandment requires love out of a pure heart; a pure heart comes only through a good conscience, and a good conscience through a faith unfeigned—in the fulfilling grace of the great Fulfiller in us (1 Tim. i. 5). Hence the Lord does not merely say: This is the Law (of both tables)—but in addition: and the Prophets! In the same sense, that is, as ch. xxii. 40. For he means to tell us that all the preparatory, prophetic Scripture which pointed to him who was to come, took its rise from the requirement of the Law, and is one with it: he refers back to ch. v. 17, and all which that word disclosed to us; his design is that we should now at the close connect with it the beginning and understand: This is the Law and the Prophets, to fulfill which in your righteousness, I am come.

Verses 13, 14. By a false disposition these verses are generally placed at the beginning of the subsequent paragraph; whereas they only form a transition to it, and are in themselves most distinctively a conclusion, which plainly enough refers to the parallel conclusion of the first division (ch. v. 20). Now is that righteousness, which must be better than the Pharisees', exhibited; now it is said, Receive it, that is, Seek for it in prayer with full earnestness of spirit, and thus enter into the kingdom of heaven! Through the strait gate? Yes verily, for your knowing all that is in ver. 12 will avail nothing; that I point it out to you and teach you, will avail nothing: but your own prayer and your own laying hold must proceed from self-denial to self-denial, until the whole of perfect righteousness is established within you.

How then are the way and the gate related to each other in the following discourse? The late Von Meyer thought this an idle question, inasmuch as the figures are here not connected with each other, but parallel: I cannot, however, agree with him. It is an error all but universal to understand the Lord, because the strait gate emphatically stands first, as having placed a strait gate of conversion, or however else it may be expressed, to be pressed through before the way is entered on. Thus do most preachers apply the spirit of the text. But this entirely contradicts the simple character of the figure, the connection of the whole sermon, and much other illustration of the Lord's own meaning? Doors lead not to ways,* but a way leads to the gate of the town or the house whither I would go: when I reach the gate I am at the end of the way.† If I have entered through the gate, my point is gained definitely, I am either in security, peace, and joy, or—in the prison of eternal ruin. The narrow way is that which the whole sermon has pointed out, the gate or the door (for πύλη is a general expression, which includes, as here, the widest gate and the straitest postern) is no other than the entrance into the kingdom of heaven, which as the close and crown of all their struggles and endeavors, is thrown open to those who knock; see vers. 7, 21; ch. v. 20. Thus does the Lord explain himself (Luke xiii. 24, 25). So also he speaks again of the needle's eye (Matt. xix. 24). In the preliminary εἰσέλθετε, enter, the Redeemer has certainly brought near to us the gate, as if it were directly before us, but only in the same sense as the future kingdom of heaven is come nigh to us, in the same sense as we now continually stand knocking at the gate of heaven, as we are now already saved through the asking and receiving of prayer, which brings heaven into the heart. The Lord, to be more particular, includes in his invitations the way and the gate, in one; since the way is already the gate to those who, walking in that way, are sure to reach that gate. When he would summon us to walk in the right way, he prefers at once to take his language from the decisive goal to which it leads: Enter ye in! For all our walking in the way is but the beginning of our final entrance. And in this lies the truth, and the justification of our customary way of speaking about the strait gate. It would be even exegetically right, if it were simply derived from the first part of the verse, and confined to it; but if the remainder is thus read, and the gate is placed before the way, it is at least exegetically incorrect, and would be inapplicable in speaking and preaching about the inner life. This exegetical error, alas! may become the occasion of much misapprehension of the plan of salvation, both in theory and in practice. The Lord acknowledges those who are entering, who are struggling to enter, but none as having entered till the end comes. And what then would become of the wide gate, through which the children of the world would have already entered; since in their case there is no distinctive beginning or passing through a gate, no passing out from any state whatever into the broad way, in which by nature and by their birth they walk. Rather is the wide gate the gaping pit of hell, opening her mouth without measure (Isa. v. 14; Hab. ii. 5; Prov. xxx. 15, 16)—into which men walk, and dance and stagger and fall by crowds.

The Lord lays down the eternally decisive alternative and contrast—damnation or rather destruction and life; this great antithesis, and the others connected with it—wide and broad, strait and narrow, many and few: he further strengthens the whole, however, by the words which we must not overlook. Many there be which go in therent, few there be that find it. Εἰσερχόμενοι δι αὐτῆς, which go in thereat—it may be asked, whether ὁδοῦ, way, or πύλης, gate, be signified. Obviously and primarily we are to understand as the word itself and the previous εἰσέλθετε show—Who go through the wide gate into hell; yet Luther has understood it of the way thither, and rightly so far as the Lord includes this likewise. The ambiguous δι' αὐτῆς, thereat, most significantly confirms the view we have given above. The Lord's glance beholds the way and its termination as inseparable, and the many who walk in the broad way, he warningly and lamentingly describes as entering in to destruction! This "going in thereat" is sorrowfully, catachrestically spoken; as if they were entering into their own eternal house, instead of entering into life! (which is lost in Luther's text). To this is opposed in solemn tones of exhortation, the εὑρίσκοντες, that find, for to this seeking is first of all needful. The broad way to the wide gate no man needs to seek; it is broad as the world (εὐρύχωρος marks rather a great country than a way); thou standest and walkest upon it already: thou canst not fail, swim only with the current, live only according to thy inherited custom and after the impulse of thine own nature; the gate of hell will then receive thee, to which all ways converge as if one single broad way by the side of the one only narrow way. But this narrow way and this strait gate must be perseveringly sought, till it is found throughout and to the end. It is "a mountain-path, narrow, insignificant and not obvious to the eye" (Tholuck). Few there be that attain to its end, for even to those who are seeking to pursue it there are by-ways issuing from it to the right and to the left (Isa. xxx. 21; Deut. v. 32), and many who have come near to the gate, fail of it at last! (Luke xiii. 24). What the Lord here says of the many and the few, is similar to Matt. xx. 16; xxii. 14. Only the doing of the divine will leadeth unto life (afterwards, ver. 21); for the word of Moses (Lev. xviii. 5) still holds good, and the grace of our Lord establishes and fulfills it in us. Life and destruction are set before us. Who regards the way, its agreeableness or its difficulty, when his eye is on the goal? Who would be guided by the number of those who walk in any way, instead of thinking whither they tend, and whither himself? The foolish world, indeed, "loves the wide, and the broad, and the numbers"—delights in the majorities! But who ordinarily investigates the door, its width or its straitness, instead of the place to which the door conducts him who enters? Look only at the goal and the end! This is the emphasis of the twice-repeated ἡ ὁδὸς ἡ ἀπάγουσα, "the way that leadeth [away]," instead of which Luther has constructed another antithesis which is not in the words; the one leading away to destruction, the other leading to life. Could the Lord then have meant to speak of a leading away into life (conversely as entering into destruction); and how might this be taken? It would be hard to find a meaning: we should have to understand it as leading away from all need, from all evil and danger and temptation into perfect security; as in the other case from all pleasure and security into everlasting torment. But then the emphasis is alike in both, and it simply denotes the eternal decision, the sure result. Bengel seizes the meaning exactly in his pregnant—ἀπάγουσα, ex hac brevi vitâ, "from this short life" Then there is no middle-path, thus there is an irrevocable and fixed alternative! Tholuck seeks in one of his sermons over-critically to soften this; as if the Lord says nothing of the eternal fall of these many, but speaks now only of their present walking in the wicked way that leads to it—many of them might yet turn aside from it. Assuredly they might, but the ἀπάγειν, leading [away], signifies the complete result, the εἰσέρχεσθαι, entering, is not their present walking, according to the weakening translation of the German Bible.

* As we see it figured, unnaturally enough, in old books of devotion.

† Thus quite appropriately in the passage of Cebes (quoted also by Olshausen): Θύραν τινὰ μικρὰν καὶ ὁδόν τινα πρὸ τῆς θύρας, "Some little gate and a road before the gate." Lange's reason for placing the gate first, that the fundamental idea is that of a departure from a city, of decision in the choice of the right way, is quite opposed to the letter of the text, which rather speaks of an entrance, and of a way leading to this.

We have now to give our view of the remarkable reading: Τί στενή, how strait is the gate! for which certainly the external evidence of manuscripts is favorable, whence even Von Gerlach declares it the true reading. We cannot, however, agree with this: and if Tholuck with a delicate and true perception says: "Wherefore so strait?" would be a human, sentimental pathos which does not accord with the whole discourse; we also say the same of the wondering appeal—O how strait! The Lord is here speaking in a tone of simple assertion and keen testimony; the τί, how, by no means suits that tone, and must have originated from the transcribers, who understood not the point of the second striking ὅτι, because. This is justified by internal criticism, but what is the meaning of the expression as here used? We should expect a simple "and" of contrast, as Luther has translated it; at furthest a "but" or "on the other hand." Yet ὅτι can be made to mean none of these, by any art. We understand it that the Lord has the former injunction—Enter ye in through the strait gate! still in his thought, and connects with that the two sentences which follow, as if it had been in each case repeated—"Enter ye in! for wide is the gate—! (once again: Enter ye in! being understood), For strait is the gate—!

And yet it is and must ever be a gate, which is not shut, but stands open and wide enough for ever for those who would enter it by the right way. "The narrow way to life is broad enough, for men who carefully, gently, evenly walk in it." That is the consolation, which even this rigorous saying contains. What more is wanting than a way wherein I may have room, and a gate that will let me through? To this end the Lord stands in fulness of truth and grace, calling and inviting us with all earnestness: Enter ye in! meets us, as it were, with "Enter in" before we knock—prays us that we ask—commands us to seek, encourages us himself that we may knock; Connect with this his other great word: I am the way! I am the door! and thou shalt in thy experience learn to unite Matt. vii. 13, 14, with ch. xi. 28–30, and find that both are truth, that both sayings are essentially one in his meaning.

The requirements which are enjoined upon us, on the foundation of a promised grace, are now ended, being condensed into that one appeal: Enter ye in! This speaks as encouragingly and graciously of a free admission, as its appended statement speaks severely of all that belongs to the successful prosecution of the way till the final entrance. It is through the strait gate, the straitness of which is previously proclaimed in the narrowness of the way that leads thereto. Its meaning is just what a later explanation of it says: Ἀγωνίζεσθε εἰσελθεῖν, Strive to enter in (Luke xiii.)—addressed to those especially who already walk in this way, to the disciples, who would be and who may be perfect. Whether they shall find the way directly to the gate, the "few there be" makes matter of solemn thought. This of itself is a warning appeal: Beware! and thus the discourse passes over to its conclusion, showing the dangers of the way external to ourselves, and lifting the curtain from before the final judgment-seat.

The third division of the Sermon, as it was defined in the distribution which we made at the outset, may not appear to correspond immediately with our preconceived expectations of what it would be; yet it will exhibit itself to a closer observation as quite consonant with the nature of things, and the whole course of thought throughout. Its beginning seems to fly off abruptly from the subject which had been treated, the way, namely, of a progressive advancement towards the goal: but it is not so. For just because at the close of the whole of the requirements, the "Enter ye in!" had been so closely connected with a strait gate, and the bye-ways to right and left of inward unholiness which leave the narrow way, had been so fully and clearly disclosed; on that account the section of warning was not required to make any distinctive and express reference to the internal state. But this did not render unnecessary a glance at the dangers of the way which rise from without, through the false teaching and guidance of a specious deceit. Thus the introductory warning against false prophets, is first introduced strictly in its right place (vers. 15–20); with which, nothing now being withheld that is requisite for distinguishing the right way, the discourse has free scope to pass on to the remaining fundamental warning (vers. 21–23) of the final judgment, in which no evil doer will be able to stand. We are wont to preach about the false prophets in ourselves, and that application is indeed permitted, yet it wrenches the passage from its place in this connection. The Lord simply means such prophets as are the opposites of those mentioned in the beginning (ch. v. 12, and again v. 17, vii. 12); so that the beginning and the end agree in one. According to Luke he had previously cast a side-glance upon the false prophets. The reference in the discourse to ourselves is to be sought not in this, but in something else, namely, in the specification of the fruits as marks, not merely of the office of prophets, but as the judgment-day presently shows, of discipleship generally. It is a perversion of the sense to regard these fruits, as is commonly done, as the proofs by which true guides must legitimate their claims; the fruits are, as the reference to the Baptist's words in ver. 19 shows, no other than what the common usage of the Old and New Testament understands by them. In the whole section vers. 17–20 those fruits, by which the Lord will distinguish his own, are at the same time demanded of all his disciples, and, as befits the tone of this concluding division, with all severity; though the first tone of promise is once more gently heard in the reference to the good tree which bears those fruits—a tree planted in us by the grace of God. Whereupon, secondly, in ver. 21, the doing of the will of God is required of us in the final utterance of law; and finally at the minatory conclusion the warning against not doing it is heard in the last stern tones of all. Thus we find that the fundamental principle of trichotomy, as we laid it down at the beginning, is preserved and justified down to the end.

We subdivide vers. 15–20 thus: 1. The simple appeal—Beware of false prohets! 2. The detecting reference to the contradiction between appearance and reality—Wolves in sheep's clothing! 3. The laying down of a mark to distinguish them, which, however, is and can be no other than the same which will avail us now and ever before the Lord—the fruits of righteousness, the fulfilling of all the commandments from that new nature which grace creates in us. Let it be observed how that which is here said was foreshadowed in ch. v. 19. This further resolves itself into, (a) The general position: The tree is known by its fruit; put in ver. 16 in a convincing manner in a double similitude of natural and Scriptural symbolism. (b) An emphatic repetition of this, which however in its generality now includes the disciples generally, and the key-note of promise is heard in the "good tree." The good and the corrupt tree are contrasted; twice positively (ver. 17), twice negatively (ver. 18). Conclusion of both: the corrupt tree is cast into the fire! (ver. 19), which directly leads over to the judgment that follows. Yet to complete the organization of the discourses, (c) we have once more the truth repeated: Wherefore by their fruits ye shall know them? (ver. 20). That is, at the same time, according to the intimation that lies in the words (in accordance with the πᾶν, every, of vers. 17 and 19): By the same mark will ye be known, as ye know others. This is the verification of discipleship before men in the time of the present life (the shining before men, ch. v. 14, 16); and with it the transition is strikingly made to the impressive sequel.

In vers. 21–23, follows the approval of their discipleship in the presence of God in eternity, or rather on that day, which divides time from eternity, and the days of grace in the way from the goal of eternal decision and doom—the judgment. And now we find not —Before God; but—Before Me, the Lord, the Judge! Not—Your Father will know you; but—I! The same who at ver. 11 excepted himself alone from the whole evil race, now in language simple and sublime, presents himself as the Judge at the end of the way, even as he now exhibits himself the Lawgiver in the way. Presumption, if he also belonged to the men who are evil and to the corrupt trees; quite natural and necessary, however, to this testimony of truth, from him who may speak to us from the judgment-seat and say (as it now for the first time breaks forth in majesty)—My Father, as the eternal Son, the Lord. All this is but the consummation of what had been prepared for in ch. v. 22, 25, and still earlier in ver. 20. He determines now, for the first time, who shall enter the kingdom of heaven, and who be cast into prison. The end goes back to the beginning; the whole sermon is a building, of which every stone, from the first to the last, is laid in its place according to a pre-arranged and wonderful order. It says already, as the beginning of sermons, what every other discourse proclaimed—I am He! for the conviction and assurance of every one who hath ears to hear, though without specifically and in so many words proclaiming it.

His words are now more closely compressed, as their force becomes more solemn. They lay down three positions. The first (ver. 21) begins gently with the mere—"Not every one," and mentions, affirmatively and with a tone of promise pervading this last requirement, the "doing of the will" as the sure and certain way into the kingdom of heaven. In this is embraced, as in the most simple possible compendium, the whole middle division of the Sermon, from its preface (ch. v. 20) down to its close (ch. vii. 14); particularly the three critical precepts (ch. v. 48, vi. 33, vii. 12), as they are condensed in that central petition of ch. vi. 10. The second sentence (ver. 22) strengthens the negative—"Not every one" by a threatening "many"; the third (ver. 23), is the inexorable conclusion: Depart from me! although the "then" leaves us a period of grace for the doing of those sayings, which we now hear from the lips of the Lawgiver who came to fulfill them, and will come again to be our Judge. Thus—He who hath ears to hear, let him hear! Let him who is a hearer, be also a doer of the work! (John vii. 16, 17).

Then ends the mighty Sermon with a cry of most direct and urgent warning, with ἐξουσία (authority) seizing the heart and conscience before the judgment-seat of God: Whosoever heareth these sayings of mine and doeth them not, is a foolish man, has his own destruction to impute to himself, because he has not received and applied my gracious—Enter ye in! my faithful—Beware! It is in gracious condescension from its highest dignity, a winning tone being mingled with the threatening, that even such a conclusion as this takes the form once more of a popular similitude, the balanced and contrasted members of which bring directly home to us the great alternative of everlasting decision, exhibiting the final judgment in warning preparatory judgments, and the test of the last day in manifold tests, which are applied upon earth, and within the day of grace. For this alone is the true meaning of the figure (vers. 24–27), which generally and indefinitely comprehends in one the approval of the house (before exhibited) in time and in eternity; in strict conformity with the apostle's meaning—The day shall declare it, time present and future (1 Cor. iii. 13). In many cases the morrow, but in every case the last day! The reference to the wise man who built securely, comes graciously first; although no longer (for every turn of the word and thought is significantly adjusted) in the form of an express appeal and injunction, but with a decisive—Whosoever thus heareth and doeth! The last appeal to the warned occurred at vers. 15 and 20, but in ver. 21 the warning and threatening remain only in the third person, just as the discourse, in its great promise, had commenced (ch. v. 2–20). The fearful fall (ver. 27), preaches condemnation at the close, as blessedness had been announced in the beginning.

Let the process of our Saviour's preaching and teaching according to the Evangelists be compared with the process of the Sermon on the Mount; and the procedure which is marked out here, will as a whole be found reproduced throughout. We refrain from this comparison in detail, and will only exhibit the analogy, as it is strikingly shown with respect to the conclusion. The warning against false prophets recurs at the end of his ministry for his disciples and the people, in Matt. xxiii. (comp. Luke xx. 46), for his disciples particularly in Matt. xxiv., as also at the close of the New Testament, in the epistles of Peter, Jude, and John. The fruits are demanded at last (an evidence this, also, of the soundness of our exposition here) in Matt. xxi. 34; John xv. The judgment, the rejection and casting out, is threatened in all the final parables to the disciples that we know of, in the last discourse to the people (Matt. xxv.), as in the Apocalypse we find it closing the whole New Testament. The reference to the word of the future Judge, heard in order to be done, is found also in John xii. 47–50; compare, for the disciples particularly, John xiii. 17, and the final conclusion of the whole Bible Rev. xxii. 6–21.

Verse 15. The Lord here bears witness to himself as the true Prophet, who should come into the world (John vi. 14; 1 Macc. xiv. 41, προφήτης πιστός); the whole series of heralds and witnesses of God from the first prophecy of Moses downwards, converging into the one, last, perfect utterance of God's will, through him whose prerogative it is to say—"My Father," and concerning whom the Father responds—Him shall ye hear! even as Moses in the beginning had testified (Deut. xviii. 15). Hear, and bear well in mind, what I now say unto you: After me will many other voices speak to you; beware of them all. In this lofty generality his warning is to be understood; and what the Lord declares for the hearing of all ages, must not be shrivelled into a narrower application to this or that emergency, to any present or following time. It is altogether the same as if he had now also said—All who come besides me, not genuinely in my name, all who shall teach anything other than I say to you, are thieves and robbers, whom the sheep may not hear (John x. 8). As comprehensive as was the word in ch. v. 12, concerning the true prophets of former ages, is the contrast to them in this passage—as universal as that contrast had been already exhibited by the Lord himself in Luke vi. 26; with this let Matt. x. 41, xxiii. 34 be also compared. For the sake of the people and the disciples, who then heard him, the scribes of ch. v. 19, 20; Luke xx. 46, are first of all intended; but then all are included, against whom Matt. xxiv. lifts up a warning voice, from the last days of Israel to the end of time. It may be taken in connection with the words which had just preceded; and they are then false guides. This must not, however, be restricted by a one-sided limitation to those who would make the narrow way broader to you; for there are false guides who would make the narrow way, apparently at least, narrower than the Lord has made it.* They come to you—there is a slight contrast hinted in this; they come though they are not sent, by their own authority: thus pointing to such ancient warnings as Jer. xiv. 14, xxiii.; Ezek. xxxiv. God sends them not, but he permits them to come, for the trial and confirmation of his people (1 Cor. xi. 19; Deut. xiii. 1–4).

What then is the sheep's clothing; does the genitive προβάτων mean—with ἐνδύμασι; Clothed like sheep, as if they were sheep, or —With sheepskins? Men contend about this with idle pains, for both are one and the same; and the word is chosen for its twofold reference. It is assuredly clear at once from the simple tone of the words (especially with reference to the Old Testament warnings against false pastors and prophets, which is connected with the discourse), that it should mean: They demean themselves as guides and shepherds, going before you, as if themselves belonging to the flock; but it is only a counterfeit and mask, for they are not sheep as ye are, to whom they come. In this we have a prelude to what is more strongly expressed soon after in ch. x. 16; it is an early note of our Lord's manner of describing his own as his sheep, as it appears in John; a usage which is rooted also in Matthew, as we see in such sayings, derived from the prophetic style of language, as ix. 36, x. 6—and in the shepherd-similitudes (ch. xviii. 12, xxv. 32, 33). But this alone does not exhaust the expression as used here; for these first hearers were not sufficiently prepared for this view, and there was yet needed some intermediate point of connection. This lies certainly in the ἐνδύμασι, clothing, which to Israelitish ears would immediately carry a reference to the prophet-costume, known to all of them, in their proverbial language, and of late brought before their very eyes by John the Baptist. That this included also sheepskins, μηλωταῖς, we are taught by Heb. xi. 37; comp. 1 Kings xix. 13–19 (in the Sept.). If it is asked, whether the sheepskins and goatskins, the rough leathern garments (שֵׂעָר, 2 Kings i. 8) of the prophets, were the symbol of innocence and the natural character of sheep, we answer by again asking—May not the Lord give the figure this application, and extend it from its historical use so far? His word is certainly directed to this point, that the prophet's garment is made a pledge and pretence of an honest design, and thus their lie is cloaked under the appearance of truth and sincerity; just as the prophet has it (Zech. xiii. 4). We thus see that the Lord comprehends in their inner unity the symbolism of nature and the Bible, combines the Old Testament phraseology (even in the Rabbinical which sprung from it) with the well-understood usage of the Gentiles, so that his words are equally intelligible to the Scribes in Israel and to all people who dwell upon the earth even to the distant אִיֵּי הַגּוֹיִם, "Isles of the Gentiles." The Æsopic wolf in sheep's clothing, and the Jewish perverter in the garb of a prophet, are united in one similitude which comprehends the idea of both, and combines what had been true as a historical fact with the common truth of nature. The ἅρπαγες, ravening, added to λύκοι, wolves, does not merely strengthen the figure, but makes emphatically prominent the destruction and ruin of the poor, deluded ones; as subsequently in John x. 10, 12, and again by the apostle (not without reference to our Lord's word), Acts xx. 29. How, then, shall we strictly define the sheep's clothing? A fair show generally, as far as it is a mere ἔνδυμα, clothing, striking the eye of those who are said ἔξωθεν εἶναι, "to be without:" then, further, it includes on the one hand the specious discourses (πιθανολογία, Col. ii. 4; κενοὶ λόγοι, Eph. v. 6; χρηστολογία καὶ εὐλογία, Rom. xvi. 18) of an attractive doctrine and counterfeit orthodoxy, and, on the other, the simulated walk of righteous and devout spirit, μόρφωσις εὐσεβείας, "form of godliness" (2 Tim. iii. 5). Although in the latter case the deficiency of the δύναμις, "power," is perceived by those who look searchingly, and it is scarcely possible (as Nitzsch preaches) to counterfeit the stamp of godliness to the eye of those who are well-grounded in the experience of Christian self-denial. As manifold as is the form which their hypocrisy assumes, so comprehensive is the Lord's meaning with regard to them. It must be observed, however, that what it is attempted to impose as pure and true doctrine, must bring with it also false doctrine and error, else how were they false prophets? And further, that what appears to be a righteous and blameless life, can be no genuine fruit of righteousness, else how could the Lord have specified fruits as the tokens by which they should be known? With the most perfect propriety of truth, he places fruits in opposition both to the word and the work of these hypocrites.

* Indeed only apparently; for the heaviest yoke of human impositions is always lighter to us and more agreeable, than the true and narrow way.

Verses 16, 17. Once more a universally appreciable natural emblem, which at the same time finds its deep significance in the symbolism of Scripture; for the Bible explains to us from its rudiments the book of creation. (James cites once more the Sermon on the Mount in ch. iii. 12.) The fig tree and the vine, the noble productions of the Holy Land—the vine, indeed, the noblest of all lands generally—are in the language of the prophets, the emblem of Israel; thorns and thistles indicate (rather under a theological than a physical presentation) the weeds of sin which have sprung from the curse, as may be seen particularly in 2 Sam. xxii. 6; Mic. viii. 4. What, then, are the figs and grapes, the good fruits? So far as the reference is here especially to the prophets, certainly not pure doctrine simply as such; as an exposition would maintain which springs, however unconsciously, from an evil principle: for that would contradict the whole consistent usage of the Scripture when speaking of fruits, and especially the words of the Baptist, to which the Lord here refers, and which must have occurred to the minds of all his hearers upon the Mount. If appeal is made to the context and connection of Matt. xii. 33, 34, with equal appropriateness at least may we refer to the disavowal of the mere saying, Lord, Lord, afterwards in this same discourse (ver. 22). Confession alone, doctrine however pure, is by no means a decisive mark, may be no more than a hypocritical pretension, which itself must be brought to the test. Still less may we, further, limit the words, as has been done, to the fruit which the false teachers may produce in their disciples: Look well, what kind of people they create out of their adherents! Although this view is not altogether excluded; as in John xv., among the much fruit of the disciples, their so-called ministerial fruit must be included with the rest. But still this refers to the teachers and guides themselves: they cannot make their disciples what they are not themselves. Thus is it the life of these prophets, by which we are to take knowledge of them? Certainly mainly this: for while they for the most part speak fairly, their error is manifest enough in their life; their sheep's-clothing is mostly woven of words. Yet there are, again, though not in such numbers, deceivers of an opposite kind, who come the more boldly, the more they appear to be authenticated by the well-ordered, decorous, resplendent character of their deportment. Hence the Lord's words must be rightly understood, as fastening upon these likewise: we are not to look only at the superficial cast of their words and works, their walk and their teaching, which is far from a sufficient test, but we are to learn by it to distinguish, what are genuine grapes and figs, from the thorn-sloes and thistle-heads which might, whether nigh at hand or far off, be mistaken for them. This is the inmost point in the meaning of the Lord's words, this is the only true sense of the καρποι, fruits, in which he by no means lays down a merely preparatory, external test, while John afterwards goes deeper into the matter (1 John iv. 1–3);* for though John refers there to a fundamentally sound doctrine, yet this note itself requires, in order to its not deceiving, the complement to it which is here given: Fruits and work decide alone at last unerringly.† But let this be rightly understood! The question might be put in reply: But, O Lord, thou who speakest of fruits, how should we then distinguish the fruits, the true and the genuine, such as thou callest such, and as will avail before thee? For there is many a vine of Sodom, which produces its grapes and wine, but gall and poison are therein (Deut. xxxii. 32, 33). And this question he has already answered in the whole sermon, in which he has defined the fruits of righteousness so clearly, that we cannot err therein. He who lives and acts before us after this standard, can be no false prophet, can be no corrupt tree. The criterion is an objective, absolute moral law; not as if, in entire perversion of the order and relation, "the peculiarity of the individual" should be the measure and standard of appreciation, according to the crafty Wallenstein: "Let me first search out the nature of the man, and I will tell his will and his deed." Who can search into that, but from without inwardly? although it must not be forgotten that a sound eye is requisite for rightly seeing what is visible before it. If we ourselves stand in the living apprehension and inward experience of the Sermon on the Mount, then, but only then, can we be on our guard, and discern all the counterfeit of hypocrisy. The ἐπιγνώσεσθε, ye shall know, repeated in ver. 20 is less imperative than a promise: Ye shall know them, that is, ye who are my disciples, who live and abide in my words. For, as we saw above in our general glance, the fruits which are wanting even to external observation in the false teachers, as certainly as they are inwardly evil, are the same which the grace of our Lord produces in all his disciples, and which therefore the judgment of our Lord will exact finally from all his disciples, sheep and shepherds alike. Such a general meaning is rendered incontrovertible by the sequel.

* So Olshausen in his frequently overbold manner.

† In which we are not misled by the strange assertions of Löhe (Von der Kirche, p. 93) who, relying on Luke vi. 45, would actually have all otherwise illusory holiness of life tested by doctrine and confession alone. A sad misunderstanding, exposed to yet sadder abuse! If possible stranger yet is the well-intentioned explanation of the Baggener Monatsblatt—that the fruits are the aim and tendency of their actions, since we have regard to the fruit in the planting of a tree. Who can discern that, and use it as a test?

Verses 18–20. What in ver. 17 was expressed with πᾶν, every, as a natural law exhibiting itself in things generally—that the inwardly good man bringeth forth truly good fruits, the evil man on the contrary, evil fruits (in which the ποιεῖν καρπούς, עֲשׂוֹת פְּרִי, of the original brings out the doing of the work more fully than we can express it, see for example Psa. i. 1, 3)—is now confirmed by a negative οὐ δύναται, cannot. He who is born of God cannot commit sin, according to John's meaning (1 John iii. 9), although he hath sin and weakness arising from within him and from without. But the natural, sinful man, ver. 11 above, cannot do any thing good, in the sense in which grace only is effectual, however much he may simulate it; they who are living in a state of grace can well distinguish it. It is indeed possible for a while that the wild tree should be graffed into grace through faith (Rom. xi.), but there follows a judgment which finds the tree as it then is. And this is said here equally for the good of the disciples themselves. We have this same expression of the Lord in Luke (ch. vi. 43–45), independently of any connection with the warning against the false prophets, but in the closest connection with the reference to the pefection of the disciple (vers. 40–42), as also with the judgment upon all who call him Lord without obeying him, and hear him without doing his words (vers. 46–49). In this Luke, though in a briefer extract, has rightly seized and preserved the leading idea of the discourse. But whether the Lord actually then upon the Mount uttered what Luke appends in ver. 45, or whether it was transposed from the repetition of the Lord's discourse in Matt. xii. 33, 37, where regard is rather had (after the precedent of Ecclus. xxvii. 6), to the words as springing from the heart, we venture not to determine. But as this particular reference to words can scarcely be made to suit the sermon according to Matthew, either as a mark to distinguish the prophets, or as to the doing of the will (ver. 21), we might be led to suppose that in this instance Luke, standing at one remove from the event, has slightly departed from the original text and its meaning, which would, in that case, be the only instance of the kind in his exhibition of it.

The being "hewn down and cast into the fire" is literally according to the words of the preacher of repentance in ch. iii. 10. From which we may perceive that the fruits demanded by the Lord are no other than the fruits meet for repentance required there in ver. 8 (καρπὸς ἄξιος τῆς μετανοίας). But what μετάνοια, repentance, in its full and ever-deepening sense is, the Sermon on the Mount, as the development of that compendious announcement of ch. iv. 17, fully expounds to us; and in such a manner that this first requirement must always recur, whether it be at the close of the sermon or the close of life—or to speak more definitely, whether it be at the close of the Gospel, or of the life of grace. That which as a legal threatening and before the consolatory message of grace, impelled to a first repentance, afterwards impels with all the might of the Gospel to the perfecting of holiness. It is a fixed decree—the Lord utters it as strongly as it could be uttered—God wills inexorably the doing of his will: I am not come to relax the Law, but to fulfill and establish it. In the judgment there is no respect of persons; the tree must bear its fruit, each one, be he whom may! If he produces not good fruits, then must he assuredly produce evil fruit; this follows as a necessary conclusion from vers. 17, 18. But that only the lack of good fruit is expressedly mentioned (just as ch. xxv. 42–45), has its severe meaning for the wilful blindness which asks: What evil can I do, that deserves damnation? Finally, in these sentences we have a criterion indicated for the two most obvious classes of false prophets: the one speaking of fruits without planting the tree, the other speaking of the tree without its fruits. As for that most dangerous middle-class between these two extremes, including those who teach faithfully the fruits of the tree which the Lord plants, and also seem to possess such fruits, not merely in saying, Lord, Lord, but in mighty works and deeds; for them the Lord's word, with ἄραγε, wherefore, emphatically repeated, has its keen force: By their fruits ye shall know them, namely, by those same proofs by which the Lord knows you yourselves to be his own, when you walk sincerely before him, and for the lack of which he will judge you in common with all who persist in wanton self-blinding.

Verse 21. Let it be carefully observed, for this alone gives the conclusion of the whole discourse its true meaning, that the Lord designedly interweaves together the judgment upon the deceivers and the judgment upon all generally who cannot then stand before him. He continues to speak in vers. 21–23 of false prophets (yet not now as known hypocrites and wolves, but by a transition as self-deceived); but generally also of all who know, proclaim, and call upon his name. Κύριος, Lord, is here, as it mightily announces itself to be, infinitely more than the usual title of reverend men (John xii. 21; Acts xvi. 30); he who now in the highest and only sense arrogates as befitting himself the name of "Lord," never from sacred propriety bestowed that title on any one in the inferior sense, even in his lowest subjection.* To call me Lord in life, to call me Lord in the day of judgment—is the claim of him, who now at the close of his sermon, every word of which (even in Matthew) is strictly measured, pronounces that great and all-comprehensive—"My Father." That perversion of the Lord's words in the mouth of the Rationalists, which represents him as laying no stress upon the calling of him Lord, or on the honor of his own name, provided only the doing of God's will is secured*—is the most wilful perversion that can possibly be imagined. Does the Lord, then, lay such emphasis upon the contrast between the saying, Lord, and the doing the will of the Father? Assuredly not, he only says: Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord (however earnestly and repeatedly he may say it, to hide his deficiency, as the repetition of the word indicates), if it be no more than saying, if the evidence of the sincerity of this profession in holy life is wanting. Moreover, he expressly exacts in John xiii. 13, at the moment of his deepest humiliation, not merely the slighter Rabbi, but the full and unlimited "Lord." When he prophesies in Matt. xxv. of such among the nations of the earth as shall stand before his great tribunal, on the evidence of their works of mercy, without having lived in the conscious knowledge of his person, he yet represents them as addressing him at the last with nothing less than "Lord." His Spirit testifies afterwards in the apostle, that every tongue shall confess that he is Lord (Phil. ii. 9–11)—as also that to call him Lord is precisely the same as to belong to him, and possess his Spirit (1 Cor. xii. 3). Only, however, when this profession is a reality of the heart and of the whole life, the serving, depending upon, and obeying him as the Lord, in the absolute and most distinctive sense of the word, as it was found above in ch. vi. 24. Hence the perfectly appropriate question (Luke vi. 46), which was probably added by our Lord (between ver. 23 and ver. 24 of Matthew). With such generality is the saying of Lord, Lord, laid down with reference to the semblance of discipleship, which may deceive many, even as many deceive themselves; and now comes in for the sake of the reality of that profession the simple—He that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven. Which indeed does not merely mean—He who keeps the Ten Commandments—but the commandment of faith, the revealed will and council of the Father in the Sermon (John vi. 39, 40; 1 John iii. 23) is essentially included in it. Not otherwise does the Lord speak elsewhere, when he is defining the limits of his own, as for example in ch. xii. 50; and his Spirit in the apostles similarly promises eternal assurance and salvation, the final possession of the promised kingdom, only to such doing of God's will (1 John ii. 17; Heb. x. 36).

* Ipse neminen, ne Pilatum quidem, Dominum vocavit, "He himself never called any one Lord, not even Pilate" (Bengel).

* Fichte led the way by maintaining that "if Jesus should only find obedience and fruit, he would ask very little about the connection which his name or his person had therewith!"

Verses 22, 23. The concrete individuality of the preceding οὐ πᾶς ἀλλ' ὁ ποιῶν, not every one but he that doeth, is now followed by Many; which introduces in its sad and warning severity, a more convincing application of his words, and lifts, as it were, already the curtain of the judgment-seat. Many again, as in ver. 13, but still more definite and strict; not merely the many who run with a wicked world in the road to hell, but many even among those who appeared to honor me, to walk as mine in words and works, who thought themselves to be such! In that day: according to the exact language of prophetic Scripture, the so frequent בַּיּוֹם הַהוּא. The worst development of hypocrisy, the result and judicial self-punishment of deception, is at last seen in the deluded belief of its own lie, self-deception become hardened into reprobation. Hence the Lord represents as the extreme contrast to those who stand before him accepted in judgment, those who at that day will vainly imagine that they also shall find acceptance.* For that is indeed all that is meant by the saying to him; and of course not any actual so speaking. There is a self-deception which holds out to the end; a frightful truth, of which the Lord once again reminds us, in the discourse Luke xiii. 25–27—a discourse closely related to this. We ask in our curiosity—Is there then a self-deception which continues through Hades, even to the last day? The Lord's word answers, Yes; but we dare not ask further how that may be. The word of Revelation does not lift the curtain from this intermediate state. We may forecast and anticipate, but nothing certain is told. Theosophy alone teaches and understands (although with no small danger of being overwise) the continuance in the empire of the dead of the errors carried thither.

The threefold progressive exhibition of their word and deed, upon which the evil-doers relied, advances, according to their conception, from the less to the greater; but in reality and in the Lord's estimation, the progression is downwards, and the order must be reversed. Δυνάμεις, wonderful works or miracles, are the least of all attestations according to the general doctrine of Scripture; there are many signs and wonders ascribed to the false Christ, and the false prophets (ch. xxiv. 24). More plausible are profitable miracles, by which the devils are really cast out, as we find the Lord himself evidencing by them, in ch. xii. 25–28, the divinity of his miracles. Yet it is requisite, in order that this token may not deceive, that the accordant, confirming evidence of all the works which spring from an inner life, good fruits, should be added; the spirits are subject to the name of Jesus even when pronounced by such as have not their names written in heaven, though it be by Judas found among the twelve. It is indeed a kind of faith, by which they are produced, but not the faith which saves and sanctifies the soul (1 Cor. xiii. 2). Finally, the most specious is the first mentioned προφητεύειν, prophesying, not merely the revealing futurity, (which belongs rather to the δυνάμεις or miracles), but according to the use of the expression in the Old and New Testament, the speaking and teaching from inspiration. But there is even an inspiration, which consists in the being transitorily possessed by the Spirit of truth, without penetrating to the regeneration of the heart and will. Alas! how many a powerful preacher of Christendom falls into this condemnation, that of preaching thus to others, himself remaining or becoming reprobate!

* They are as thoroughly assured of their righteousness and salvation, as the Pharisee, Rabbi Simeon, in the Talmud, who says: "If there are only two righteous men in the world, my son and myself are the two; if there is only one, it is I myself!"

There is such a self-deception which continues to the end, but it is detected at the last; and the detection is as righteous as it is fearful, for this self-deception is only hypocrisy made perfect in its own guilt. If then—for this is the conclusion which the Lord designs to produce in the minds of his hearers—such as can point to the evidence of prophecy and miracles are rejected; how much less will the unfruitful trees of a commoner kind be saved from the burning! If even their thrice-protested—Lord, Lord, in thy name! is insufficient for their salvation, how much less will the saying Lord, Lord, with their lips only, avail for the multitudes of the utterly idle and unprofitable, in the day of his wrath! Let it be observed how significantly the Lord maintains the honor of his name, by thus declaring that it is not a mere empty external honor that it requires. Let our hearts feel, without many words, the inexpressible ἐξουσία (authority) of the judicial τότε ὁμολογήσω, then will I confess, which scattering to the winds the delusion of lies, pronounces the truth against all imaginations and self-delusion! There is no Ἐγώ prefixed, and yet in these most simple words it is most solemnly implied—I, the Judge, will say unto you; I, the Searcher of hearts, will reveal to you your long-hidden heart and conscience, will only confirm to you what you should have known, and must now know. If all the world, if all God's children have held you for my people, I never knew you, that is, as truly and effectually mine: the words say nothing more, that is enough. It is remarkable that in pre-announcing his final judicial sentence, the Lord appropriates a word of his great ancestor and type, King David; and not any such royal utterance as is found in Psa. ci. 3, 4, 7, but that which occurs in Psa. vi. 8; which was given to David after he had cried in deep, personal, most lowly penitence—Rebuke me not in thine anger! This is intended to intimate (for it cannot have been chosen without signification) that whoso hath not learned thus to speak with David, will be constrained to hear it from another mouth. From the mouth of him whose Depart from me! (ch. xxv. 41) is cause enough for condemnation; of him, who needed to have said nothing more, yet in his righteousness makes the explanatory addition: Ye that work iniquity! This is, further, a solemn expression taken from the Old Testament, פֹּעֲלֵי אָוֶן, workers of iniquity, as for example, in Psa. v. 6, xiv. 4, xxviii. 3, xxxvi. 13, xcii. 8–10, xciv. 4–16, ci. 8, cxxv. 5; Job xxxiv. 8–22; Prov. x. 29, xxi. 15 (1 Macc. iii. 6, comp. Luke xiii. 27). Ye have named my name, but ye have not departed from iniquity! (according to 2 Tim. ii. 19, where there is manifestly an echo of the Sermon on the Mount, whether by the conscious design of the apostle, or by the inspiration of the Spirit). In τὴν ἀνομίαν of the Greek expression (literally, the [i. e. your] lawlessness) we may detect the great truth—With all your other appearances, your life and work, judged by its internal principle, was one great ἀνομία, nothing but unrighteousness, lawlessness and transgression in my sight.* Whether the Lord did thus keenly express his meaning is questionable, on account of the Old Testament פֹּעֲלֵי אָוֶן, workers of iniquity.

Verses 24–27. From his utterance at the day of judgment the Lord suddenly turns to what his lips, the same lips now utter, in the day of grace, and with the judgment yet in the future. These sayings of mine: these words, utterances, testimonies, as I have now given them in one entire and perfect harmony of connection. This requires us to regard τούτους, these, as implying a fundamental sermon of peculiar solemnity; and it forms its sublime conclusion as such, its direct and authoritative dixi, by which the whole discourse makes its appeal to the conscience as the word of the future Judge even before its λόγοι, words have ceased to be spoken.† It is with the hearing of these sayings as with the saying Lord, Lord; it avails not of itself, but must not be omitted. The hearing, indeed, is the first necessary condition; for faith and supplication, asking, receiving, obeying and doing, come all from the previously received and accepted word of grace and truth, Heb. ii. 1, xii. 25. Yet compare with this Rom. ii. 13; James i. 22–25. Again there is the concrete antithesis: a wise man, a foolish man; as in vers. 17–19, tree set against tree. The very popularly conceived and condescending similitude that follows, is found in similar terms, though more superficially, in Sirach (Ecclus. xxii. 16, 17), who points, as the Lord does here, to passages in the prophetic Scriptures; to Isa. xxviii. 16–18, namely, where the great foundation is more especially referred to, and Ezek. xiii. 10–15, where the falling of the untempered wall as well as of the whole building, is threatened in similar figures. Ezekiel may rather refer to the temporal judgment (comp. Ecclus. xlix. 11), Isaiah to the final fall into death and hell. Our Lord's words here embrace both, as we showed above. The house which a man builds for himself as a secure abode, as a defence and protection against wind and weather, signifies the abiding and standing before the judgment of God both in time and eternity, the salvation of the soul into perfect security: in this sense Solomon also says—The wicked are overthrown and are not; but the house of the righteous shall stand (Prov. xii. 7). If the house falls, which thou hast built for thyself, then wilt thou thyself be overwhelmed and buried in its ruins. The Lord speaks not directly concerning those who think nothing about all this; who have no concern where or how they shall stand; who built not at all: their fate is understood without being mentioned. They also who, having laid the right foundation at first, yet have neglected to build fast and firm upon that foundation, will find their condemnation in the simple word which afterwards makes prominent the extremest contrast of folly, with those, namely, who seem to think mere hearing without doing to be foundation and superstructure enough. (As before in ver. 22, the uttermost extreme was contrasted, designedly to embrace all else.) If, however, we look narrowly and hear attentively, we shall find that all are actually included who fail in the persistent doing of the will of God; for these sayings speak directly of this, and require of all, who hear and do them, perseverance and consummation of their holiness: and we might add, taking this similitude generally to ourselves, that a foundation is not itself a dwelling, there must be something built upon it. This, however, is contrary to the close connection of the figure with all these sayings. Rather the Lord regards the entire and full performance of his whole will as itself the foundation of rock, on which all depends; the superstructure thereupon is understood without any specific mention, in both cases alike.

* Hence Lange would translate boldly—"Ye who pursue lawlessness as your calling.

† Τοὺς λόγους τούτους, these words, seems to bind together the Sermon, and preclude, as indeed does the whole structure of the Sermon, the supposition that these chapters are merely a collection of sayings uttered at different times (Alford.)

A house must be built with direct reference to protection against wind and weather, for the rain, the floods, the winds will not fail or cease: this is the significant meaning of the article here designedly used. Specially does this apply to eastern countries, with regard to the physical character of which this figure is chosen, where these commotions are more sudden and more violent than ordinarily in our own land. The rain descends from above (κατέβη), the floods come side-long, washing their way to the very foundation beneath; when in addition to all this the winds blow and violently beat upon the building, none but a foundation of rock can sustain the whole. This has been pursued into more exact detail, as referring to the sorrows and afflictions which God sends from heaven like heavy rain; to the current of the spirit of the age, of temptation or persecution, which presses around and shakes the foundation; to the additional storms or marked judgments of God, in which he blows with his breath, to separate and make manifest what is only flesh.* We leave this to the judicious application which every word of Holy Writ will easily admit; but the generality of the final tone of the whole discourse will not permit us to deduce such specific views from the text. In Luke, where the whole reads somewhat differently in the freedom of the variable letter, the winds and the rain are wanted, a simple πλημμύρα, stream, is all that is spoken of. On the other hand he brings into more prominence the fundamental idea of the parable, which is the firm foundation—He digged deep, till he could lay his foundation upon a rock. There, further, our Lord's first ὁμοιώσω, I will liken, is made strongly emphatic, in entire harmony with Matthew's meaning: Ὑποδείξω ὑμῖν τίνι ἐστὶν ὅμοιος, I will show you to whom he is like. For the sovereign authority of the Master employs here, as emphatically as condescendingly, a customary mode of speaking among the Rabbies, comp. Mark iv. 30. In the second member of the sentence it is merely ὁμοιωθήσεται or ὅμοιός ἐστιν, he shall be likened or he is like. The conclusion, with its solemn tone of threatening, is the same in both, though expressed in different words: a manifest token that we have in Matthew and Luke one and the same discourse of our Lord, pursuing its course of instruction from the same beginning to the same end.

Matthew conclusively and irresistibly confirms this by the postscript (vers. 28, 29), which points back to the superscription in ch. v. 1, 2, and we, for our part, can never accede to the position that this is a collection of sayings uttered at various times. How mischievously a hypothesis may beguile is shown by Olshausen, who finds clear evidence of Matthew's having formed such a collection in his expression τοὺς λόγους τούτους, these words, since a connected discourse could only be spoken of as λόγος, or word, in the singular; while the συνετέλεσεν, he had finished; which contradicts this supposition, is altogether passed over. As if Matthew had not received this very expression, which he designedly repeats with great emphasis, from the Lord's

* Braune's interpretation is just like this, so far as concerns the first reference; but when the winds are made only human temptations attacking us sideways, and the floods of the ocean, "the ebb and flow of the despairing and then froward heart," this seems to us to be more subtle than skillful. Father Zeller, of Beuggen, speaks again of the heavy rains and floods of revolutions, the wind of false doctrine, storms of the "judgments of God," agreeing in this last point with what we have given above, which is the best exposition, after all, if we must make these distinction.

own mouth in vers. 24 and 26! Οἱ λόγοι οὗτοι, these words, cannot there be "extracts from several discourses," but have the same meaning as τὰ ῥήματα ἃ ἐγὼ λελάλημα ὑμῖν, the words that I speak unto you, in John vi. 63, and οἱ λόγοι μου, my words, in Matt. xxiv 35.

What the apostle remarks of the impression of the discourse upon the ὄχλοι, or multitudes, appears to be one of those unfrequent reflections of his own which he inserts in the simple narrative; but it is evidently, when closely examined, itself only narrative, a record once made in the most appropriate place, just as Luke afterwards says the same thing (ch. iv. 32). Indeed, what Matthew says in ver. 29 may be almost received as the actual expression of the people's feeling, as an epitome of all their sayings concerning it; just as in a similar manner he gives in ch. x. 36, a word probably spoken by the Redeemer himself.* This was, in any case, most naturally the necessary impression upon the minds of the multitude, whether they thus uttered it or not; this was the inward ground of that outward ἐκπλήσσεσθαι, astonishment, of which they were thoroughly conscious in themselves. It was so: the apostle himself remembers it well, for his own emotion at the first hearing was living yet in his soul. Not as the scribes! In this is summed up yet once more the great contrast which pervaded the Sermon from ch. v. 20. But alas the mere ἐξεπλήσσοντο, in which the whole terminated with regard to most (Luke ii. 18, 19), transmits to us a melancholy example of that hearing and not doing, with warning against which the Sermon closed.

LUKE'S SUMMARY OF THE SERMON ON THE MOUNT.

(Luke vi. 20–49.)

We have already shown, in passing, that Luke's report of the Sermon on the Mount perfectly agrees with Matthew in every thing essential, that there is not only no contradiction between their several statements and view of it, but that the comparison tends to their mutual confirmation and elucidation. Luke gives an epitome of the Sermon, like Matthew; hence it is natural that each gives something which is wanting in the other, even in the case of Luke, who gives a much more concise presentation of it. What we read as given by the apostles and ear-witnesses, was brought to their remembrance, selected for them, and set in order by the promised Spirit (John xiv. 26, xvi. 14); the historical writer Luke, who derived his information from the original witnesses, and whose testimony (in relation to John xv. 26, 27) is humanmediate, although he is not without the spirit of truth, yet may naturally be supposed not to have caught so central a view, and to have spread out the whole amplitude of a long discourse, which was poured forth at once in such depth and fulness. For as the syanagogue admitted degrees of inspiration in the Old Testament, so we must allow in the New, a difference even between Matthew and John, and how much more between both these and the two other Evangelists. All proceeds naturally with each, in the miracle which yet approves itself as nature; how otherwise would the higher and lower nature come together as a true and living reality?

Here we are constrained in a second edition more decidedly to oppose a view propounded in Lange's Leben Jesu. That excellent man having thoroughly entrenched himself (his work is pervaded with it) in the notion at first broached by Augustine, and since his time sometimes emerging into notice, of two discourses delivered at a short interval, endeavors to convince us that there was a sermon on the mountain-level in addition to the Sermon on the Mount, a platform sermon besides the hill sermon, a sermon for the people after the sermon for the church:* but few we think will concur with him. The reasons which are adduced, more confidently maintained than well-grounded against the long prevailing view, are indeed actually very weak, and provoke our instant opposition. Apart from the ingenious turns of thought and forced interpretations which Lange in this as in all his hypotheses has abundantly at command, the arguments for this view are reduced to these two positions: that the Evangelists themselves indicate separate localities and circumstances, and that Matthew's discourse could not from its intrinsic nature have been openly and publicly delivered.

We are to understand (Matt. v. 1) that the Lord at the sight of the great multitude of people, retired into the narrower circle of his own disciples! But what man in his senses and not already pledged to a hypothesis, can fail to see that the connection with ch. iv. 25 will not allow of a retreating from the crowd, but rather requires that that crowd is itself taught? (comp. ix. 36, xv. 29, 30, xix. 2) Thus the disciples are either those who in a narrower circle more immediately surrounded him; or more generally and in a wider sense, all who were disposed to hear him and followed

---

* Roos: ὡς ἐξουσίαν ἔχων, "as one having authority," one who was, though incognito, the King in his kingdom! Chrysostom earlier: Πανταχοῦ ἑαυτὸν ἐνδεικνύμενος εἶναι τὸν τὸ κύριος ἔχοντα, "Everywhere showing himself to be the One having the dominion"—on account of the "I say unto you," and the assertion of the judgment at the close.

* Since the Lord, in contrast with the second and more bare redaction of the law by Moses (!), reduces the first form of the Sermon on the Mount which only his devoted disciples could apprehend; and in tender consideration of the people's weakness, gives a second, more concrete, and easily apprehended. Against all such distinction see the testimony of John xviii. 20.

him for that purpose. This is rendered more certain by Matthew's own declaration (vii. 28) that the ὄχλοι, multitudes, were hearers of this discourse! Further, the ἔστη, stood, of Luke vi. 17 is not to be pressed (as Braune takes it) to mean, that Jesus delivered this discourse standing upon the plain, but it simply signifies as coming after the καταβάς, when he was come down, that then he stood still, halted at the place which he would choose for his sermon. The τόπος πεδινός, or plain, the "high or mountain-level," a platform of the ὄρος, or mountain, was naturally selected as adapted for the gathering together of the people.

But the very doubtful exegesis in favor of distinct locality is supported by an internal criticism, which comes to its aid with the bold affirmation that Christ could not have delivered the Sermon on the Mount to all the people indiscriminately! It cannot receive a view which would indiscreetly put to the utmost peril its whole design, for this discourse has altogether an esoteric and confidential type!* The common people were not yet ripe to receive such an illuminating criticism upon the precepts of the Pharisees! We appeal against this to our whole exposition, which has seized and exhibited the spirit of the whole discourse as a public programme of doctrine for the whole people. We think we can decisively overturn this whole position by three brief questions. First: did not the discourse which the Lord might utter before his formed circle of disciples (which, however, could not possibly be a closed circle, since whosoever would might go up to them) instantly and necessarily and always become public—especially a discourse so strikingly delivered as this? As to its being confidential, a mountain in the very sight of the following crowds would not have been chosen for a discourse which was to be withheld from the people. Can we suppose the Lord to have commanded them to remain below, until he should come down and speak also to them? Secondly: where do we find in the Gospels the slightest trace of any such delicacy and consideration, of any such disposition to spare the Pharisees, in the first period of his ministry? Finally, was John the Baptist's public and unsparing and severe opposition to the Pharisees in the presence of all the people an imprudence, which the Lord can be supposed to have desired to repair, or to have been in a condition to do so?

Enough; no further detailed refutation is necessary. We, at least, observe not in Luke any such "dim and exhausted representation of the discourse" as the supposition of its identity is thought to involve: he gives another extract of it, and indeed each Evangelist can be supposed to have given the longer discourses of our Lord only in such extracts. But we hold it a far worse evil than even a dim presentation at a second remove by a collator, if such language may be used; yea, we reckon it the worst possible evil, and one that decisively condemns and overthrows the whole hypothesis of Lange, that untruthfulness is thus necessarily imputed to an apostle and eye-witness. Is it said that by his "inexact concluding words" concerning the astonishment of the people, he has in some degree weakened his own first "more exact statement" in ch. v. 1? Assuredly not; he tells us only at the close himself, how his words at the beginning are to be understood. It is said that "he has allowed the sermon to the people to mix with the sermon to the church;" nay, that "minute transpositions from the one sermon to the other may have taken place through evangelical tradition." We have a quite different opinion of Matthew's Gospel, and of his narration, so simple in its truth, and exhibiting so entirely as it does the marks of an eye-witness. He is said, finally, to have taken the popular and lucid similitude at the conclusion of the exoteric discourse, and attached it to the esoteric: but what assertions, what imputations are these! and how, then, did the Lord close his confidential sermon? Was it not also with the rejection of the workers of iniquity, ch. vii. 23? And how did the fit and appropriate conclusion pass into oblivion, the other taking its place? Then must the wisdom of the Great Teacher, which led him to deliver two sermons, and which could not have spoken the Sermon on the Mount to the multitude, have remained hidden from the Apostle Matthew as well as from all "evangelical tradition," so that they mixed together in early times what it was left to our later skill to discriminate. Against all these absurdities we have our consolation, reading the sermon to the people even in Matthew's account; and regarding it as returning to us again abbreviated in the derived Gospel of tradition. "Devoted" disciples—how became these such so early? were they not rather made so by this sermon, which was designed to call out and to separate those disciples from the mass of the people?

Luke hands down what his sources gave him,* and arranges more after the manner of human skill and wisdom the words which his reporters had seized and preserved as then spoken by our Lord. Thus in his case there may be something of that which is improperly imputed to Matthew, a working up, if we may so call it, of his materials. He constructs out of the details a whole of his own, and in doing so we must suppose that the original letter may have been departed from in some cases by his vouchers, as well as that he may in some cases have departed from it himself, just in order to give it more closely. He gives his own spontaneous expression sometimes so as to make his narrative move more harmoniously; generalizes the concrete, for instance, in order that it might lose any fragmentariness or indistinctness, being conscious in himself that in some cases he had not received the ipsissima verba of the Lord. We concede all this, for it lies before our eyes; and yet we, on our side, maintain with equal confidence, that Luke could not in this manner incorporate any thing of his own, or any thing that by others before him had been falsely attributed to our Lord. For that the Spirit of Truth miraculously guided him also, preserving him from all essential error in the matter of his Gospel, is most evident, however more or less conscious his Proœmium shows him to have been of this. It is manifestly stamped upon the very character of his whole Gospel, and is proved by the many discourses of our Lord which he alone gives in all their self-evidencing truth. Consequently we have in the Sermon on the Mount even of Luke nothing but the Lord's word actually spoken by himself: even where for once he may be thought to have transgressed the bounds of his own faculty by introducing a saying from another place (ver. 45); yet even this is a saying of our Lord, actually spoken on another occasion.

* It is even said that in the midst of a gathering of thousands of people Jesus could not have preached sitting, "tarrying so patiently and composedly."

* Not, however, just a "postscript"—as Schleiermacher once said, as if talking about his Berlin sermons!

The more closely genuine criticism examines the contents of the two Evangelists, laying them side by side and subjecting them to a comparative exposition, the more incontestibly does Matthew's evince itself to be the original, according to which Luke's is to be understood. For what the latter gives us, bears the natural character of having been transmitted and derived from hearers at a second remove.* To make this the proper original, and Matthew's a deviating and expanded collection and compilation, is not criticism but folly, which heedlessly and superficially talks about what has never been thoroughly investigated. This is our avowal and testimony; the detailed grounds of which appertain not to this book, though we hold them in readiness.

Let the entire arrangement, closely compacted as it is in Matthew, down to its slightest details, be now surveyed; and let the elements of the discourse as given by Luke be assigned to their place in it. The commencement and the conclusion fit well together, although the great bulk of the expansive middlepart is wanting. Of the first main division we have the benedictions, apprehended in their starting-point and in their essence, and illustrated by distinctive contrasts.† Of the second part we find little, yet that little is well-ordered and correct. Of the first contrast as opposed to the righteousness of the Pharisees, we have the commandment of the love of enemies which annuls their wicked gloss upon the falsely interpreted law; as well as the accompanying reference to the perfectly merciful benevolence of God. The express polemic against their apprehension of the law in individual precepts is wanting at the beginning, as also that against their specious corformity to the law in alms-giving, prayer and fasting. The whole of the second contrast as against heathenish care is pretermitted, probably with the Evangelist's knowledge and design, certainly under the Spirit's direction, since the Gospel (ch. xii. 1) contains a record of it afterwards as having been spoken by our Lord. The third contrast, on the contrary, as against judging and mote-seeing, comes forward with tolerable fulness, even enlarged upon the main idea. On the other hand the profound observation directed against the imprudence of charity in exhorting and preaching, is wanting; and so, indeed, is the whole close of this division, viz., the injunction to prayer and to enter through the strait gate, but only for the reason given above, that both are to occur in a later repetition (chs. xi. and xiii.); as well as the preceding Lord's Prayer. Finally, in the third part of the discourse, only the warning against false prophets is passed over, as before the general controversy with Pharisaism. Instead of this the requirement of the fruits, the exhortation to doing, and the warning against not doing, follow immediately next, in strict harmony with the fundamental course of thought. And now we ask any man whether, in Luke's extract also, the characteristic element of every section is not preserved; the heart of the promise at the commencement; the point of the requirements in the middle, piercing the heart of every hearer who keeps them not (in ver. 40 these requirements merge into that of a perfect discipleship); and finally the conclusion with its no less emphatic and solemn warning. We have fresh evidence in this, that we have rightly seized the course and order of the discourse in Matthew, since it is not contradicted here but confirmed. We find a reason and justification of Luke's omission of the reference to the Law and the Prophets (Matt. v. 17–19), as well as of the subsequent controversy with Pharisaism upon its interpretation of individual commandments, in the relation which his Gospel bears to the first: he has less directly than Matthew a Jewish interest and aim, but the Spirit uses him as a witness for the Greeks and the Gentiles.* Thus in the marvellous domain of inspiration, where human consciousness and divine direction most wonderfully unite in concert, even deficiencies approve themselves as parts of a well-ordered arrangement.

* Not, however, in the sense in which Schleiermacher says, "that the reporter had a more unfavorable place for hearing."

† Not as if (according to Schleiermacher) the reporter appended the woes, in order to fill up a gap which he felt, but knew not how to complete! but in the sense in which we shall afterwards explain ourselves.

* Von Gerlach simultaneously concurred with me in this reason for regarding Luke's discourse as "without doubt the self-same" which Matthew gives more in detail.

Verses 20—23. In the benedictions as here given according to the conception of a less immediate report, we do not find recognized Matthew's internal progression through the number seven into its close and confirmation in the eighth, and the complete systematic view of the inner and outer life of discipleship which he has stamped upon them. Hence not only is the second part (Matt. v. 7–9) quite wanting, but also the previous benediction of the meek, as it stands at the turning-point of the development. But so much more sharply comes out in striking paradox the contrast between the promised blessedness and the present external circumstances of the disciples, as Luke's main point of view: Blessed are ye who are now miserable, needy and persecuted! In this view the transposition which places those who hunger before those who weep, is fully justified; and thus viewed the benediction of the persecuted and separated ones (vers. 22–23) was all the more indispensable. It is in harmony with this point of view, further, that the discourse just here assumes the direct address of Ye (which in Matthew first begins at ver. 11); and the preceding observation that the Lord thereby signified his disciples, is so entirely correct, that we cannot but suppose in connection with Matthew's form of expression such a direct turning of the Lord's eye upon his immediate and near disciples. To give this idea, as a human illustration which, however, is faithful to the true reference of the discourse, νῦν, now, is now appended: for if a present internal satisfaction and consolation are promised to those who hunger and those who weep, yet does the full contrast as here viewed stretch its futurum onwards to that time of which such a passge as Rev. vii. 16, 17, speaks. Then will the consolation which now begins be consummated in laughing in its highest sense (Psa. cxxvi. 2).

But here a false criticism and exposition—even that of Neander,* to our great regret—will have it that the Lord's word is misunderstood, as if he had spoken of the physically and externally hungry and poor. Assuredly it is not! Let it be observed narrowly and it will be seen that as in Matthew the אֶבְיוֹנִים, needy, are by transition included, so also in Luke internal poverty, hunger and sorrow are not excluded but implied. He had already (ch. iv. 18) quoted Isaiah's εὐαγγελίσασθαι πτωχοῖς, to preach the Gospel to the poor, and now indicates the true meaning of that expression, the only one which it will bear in the prophetic Scripture; viz., that which includes both senses in the indeterminate language of the Spirit. Are mendicants, as such, inheritors of the kingdom of God? Only so far as their external poverty becomes true poverty of spirit; as on the other hand the externally rich may be truly poor before God. The τῷ πνεύματι, in spirit, is wanting to πτωχοί, poor, and τὴν δικαιοσύνην, after righteousness, to πεινῶντες, that hunger, but that they are to be understood in the Lord's word follows necessarily from its being his word.*

In the sequel we have as a mere change of expression, instead of persecute, its principle sharply defined in μισεῖν, hate, and with this, its manifestation in ἀφορίζειν, separate; the Lord may have uttered both; let his corresponding concluding discourse to the disciples be compared with this, and let the probable allusion in John xvi. 2 to Isa. lxvi. 5 be duly noted.† The ἐκβάλλειν τὸ ὄνομα ὡς πονηρόν, casting out one's name as evil, is probably the same as הוֹצִיא שֵׁם רָע (Deut. xxii. 19). Yet is ἐκφέρειν ονομα πονηρόν, as the Sept. translates there, somewhat different from the stronger ἐκβάλλειν of our text (which rather includes the idea of excommunicating or putting under ban), and from the just as much stronger τὸ ὄνομα ὑμῶν ὡς πονηρόν. This ὡς and this τὸ point rather to the Name which they preach and glory in; which they thus make their own and bear; see, again, the Epistle of James, which is pervaded with the spirit of the Sermon on the Mount (ch. ii. 7), where we the rather find a lusion to our text, as the poor and the rich, vers. 5, 6, had just been spoken of. In the intense σκιρτᾶν, leap for joy, Luke only remains true to his fundamental aim, to make prominent the contrast between the future and the now; but inasmuch as not a future but an imperative stands connected with "in that day," (comp. Matt. vii. 22, a prelude of which we may have here), it must be taken with ἀγαλλιᾶσθε, rejoice: Leap up joyfully in faith and hope, in anticipation of your future joy.

Verses 24—26. Just in these words the Lord assuredly spoke, though they may be reported with more or less literal exactness. It is not conceivable that any reporter could have falsely appended such contrasted woes to the distinctly marked benedictions; even leaving out of view the Spirit's guidance of Luke. Matthew, who makes prominent the progress of development as the main idea of the Sermon, has omitted these as well as much else that is similar; here, however, they take their place with the full force of perfect contrast. Here, still less than before, the externally rich, and full, and laughing, are intended as such; and we have new confirmation of the spiritual interpretation of the preceding. These sayings of our Lord find their type in the prophetic Scripture, Isa. lxv. 13, 14. James, in whom we discern so many elements of the Sermon on the Mount (as found whether in Matthew or Luke), to which he immediately went back through the medium of living tradition, manifestly refers to it not only in ch. iv. 9, but also in ch. iv. 1; with which he also in vs. 2, 3 combines (as we saw before) an allusion to what is found in Matt. vi. 19, 20. Both in the former and in the latter passage he designates the externally rich, but as they are at the same time rich and self-satisfied in the sense of Luke xviii. 24, 25; Rev. iii. 17; Hos. xii. 9. Ye have received your consolation—once more an anticipatory note of Matt. vi. 2, comp. Luke xvi. 25. Very significant also is ἐμπεπλησμένοι, full, indeed, but not properly satisfied (Luke xv. 16; Psa. xvii. 14). They are the rich and the full, who, because they have the good things of the world and earthly consolation, think themselves also contented in soul: such are immediately spoken of, but they are taken only as a most striking type and example of those who are spiritually satisfied and at ease, of whom there are many, indeed, who have no external abundance of earthly goods and earthly joy. But he whom earthly good does not content, belongs to the hungry ones who were before blessed, even though he may abound in provision for his earthly life. The four woes correspond, as they are here arranged, to the four benedictions; hence the laughing has no bye-meaning of mad earthly exuberance of joy (as in Eccles. ii. 2, v. ii. 3, 6); it is only the exact converse of ver. 21. In reality it includes not only that wicked laughter, properly so called, which being a mere convulsive excitement of the animal nature is exhibited as unworthy of man, but also and more than that, the malevolent laughter of those who hate righteousness and triumph over the righteous, which is referred to again in John xvi. 20, but not in the same terms. Thus it forms a good transition to the mention of hatred and persecution, which follows presently in contrast. How apt is the proleptic allusion to the false prophets in the Lord's discourse, which in the first part already shadows out its whole course, we have noticed already upon Matthew. What James says in ch. iv. 4 may refer to this expression as directly as to Matt. vi. 24, probably to both together; his main idea, at least, is certainly an echo of the Sermon on the Mount.

* Who sees here only narrow-minded misunderstanding combined with rhetorical painting.

* Alford remarks very truly that a comparison of other passages in Luke without reference to Matthew, would render a spiritual sense necessary.

† Though there לְמַעַן שְׁמִי is to be construed differently from Luther, as my commentary on Isaiah shows.

The whole of our Lord's discourse, from Matt. v. 21 to ver. 48, this account compresses into that one pointed and prominent saying: Love your enemies! which here commences as it there closes all, with condensed and emphatic brevity. Here we find it again in ver. 35, and thus at the beginning and at the end it is the boundary of the whole discourse upon this subject. Hence the transposition of vers. 29, 30, which according to Matthew were spoken before, and formed the appropriate transition to this topic. Similarly ver. 31 was probably placed here instead of later, as in Matt. vii. 12, since to an inexact remembrance this seemed its point of connection. According to their sense and meaning the two sayings are strictly connected, for the one explains the other. Instead of the many contrasts in which the Lord so emphatically spake his But I say unto you! we have only now the ὑμῖν λέγω, I say unto you, remaining; which does not so much indicate a contrast of his words with other sayings and teachings of the scribes (the false prophets of ver. 26, with which the ἀλλά, but, in ver. 27 may be a slight link), as the absolute authority, which, even thus abridged, they emphatically announce, of him who now speaks. We observe here also how thoroughly Luke's account brings the earlier portion of the discourse into connection with the fundamental idea of its conclusion, the ὑμῖν λέγω with vers. 46, 47 afterwards. It is partly to express this that τοῖς ἀκούουσιν, to you that hear, is added; and partly as equivalent to πᾶσι τοῖς ἀκούουσιν, to all that hear—in contrast with the αὐτοῖς, them, of ver. 39, which specially points to the μαθητάς, disciples, of ver. 20. This is precisely in conformity with the Lord's meaning, who, beginning with his disciples in particular, then included all people universally in his address; finally, again, returning especially to those who were his own disciples and stood in his presence.

In vers. 27, 28 there is a transposition which disregards (as in the benedictions) the inner sequence of blessing, doing good, praying for, as Matthew preserves it, the contrasts merely being aimed at. In ver. 29, the concrete going to law for coat or cloak is generalized as a mere αἴρειν, taking away; hence, naturally, as we saw before, the cloak comes first. The essential power and truth of our Lord's words do not lie in these specialities; and this the Holy Spirit designs to teach us by the more exact or inexact expressions found in parallel places of the Evangelists. The αἴρειν is even not necessarily now robbery by force, but, generally speaking, a taking away without asking, which should, however, be regarded as equivalent to asking it; and so we find ver. 30 carrying on the idea, in conformity to its peculiar fundamental design as we discovered it in Matthew. Ποία ὑμῖν χάρις ἐστί, what thanks have ye?—another form of Matthew's τίνα μισθὸν ἔχετε, what reward have ye? We might almost say that it embraces in its generality the τί περισσὸν ποιεῖτε, what do ye more? which is there found hard by. For sinners also do—a general idea instead of the concrete Publicans and Gentiles. Matthew says nothing of the lending, but the Lord probably, as we there saw, added this, since it most strikingly represents the ὑπόνοια, or hidden sense, of all Scriptural teaching; unselfish love, without regard to its return, or to previous love in its object, a readiness to lend without interest, even at the peril of not receiving again even the principal, at least from men. Let Moses' prohibition (Lev. xxv. 35–37) of usury and increase be reflected on, and the commandment to lend to a poor brother, without hope of the principal, even though the year of release was nigh (Deut. xv. 7–10). Τὰ ἴσα, the same, in effect, refers rather to principal than to interest, as the antithesis μηδὲν ἀπελπίζοντες, hoping for nothing again, afterwards more directly declares.* Ver. 35 corresponds in its threefold expression clearly enough to the three sentences vers. 32–34. The form vioi ὑψίστου, children of the Highest, here used, is after the Old Testament (see Ecclus. iv. 11, καὶ ἔσῃ ὡς υἱὸς ὑψίστου) and might have been used by the Lord, as well as the other, in a more detailed and copious discourse. The χρηστός ἐστι, is good, once more generalizes the sense, if we compare Matthew, and ἀχαρίστους, unthankful, is a human illustration at the close, corresponding with the context. "Ingratitude is the world's recompense"—this also experiences the most high God, the merciful One to all; let it not overmuch grieve you to bear the like. In this we have, and must not overlook, a keen exposition of the word which Matthew uses. God maketh his sun to shine and sends his rain upon the evil, that is, not merely upon those who were before evil and therefore deserve it not, but who remain so afterwards also, and thank him not.

Although so much that is intermediate is omitted, how spiritually correct and true to the whole harmony of the discourse is the condensation which attaches ver. 37 immediately to ver. 36. Matthew commenced a new subject with these words, but the thought was closely connected with what had just been said concerning a God-resembling, forgiving, blessing love of our enemies: and the fundamental idea of the whole section (Matt. vii. 1–6, 12) is pure, unselfish love. Matthew sets down the simple and impressive μὴ κρίνετε, judge not, but here we have a more detailed commentary upon his word, one which cannot be thought to have been added by any one ex propriis, for it is too definite, and striking, and appropriate. The Lord assuredly uttered these words, nor could that conception of the discourse, which has found "Love ye!" to be the centre and heart of the whole second part of it, willingly dispense with them. We have, further, in Luke a gradation, a threefold progression in the thought: Judge not, even forgive, and finally (as practical evidence of the same) give, impart, do good, that is, as the preceding verses require, to all alike without distinction, enemies as well as friends. The having it measured again, is, as in Matthew, an undefined promise, which in part finds its fulfillment from man, assuredly in full from God. This latter we hear in the μέτρον καλόν, good measure. The threefold detail of the figure (Bengel: In aridis, mollibus, liquidis, "in dry, soft, liquid things") is so familiar and acceptable to all, and clings so fast to our hearts, that we strongly suspect, though we cannot positively affirm it, that the Lord actually added these very words,* and all the more as εἰς τὸν κόλπον, into your bosom, with a changed application, however, from threatening to promise, comes from the same chapter of the prophet (Isa. lxv. 6, 7), to which vers. 21, 25 referred us, as ver. 22, to Isa. lxvi. 5.

Verses 39, 40 are peculiar to Luke, but suit very aptly the connection of Matthew. The significance of the subsequent beam is before indicated by the idea of blindness; the ground-thought of Matt. vii. 1–6, as we showed before, is then emphatically made prominent: Be perfect as disciples! Even if it were an expository addition, we would think that it penetrated the depth of the Lord's meaning.† But the Holy Ghost has expressly provided against this, by inspiring the Evangelist to insert εἶπε δὲ παραβολὴν αὐτοῖς, and he spake a parable to them—which remark certainly cannot signify that here a parable spoken elsewhere is interpolated;‡ for the αὐτοῖς, to them, is only to be interpreted by ver. 20 and was used here to show (in contrast with ver. 27) that the disciples were particularly addressed. Luke also (ch. vii. 1) asserts beyond all doubt that it was a connected discourse which he had given. The Lord consequently uttered it at this place, and by a significant parable more decisively taught what in Matthew we find him teaching without it: that a censorious disciple is still, or has become no better than a Pharisee. For he has repeated the same words, afterwards, concerning the Pharisees, (Matt. xv. 14, xxiii. 16). Let it be noted that in this one word Luke also has given some intimation of the general tendency of the discourse to oppose the Pharisees.

When expositors and preachers refer ver. 40 to ver. 39 in such a manner as to interpret the words only that a blind teacher makes also blind disciples§—they entirely pervert the text. That would be too keenly-expressed irony,‖ and κατηρτισμένος, he that is perfect, then would be an altogether unsuitable word. No, the discourse passes into a severe contrast, and opposes to these false and yet-blinded teachers and censors, the one true Master, that perfect διδάσκαλος, Teacher, who now speaks

* This ἀπελπίζειν, which is only found here in the N. T., is explained by its context: hoping for nothing of it, for it, again. Nullo modo desperantes (a signification which is found in Diodorus and Polybius as also in a var. reading of Eph. iv. 19) would be altogether inappropriate; but the transitive sense which the Syriac gives it, is quite contrary to the language.

* If others think, rejecting Bengel's interpretation, that the same measure is designated only with the climax of full rising into overfull; we accept this as a subordinate sense, yet must cling to the threefold application of the figure.

† As G. K. Rieger's Herzenspostille on Luke vi. 36–42 (the Gospel for iv. Sund. after Trin.) takes from this verse the comprehensive theme, ein ganzer Christ—a whole Christ.

‡ In Luke v. 36 the Evangelist inserts the same before a strictly connected discourse; similarly also ch. xii. 16, xxi. 19, xiii. 6, xix. 11, xx. 9.

§ Hilgenfeld thus drivels: The Pauline "Lucas-Evangelium" could only have intended in this distorted saying thus patched in—according to the connection (in the expositor's brain!)—to have condemned the Jewish-Christian teachers.

‖ According to Von Gerlach: Even in the best case the disciple is only as his Master.

to his disciples. That meaning which has been incorrectly imported from Matt. x. 24–25; John xiii. 16 (where the Lord places the significant Maschal, or "parable," in an unusual, and altogether new application of his words), as if he meant that the disciples must suffer like their Master, is foreign to the discourse, where the παραβολή, parable, occurs in a general, and well understood sense. The irony, which indeed adheres to the first sentence (οὐκ ἔστι ὑπέρ) though not to the second, lies deep, and the Lord intends to say: Take care that ye do not in your rash and unmeasured condemnation of your brethren, exercise a severer judgment than I, in my love and forbearance, have exercised upon you! For does not the censorious judge place himself, as it were, above his forgiving, graciously-correcting, long-suffering Master? Πᾶς in its position here is not "every," but totus quantus est—when he is perfect, has learnt all as μαθητής, a disciple, will he be altogether whole and perfect, as his Master. The ἔσται, shall be, is a hortatory promise just like ἔσεσθε, ye shall be (ver. 35).

We have already seen that, in conformity with the spirit of the section, vers. 43, 44 omit the false prophets, and require from the disciples themselves the good fruits of the good trees; we now only observe, so that nothing may be unmentioned, the change of expression ἐκ βάτου τρυγῶσι, of a bramble bush men gather, and the transposition of σῦκα, figs, and σταφυλήν, grapes, as well as the generalization here suiting the thought: ἕκαστον δένδρον γινώσκεται, every tree is known, instead of Matthew's ἐπιγνώσεσθε αὐτούς, ye shall know them. The Lord signified that, though he may have only said this.

Of ver. 45, we have spoken again and again; we may point out that we are unjustly charged with maintaining a stiff mechanical theory of inspiration, since we here (though with the proper reservation, that it is only till we obtain a deeper insight) are willing to allow that this passage has been transposed from another place, and that it does not harmonize with the connection (not even with ver. 46). We may have frankly to concede the same in the case of Luke. We regard this, however, as possible only in his case and in Mark's; not in that of the apostles. But with equal confidence do we discern and assert the wisdom, correctness, harmony of the whole residue of Luke's report of the Sermon on the Mount, down to this one word: would that all criticism penetrated into the depths of the whole context, before making assertions of the same nature so abundantly and hastily as it does!

Ver. 46 gives in few words what we find in Matt. vii. 21–23, condensing the Lord's teaching after the manner of the shorter extract. As the original concrete presentation has been given up throughout, we have it here in a general position, which corresponds most perfectly with our Lord's meaning, as we find it later explained by himself in a parable (Matt. xxi. 28–31) which Luke has not. Finally, we have the same generalization in the πᾶς ὁ ἐρχόμενος πρός με, every one that cometh to me, which, though probably not thus spoken by our Lord, yet indicates at the close and fitly illustrates, the universal and all-comprehensive character of this first Sermon on the Mount, in which all other sayings were already bound up. Is there nothing but "dim and weakened exhibition" in an extract like this, so wisely selected, so skillfully knit together, according to its own independent point of view and aim?

THE LEPER.

(Matt. viii. 3, 4; Mark i. 41–44; Luke v. 14, 14.)

The first miracle of healing which Matthew records in detail, after the general statement of ch. iv. 23, 24, belongs assuredly, so far as regards its time and place, to the position which the "behold" of an eye-witness here assigns it. That the Lord's Sermon on the Mount had only resulted in a vague unimportant, and uninfluential impression—That was a mighty discourse! the Evangelist has just informed us. Nor is there more significance in the following of the multitudes, when the Lord had ended speaking. What inwardly passed in individual souls at the time, or afterwards recurred, to the conviction and salvation of the inner man, the sacred narrative does not reveal; this belongs to the "secrets of men" (κρυπτὰ τῶν ἀνθρώπων, Romans ii. 16). There was a poor leper, having ventured to approach or actually to mingle (probably, at least), with the ὄχλοις πολλοῖς, or great multitudes, as they listened at first and afterwards as they followed, whom the final close of the discourse, stern and severe as it was, had not discouraged from laying hold upon the loving-kindness of its first promises to all the poor and wretched; nay, rather by the very ἐξουσία or "authority" of its severity had given ground to his confidence. A wonderful type for us all in this respect, the truth and applicability of which are manifest in the narrative as given by the Spirit, even though the leper's prayer had no immediate connection with the influence of the sermon. This leper tells us parabolically what the true and entire result of that sermon is to be in our minds: Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst make us clean! This is the right "Lord, Lord," which will not be cried in vain. As God sends the leprosy, so God only can heal it—said the Jewish proverb; and Moses cried to the Lord concerning Miriam—Heal her now, O God! Above in ch. iv. 24 lepers are not as yet expressly mentioned; but in any case, even if such had been already healed by Jesus, and it had come to this man's ears, and still more so on the likelier supposition of the contrary, it is a strong faith which his words utter—Thou canst make me clean! (unlike Mark ix. 22). This faith it is that urges him further, even to the fearless approach and falling down before the Lord; even as to his willingness he does not really doubt, but his "if" is the becoming expression of an humble supplication,* which by this word seems to tarry afar off, as it was prescribed to the leper bending under the plague of God.

Verse 3. The Lord is now, as ever, ready to help. No sooner is the request uttered, than it is heard. The hand anticipates the word (Mark adds, σπλαγχνισθείς, having compassion), he stretches it forth down towards the leper, who scarcely knelt quite close to him; he touches him, as Elijah and Elisha touched the dead without defilement,† the word and deed are one, an immediate moment of most immediate answer. Alas! the majestic utterance may not be fully rendered into our own tongue, as the three Evangelists unanimously preserve it in those two only words so full of grace and authority: Θέλω, καθαρίσθητι, I will, be thou clean! The first is not merely an instant echo of his mercy to this present single request: I will do it. No, the Lord, who ever contemplates and perceives in his Spirit the whole in each, inclines himself to this man, as to that entire unclean humanity which he only can cleanse, with an avowal and testimony which comprehends everything—I will! The appealing "if" awakened the whole full tone of love in the depth of his heart—If I will heal and help? Yes, verily, it is for this that I am come! It is the same great I will with which he came into the world, and with which he leaves the world, which is consummated in that I will uttered to his Father on behalf of his sanctified ones, in John xvii. 24.

And now is added that word of authoritative command which was essentially contained in the former, but is now expressly uttered as a testimony to man—Become clean! Be thou clean! (comp. Luke xiii. 12; xviii. 42). Because I will! Therefore I can! I say not, I can; faith, awakened by my discourse will confide in me for that. My power is necessarily included in my willingness. In this manner never prophet before him healed, and he thus speaks only in the power of God who speaketh and it is done. An imperative this, which human language had never known before. The leprosy of the body must visibly and instantly obey him. The leprosy of the soul, indeed, not equally so; yet is there in the word of our Lord's authority, which speaks clean, at once both the power and the will on his part, to make clean also.

Verse 4. It was for the sake both of an internal and external propriety, that the wisdom and consummate prudence of the Lord added to his first utterance, which had sprung from the mighty impulse of his authority as well as of his love, something more, viz., a prohibition and a command, both wholesome and expedient. The prohibition, to tell no man of it, is not simply to be taken in connection with what follows—Delay not by so doing, but hasten to the priest! It is certainly to be understood in the same sense as many other similarly recurring prohibitions, in connection with one of which (when it was imposed upon all the healed together), Matthew (xii. 16) gives its most immediate signification and cause in the prophetic word—He shall not strive nor cry, neither shall any man hear his voice in the streets. The Lord's design is—not indeed to suppress all that we may call rumor or noise in connection with his works, for he knew that his prohibitions were in most cases to no purpose; but to testify most expressly that it was not desired or demanded by himself. A deeper cause which is (in Mark viii. 26 for example and elsewhere) more distinctly intimated, was the wise aim of his love to direct the healed ones themselves into the seclusion of thankfulness before God, to a profounder penetration of the matter where the injurious talk about it might not dissipate their thoughts, in order that, if possible, what had taken place in their bodies, might lead to their inner healing. This, however, our Lord seldom attained, but he continues in every new case to impose it with unwearying patience. On the present occasion he spoke the prohibition all the more emphatically, because of the publicity which already had attended his healing word of authority. (Mark—ἐμβριμησάμενος, strictly charging—εὐθέως ἐξέβαλεν αὐτόν, sent him away—thus as it were, strengthening the μηδενὶ μηδὲν εἴπῃς, tell no man).

With this is connected the recognition of the Levitical regulation, the reference to the priest's authority and prerogative, upon which the true High Priest meekly falls back, even at the moment when he has exhibited most impressively his own supreme authority, in order that we should not offend against it (ch. xvii. 27). Go thy way instantly, that if possible the fame of what has taken place may not outstrip thee, and give occasion to the evil-disposed to interpret my act of power into an invasion of their office. What lowliness of the mighty One! What condescension of the righteous One on account of unrighteousness! This healed one, forsooth, might have been justified in thinking himself released from the offering: but just because he might so think, the Lord reminds him of it, and will not have that which he has done, otherwise regarded than as what God does when a leper is healed of his plague (Mark v. 19). The article in τῷ ἱερεῖ, to the priest, and τὸ δῶρον, the gift, points plainly to what was written in Moses; which Mark and Luke, having said indefinitely ἃ προσέταξε, καθὼς προσέταξε Μωϋσῆς, what things, as Moses enjoined, supplement and complete by the addition of περὶ τοῦ καθαρισμοῦ σου, for thy cleansing. We may not regard τὸ δῶρον, the gift, as being the offering especially prescribed by Moses for the first day in Lev. xiv. which was followed on the eighth by another, but it comprises the whole obligatory duty in one word.

* But not unbelieving, for, as Von Gerlach has well put it: "Faith always says, if thou wilt! not, if thou canst! The opposite of Mark ix. 22."

† The contagion of pestilence is overcome and kept off from the Lord, and can as little attach itself to him as sin (Braune).

In the conclusion εἰς μαρτύριον αὐτοῖς, for a testimony unto them, which all the three Evangelists have in common, there lies a comprehensive meaning: that they, these priests so especially malevolent against me (this is signified in the transition from the singular to the plural, in the emphatic αὐτοῖς, to them), may learn at once both the miracles which I accomplish, and that I do not invade their office by them (comp. further on Luke xvii. 14). The former, however, is the special sense of that solemn expression, which recurs in ch. x. 18, xxiv. 14, where the general rejection of his testimony is pre-supposed. We must further guard against the error of many well-meaning persons (who are here unconsciously following Roman Catholic precedent), in interpreting this commandment to show themselves to the priests, as referring to our present spiritual guides, who must inspect and sit in judgment upon souls.

THE CENTURION.

(Matt. viii. 7, 10–13; Luke vii. 9.)

A second, equally prompt I will! A believing proselyte of the Jews from among the heathen placed in opposition to that unbelief of Israel, which the last word of the Lord had just indicated. Did the reader suppose that the stretched out hand and the touching were necessary in connection with the mighty Θέλω, καθαρίσθητι, "I will, be thou cleansed!" it takes place now through a simple Γενηθήτω, So let it be, spoken at a distance. But he who can do this, yet graciously and condescendingly complies in every case with man's request. That request, as Luke expresses it more definitely, was ὅπως ἐλθὼν διασώσῃ τὸν δοῦλον, that he would come and save his servant—and the Lord does not instantly utter his Γενηθήτω, "So let it be!" but Ἐγὼ ἐλθὼν θεραπεύσω αὐτόν, I will come and heal him. Whether the centurion came himself and spoke, or only by those whom he sent, can scarcely be determined with certainty, and affects the question but little. Without Luke's account we should unhesitatingly understand the former from the letter of Matthew, but the exceedingly definite account of Luke must have as much weight as the prerogative of Matthew as an eye-witness. Both have been united in the supposition that the man, in the unrest of his great desire, had sent once and again, and at last had come himself. This is possible, but appears to be contradicted by Luke (ver. 7). If, according to Luke, the first request was not urged in person, yet must vers. 5, 6 of Matthew be understood in connection with this, and Luke ver. 10 admits most assuredly of no other coming and going than that of those who were sent. Therefore we, for our part, would concur with Bengel, who holds Matthew's account to have been written sublimiore divinæ quam historiae humanæ lege, "after a more sublime law than human history." That is, not that it is indeed immaterial whether any man speaks by himself or by messengers (for there would be no justification of untruthfulness in this); but it is no untruthfulness to place one instead of the other, as the authoritative language of Scripture elsewhere teaches. How often in the Old Testament does speaking by the medium of others assume all the living reality of speaking in person! Compare in the New Testament Mark x. 35 with Matt. xx. 20. Thus Matthew's προσῆλθεν, he came, with its sequel may well be regarded as a living representation of Luke's ἀπέστειλε, he sent; the λέγων, saying (continued afterwards as ἀποκριθείς, answering), equivalent to the Old Testament לֵאמֹר in countless instances. So also in the εἶπεν, he said, of Matt. xi. 3, and in this very place Luke uses ἐρωτῶν, asking, in ver. 3, of the sending and saying by others, and in ver. 6 uses λέγων, saying, also. Let what we have elsewhere said be remembered, concerning the just distinction between the represented and the acted narrative, the historical writing which gives us the very life of the events, and the mere recital of the events themselves. In accordance with this let the higher grade of freedom of spirit in Matthew be here observed as it is contrasted in this external circumstance with the more human exactitude of Luke.

This freedom, however, proceeds not so far as to place a word in the mouth of our Lord, which he might not in such a sense have spoken. Thus when Luke (ver. 6) only intimates that Jesus went with them, but Matthew announces a word of willingness and promise as spoken by him, they mutually supplement each other. So he who reads Luke, thinks almost necessarily of such an utterance in answer. Here also the word and the action are immediately united.

The humbly believing words of the centurion which follow, and which Luke records as having met the Lord when he had approached near to the house, appear in Matthew's living presentation of the whole circumstance as the answer of the man himself; so on the other hand even Luke in his external particularity has represented a similar approach of the man as if in person, who yet was not present. He writes in ver. 9 ἐθαύμαζον αὐτόν, he marvelled at him, and then gives the commendation of his faith, just as Matthew does (yet without Ἀμήν, verily; which, as it was so often spoken by the Lord, is not by all the Evangelists, and by Luke especially, mentioned with uniformity). He also more definitely states (with στραφείς, turning) what Matthew does not neglect to record, that the Lord spoke this praise τοῖς ἀκολουθοῦσιν, τῷ ἀκολουθοῦντι αὐτῷ ὄχλῳ, to those, the crowd that followed him; that is, not so much to the centurion in commendation,* as to the Israelites for their shame, and as a testimony against them.

It has been said that this is the first time that we find the word "faith" in the New Testament; but the Lord had not only given utterance to it in the Sermon, ch. vi. 30, but on many occasions from Mark i. 15 downwards (comp. John i. 50, iii. 12, 15, &c., iv. 48; Mark vi. 6). He everywhere seeks and demands faith, not only as a susceptibility which his miracles and wonders must meet, but as that without which he cannot confer that blessing which he is so willing to bestow. Much else was to be praised in this eminent man, his amiable care of his servants, the humility so unwonted in a Roman, the profound recognition of God's revelations manifested in his retreating behind the despised people of God—but the Lord only makes prominent his faith. He even marvelled at his strong faith, as it is only once elsewhere (Mark vi. 6) said that he marvelled—but in that case it was at unbelief. He must have in some way given express utterance to this, else how could the Evangelists have ventured to record it? But let not this be hastily read and passed over; let us thoughtfully penetrate the depths which that wonder at faith or unbelief in the Spirit of the Son of Man discloses to us.* So great faith—he says; so strong, so great (Matt. xv. 28), by which this man, a man under authority, absolutely and nakedly trusts in me, confiding that I have power to command sickness† by a word without coming or laying on of hands in the name of God, just as he himself can command his servant in the name of Cæsar! I have not found it in Israel, I who come to seek it, and to seek it there first of all, where it should have been found. For is not Israel—the Lord while he puts them to shame in his language of reproof, yet uses the glorious and honorable title of their calling—beyond every other people the people of faith, called by God from the time of Abraham, and prepared, and through long ages trained unto faith? The Lord thus, as manifestly as expressively, indicates the great leading idea of the divine dealing with his people, the essential aim of all the institutions which had preceded his own coming.

Verses 11, 12. Luke, who elsewhere makes prominent the calling of the Gentiles, and for this reason records in detail the history of the centurion directly after the Sermon on the Mount, yet contents himself here with the Lord's first saying, which indeed involved all the rest. The extended development of it into that clear and ample prediction which now follows as taken from the prophets, he introduces in another place, (ch. xiii. 29,) where the Lord uttered it a second time (just as we found in the Sermon on the Mount). Ample occasion, however, was given by the retiring humility of the Gentile, and yet more by the self-complacent obtrusion of "our nation" (Luke ver. 5) in the saying of the elders, for such an utterance of our Lord—probably the first such testimony that fell from his lips, as probably this was the first heathen who ever came to be admitted into the kingdom of God. It was nothing new that he spoke, for it was only the blindness of Israel that failed to read it in the prophets, and to find in the promise of Abraham. Yea, it was only the remains of this blindness which rendered it of

* Bengel's remark that the Lord would not thus have praised the man if present—appears to us a refinement, almost in direct contradiction to Matthew, who felt nothnig of the kind. The word would assuredly be very soon reported to him, and thus was just the same as if spoken to him and in his presence.

* Julius Müller seems to us to pass over this deep meaning in a loose and unconsequential manner, thinking that goodness can only astonish us, because we have participation in sin. The ground of Christ's marvelling at the centurion's faith lies only, as his own words show, in its contrast with what the Lord was accustomed to find; not also generally in its contrast with the "evil unbelief" of mankind, since the Lord knows its sin without participation therein.

† Certainly his meaning was simply—Command the sickness that it depart (comp. Luke iv. 39); somewhat as the modern fashion of aiming to speak to, and drive away, bodily evil. What Lange says of "Genii of recovery and health, powers of life, a genius of healing sent as a servant," sounds very beautiful and delicate, but is an importation from another quarter altogether.

necessary to the Apostles of the Circumcision with Peter at their head, even after all that the Lord had said down to Matt. xxviii. 19, and after the uncomprehended testimony of the Holy Ghost in Acts ii. 39, to receive another and distinctive revelation of this mystery (Eph. iii. 5). The Lord expresses himself, as it were, euphemistically; avoiding the word "heathen," as also in Luke iv. 24–27. But he uses the prophetical expressions, probably alluding to the apocryphal passage (Bar. iv. 37; v. 5, 6)*— or directly to that fundamental promise (Gen. xxvii. 14) which the book of Baruch seems also to have in view, and the echoes of which are heard in such prophetic passages as Isa. xlix. 6, 12; lx. 4, &c. In contrast with Israel, and comprehending those gathered from all the nations of the earth, they are regarded as many who come into the kingdom of heaven. The sitting down at table, ἀνακλίνεσθαι, is not to be specially referred to the last futurity, although it points as far as that; it is obviously and first of all, the general Scriptural metaphor, firmly established in the phraseology of Israel (Luke xiv. 15), for the enjoyment of all the blessings and benefits of the kingdom of God. It has the same signification as in Isa. xxv. 6, and as it has in all the parables of our Lord concerning marriage feasts and suppers. The Israelites would not eat with heathens; the Lord puts them to shame by the express contradiction of this. We also see that the coming of these many signifies their first entrance into the fellowship of the kingdom of heaven set up on earth, by the contrasted simultaneous rejection of Israel in ver. 12. The children of the kingdom: this is not ironically spoken, as if meaning those who vainly thought themselves such (comp. ch. xiii. 38, where we find the expression in its most distinctive sense); but those who are already the authenticated heirs, the guests already called, those who were born in the typical kingdom of God in order to the inheritance of the Messianic, promised kingdom; they who as the children of Abraham stand already in some sense in its possession and enjoyment. With this sense only does the expression used in the later parallel accord: The kingdom of heaven shall be taken from you (ch. xxi. 43).

Let it be observed, further, how the Lord proclaims faith in his person, confidence in his divine power and authority, as the distinctive condition of entrance into the kingdom of heaven: throughout and entirely this and no other. For the whole discourse proceeds from this point, beholding in this one heathen the type and earnest of many, who in point of faith shall be like him. I have not found such faith in Israel, that is, at the same time—I have not been hailed and received with faith: a general and indefinite faith in God (John xiv. 1) is no more in question, since he makes his appearance; and when he proposes his claims, the evidence of such faith is to be sought and found as faith in him. But just as little as we are to seek the Lord's meaning in a more far-reaching, free development of faith as to its object; as if the insight into the person of Christ, as the Lord of spirits, from the heathen stand-point, is placed in advantageous contrast with the limited and straitened Messianic ideas of the Jews! (as Neander imposes his meaning, contrary to all Scripture). When Christ and the apostles speak of the measure, the greatness, the strength of πίστις, or faith, they never refer directly to its extent of perception and acknowledgment.

Let it be observed, further, that the Lord gives those who are to be cast out their full rights at first as "Israel," and "the children of the kingdom," as also that he describes even the entrance of the strangers from the east and the west as only an opening to them of fellowship with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob (quite in harmony with the prophets); but that yet the casting out of the unbelieving on account of their unbelief is, on the other hand, most definitely and decidedly pre-announced. For the outer darkness which is opposed to the feast of light and joy, although it seems in part to have its accomplishment in the blindness and obduracy of Israel upon earth, yet stretches its warning and threatening meaning to nothing less than what the Lord afterwards by similar expressions indicates (ch. xxii. 13; xxiv. 51; xxv. 30; xiii. 42). For as all the Lord's legislation does no more than fulfill and unfold what had before been written and spoken, so in all his prophecies he only illustrates, and perfects what the preceding prophets had included in their field of vision and range of utterance. Darkness in the Old Testament is equivalent to the prison (Psa. cvii. 10–14; Isa. xlii. 7; Eccles. xviii. 4). But finally to the kingdom of heaven stands only opposed the kingdom of him, who keeps bound in the everlasting bonds of death. The article before κλαυθμός, weeping, and βρυγμὸς τῶν ὀδόντων, gnashing of teeth, does not simply oppose emphatically the future torture to all pains of time,* but points obviously to the prophetic word, in order to connect the whole discourse with that in its conclusion. Isaiah lxv. 14 is indicated (as elsewhere ch. lxvi. 24 is brought forward), and placed in connection with such passages as Psa. cxii. 10, with which, again, Judith xvi. 21 may be compared. Whether in the significant contrast, weeping and gnashing of teeth (not chattering as with cold), a farther antithesis between the softer bewailing, and the mad fury of anguish is intimated,† we leave undecided; we prefer taking

* Where, indeed, the discourse is only of the children of Jerusalem returning, yet the Vulg. reading "Sicut filios regni" remarkably suits our passage. That the Lord elsewhere has apocryphal places in his mind, is undeniable.

* "The article is noteworthy: in this life is not yet anguish" (Bengel).

† According to Von Gerlach: "Probably the former represents the grief of the softer natures, the latter that of the more rugged." He also observes the more obvious contrast with the songs of the blessed.

the description as a simple Scriptural emblem of self-engendered, useless sorrow of every kind.

But let it be noted, finally, that the Lord, with wise discrimination, does not proceed as we might have expected— The children of Abraham shall be cast out. For in the background of this saying he designs to leave room for the second historical fulfillment of the great relative change between the far off and the near, those who are there within and those who are without—as it is prospectively announced by the prophets. Twice must the children recede, that those who were before strangers and afar off may enter into their place; the second great change is when the Gentile-Christians have become ripe for rejection, and the seed of Abraham dispersed through all lands shall return again from the east and the west, from the north and the south (Isa. xliii. 5, 6). The Lord does not say or signify this immediately, but he leaves room in the prophetic perspective, for this second and inverted fulfillment of his word.

Verse 13. Matthew's representation, which from ver. 5 has more and more clearly set the nobleman before us as if present, now passes from a spiritual intercourse between him and Christ, to what would seem to have all the vividness of a bodily intercourse. He who may think that the ὕπαγε, go thy way, spoken as if to a person present, departs too far from the reality of the occasion, may suppose, with many, that the centurion himself came afterwards; whereby, however, the greater inaccuracy of Luke, nay the only irreconcilable inconsistency, in the whole narrative is immediately involved. The signification of the word, whether we regard it as thus immediately spoken or not, lies in two critical points, which now recur in their relation, and which the Evangelist now points out and makes emphatic for the analogy of similar cases. Faith, with the praise of which the discourse began, is ever the ground of help, as the Lord now testifies, with joy that he has found faith and therefore may help, but keeping back in his lowliness the mention of his own power which is ever spontaneous and ready to help. Be it done unto thee, as thou hast believed, namely to thee in thy servant, for whom thy affectionate faith may avail. This expression is a universal word of mercy and of power, which the Lord had for every one who came, and may have spoken to many unmentioned ones, with the same meaning in various expression. It is the design of the Evangelist to record this, and in this lies the truth of his narrative according to the mind of the Spirit. As to the external historical letter of our Lord's words, we may safely resign that, while the Spirit continues from age to age to illustrate its living meaning in the world through the holy Gospels. Moreover we know not in any case, at least know not in the most important discourses, nor is it necessary for us to know, in what language they were uttered by the Lord.

THE TWO DIVERSE FOLLOWERS.

(Matt. viii. 20, 22; Luke ix. 58, 60.)

The chronological connection, which has been preserved hitherto, begins now to fail us. It seems, indeed, as if Matthew placed this transaction expressly between ver. 18 and ver. 23, yet Luke's account from ver. 51 has certainly the appearance of having adhered very strictly to the order of time. Who shall decide this? Thus much in general we may regard as certain, that, as Luke often collects into one homogeneous whole, events occurring on various days of our Lord's eventful history, so also Matthew by no means makes it his design to relate every where every thing acoluthistically, or in the strictest order (to quote the recent eminent critic Ebrard). It must remain undecided, also, whether the two incidents occurred in succession, as it appears in the narrative.* The sayings of our Lord are the marrow of the Gospels. Much stress is laid upon the connection of the more connected and longer discourses, but little or none upon the date and sequence of single incidents and shorter sayings, the beginning and end of our Lord's history being excepted. A comparative harmony may be very serviceable as it regards these. Here Matthew, who gives us in his eighth and ninth chapters a selection of the earliest and most remarkable miracles arranged on the whole in strict order, but while doing so is preparing the way for the mission of the Twelve in ch. x. (hence ch. ix. 9), gives us in connection two solemn sayings of our Lord concerning the following of himself, which contain a most highly significant contrast.* This is exhibited in the different treatment of the different cases, as the Lord's wisdom, in the most impressive manner, speaks to each what his all-seeing eye discerned to be necessary.

* It is our unbiassed judgment that according to the express words of both Evangelists the former of these examples occurred twice.

* See, generally, the contrasts in Matthew as they are shown in Lange's Biblischen Dichtungen, second part. We cannot, however, discover with him any dispositions or preparations for the apostolic office; or find Judas Iscariot, Thomas, and Matthew, in the three candidates for following, though Rothe too was not thus in the selection of the apostles; and (Ethik, iii. 419) appears to take such a view. If the Lord had, moreover, other close followers besides the Twelve.

For to this we may refer John ii. 24, 25. The enthusiastic one, who offers himself at once and with so much alacrity, is repelled almost abruptly; the considerate, reflecting, lingering one is quickened to his duty by a word of power which in his case dispenses with every other permitted and bounden duty.

Scribes do not offer themselves in great numbers, and this Matthew seems to intimate in the usual εἷς, a certain. But nothing was less aimed at by our Lord than to have followers, unless they were genuine and sound; he is far from desiring this, as it would have been easy to attain it. He tests the scribe severely, whether this was a matter of solemn earnestness to him. That he did not offer himself as tempting Christ is manifest; for in such instances it is generally either stated in the account, or detected immediately and exposed by the Lord. The man's speech sounds honest and decided, like Ittai's word to King David (2 Sam. xv. 21),* yea, as if he was prepared to reap the reward promised in Rev. xiv. 4. But it springs, probably, from a momentary paroxysm of feeling not uncommon at that time, and is not without a certain affectation of promising much; he by no means understood (like Thomas afterwards, John xi. 16), whither matters would tend with the Lord and his followers. Therefore the Lord tells him the rugged and naked truth which he little expected, that with him it would be otherwise than might have been usual in the case of a teacher so honored. This presses upon him the unexpressed question—Wilt thou still go with me? Hast thou understood and pondered all this? Probably the consequence was as in ch. xix. 22.†

The Lord's accompanying word has all the terseness and strength of a proverbial saying, and is in the highest degree vivid. Every thing living upon earth, even among its wild beasts, has its home, its secret place of rest and protection; not thus provided for am I! Places of abode are generally upon the earth; but the Lord designedly makes the variation: Even under the earth and above it the animals are cared for. The foxes are set against the more familiarly and proverbially used birds of the air, with this distinction, that while the former are among those beasts of the earth which are most secret and native under it; the latter are, on the contrary, free, unrestricted, and apparently homeless and unsettled. Nevertheless, just as the foxes have their cunningly prepared and secure holes, so have (and on this word the emphasis lies) even the birds their κατασκηνώσεις, nests, at least, and this contains the general idea which was appropriate to the occasion: nests are not meant, as such, but some little branch on which they may sit, or some tree or shrub under the shade of which they may find refuge. See ch. xiii. 32; Mark iv. 32; and Psa. civ. 12; Dan. iv. 18 in the Sept. But the Son of Man—and here first occurs in Matthew that name of deep meaning by which the Lord is wont to designate himself, and which has already been found in John i. 51. That it is a name which indicates and avows the Messiah, is certain from Daniel's prophecy; but it is equally manifest that it is most immediately a name of humiliation, of humble self-renunciation (a lowly Son of Man): which meaning holds also in Daniel, where it is used (as in John i. 51) in contradistinction to the angelic nature (ch. vii. 10); as the invocation, "O Son of Man," Dan. viii. 17, shows, and the repeated use of it in Ezekiel. Other significations are not excluded, as further, the Universal Man, the Second Man, the Son of God who yet has become man, and for man's sake will ever be such. Now the one meaning and now the other is prominent, according to the ever-varying connection. Here we have the identity of the Messiah-name with the name of a lowly, neglected son of man, and the second meaning holds good—Men usually are better and more commodiously sheltered than beasts, but I am one of them of whom even this cannot be said! Again, in strong and proverbial expression—Not a place where he may lay his head, no pillow for his weary sleep. Is there here allusion to Jacob's stone for a pillow, as in John i. Bethel had been referred to? Certainly the Lord does not merely say—I know not even for the coming night where I shall lay myself down (Herder). He speaks of his entire homeless and needy life, and lodgment, and wanderings since he entered upon his ministry; and if in his abode at Capernaum, or any where else for a short time, this expression might appear too strong, it was a great truth on the whole, and was even more and more literally working out its full accomplishment, till he bowed his head on the cross. This has the Lord most distinctly in view when he gives the answer to the avowal, I will follow thee whithersoever thou goest—Thither go I, that is my way and my goal! Wilt thou still go with me? If we take Luke's chronology, this would have a yet deeper significance, see vers. 51–53. But the Lord could well have said the same at an earlier period, conscious beforehand of the whole course of his career; and would do so, doubtless, when necessary, in order fundamentally to repel all Jewish expectation.

* With which we may compare Ruth to Naomi (Ruth i. 16, 17). Thus the expression, "Whithersoever thou goest," assuredly does not refer to the various roads the Lord may journey in! (according to the great Schleiermacher's very small interpretation).

† "The book-learned are generally fastidious and love warm housing: Thus on this account as well as on account of their burrowing in dialectical subtilties and the dust of books, they are least useful for the practical work of life, and for laboring in the Lord's vineyard—hence is the first immediately rejected as unfit!" So Sepp after his manner, rather too express in his anachronism about book-dust, yet with some ground of truth. As to the general sentiment Braune says excellently, "Many would be pious, but would keep their nests—houses, riches, honor, and respectability."

Not improbably the scribe or others who heard these words would say: Is this language for one who assumes to be Messiah! Is this Daniel's "Son of Man?"

The second belonged already to the disciples, as Matthew expressly remarks; that is, in the more comprehensive sense to those who, coming and going, attached themselves to the Lord: with this Luke's account that the Lord uttered to him a special ἀκολούθει μοι, "follow me," perfectly agrees; for this summons might, in its higher and additional meaning, be repeated a second time, as we find in the case of the apostles. The hitherto disciple is required to attach himself yet more entirely and inseparably to his Lord, and probably it was his intention to include him among the Seventy (Luke x. 1). Even in Matthew's account a second summons of our Lord is evidently pre-supposed, since the words of ver. 21 can only be understood as an answer to such a summons: Suffer me first—! The Lord, however, qualifies not his ἀκολούθει μοι, and speaks to this wavering lingerer who was in a danger that he knew not of failing to return, with such keenness and urgency as he would not have been likely to use in the case of an entirely new disciple. For the rest, it is entirely inconceivable that the meaning of the request was simply—Let me first go and await my aged father's death and burial. This is contradicted less by the letter of the petition,* than by the spirit of our Lord's refusing answer, which lays the stress of the emphasis upon the burying. The entire meaning of the expression, as we shall unfold it, would then be entirely displaced, and an incomprehensible severity unnecessarily infused into it, by refusing the attentions of an affectionate son to a yet living father. The man could not thus have come to Jesus from a house of death; the affliction and legal uncleanness would have forbidden this;† but having recently come to him, he received the intelligence of the death which summoned him home, while the Lord required him to remain. By this obvious supposition alone the whole is disengaged of difficulty, especially the command of Jesus—Therefore go not, but follow me! The man thought indeed that he might with propriety ask to perform the duties which nature and religion exacted, especially as in Jewish law the obligation of burying released from most other engagements. Hence it is with modest submission that he says—Suffer me first! Or should we rather say, with a wavering tendency? Certainly the position of this man's conscience, vibrating at that critical moment between return to his old relations and a persevering, yet closer adhesion to the Lord, manifestly betrays itself here: if he did not suspect danger in returning, would he have put the question—May I go? 1 Kings xix. 10 is generally compared, but this still more closely applies to Luke ix. 61. And in connection with that, the difference between the Old and New Testament is referred to, between the relaxation of requirement and its strong enforcement; but this does not apply here, since our Saviour also can in fit cases relax his demand, even as Elias did to Elisha. His expression has primary reference to the individual instance before him, and only applies in all its rigor to those who shall be found in the same precise position of mind. That is, he makes available in its literal significance a truth and a principle which, though in themselves perfectly general, are not always applied in a manner so directly interfering with human life.*

There is at first sight a tone of rigor and of harshness in this word of the Son of Man, who ordinarily is very far from breaking in upon any human ordinance, and certainly is at the utmost distance from a condemnation or violation of the most natural exhibitions of human love. The dead must be buried, according to the very ordinance of God (Gen. iii. 19). If it be said that burial is a matter which affects not the dead, and therefore that it is immaterial who performs it, whether a son or any one else; such a cold thought, which our Lord has not in his view, is contradicted by the recognized and universal right feeling of man. Is it not a duty of love which a son might be supposed to have permission to discharge without asking for it at all? And yet he who directed the cleansed lepers to the priests, refuses to concede to a son the duty and the right of burying his own father! Assuredly it is because he had said, Follow me! and to the same extent goes that other word—Whosoever loveth father or mother more than me, is not worthy of me. We may be tempted to regard this requirement as being too high and strained for humanity, we may find it difficult to reconcile this saying of our Lord with his ordinary manner of speaking; but this should lead us all the more diligently to seek that hidden meaning which is concealed under the intentional paradox: and if we seek it we shall find it.

We set out with the literal burial of the literally dead; for the request referred to

* Yet as Alford well remarks (against Theophylact): πρῶτον απελθεῖν καὶ θάψαι, "first go and bury," must refer to a specific act to be previously performed.

† Such left not the house of mourning before the entombment.

* Very true and discriminating is Göschel's observation, that Luke ix. 61, 62, explains the foregoing, and that the Lord in both cases condemns the looking back (Zur Lehre von den letzten Dingen, p. 70. On the other hand, what follows in pp. 71, 72, concerning reference here to the mutual care of the dead in the church beyond—to the performance of obsequies in the name of Jesus—may be set down as ingenious wanderings beyond the letter of the text).

this, and the refusal must, first of all, have referred to it likewise. But that the dead who are to be buried must be figuratively understood, admits of no doubt, and needs no proof; for it can occur to no man to impute so meaningless a saying to the Lord as that the burying must be deferred, till one dead man shall bury another—Let the already dead care for the companions who join them! Who then are the dead? Not those who, being only mortals and soon to die, are reckoned as being dead; for then the contrast here would be lost. The disciple to whom it is forbidden, is himself one of such. No, the Lord speaks here as in John v. 24, 25, of spiritual death, according to the Spirit's usage throughout the whole New Testament. Thus the "burying," as an external work belonging to the things of this world, should, in regard to persons and circumstances where the doing of something more important is involved, be left to the children of the world, who can perform such matters, are good enough for them, and are in their generation better adapted for their performance. Thus far we have light arising in this dark word, and observe by this increasing light that the Lord goes still further, and taking the present circumstance as a similitude, designs that we should also understand the burying itself, and even the dead to be buried in their figurative meaning. Here we discern himself and his manner of teaching once more. How often do we find in studying his words, that his penetrating glance beholds the most internal and general significance of individual occasions and circumstances; and then, elevating the particular circumstance into an example and emblem, connects with it sayings of sublimest, and most far-reaching application. It is not otherwise here. When one called to be his follower has mentioned a "burial" which he must first take charge of, which, however, may very probably lead to the withdrawal from him of this called disciple, the profoundly wise Master gives him as an answer, not premeditated, but issuing at once from the depths of his spirit—an answer which at the same time opens up a wide field of thought.

But to perceive this, we must think of the still more harsh and mysterious saying: Let those who are dead in sin, perform their burial work one for another! This may appear to sound like what many loveless ones in their pride say in their thoughts or with their lips—Let the evil world perish, let it remain in its ruin! For a moment it may so sound, till we reflect who thus speaks. Did he then leave the dead in their death and burial? Did he not come for the very purpose, that whosoever believeth on him, should not remain in death? and is it not for this very object, that the great work of revivification should proceed upon earth, that he called his disciples, and sent them forth among the dead as his witnesses, with the word and spirit of life? And here we remark that his words to the disciples whom he called, contain a very impressive contrast between the work to be left to others, and the work which he himself must with his utmost diligence engage in. We should find this antithesis in the occasion and in the person, even if it was not expressed in word, but it is so. In Matthew we have the Follow thou me, that is, Hear the words of eternal life which will give life to thy soul; and again in Luke—But go thou and preach the kingdom of God, that is, Arouse those who are dead, being called to this, leave burying to others, who alas! do it naturally enough, so long as they themselves are as dead as their dead. (Διαγγελλε, cry aloud everywhere, far and wide, as in Rom. ix. 17.) The dead, indeed, are not to be thus left, but to them the true word of life is to be preached. The very reverse holds here. The Lord's stern saying is one which springs from the consuming zeal of his love for the world's salvation. He will have the one thing pursued without distraction and intermission. He holds fast his messenger of life, that the life-giving work may take no harm through his attention to the "burying." As in a great hospital, where many are hourly dying, the physicians' sole concern is healing and saving; others may charge themselves with burial, they have no time for that. So is it with the followers of the Lord in this world. When separation to this great calling is concerned, every thing else must give way. The proper burial of a father, even, is not excepted; although generally it is fit and right that a mourner should bury his own dead out of his sight (Gen. xxiii. 4, as here—their dead), and the Lord himself, Matt. xxvi. 12 gives us proof, in what estimation he held such a service rendered by love to its object. Much more must all that give place, which the Lord likens to such burying. Luther says very appropriately on this place: "Some there be who allege good works, for their not following and believing, but Christ regards them as only dead and lost works." O how much of such lost and valueless work is there under all kinds of forms and names, and with very specious pretension, but which bring no service to the kingdom of God, bring no dead to life, and from which the Lord not simply by permission but by express commandment gives his people dispensation—Leave these things to others! Much of this mere burial-work passes under the title of political or generally human obligations, yea, is to be found in the holy ceremonies of an ecclesiastical death. These things not only make no dead soul live, but bury the dead yet more deeply in their death (Rom. vi. 4). Thus do the dead bury each other! For all things in men's mutual commerce have the effect and influence either of burying or of raising from death. But this difference does not so much lie in any external act as such, as in the manner and spirit of its performance. The burying may be so ordered, as to conduce to awakening from death; men may so "preach the kingdom of God," as that the people who hear be preached into death.

This is the far-reaching, universally applicable meaning of the word, in which it has its truth and force for all his disciples every where: Ye are called, as the living, to diffuse life; leave everything else as burying-work to the dead!* "Take with you who is fit to go; but miss not a step of your own way" (Zinzendorf). But when does this general principle lay hold of the soul in its full severity, and cut off from us by an unconditional prohibition, things otherwise permitted, and even demanded by the very instinct of life, such as the burying of a father in the present case? In cases of collision and critical times of decision, known to be such by the Lord's inward monition in the conscience. This man was in actual danger of burying himself again, while burying his father; and the third example in Luke ix. 61, 62, is an explanatory parallel of the second. He who felt in himself, while he put the question, the waverings of his spirit, perceived in his spirit more clearly than many expositors have done, the true meaning of the Lord's stern answer. Suppose it thine own case, should any the holiest obligations of life, even that of showing thy filial affection at the dying bed or the grave of thy father, call thee away at the critical moment when thy Lord's service most imperatively claims thee; tell it to him in the sincerity of thine heart: Lord, suffer me first to go and discharge this obligation! and if this first should not be approved of by him, as involving danger to thyself; then art thou released from all, hold thyself bound to follow him! What thou thoughtest thyself bound to do will be done by others, and no more will harm result from thine omission, than that the dead will fail to bury their dead.

* As typically the consecrated Nazarite might not defile himself even at the death of his father, mother, &c., though the high-priest was not forbidden to do so (Num. vi. 7; Lev. xxi. 1–4).

THE STILLING OF THE SEA.

(Matt. viii. 26; Mark iv. 35–40; Luke viii. 22–25.)

The significance of this history belongs not simply to the place where we find and expound the words. The whole human life of the Son of God is in all its circumstances and details altogether symbolical, because he who is the image of the invisible God in the flesh, appears in commerce with the world, with nature, and with men; and this symbolical, typical, prophetical character meets us with special significance on some most striking occasions. The passage over the sea is human life generally, disciple-life in particular; the ship in which he protectingly and savingly voyages with them, as it is the heart of his disciple, so it is also his Church, the antitype of the Ark. The three Evangelists note three sayings of our Lord in connection with this event: Matthew only records the central and most important word, to the right understanding of which belongs the right understanding of the whole narrative, inasmuch as in that word the Lord regards the occurrence prophetically and symbolically. He stills the storm, in order to teach by signs, how he could and will still all storms; he rebuked the little faith of his disciples, in order to speak in doing so a permanent word for all similar conjunctures and circumstances in all time to come. The Spirit secretly teaches this in the concise and measured words of vers. 23, 24, in Matthew. The disciples followed him, when he, evening being come (according to Mark), summoned them to the voyage by entering the ship, and announcing his will. And behold, where he voyages with his disciples, there arises the storm!

The first word (in Mark and Luke) is the Lord's purely human—Let us pass over unto the other side! On which we have only to remark that the Lord who so often is under the necessity of opposing his majestic I to all other men, all the more condescendingly on that account speaks of the we and the us in the external things of ordinary life:* yet as the whole tenor of the Gospels evinces, the Lord in his own pre-eminent dignity only thus speaks in such relations. All the more impressively does the third word follow, with which he, the only one, and concerning whom the question is forever rising anew—Ποταπός ἐστιν οὗτος; "What manner of man is this?" —rebukes the winds and the sea!

The word of main importance, however, is that central word to the terrified disciples, which the Evangelists remarkably enough give us in variety of literal expression, but with the same meaning. The power and force of such words must ever leave the mere letter behind, and fasten upon the heart as the immediate speech of spirit to spirit. "He rebuked us that our faith was little, that we were not ready with our faith, that we had no faith"—this was the never-erased impression of words which in the perturbation of the moment were not distinctly heard, but profoundly understood. One thing was beyond all else plain; that he pointed to faith as the principle through which fear is overcome. There was, indeed, great peril according to human appearance, in a ship already filling with water: Luke καὶ ἐκινδύνευον, and they were in jeopardy. Four fishermen familiar with the sea were there. But the Lord, whose office and work was not to row the ship, knowing no care as to the passage (critical from the beginning), slept, laying his weary head upon the wooden railing of the ship;* slept so sound and tranquil, that the storm and uproar around did not awake him, but only the hands and cry of the disciples. (All three Evangelists mention distinctively the awaking him, before they spoke to him.) And how does the awakened wake up? In the same majestic tranquility with which he had sunk to sleep, in the most perfect self-possession and power of his spirit. Let any man reflect how one suddenly roused with outcries of distress and danger of death around him, would in the weakness of humanity comport himself; and it will help him to perceive and estimate the unapproachable dignity of this Being, even while, as one with us, he is paying his tribute to the infirmity of our flesh. Yes, verily, this Son of Man sinks into sleep, and wakes again even like ourselves, and yet not like ourselves. This gives his word, spoken at this critical moment, its foundation of majesty, and must be considered in its exposition. That the Lord thus speaks and thus can speak, is at least as wonderful as that he in Adam's primeval authority and dominion controls the element; rather this latter is to be understood by the former. The Son of Man slept, the Son of God in man awakes and speaks; for himself exhausted, for others almighty.

* Compare 2 Kings iv. 13 (especially in the original) with ver. 9. Just so do the apostles speak, in the same spirit mingling themselves and their attendants, ministers and servants together, even in spiritual things—though not with so much condescension as Elisha showed when he spoke of respect shown towards him and Gehazi.

Matthew gives the words of the disciples in their simplest expression, Luke indicates more strongly the urgency of their feeling by the twice uttered "Master! Master!"—Mark adds their reproachful appeal, "Carest thou not that we perish?" Canst thou sleep tranquilly, while we are in anguish and straits? He utters no reproach for the violent awakening, but perceiving instantly the whole significance of the occasion, he penetrates to the very heart of the matter, by speaking, as the great Master, a great word of instruction for all who are so terrified: Why are ye so fearful? So fearful? This Mark also places first. He never entertains fear of any creature; there is no trace of any such feeling in him throughout the Gospels. When anxiety, fear, or grief falls upon him, it springs from quite another principle. To fear is human, belongs to fallen human nature in its sin and fear of death; but faith in God should again expel this fear. This is the great thought in the mind of our Lord; it is only he who can speak to the terrified, in perfect fearless composure, concerning fearing and believing, as opposite one to the other. The Holy Ghost revives in the apostle the remembrance of the word, as if it had been: O ye of little faith! as in ch. vi. 30. The disciples were also in unbelief, which cried out—We perish! Yet were they at the same time sufficiently believing to awake and call upon him—Lord help us! Even weak faith is faith still, the trembling hand yet holds fast the Deliverer. If others among the people had called upon the Lord in such a storm to help them, in them it would have been a stronger faith. Thus the idea of little faith is relative; the disciples, more intimately familiar with the power of their Master, should not have allowed themselves so lightly to be whelmed in distress and deadly fear by the mere appearance of danger; to Peter, already walking on the sea, the rebuke is yet stronger—O thou of little faith, wherefore didst thou doubt! Mark and Luke give us another form of expression: How is it that ye have no faith, just now, when ye should have been able to trust? Hence equivalent to Where is your faith? for there is in truth no difference of meaning. More depends upon another difference; viz., that the Evangelists, not apostles, relate first the rebuking of the storm, and then the word of the disciples; while Matthew, on the other hand, tells us, and with a literal and express τότε, then, that the Lord spoke first the word of admonition to the disciples and stilled their disquieted souls, before he turned to the winds and the waves. In this lies the sublimest trait of the whole: he looks not round on the uproar of the elements, before he has discharged to his disciples in severity and love his accustomed function of Master.* Further it is τότε ἐγερθείς, then he arose—still sitting, the awakened one in the midst of all the tempest remaining unperturbed.

But then follows the act which sets its seal to the word. And just as this, so also does that carry its own meaning with it. And yet this empire over nature is a new thing which Matthew has to record concerning Jesus. His narrative of selected miracles in chs. viii. and ix., rises through a gradation of importance: cleansing of the leper (a great thing even to begin with)—healing at a distance by his word, Be it done!—commanding the wind and the sea—saying to the devils, Go!—forgiving the sins of the paralytic (more indeed than saying, Arise! or, Go hence! more than ruling the sea)—and finally giving life to the dead! Matthew and Luke both give us to understand that the Lord addressed the excited elements, as we speak to living and conscious beings; Mark gives us the two words of his invocation: Σιώπα! πεφίμωσο! Peace; be still! If we are to seek in the repetition any thing more than mere emphasis, that additional meaning is not to be found by referring (as Bengel does) the former to the sonus, and the latter to the impetus, but by regarding the previous words of Mark: He rebuked the wind, and spoke to the sea. This is so significantly echoed in the subsequent exclamation of the astonished men, as recorded by all the three Evangelists, that we may even on that account readily believe that the Lord literally spoke, as Mark records it—that he uttered one word of authority to the storm raging above, and another to the waves below. It surprises us to read in Lange that, as the wind and the billows were no "spiritual power" opposed to him, the invocation was not "properly such," but a "prophetic announcement with a mysteriously symbolical design," and to find that with a diluted rationalism he traces the "immediate causes of the stilling of the air and of the sea to the atmosphere." O no, there is an authoritative word of God's Spirit's power, which can speak into the atmosphere more than was before latent in it according to the harmonia præstabilita. This word of authority was not a manner of speaking which meant only a knowledge that it would become still! It is, moreover, generally true, as Von Gerlach understands the passage, that "the destructive powers of creation are for the sin of man in the service of evil spirits." That profound thinker Daub, for example (Jud. Ischar. ii. 353), has referred to this history in connection with his views of the demon-element in the terrors of nature and the war of the elements, and of the authority of God which can alone command them to be still. Whether the Gergesene devils, whose history presently follows, were the spirits who raised this tempest against Jesus (according to an old opinion), and thus their ordinance is spoken to instead of the beings who directed it, is very much to be questioned; and the invocation will certainly admit of no application to the intermediate agency in nature of angels, according to the opinion of many. We, for our own part, are not at all disposed to rest the simple truth of this history upon any such inappropriate and needless conceits; it is quite in harmony with the whole exhibition of the character of God's power, thus to exert authority over nature, Job xxxviii. 11 (Psa. lxv. 8, lxxxix. 10). What that mysterious question in Prov. xxx. 4 attributed to the "Son" of whom the Old Testament prophesied, now receives its manifest realization. Here is something much beyond Elijah's dividing the waters of the Jordan. We have no need too elaborately to work out the picture, and refer (with Pfenninger) to the imperative form of the Lord seen reflected in the instantly still water (it was, indeed, evening or night); we have ample foundation already for the amazed exclamation of the men (of the disciples themselves according to Mark and Luke) concerning this Son of Man: What manner of man is this! But he remains himself in his high dignity amid such an outcry of astonishment, the same as when he heard it later from the lips of Pilate—Behold the man!

* For even though προσκεφάλαιον may signify ordinarily a second pillow or cushion, yet the article in Mark iv. 38, seems to indicate something belonging to the ship, which might serve as a cushion or support.

* "If they had awaked him, to restore their disorder and presence of mind scared away by danger, he would have entered on his function without rebuking them" (Braune).

THE DEVILS IN THE SWINE.

(Matt. viii. 32; Mark v. 8, 9, 19; Luke viii. 30, 39.)

One single word of the Lord does Matthew set within the margin of a wonderful narrative,* which, amid all the wonders to which we have been accustomed, stands alone and distinct in its kind. Thus much is by it clearly designed to be taught, that this Jesus who commanded the wind and the sea to be still, rules also in his unapproachable dignity over the devils, to whom his ὑπάγετε, "depart!" mighty in its tranquility, points the way of departure, and permits them to go; just as in ver. 16 it had been already said in general that he cast out spirits with his word. There is a simple grandeur in the account of Matthew, who brings forward no part of the circumstance which is not absolutely necessary for its right understanding. To the other three Evangelists there remain the individual and more exact details, and three other words of our Lord in connection with them.* The records agree perfectly in all essential points, and particularly concur in placing the incident immediately after the stilling of the sea.

* The geographical investigations about Gadara, Gerasa, Gergesa, we gladly hand over to the learned.

* But it is no part of this greater exactitude, that they speak only of one possessed. We cannot agree, either with Olshausen who says, generally, that Matthew has confounded the accounts; or with Ebrard, who regards the second as taken from Mark i. 23–27, and connected with the first. We adhere to the simple conclusion, that according to Matthew there were two, while Mark and Luke, without denying that, speak more especially of one. We have only to add that the one might very naturally be prominent throughout the whole proceeding. He who would investigate further, forgets in subordinate and useless questions, the main point. Schleiermacher repudiates the second as false, because madmen never affect such close friendship and fellowship, but there are answers enough to that observation.

That truth, which had only been testified in Matthew's Gospel by the Father from heaven (ch. iii. 17), and which Satan had in vain endeavored to assail, viz., that this Jesus, the Virgin's son Immanuel, is truly the Son of God, —the devils have since understood, earlier and better than men. But while they know it they tremble before him! Mark, ch. i., has already announced similar testimonies of the spirits in the possessed. We understand, with all our science, so little of the natural history of hell, and of that interference of its spiritual powers with the affairs of human life which is ever being exerted, but was specially intense in our Saviour's time, that it might well be accounted the most infatuated of all imaginable folly to hazard the rash assertions of our ignorance against the plain declarations of Holy Writ, which have their thousandfold confirmation in our consciences, in history, and in religious science. These Gadarenes or Gergesenes disclose to us a dark and awful province of humanity, as lying under the ravages of the devil, the counterpart of which, at least in moral life, if not in such horrible manifestations of bodily possession, may be found in Christendom to the present day—to say nothing of its full analogies in heathenism. But over this region also Jesus rules, the Son of God! To believe and to understand this, is the main concern, and we would not bury or obscure this fundamental truth by any irrelevant discussions.

Matthew's expression, ver. 29, gives us at first to understand that the possessed called out upon Jesus, but it is afterwards made plain that the devils, ver. 31, spoke through their mouth, especially that of the one. The incident is made more vivid by the additional information of the two other Evangelists, that the men, in their frenzy, rushed towards the Lord, as they did towards all who were in the way, but that in his near presence there came a change upon them suddenly. The one devil who unites together many in them, perceives the great Ruler and Judge; hence the falling down before him, and the cry of horror against him who is come to torment them, who has power to bid them go away into their abyss. And how came this? For (thus both Evangelists add in explanation) he had commanded the unclean spirit to come out of the man, had uttered a word which arrested the mad attack upon him: Come out of the man, thou unclean spirit! I am he who can utter this command, who am come first of all to deliver men from the power of Satan. Unclean spirit—this was the ordinary phrase, used by the Lord because it has in his use a profoundly true significance. Did he address in these words the ruler of the host "Legion?" He was in his humiliation by no means omniscient, but, unless in cases when the Father gave him special and instant revelation, subjected to the successive perceptions of observation, like humanity in general. He appears here to have seen in effect at the beginning only an ordinary instance of demoniacal possession. But his first—*Come out of the man! not indeed impotent, rather efficient to bring down the spirits to entreaty, was not instantly obeyed, as we often read, e.g. in Mark i. 26, ix. 26. Then does the Lord discern a possession of an aggravated kind (Matt. xvii. 21), and maintaining the sublimest composure in the midst of the raging fury of the demons, condescends as his king and judge to the being thus brought, as it were, before his tribunal; and enters into a most marvellous and mysterious colloquy with the unclean spirit.

What is thy name? (Mark τί σοι ὄνομα; Luke τί σοί ἐστι ὄνομα.) It is marvellous and quite peculiar (the only instance recorded), that the Lord should ask the unclean spirit concerning his distinctive name. For that this spirit is intended, and not the man of whom he had taken possession, is most decidedly shown in the context, according to the other two Evangelists. It has been well urged, that a question which would have been otherwise quite inappropriate and unmeaning, might in this case be regarded as quite useful, inasmuch as it would help to bring the confused madman to sober recollection. But the frenzy of possession is not to be treated thus, and we perceive at once that the conversation is not opened up between the man and Jesus, but between the devil who usurps the man's mouth,† and his Lord and Judge who commands him to stand and render account. That the devils as spirits are individual persons, and that gradations and kinds obtain among them, we already know; and can understand the object of our Lord's real question: What devil art thou? The name which he may have uttered, was indeed only intelligible to Jesus; for what we find in the Talmud or in any other books of ancient or modern times concerning

* By no means, as Neander thinks, a mere remark of a subsequent compiler, in order to find a motive for the words of the demons. Worse still, we find Schleiermacher deeming it incomprehensible "that the spirits are so considerate and thoughtful for themselves, and like children who have no inclination to obey, make their proposals and subterfuges"—and therefore holding that the παρήγγειλε γάρ, for he had commanded, is an incorrect addition. That the devils, indeed, have no wish instantly to obey, is their very nature—and in that they are actually worse than mere headstrong and obstinate children, who are full of cunning reasonings.

† Not however as if the notions and manner of speech of the possessed man were mingled with those of the possessing subject. This has been discovered in Mark's "adjuring by God," but incorrectly. For Dr. Bauer's question: "When was the devil so devout as to take the name of God into his mouth?" is answered most pointedly and well by Ebrard, when he writes "die Posaune des jungsten Gerichts gegen Hegel!" Von Gerlach observes generally that the "manifold abuse of the name of God among wicked men, shows how false the ideas of former times were, which conceived that the devil could not utter it."

the names of fiends, may be regarded as containing a little truth mingled with much fable. But expositors should be content to stand apart while the Son of God speaks to a being out of hell; well assured, however, that they perfectly understood each other. The malicious spirit, we further mark, made bold by the unlooked for condescension, evades the proper meaning of the question, and gives an answer which is in the genuine devilish manner, by a name which is only a disguise, and says proudly, impudently, and half-mockingly, as though a prisoner on defence—My name is Legion, for we are many. All this Matthew passes over, and hastens on to the request of the devils founded upon it, for permission to enter into the swine. This is the turning point of the whole narrative. The Lord who has not hitherto exhibited to us merely "a kind disposition to enter into the disordered fantasies of a maniac" (Weiss), nor his wisdom in the gentle, gradual, accommodating treatment of a sick man (as, alas! most of even orthodox expositors, down to Lange and Braune, would have us believe), but who has shown us, in this the first direct and violent incursion of hell upon him, the sublime tranquility of the Son of God in the Son of Man—knows at this critical moment, by the full revelation of the Father shining through his spirit, what the whole occasion is, and what it becomes him in this conjuncture to do. The trial and hearing are broken off abruptly, the request even of the devil is granted, and soundness is imparted to the men through the majestic and decisive decree—Go! Here the whole narrative finds its consummation, and just at the point where Jesus is revealed as their absolute Ruler and Lord, our curiosity concerning the mysteries of the devil's kingdom and subjects is left ungratified, and forever silenced. Whether there lay in the request merely the appetency for the unclean,* with a superadded disposition to destroy, or whether it was a malicious scheme to bring the Lord into evil repute through the death of the swine—sublime over all rises his calm, sovereign word of permission—Go! What calm supremacy, what mysterious depth is there in this one word! Latent within it is an answer to the question before put, ver. 29—It is not yet time for your final judgment. How much is there intimated yet not spoken, and which we dare not trust ourselves to penetrate, concerning the influence of unclean spirits even upon animal life, the only example† of which in Biblical history here meets us.* We do not read that the man or the men rushed upon the two thousand swine, to drive them into the sea; it is only said that the devils went out, and entered into the swine. Even Neander here recognizes the improbability and inappropriateness of the demoniac's being let loose upon the swine—although he then ventures to suppose, in explanation of this "obscure point" of the narrative, that the entering of the spirits into the swine has been inferred from their rushing down into the sea, and that the permission of Christ, as it is recorded here, has been fabricated in consequence. We altogether protest against such dealing with the Scripture. Braune ventures his doubtful remark, that the swine were seized with this madness from some "altogether undefined, and unknown cause," but we must read it as we find it—it was the simple result of the devils entering into them. Not indeed, only to possess them, but to destroy them, that going out of the men they may yet accomplish some work of destruction. The whole record shows that this was the sole object of their request. Nor were they in any special sense "stupid devils"—as Dr. Paulus ironically solves the mystery of their so soon forfeiting the transitional bodily homes which they had just obtained: they were more cunning than this Paulus!

But now come forward the silly expositors, orthodox and hetrodox of every shade, and think they have a right to ask, whether the Lord Jesus could have spoken this—Go! Many fly from this narrative, as if the spirits had entered into them, and driven them into the sea of unbelief; they enter upon all kinds of uncalled for apologies for the swine and their owners, forgetting, or seeming to forget, what the apologies of ages have testified on behalf of Jesus. Others, with better views, adduce many ingenious reasons for the act: as that the Lord would hereby give the most convincing evidence of the entire dependence of all spirits upon his word; and with this to give palpable assurance to all Sadducees of the existence of such spirits; so also to punish the probably Jewish owners of these swine (which we cannot think of);† further, to test the Gadarenes, how they would receive the des-

* "The ancient affinity between the serpent and swine, the union of which is exhibited in the dragon, the affinity of the demon nature for swine," as Lange labors to express his idea. The mere "inclination to the external, towards flesh, or towards a bodily dwelling" (Von Gerlach), does not seem precisely to explain the desire to enter the swine in particular.

† The inhabitants of the destroyed Babylon in the prophetic description might have been made to illustrate this, where animals and devils are in mysterious fellowship: Isa. xiii. 21, 22, xxxiv. 11–15; Bar. iv. 35; Rev. xviii. 2.

* Even the English Trench (Notes on the Miracles) refers us to the Tellurismus of our Kieser, and Passavant's Unters. über das Hellsehen, for the susceptibility of animals, to demoniac influence. Alford's subtle observation goes to shew that the same animal soul, which man has in common with animals, and through which the demon exerts influence upon him, may undergo the same influence in them.

† Sepp (ii. 393 seq.) gives us some interesting and learned notices of the Jewish greediness of gain which was shown in the breeding of swine, and the employment of Gentile laborers therein, for traffic among the Gentiles.

truction of their property; finally, to teach the value of the spirit of man, his healing being well worth some two thousand swine; or what else has ever been suggested. We have no need whatever of any of these remarks, true or otherwise, concerning this sublime transaction, the σκάνδαλον, or stumbling-block of which all three Evangelists have ruthlessly placed right in the centre of their several accounts; for we fix our eyes upon the plain fact, that the deed itself is its own justification. They did not then sue our Lord for any loss they suffered in the destruction of the swine; no more will we—we will not indeed dare to speak boldly concerning it. The question, why our Lord permitted the devils to enter the swine, is already answered by another question—Why had the Lord permitted them to enter the men?

But far more fearful than the hearing of this request of the devils, is the Lord's granting to the Gergesenes their supplication. (They dare not, however, cast any reproach on him concerning the swine.) He who does not desire him, as he is and as he acts, the Ruler of hell, the Lord of nature, the Physician and Healer of men, may beseech him to depart, whether courteously, or ungraciously, and have his request granted. Yet is his departure softened by the word which, according to both Mark and Luke, he uttered to the men who were healed. It is not now, as sometimes, when it was forbidden to make it known; here upon the very outskirts of the Jewish land there was no danger to be obviated. The poor people of the Decapolis shall have, though against their will, a testimony and living monument of his power—one who had lived among themselves. Not indeed to publish abroad every where (as he actually did) is the healed man sent back, with his brother not mentioned; but the command is—Go home to thine house, (ὑπόστρεφε,) to thy people, from whom thou hast been so long estranged! Not indeed with a prudent care against relapse, and in order to his full recovery, which would be prevented by his being alone: for he wished to go with Jesus, and the devils were clean gone from him.* But this springs from the gentle graciousness of our Lord, which desires the return home of this man, thus restored to his family. It is in accordance with this universal ordinance that the ἀναγγέλλειν and the διηγεῖσθαι, the "telling," should take its beginning from the social circle, and sound out from the home. It evinces also his constant humility, for he here speaks of his great miracle as what the Lord† hath done for thee. Mark adds, "and hath had compassion on thee." The miracles of Jesus are ever God's acts of compassion towards men. This is one such instance, standing alone in its kind, and takes its place among the rest, with a word at its close which contains an exhortation that applies to this day to all who have received God's compassion in Christ.

THE PARALYTIC AND THE SCRIBES.

(Matt. ix. 2, 4–6; Mark ii. 5, 8–11; Luke v. 20, 22–24.)

The chronological order of this occurrence is not to be obtained with full certainty from the separate accounts: Mark's δι' ἡμερῶν, after some days, and Luke's ἐν μιᾷ τῶν ἡμερῶν, on a certain day, however, allow latitude enough to permit our following Matthew—as is always the most obvious and natural—and to view his καὶ ἰδού, and behold, as immediately hanging upon his preceding narrative. The three Evangelists entirely agree in the matter itself, although the accounts of the two others are more detailed and vivid. The words of the Lord Jesus are repeated by them all in nearly the same terms. We read, first of all, in all three, that Jesus saw their faith (ἰδὼν). It is generally, but very improperly, supposed to be that of the bearers, and of him who is borne—as it were "the united believing efforts of the sick man and his friends." For not only is the latter distinguished from the former in the passage itself, but it was obviously the faith of those who brought him to the healing power of the the Lord that made itself so manifest in the painstaking and zealous means which they adopted;* and finally, the Lord's word to the sick man, unlooked for and striking as it was, finds its explanation in this, that he saw in him a state of mind and feeling different from theirs, aiming at an object distinct from that of the bearers, who only sought for his bodily healing. It may be understood, therefore, as a paradox and by way of opposition—although he perceived their believing desire, he did not immediately gratify it, but spoke first a word quite different from what they had desired:

* Schleiermacher would explain "the uncommon and almost tumultuous excitement about a home-born (?) sick man, whose case would have been no worse for delay," by a festival near at hand. But how much else is to be thought and said about that!

* As it regards the "inner and moral healing," the remaining with Jesus would have been the most effectual guarantee, as Von Gerlach remarks, in defence of the immediate bodily healing.

† This, and ch. xiii. 20, both in Mark, are the only places in which Jesus speaks of God, his Father, as κύριος, or Lord—supposing that he is literally exact, (for Matt. xi. 25 has not κύριε, absolutely.) The demoniac was not "probably a heathen" (as Braune thinks), in which case κύριος would have been to him just Jehovah, the God of Israel. The sayings are altogether Jewish in their structure.

or, it may be regarded as giving a profoundly significant reason—when he perceived that their strong faith would well bear the test of delay. In any case the key-note of the narrative is this, that he acted in a manner unexpected; but the secret reason of our Lord's dealing is left unconcealed in the narrative, even as it first revealed itself in the transaction in the concluding reference. The Lord perceived in the soul of the paralytic a sentiment more akin to despair than to faith, rather a doubt whether his healing would correspond with his friends' confidence; for he was greatly troubled on account of his sins, which probably had a particular connection with his sickness. This penitent state of mind, on the one hand, was more than the confidence of the others, which had reference to bodily healing; and the Lord, rejoicing more over his penitence than their faith, does not fail first of all and immediately to invigorate the troubled spirit with the best consolation. On the other hand, although their faith might have availed for the healing of the man, the Lord prefers to excite within his own heart the spirit of faith, that so he might come to experience a greater healing than would have been imparted through the faith of others. When preachers on the eighteenth Sunday after Trinity lay down faith as a pre-supposed condition for the forgiveness of sins, they forget, in their dogmatizing, that the encouraging word must be uttered first, which then faith lays hold of and appropriates.

A gracious and most affectionate word of consolation to the dejected man precedes the utterance of the great and express word of absolution. Luke has only retained the ἄνθρωπε, Man! which marks an address to the person himself; and that only in general terms, while the other two Evangelists mention more exactly and literally τέκνον, Son! which is more affectionate even than θύγατερ, Daughter! (Matt., ver. 22), and the same word which our Lord afterwards used in addressing his disciples. Matthew only adds θάρσει, Be of good courage! and we feel it to be quite natural that the Lord should utter just such a word; while the other two Evangelists, presupposing that, give only in full prominence the assurance of the forgiveness of sins.

We might now go on to exhibit and expound the testimony given in this narrative, so as to bring out its reference to that which is of the highest moment, of infinitely greater importance than bodily help. We might make some remarks upon the interval, however short, which the Lord permits in this case between the taking away of the guilt of sin, and the removal of its punishment; and show that in the counsels and plans of the Most High, many must be contented with hearing the first essential word of grace, Thy sins be forgiven thee! while they must still continue to lie on the beds on which those sins have laid them. This, however, must be guarded, by bearing in mind, that when forgiveness is received, the punishment is in reality taken away; what remains of suffering is no more punishment. All this instruction, however, lies in the matter of the narrative itself; it was scarcely the Lord's conscious design to express all this himself, or to give any testimony directly on these subjects. It was so natural to him to greet a penitent sinner with his immediate θάρσει, Be of good courage! it was so great and so rare a joy to his own heart, that in the sublime simplicity of his full authority, he uttered the words which we find, without any oblique or subordinate reference in them whatever.

But since no prophet, no son of man had ever, with power and confidence like this, spoken to men this word of absolute consolation, astonishment and prejudice are excited against the divine voice of his authority, and this its authoritative utterance; not among those who brought the sick man, but among the Scribes and Pharisees, who, though they were not now gathered together as a "first inquisitorial assembly" (according to Sepp's fancy), yet occupy there their seats of pre-eminence, and now take occasion to vent upon the Lord the enmity of which their hearts were already full. They might have used opposite language, and said: Such a word of spiritual consolation is very easily uttered; he only feeds thus the sick man's confidence, but he can do no more! But they give it a far more malicious turn, and say that he blasphemeth. Christ has not said: I forgive thee thy sins; but his simple word contained this latent within it, and their spirit of opposition did not engender in them an incorrect suspicion; they rightly understood his meaning. They do not say it, but they think it, every one regarding his neighbor with looks which said, as Matthew tells us—οὗτος βλασφημεῖ, This man blasphemeth! The others filled up what they intended, by adding the obvious position—Who can forgive sins but God only? a perfectly true proposition in itself; and the inference from it, that "he who assumes this power, being no more than man, blasphemes," was more correctly deduced by these Scribes in the reasoning of their hearts, than by the rationalists of our time, who leave the Son of Man all his full honors as Son of Man, but are not so scrupulous about his claims of divine power and authority. The Lord saw the reasonings of the Scribes,* just as he had seen the faith of the bearers, and the penitence of him whom they bore; for in relation to his spirit, the penetration through the conduct or countenance to the internal heart of man was one and the same with his knowledge of that which was in man, as man's great Archetype and Head. It was not with the omniscience of God that he pierced the thoughts of all men's hearts, though nothing could remain concealed from him, and nothing could deceive him, when his spirit in the Spirit of God entered into relation with man. And thus he here exhibits himself, first as the Possessor of all grace for the penitent sinner, and then immediately as the Searcher of hearts and Judge, for the proud and reprobate and self-blinded.

* Whether we read this second time εἰδὼς or ἰδὼν in Matthew, does not affect the case, for compare ch. xii. 25. Luke has ἐπιγνούς, and Mark in the most express and pregnant words has ἐπιγνοὺς τῷ πνεύματι αὐτοῦ.

He most impressively lays bare the secret language and murmuring of their hearts, by a piercing question which referred the origin of their thinking to their evil heart.* Mark has only ταῦτα, these things, expressed, Luke still briefer, only τί, what, but Matthew is here as before more precise; as is seen in the conscience-stirring ἱνατί, wherefore, as well as in the addition of πονηρά, evil. This latter would probably refer the Scribes to Zech. viii. 17 (although the Sept. does not accord). Their application of these remarks to the person of our Lord was as wicked as their conclusion in thesi was sound; so that we may regard them rather as having blasphemed in charging him with blasphemy. For first of all, they exhibit no sense and feeling for his gracious consolation of a dejected sinner, which every right-minded person would in its first impression have sympathized with and understood. Then there is the malicious, unprincipled, wilful pre-supposition that Jesus is no more than any other man, which stands in direct contradiction to the emphatic and distinctive words of his consolation, and which those very words, addressed in supreme dignity to the paralytic, were quite sufficient to have confuted. Yet the Lord does not leave them to their folly, as they had deserved. He would, in any case, have effected the healing, but it is for their sakes also that he utters the other word of authority which all are waiting for and desiring. To put their perverted reasonings, however, to shame, and profit them, he puts an enigmatical question concerning the relation of the two words which he has spoken. It is a light thing to him to cast down all the folly and wickedness which exalts itself against his acts; but he condescends to their weakness, in that divine wisdom which knows how to accommodate its teaching to the folly of men. He enters more deeply into those thoughts of theirs, which he has just condemned in their wickedness. Are ye not now thinking that it is easier to say (with baseless assumption, without authority and without effect), Thy sins be forgiven thee! than to say (what would immediately convict itself of impotence), Rise up and walk! This is manifestly the immediate conecting meaning, with which the Lord condescends to their imaginings. He does not directly express himself thus, but leaving the question indefinite and in suspense, intimates that the answer should be very different from what he pre-supposes in them. In effect, the converse is to be understood in his question—Many have performed miracles of healing, prophets and apostles, as well as false wonder-workers, but to forgive sins with the authority of God is greater, nay the greatest of all. Or to apprehend it in another way—To God in heaven, and his representative on earth who is now speaking and acting, both are one and the same: the forgiveness of sins is not consummated without the certain, though subsequent, removal of all their punishment; and the bestowment of health is not truly making whole without its accompanying and essentially blended communication of forgiving grace. However we take it, there is much to be pondered in the question of our Lord, and a very different answer to be found than that which was pre-supposed in the general thoughts of men. He intimates this himself in this enigmatical and sacredly ironical manner, before he proceeds, in accommodation to their foolish thoughts, to give the evidence they need.

We have here, consequently, in a particular example, a general explanation of the significance of the external miracles of Jesus. The immediate self-evidencing clearnesss and truth of his word, spoken in the power of his spirit, should, in strict propriety, have required no further evidence. When a soul like Nathanael's heard from his own holy lips, I came forth from the Father! or a sinner truly poor in spirit heard his great invitation, Come unto me all who are heavy laden! such souls needed no further evidence, before they would believe and follow him. The paralytic, who embraced with a ready heart the first word of comfort, did not put the doubtful question—By what authority dost thou thus assure me? heal my frame, that I may believe in thee! And so all Israel would have needed no more than to hear—I am come to bring you grace! if all Israel had been found in true repentance. But the less must become evidence for the greater, to their hardness and folly of heart, although by an inferential reasoning which has not always and to all, absolute validity; for the word of the Holy One, which testifies the forgiveness of sins, is just as much a proof of the divinity of his miracles, as these again are the authentication of the truth of his word. By this we may understand the only sense in which the Lord might say—But that ye may know, or perceive, that not without power and authority to do so, I forgive sins! To the sick man, on the present occasion, such evidence was not necessary; he was already comforted, and thought less than before of the he healing of his body. Let preachers upon this text beware, also, of a perilous hysteron proteron into which a false spirit of allegorizing has led many; as if the words, rise up and walk! were spoken first to the soul (renewing unto holiness), and were an evidence to it of justification. That would be to reverse the evangelical order of grace, since in a spiritual sense the rising up and walking can only result from an appropriated forgiveness. It is not so much for the paralytic as for the others that the act for healing follows ; this is as evidently declared in the whole narrative, as it is that forgiveness of sins is essentially the greater thing, and sufficient for itself. Let it be further observed, how meekly the Lord veils his divine majesty, even while he must testify and assert it. The fully developed answer to their evil thoughts might have been—That ye may know that I do not as man invade the prerogative of God, but as the Son, one with the Father, forgive sins in my own divine right and dignity. He says not this, that he may not cast a stumbling block in their way ; just as throughout his whole testimony he ever kept back the simple declaration—I am God ! in order to avoid the provocation of unbelief. (Let John v. 17, etc., x. 33–36 be noted, for example.) He calls himself, also, here the Son of Man, while he appropriates a prerogative of God, and the Son of Man upon earth, which was equivalent to saying, the fully authorized representative of God in heaven.* Quite correctly Bengel remarks : This language argues his celestial origin. It is not admissible to construe here ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς, upon earth, with the following ἀφιέναι ἁμαρτίας, to forgive sins (as at Matt. xviii 18 in a lower degree) ; although certainly (as Richter says) the earth is essensially the proper place where he does forgive sins. And now he turns in the concluding sentence from the Scribes to the paralytic, lets the immediate word of his power speak in act, and utters, without further preface, the command which he had prepared them for—Stand up and walk ! In this change of his word without drawing the conclusion, there is a sublime breviloquence ; the Lord does not first say : I will then speak what ye require—but he speaks it ! This is proved by the σοὶ λέγω, I say unto thee, of Mark and Luke, in which (as Alford fails not to observe) the emphasis lies on the σοί, to thee. To connect with this the λέγει, in Mark, as being part of the Lord's own words, is he saith, an unskillful forcing of his language and meaning (" That ye may know that the Son of Man hath power, he saith now in your presence to this paralytic, I say unto thee !"). Besides which, this construction is not admitted by εἶπε, he said, in Luke, nor by τότε λέγει, then saith he, in Matthew, which is an insertion of the Evangelist, as we infer by the use of the same narrative λέγει, he saith, afterwards in ver. 9.

* "A proof, how far unenlightened reason may lead us, when childlike simplicity of heart is wanting!" (Von Gerlach.) In this sense, the emphasis in Luke has been laid with ironical meaning: 'and they began to reason."

It is immediately obvious in this as in all similar instances, that the taking up of the bed, and going to the house, was designed as convincing evidence of perfect soundness instantaneously imparted. What the Lord bestows, he bestows with full hand and in unrestricted measure : when he condescends to attest his power in the sight of man, he will have it worthily esteemed and magnified ; and more worthily by us who believingly read than by the astonished people of that time, who in all probability when they glorified ἐξουσίαν τοιαύτην, such power, in his hands, rested upon the lesser instead of the greater manifestation of power. But the Lord restored soundness to the paralytic man, in order that we might apprehend him as one who could also say to us—Thy sins be forgiven ! This word may neither be criticized nor wondered at, but experienced.

THE PHYSICIAN FOR THE SICK.

(Matt. ix. 9, 12, 13 ; Mark ii. 14–17 ; Luke v. 37, 31, 32.)

This is another example how various is the meaning which we should attribute to our Lord's Follow thou me ! according to the development of circumstances. In Luke vi. we find that Matthew had been, suddenly to himself, chosen into the number of the Twelve before the Sermon on the Mount. It does not follow because he himself relates his final call from his secular office two chapters after the Sermon, that therefore that final call must have occurred later ; but a comparison of the Evangelists indisputably proves it, since otherwise the parables of ch. xiii. must also have occurred before the Sermon on the Mount, which is not to be supposed.† Matthew appears to have returned more or less to the business of his office, just as Peter had returned to his nets ; and the Lord, who in his wisdom regulated all things according to their respective conditions, allowed this to be so ; until the critical moment came when he saw fit to repeat that first call, strengthening it into an unqualified command to follow him permanently. The very artless manner in which Matthew records this final summons, omitting the former choice of him altogether (in which the two other Evangelists follow him, according to the established tradition), proceeded on the one hand from a most amiable modesty, on the other from a deep consciousness in his own memory that it was the last " Follow me !" which came to him at the critical moment of release from all. We, however, deny that his conversion had been, as Sepp says, the work of a moment. We hold against Ebrard with the profound Bengel, whose harmony is not to be lightly and superficially rejected. (See his § 55. " Peter and Andrew,

* Neander : " God forgives the sins in heaven, but Christ as man, announces to the sinners the divine forgiveness. Son of Man and on earth are correlative ideas." This is at the same time directed against the Pharisaic-catholic doctrine, that there must ever remain uncertainty among men concerning God's forgiveness in heaven.

† [This supposition by no means follows; nor, if it did, would it be so improbable as the author's— that Matthew was chosen an apostle before he was called as a disciple.—Am. Ed.]

James and John, had been followers before they became apostles; Matthew is called to be an apostle, before he has become a daily follower of Christ.")

But, without any argument, such an apparently sudden summons from office and function pre-supposes some previous acquaintance and connection. It is no where written that no one of the Twelve left the person of our Lord after having been first called; but the remarkable, and, in its kind, singular procedure in the case of Matthew, affords us much subject of thought, which however here we may not speak of more particularly. His "rising and following him" is not to be understood as if he left every thing as it then was, according to the mere letter of the narrative. It is to be understood that he set everything in order pertaining to his house and office; and the text itself allows us to think that he even made a parting feast for his former companions, at which he might introduce to them his new master and his other fellow-disciples. He only intimates that this occurred in his own house, because that must be mentioned in order to explain the following sayings of the Lord, so memorable to himself. We may doubt whether, as Menken has it, "before long, some Pharisees added themselves to the company," for the Pharisees were not wont thus to mingle, at least unbidden, with the Publicans. We only understand by the ἰδοντες, when they saw, of Matthew (even in connection with Mark's ἐσθιοντα, eating), that they saw it, or became acquainted with it, perhaps, as they departed again, or sometime afterwards. (Luke designates by οἱ γραμματεῖς αὐτῶν, their scribes, the Scribes belonging to the place, where Jesus, always watched closely by this kind of people, participated in such a meal.) They do not venture to address themselves directly to the Lord, just as we saw in the foregoing history. In ch. xii. 2, xv. 2, they do indeed address the Master, but only allege, as against the disciples, what their Master did or approved; here they mockingly attack the disciples on their Master's account. At furthest they only proceed to utter once their murmurings in the third person, as in Luke xv. 2.

The Lord is immediately ready with his answer, to deliver his disciples from their embarrassment, and to inflict salutary shame upon the questioners. His answer and vindication consists, according to Matthew, in three propositions, which indeed are one in their fundamental meaning, but advance in a threefold progression of conviction in their expression. He begins in a popular and gracious style with a well-known proverb, figuratively to set forth a principle, applicable in this case, which they, in their perversion, utterly forgot. He then attaches to this a word of Scripture for the scripturally learned scribes, which neither the wisdom of the market-place, nor the wisdom of the sanctuary, had yet understood and learned. His conclusion gives a most penetrating and direct answer, in an utterance of the Lord himself, concerning himself and the design of his coming, which at once explains the proverb and expounds the Scripture that he had quoted, as fulfilled in himself. Matthew alone gives us the passage of the prophet which mediates between the figurative and direct expression, partly because of its immediate interest as occurring at his repast, and partly because he especially has preserved the reference to the Old Testament Scriptures.

The proverb concerning the physician for the sick, and not for the sound, which occurs as well in the Talmud* as in profane authors, and is of universal use, is given by Luke in the most simple form, with the anthesis of ὑγιαίνοντες, whole, and κακῶς ἔχοντες, sick: the other two Evangelists have the more exact ἰσχύοντες, literally strong, which probably made the contrast still more emphatic, as we should say, the robust, who are of radically and permanently sound constitution; (although, indeed, to be strong and grow strong, is a Scriptural expression for recovery and healing after sickness, as in Isa. xxxix. 1; Ezek. xxxiv. 16.) Apart from the confirmation of the common practice to send the sick to the physician, which lies already in the use of the proverb, its application here has a further two-fold reference. First of all, being spoken to the teachers and spiritual guides of Israel, it puts them to shame as bad physicians, who, although called to strengthen the diseased, and heal the sick (Ezek. xxxiv. 4), yet in their loveless selfishness acted perversely as the physician would act, who should avoid the sick man who needs his help, in order to escape the danger of infection! But then the Lord announces himself as the true Physician for the sickness of the soul, using thus an expression wide and deep in its meaning, which contains at the same time an interpretation of the miracles that he performed on the bodily sick. The Lord speaks here in the sense in which the Evangelist had already given that interpretation by a prophetic passage (ch. viii. 17), and it is for the sake of this that Matthew appends these sayings of our Lord, with their occasion (and its continuation in vers. 14–17), to the record which he had given, in the eighth and ninth chapters, of bodily healing of all kinds. It may indeed be said, with some propriety so far as regards the first of his expressions, that the Lord uses the language of humility, and appears to place himself only in the ranks of physicians in general; yet we cannot but perceive immediately afterwards a more intense and peculiar meaning in the sing. ἰατρου, physician, as spoken by our Lord in the person of him who has come (ver. 13). It is no other than if he had said: I am the Physician, the one and only Physician for the souls of men; just as he had said, I am the good Shepherd, and as he presently afterwards in ver. 15 distinguishes himself as the Bridegroom. These are nothing but names of God and his Christ through the whole prophetic Scripture. Even in Exod. xv. 26 more than merely bodily sickness is intended.

* Talm. Babyl. tit. Bava Kama, fol. 46, col. 2, as Antisthenes in Laertius, Diogenes in Stobæus, Pausanias in Plutarch, Ovid de Ponto.

How wonderful is the union of gracious tenderness and supreme dignity in this as in every other word of the Great Physician who is come into the world; assuring every one, who will receive it, of forgiveness of sins in God's authority, and of the healing of all his iniquities by the Divine power! In uncharitable perversion they criticise and condemn the peculiar exercise of his function; he only and simply answers that this is, nevertheless, his office and work. It is the voice of that compassionate love which brought him from the bosom of the Father, that is heard in the χρείαν ἔχουσιν, have need. It is the gracious view which divine compassion takes, to pass by the idea of guilt and to regard our sin as sickness, which, though it does not deserve yet needs, to be healed—it is thus often represented in the Old Testament; e. g. Jer. iii. 22, and more particular Isa. liii. How deep and grievous our injury is, we learn indeed from this, that God only can repair it, and that only by the wounds of his dear Son. But who are the whole who need no physician? We shall hear in this, with Calvin, an ironica concessio, if we rightly consider the subsequent explanation of our Lord, which goes beyond the mere literal meaning of the proverb, and tells us plainly that the Lord never recognizes upon earth any "righteous" and "sound" but such as think themselves to be so.* This is opened up to us by the quotation from Scripture, to which the Lord refers the scribes with a keenly penetrating hint—Go ye and learn, what that often read, but never yet understood Scripture meaneth. (In the Talmud the Rabbins frequently say to their disciples: צא ולמד, go and learn.)

Let us also go and read the words in their connection in Hosea, in order that we may read and expound them aright—not reading and expounding them, however, as the modern scribes of our day do, who allow the prophets to say no more than what dim-sighted investigation of the present age thinks reconcilable with the history, and the views, and the range of thought in the times of the prophets themselves; and who thus remain at the utmost distance from that one, only exegesis, according to which the spirit of Christ himself who spake by the prophets, expounds and opens to us by the mouth of Jesus and his apostles, his own anticipative word, and bears witness to it as now first fulfilled, and now first accessible in its full and consummate meaning, to our understanding. We cannot penetrate too deeply into the words of the Holy Ghost, specially cannot we hold too firmly by the principle that the quotations and expositions of the Old Testament in the New, give to us the right key for their interpretation.

Misapprehending this, even orthodox expositors have missed the inmost and fundamental meaning of the impressive ἔλεον θέλω, I will have mercy, which the Lord has appropriated out of Jehovah's word to Hosea, at the same time carrying it on to its development, in the person of him who was to come. It is almost universally understood, as Von Meyer's note upon Matthew expresses it: "as a gracious condescension to teach sinners, and not a rigid, external separation of himself from them," thus referring to that mercy and love which man should exercise towards man, according to God's good pleasure. Though this seems at the first glance to suit the connection, yet might we, penetrating deeper, already mark that the Lord, who has proclaimed himself the physician of sick humanity in the power of the grace of God, in the following words refers rather to God in heaven, and must mean the mercy which God exercises towards sinners for their healing and salvation; and in effect, this is the first and only true meaning of the word in the prophecy quoted.

The great theme of the fourteen chapters of Hosea from the beginning to the end, is generally, as in all the prophets, an annunciation of punishment in order to subsequent mercy, a prediction of the dispersion and return of Israel. His whole discourse passes from threatening to promise, and is arranged in four sections, ever strengthening its hold, and widening its view, as it goes on. The second of these sections embraces ch. iv. to ch. vi. After long rebuke and threatening there is a sudden transition in ch. v. 15 to that healing mercy, which will survive the judgments, be prepared for by them, and even effectually work in and through them. That God only, as his people's Physician, can heal them and will, is a fundamental idea which runs through the whole of Hosea's prophecy; and our Lord's citation therefore seizes the central idea of the prophet. The Assyrian could not heal them, nor cure them of their wound, ch. v. 13. When I would have healed Israel, then the iniquity of Ephraim was discovered (ch. vii. 1) —finally I will heal all their backslidings, ch. xiv. 5. But how is this to be effected? They must acknowledge their offence, and seek my face: this they will do, they will in their penitent affliction say—Come, and let us return unto the Lord; for he hath torn and he will heal us; he hath smitten and he will bind us up (ch. v. 15, vi. 1). The spirit of Christ in the prophet here glances forward into the new covenant, the covenant of grace; and in the reference ver. 2, to the third day, after two days, as in its most obvious meaning, the critical time of God's speedy turning from judgment to mercy, we discover a latent typical under-meaning, such as, despite all modern exegesis, the Old Testament abounds in, by which the resurrection of the Redeemer on the third day is foreshadowed.* Then is the future, New-Testament grace further commended and set forth in vers. 3, 4; where, assuredly, חַסְדְּכֶם, your goodness, (comp. Jon. ii. 9 חַסְדָּם, their own mercy,) can mean no other than, the mercy, which I will manifest to you, entirely as מִשְׁפָּטֶיךָ, thy judgments, in ver. 3, signify my judgments against and upon thee. That other interpretation which is generally preferred, and which Von Meyer's note also approves as "the most immediate and obvious," is altogether to our thinking inapplicable here; for the passage from the first to the sixth verse has no tone of rebuke, but is full of promise and encouragement. The coming of the Merciful One to heal and make alive is foretold in ver. 3, as the full preparation of the morning dawn, and as a fructifying rain; and presently afterwards it is testified in ver. 5, that through judgments and after them light should break forth. How then could we suitably interpose a rebuke that "your goodness is as a morning cloud, and as the early dew that goeth away, that is, fleeting and transitory." We must not, therefore, be misled by the passage in ch. xiii. 3, which designedly applies the expression in another meaning, but take the decisive conclusion of ch. xiv. 6 as a strict parallel: I will be as the dew unto Israel! Comp. Mic. v. 6. The only true exposition of ch. vi. 4 is that of Burk, Gnomon in xii. prophetas minores, who says: "Iram comminantem, in quam nonnulli (omnes fere hodie) interpretes hæc verba vertere conati sunt, totus tenor textus et connexio cum antecedentibus et consequentibus plane excludit. Sicut nubes mane, quæ auroræ correspondet, et in quâ radii auroræ eo magis conspicui sunt. מַשְׁכִּים הֹלֵךְ—cito, tempore matutino, summo mane ros venit. Mox ubi efficaciam et virtutem suam terræ communicavit reliquitque, iterum abit videturque evanuisse; revera vero prodesse non posset, nisi abiret, et dum evanuisse videtur, quam maxime adest et in effectibus lætissimis, in pratis virentibus, in herbis celeriter succrescentibus, novo habito indutus, splendide prodit."†

* [So the German original. But it does not appear to represent the author's real meaning.—Am. Ed.]

We have been constrained to discuss all this beforehand, in order to found upon it our protest against the ancient and modern misapprehension of our Lord's citation of the sixth verse. The fifth verse forms the transition from the gracious promises, vers. 1–4, to this all-comprising conclusion of the whole discourse; and indicates the aim and object of the prophetic threatenings, of the word which rebukes and kills, and of the chastising and purifying judgments, to be, that light should break forth upon the people thus humbled and prepared. For, saith the Lord, I desire mercy, to show mercy and not sacrifice. This does not immediately mean—I am well pleased, when ye shew mercy one toward another,* but there is a twofold contrast between God and men. Israel would give to God in sacrifice and offering; this is the leading mistake of the Old Testament, and it is here once more protested against: I will take nothing from you (see Hosea v. 6). I will rather give to you, it is for you before and above all things, first and last, to seek and to find my compassion and my love! This is the true knowledge of the Lord, דַּעַת אֱלֹהִים which ver. 3 had spoken of, and which ch. ii. 19, 20 confirms. Taking this sentence, which forms, as it were, the central point of our Lord's discourses out of Hosea, let us look backwards and forwards through the prophecy, and see how the mercy and compassion of the Lord is testified to be the only source of healing from the beginning to the end. Ch. i. 7, אֲרַחֵם, I will have mercy—ch. ii. 4, רָחָמָה, mercy—ch. ii. 21 (19) וּבְחֶסֶד וּבְרַחֲמִים, and in loving-kindness and in mercies—ch. xi. 9, נִחוּמַי, my repentings—especially the sublime conclusion, ch. xiv. 3–5, which shows that this is the true sacrifice, when sinners confessing their sin seek forgiveness, when the fatherless find mercy of God, and he heals their backsliding.

This then is the first and most essential meaning of the word which the Lord bids the Pharisees study, in order that they might discern the healing mercy of God as now having appeared unto sinners—Your God has ever in the Old Testament testified, as the end and aim of all his revelations to his people and dealings with them, that he alone is the true physician for the healing of his sick people. He will impart mercy, not take sacrifice.† We do not deny, for it is perfectly obvious, that on the foundation of this meaning, a further hortatory application is intended—He who has found mercy, should be merciful, affectionate,

* According to th eScripture—says Paul, 1 Cor. xv. 4. But where shall we find it, save here and in the typical history of Jonah? This latter does not seem to us enough of itself to sustain the emphatically asserted "on the third day."

† Reichel also, from whom I extracted in my commentary on Isaiah, was very vehement for Luther's translation and interpretation. In an unprinted manuscript upon the twelve minor prophets, which I have looked through, he complains much of the damaging and disfiguring perversion of this passage into a threatening sense.

* As the Chald. בְּעוֹבְדֵי חִסְדָּא, by deeds of mercy, —and the Rabbins who indeed think directly of their עֲשׂוֹת מִשְׁפָּט וּצְדָקָה, works of judgment and righteousness.

† Lange, whose opposition cannot lead us astray, says himself "that God only rejects sacrifice, when it is offered to him in contradistinction to mercy, and quite correctly, scilicet the mercy of God, that alone is the true and deep contrast here. [The author's labored interpretation of "mercy" or "goodness" in Hos. vi. 4, 6, as being that shown by God, is opposed to the obvious import of the passage, and especially to the parallelism with "the knowledge of God" in ver. 6. The sacred writer evidently means piety, and Stier's exegesis is only correct in recognizing God as the ultimate source of this.—Am. Ed.]

and full of kindness towards sinners. Hosea himself speaks, ch. iv. i. and xii. 7, of חֶסֶד, mercy, among men, just as Mic. vi. 8, and Zec. vii. 9. But in this fundamental passage he discloses the foundation of the divine compassion, which must and will itself prepare the sacrifice which is well pleasing to him, that is the living sacrifice. Unless we err, the apostle in Rom. xii. 1 makes allusion to this same passage of the prophet, as would appear from the conjunction of his three fundamental ideas: the mercies of God, the sacrifice offered, and acceptable to God.

And now observe, further, how profoundly and sublimely the Lord, continuing his words with γάρ, connects them with the words of God in Hosea! I have had pleasure in showing mercy, saith God—I am come to call sinners, saith the Son of God, in whom the God of Israel comes and manifests himself as the promised dawn of righteousness and grace. As Jesus had, in the previous healing of the paralytic, called himself the Son of Man, while assuming to himself a prerogative of God; so now he directly speaks in the person and name of God when his human action, which is also divine, is measured by a false standard and judged by man. He now gives full utterance, having prepared the way by the quotation from Scripture, to his interpretation of the previous proverb; but his interpretation and application of it must go beyond its ordinary meaning. The proverb pre-supposes some who are whole, who need no physician, but now the great physician who is come, the revealed God of Israel, who will heal all sin and backsliding, finds none but the sick or sinners, none who are whole or righteous. Therefore the article is now omitted which had been prefixed to ἰσχύοντες, whole, and κακῶς ἔχοντες, sick, and this has a critical significance. The Lord knows no class of men, whom he might term τοὺς δικαίους, "the righteous," whom he is not come to call. That great "I am come!" which he so often repeats, thereby indeed testifying himself to be the Messiah, has its application for all. His calling, which sounds forth to all, regards all as sinners, not as righteous. If they had not needed such a physician, he would not have come at all! This is the final and full answer to the question of ver. 11, in words which correspond to it—It is for sinners that I am here!

Yet does this simple expression, which knows nothing of the righteous, assume, when connected with the preceding proverb, a severe tone of irony against the proud, who think themselves sound, just as in Luke xv. 7, there are righteous referred to, who think they need no repentance, but there is no joy, but sorrow rather in heaven over them. That he speaks of a righteousness of the Pharisees, which availed before him, no rational person will admit. But because they perceive not and feel not themselves to be sinners, in this particular sense not needing the physician, not κακῶς ἔχοντες, or sick, the gracious Physician can only say to them, in his angry sorrow—For you, such as you are, it is as if I had not come at all, for ye receive me not, although I call you too as sinners—ye are not such, ye are the strong and the righteous! And in the very fact of uttering this in their presence, he does nevertheless call them, and they might have known it. It is as much as if he had said—ἦλθον καλέσαι πάντας (εἰς ἔλεον, εἰς μετάνοιαν), οὐχ ὡς δικαίους ἀλλ' ὡς ἁμαρτωλούς, I came to call all (to mercy, to repentance), not as righteous, but as sinners.

The question whether εἰς μετάνοιαν, to repentance, is the right reading in Matthew and Mark, as well as in Luke, does not affect the case; for on any supposition Luke has rightly completed what must be included in the full meaning of the καλέσαι, call. To what does the Lord call sinners but to mercy, and how can this be obtained but in the way of conversion from sin to God, that is of repentance? We should regard it as more probable that the Lord's words were uttered as we find them in Luke. He thus manifestly referred to the preaching of John the Baptist, continued as it was by himself, whose cry, Repent ye! went forth to all without exception.

Jesus does not merely eat with publicans and sinners, he sanctifies this eating and commerce, as he sanctifies his whole life and work, by the testimony and call which pervades it. And not only so; his graciously condescending, never-repelling fellowship with them, is itself a call, and an invitation and an attraction most powerful.

ANSWER CONCERNING FASTING.

(Matt. ix. 15–17; Mark ii. 19–22; Luke v. 35–39.)

Matthew's τοτε προσέρχονται, then came, which will not admit of a relation of anything past, indicates a close connection between this and the preceding discourse. The conversation with the disciples of John must certainly be conceived of as having first taken place after the answer given to the Pharisees; and, consequently, the chronology indicated in Mark v. 21, must not be so far pressed, as to leave no room for all that Matthew relates as having transpired before the request of Jairus. Mark, who has related these circumstances earlier, places the discourse concerning fasting immediately after that concerning eating and drinking, though with but slight bond of connection; Luke, however, connects the one directly with the other, as if the subsequent objection had been urged by the same circle surrounding the Lord, from which the previous one had sprung (οἱ δὲ εἶπον πρὸς αὐτόν). It seems nearly certain from the whole, that the two conversations, closely related in their matter, should be placed, according to Matthew's τότε, then, not merely in relation as facts but in strict chronological conjunction; with which it will accord, if we perceive in the second discourse a reference to the former, which was still in our Saviour's thoughts.

The disciples of John, too, who now came, according to Matthew, to our Lord (that is, certain of them, whom the article in Mark indicates as representatives of their kind), present themselves to our Lord and his disciples, with their objections and scruples, just as the Pharisees had already done. For even they stand in part, if not for the most part, on that footing of the old, which will not comprehend the new as revealed in Christ. This is the general fundamental idea, which our Lord's discourse makes prominent. They themselves, with great simplicity, indicate this their position—*We and the Pharisees. Whether they were incited to bring forward their objection by the Pharisees, may be left to conjecture; we may very well suppose the impulse to have sprung from within themselves, without any such external stimulant. We are very far from saying, with Schleiermacher, that "such a question from John's disciples themselves would have savored of simplicity"—many as wise as he, might in their case, have shown only the same wisdom. We fast so oft (Matt. πολλά, Luke πυκνά, καὶ δεήσεις ποιοῦνται) does not mean that they thought it too much, and would rather have it lightened like the disciples of Jesus; it is rather the proud zeal of their righteousness which expresses itself thus, upon which they value themselves. Thy disciples fast not: a slightly ironical, euphemistic expression for eating and drinking as Luke has it, which is now made objectionable in itself, as before it had been objected to for being in company with publicans and sinners—almost in the spirit of sympathy with the invidious meaning of Matt. xi. 19.†

We have then to do here with the contrast of that distinctively and entirely new thing which the Lord brings in as exhibited in himself and his disciples, with the entirely old, to which Pharisaic Judaism adhered, as well as with that intermediate position of John's disciples, which, vibrating between the old and the new, had rather a preponderance of the old element. We have it clearly recorded, how the Lord openly and decidedly opposed himself to both.* If this collision is confined to the special point of fasting, all who were susceptible of faith might have perceived in his words a token that the Messiah was come; for it was the Jewish teaching, as we find in Maimonides, that "all fasting should cease in the days of the Messiah, and that there should be then only holidays and festivals, as it is written in Zech. viii. 19." Resting on this, our Lord utters in his first response the great contrast openly and decisively expressed; thus proclaiming himself as the giver of joy now come, and present among his disciples, and designating the period of his presence among them as the marriage time. He had already declared himself to be the Physician, and this gives additional emphasis to a second title: I am also the Bridegroom! But the weighty significance of this Messiah-name, pointing as it does by the definite article to the prophecy and its fulfillment, would be altogether weakened if we should limit that article to its mere use in the figure, instead of deriving the figure itself from the prophetic name; and interpret it as only meaning—So long as the bridegroom is with them—that is, he who is, as it were, a bridegroom to them, as being the source of their joy. It is incontrovertibly obvious that the Lord here refers the disciples of John to the testimony of their own master, as we find in John iii. 28, 29.† In that passage ὁ Χριστός, and νυμφίος, Bridegroom, are strictly parallel. There the Baptist named himself the friend of the Bridegroom, paranymph, παράνυμφος or παρανυμφίος, νυμφαγωγός, Talm. שׁוֹשְׁבִינָא, he who demands and leads the bride to the bridegroom. He does not indeed there say ὁ νυμφίος, "the bridegroom," but the Messianic reference in the preceding τὴν νύμφην, "the bride" is even yet stronger than that would have been, when we consider the whole meaning of John's demonstrative discourse. (All men come to him; the bride, the church the people of God turn towards him: and this is as it should be, for, as this proves, he is indeed the bridegroom

* In Mark, they speak of the practice of the two discipleships in the third person, just as (according to Ebrard) a Lutheran might say to a Roman Catholic: The Lutherans and the Reformed do not keep Corpus-Christi-day. We may very well conceive (with Von Gerlach) that after the imprisonment of the Baptist many of his disciples would rather attach themselves to the better kind of Pharisees than to Jesus. The opinion on the other hand, that the Pharisees proposed this question to Jesus, only referring to John's disciples; and that Matthew's Gospel derived the account from a misunderstanding and transposing tradition, is one more of the petty shifts of Scripture dishonoring modern theology.

† They speak, however, as Roos says, with simple hearts, and hold probably the disciples of Jesus only in suspicion, as being an undisciplined people, who would not so readily acquiesce in their Master's enforcement of prayer and fasting as they had acquiesced in John's.

* Which we find here "in a marvellous union which is perfectly natural, but on that account full of instruction and warning." It is thus Seyler preaches: see his Mittheillungen über die zehnte Versammlung in Gnadau.

† Subordinately a not unimportant example, how the contents of the fourth Gospel are pre-supposed by the Synoptical Gospels, and are confirmed by them.

of this bride. I have no other function than to lead her to him.) But the Lord's words here have a more extended reference; all his disciples generally appear as υἱοὶ τοῦ νυμφῶνος, "children of the bride-chamber," friends of the Bridegroom: and with this we may compare ch. xi. 11. This expression, indeed, indicates something much more intimate than marriage company or wedding guests generally, since νυμφὼν signifies the bridal-chamber, and not merely the hall of the wedding-feast. It refers already to the calling of the apostles to be the bringers of the bride, in the same sense as the Baptist had intimated; for in such indefinite parables as these, which hint more than they say, the narrower and the wider meaning pass one into the other.

It remains, however, clear and important that the Lord here, by a general citation of the Old Testament, terms himself the Bridegroom. This was according to a general orientalism, which thus exhibited the relation between ruler and people, and with a much deeper meaning it was applied to the sacred relation of Jehovah, the God of Israel. But the prophets testified clearly that the true betrothal, the true marriage (which Psa. xlv. and the Canticles predict) would take place when God, the King, the husband of Israel, should come as his Messiah. Thus are given first of all the great promises in Isa. lii. 6, 7, 12—I myself, who now speak, will be He! Thy God reigneth! The Lord will go before you; and the God of Israel will be your re-reward! Then is interposed the marvellous prophecy concerning the servant of the Lord; but immediately after follows again in ch. liv. the prediction of the fruitful marriage, ver. 5: For thy maker is thine husband, the Lord of hosts is his name; and thy redeemer the Holy One of Israel; the God of the whole earth shall he be called. Hence are to be understood the subsequent marriage parables of our Lord, which are already prepared for in this discourse to the disciples of John. It is, finally, a very striking circumstance that the same Hosea to whom the Lord had referred the Pharisees, as he testifies of the Physician, so also testifies of the Bridegroom. For in Hos. ii. 19, 20 (which is to be regarded as an interpretation of the typical conduct of the Prophet, with an allusion, at the same time, to a meaning of the idol-name בַּעַל, Baal, i. e. lord or husband,) we find it said: I will betroth thee unto me for ever; yea, I will betroth thee unto me in righteousness, and in judgment, and in loving kindness, and in mercies. I will even betroth thee unto me in faithfulness; and thou shalt know the Lord. Now this is the true explanation of חֶסֶד, mercy, and דַּעַת אֱלֹהִים, knowledge of the Lord (Hos. vi. 6), which the Lord himself supplementarily brings, while he blends in his answer a reference to that testimony of the Baptist with the thoughts of his own mind, which still linger in Hosea's prophecy. Thus by means of both the prophet's predictions, that of the Physician and that of the Bridegroom, uniting in strict harmony and concert, the Lord declares with ample clearness for all who have ears to hear, who he himself is. Where I thus am present, the Bridegroom, there can be nothing but joy for my chosen disciples especially, who are elected to be paranymphs, friends of the Bridegroom. To fast now would be a plain self-contradiction, for fasting pertains to sorrow and not to joy. But these are glad, and rightly so, because the long-expected is come at last, and they are conscious of nothing but this. The Bridegroom is come, the marriage must and will now go on! The presence of the Bridegroom is already to them the beginning of the marriage. Interrupt them not, they will soon enough discover that an interval must take place: yea, these and my future disciples shall during many a dreary season, find cause to fast—for the actual marriage is yet far in the distance. Such generally is the meaning of this prophetic discourse, though, alas, most Bible readers accept it with difficulty, for Luther's word, without explanation derived from oriental biblical customs, misleads them to think of the actual marriage at once.

The Bridegroom is taken from them, just as the king first takes his journey, in order to receive his kingdom (Luke xix. 12; Matt. xxv. 14). The very generally announced prediction which the Lord gives* concerning this, refers immediately and first of all to the days of his sufferings and death; for the disciples of John, whose Master, according to every correct harmony, was now in prison, the words would contain a latent analogy, which the Lord more fully utters in Matt. xvii. 12, "Your Master, for whose imprisonment ye would mourn and fast, is not, however, the true Bridegroom, who will similarly, yet quite otherwise, be taken away!" The first presence of Jesus among his disciples, however full of joy it might make them, was nevertheless quite transitory; there stood the cross before him, by which the Bridegroom would become the Physician, and lead the truly healed through deep affliction to perfect joy (John xvi. 20–22). All this the Lord knew from the beginning, and in the midst of his gracious acknowledgment and approval of the joy which surrounded him in his own disciples' hearts, he alone looks beyond into the days which were coming. (Wizenmann may well cry: "What man ever looked down so tranquilly, so cheerfully, from so great a height into so profound a depth?") Indeed the ἐλεύσονται δὲ ἡμέραι, but the days will come, and the τότε, then (which Luke still strengthens by ἐν ἐκείναις ταῖς ἡμέραις, in those days, a more exact expression than Mark's singular) stretches the prospect far into the times of the Church, in which, as well for the whole as for individuals, there will be a manifold and perpetual recurrence of the departure of the

* Where the grammatically unusual ἀπαρθῇ, taken away, the same in all three Evangelists, stands alone in the New Testament.

Bridegroom, and the pressing through the sorrow of the cross to the joy of the resurrection.

Nevertheless, the Lord will not permit any to disturb the present joy of his own, however transitory it may be, in himself and his personal presence (ἐφ' ὅσον, Mark and Luke ἐν ᾧ μετ' αὐτῶν ἐστιν—Mark again ὅσον χρόνον μεθ' ἑαυτῶν ἔχουσι τὸν νυμφίον)! Although the most fearful suffering was at hand, although the greatest of the prophets awaited in the prison his death, yet even these things may not suppress the joy of the disciples, and make them fast, so gladdening is the presence of the Bridegroom. It is in this that we are to seek the peculiar contrast between the Old and the New, which is now intimated, and afterwards expanded more fully; not, indeed, merely through the presence of the Bridegroom (for this is limited by an ἐφ' ὅσον, and fasting even in the new time is plainly contemplated), but rather in the distinction between fasting as genuine and corresponding to the occasion, and fasting as enforced and legally imposed as an external obligation. The specific point of the Lord's saying becomes obvious to us in Matthew (who has here the exact word in preference to the other two), for he speaks, first of all, of mourning instead of fasting, and with a frank μὴ δύνανται, cannot, asks if it be befitting and right to enforce fasting in a time of joy? Mark strengthens it with a repeated οὐ δύνανται; Luke expresses this fundamental idea through a less direct tradition, but in a vigorous manner and quite consistent with circumstances: μὴ δύνασθε ποιῆσαι νηστεύειν; "can ye make them fast?" What gives truth and reality to external fasting, is the internal mourning; all such exercises as outwardly imposed and enforced it, belong to the old and legal position, which in the circle of our Lord's discipleship is utterly removed. And further, what was all the עַנּוֹת נֶפֶשׁ, even as imposed in the Old Testament by God himself, but a preparation for coming joy? It was never an end in itself, only the transitional means. And when now he that is come inspires the joy, where is the occasion for fasting?

It will return, but never again in the legal, Old-Testament, Pharisaic spirit and manner, but in the truth and reality of the fulfillment of its design. Then shall they fast, that is, now conversely, they shall mourn of themselves, naturally and truly and necessarily fast. This is no commandment, but a prophecy of those fast days which God himself will apoint to souls, and not they themselves impose voluntarily upon themselves. That which in the time of the first fulfillment happened symbolically to the disciples, who in their affliction forgot to eat and drink, though it never occurred to them to say, "We must appoint ourselves a fast," will have a perpetual realization in the Church. It might indeed in a certain sense be said that the whole time of the Church during her Lord's absence, the whole interval between the Ascension and the Second Coming, is a time of solemn earnestness, of sorrow, and of fasting. Yet there is a qualification of this, since for the Church, as well as for its individual members, times of the Lord's presence alternate with times of his absence, the one profoundly preparing the way for the other. There freedom and truth must be uninterfered with in all their conduct. If a soul has found its Saviour, let no one disturb it when rejoicing as the disciples rejoiced in the beginning: the hard ways of the cross will come afterwards, let them be prophesied that they may be provided for, but nothing more. The complete consummation, which already appears to our first apprehension, and with truth, to be so near, is the marriage of the Bridegroom with his own, a time of joy and delight, in which all fast-days are lost.

Verse 16. We shall now be better able to understand what the Lord goes on to say concerning the old and the new, yet in marriage similitudes still, for garments and wine may well occur to our thoughts when preparation for the marriage is spoken of. What is the altogether new? That freedom and sincerity of deportment which ever correspond with the reality of the inward state, and which should henceforward alone avail: not, assuredly, a mere vain joy, as before a mere vain sorrow, but the eating and drinking when man is glad, the fasting when he is sorrowful; that is, as we are wont to say, the government of the evangelical spirit, rule of life, and guidance. What, on the other hand, is the old which the Lord thus by the very word emphatically announces already as done away, even as his apostle afterwards (Heb. viii. 13) must do again? All that pertains to the legal, Old Testament, imperfect, preparatory, typical relation, as it is opposed, in the Pharisees and John's disciples, to the spirit of the New. What then is the mixing and mending which would put a new patch upon an old garment? It would have taken place, if the Lord in his instruction of the disciples whom he was now training for the entirely New, had still retained the Pharisaical, Old-Testament spirit as his foundation; for then nothing fundamentally and permanently new would have resulted, they would not have agreed together. No one acts thus, who will provide a durable garment, that is, no practiced workman, for of this unintelligent, wretched, and indeed (holding to the external figure) necessitated patching, there is abundance. It is very plain that here as elsewhere, our Lord's word, which in its dignity condescends to the meanest details of the earthly, and common realities of life, enters into the history of a mended garment, elevating in his wisdom the most trivial thing into a glorious similitude. If the garment itself is old, worn out, and holds not together (and the whole rests upon this supposition), no new patch inserted will do it any service. The ἐπίβλημα, patch, which was intended to be a πλήρωμα αὐτοῦ, ("put in to fill it up"), can accomplish that purpose only for a short time and very badly; it αἴρει ἀπὸ τοῦ ἱματίου, takes away from the garment, that is, although it rends not itself, it does not hold to the seam of the old, the new piece taketh away something from the old;* the consequence is, as Luke expresses it, καὶ τὸ καινὸν σχίζει, both the new maketh a rent, in the end the new is thrown away, inserted in vain, no better than rent, like the old itself. The new is not entire, the old is not firm. (Comp. the parallel, ver. 17.) Luke gives the fundamental idea quite correctly, whether the Lord now uttered it or not, οὐ συμφωνεῖ, agreeth not, the old and the new fit not, agree not together: but Matthew and Mark say most distinctively and decisively χεῖρον σχίσμα γίνεται, the rent is made worse, such improvement only makes the evil worse. See here in the history of an unskillfully and vainly patched old garment the prophecy of many injuries and schisms made worse, in souls, in congregations, and in whole Churches! Oh that wicked piecing of evangelical patches upon the old ground! O that it were in the thing signified as it is said to be in the figure —No man doeth this!† Poverty constrains us not to do this, now that he is come to provide us the new wedding garment: that we should put on whole and new, in the new nature of the spirit and of liberty, the old nature of the letter and of bondage being entirely cast off. Let it be once more observed, with what far-reaching wisdom our Lord, passing beyond the present occasion which gives birth to his words, makes them universal; and with what irresistible conviction the thought thus clothed in parable teaches us to hold fast his doctrine.

Verse 17. Are we to suppose that the Lord is saying the same thing in a second figure? Many are of this opinion, though it runs entirely opposite to our Lord's manner of teaching. It is not sufficient to say that he views the subject of his discourse under two distinct relations; as if he first condescends, as it were, to figure the new "only as a subordinate element, repairing the deficiencies of the old," and then in the second similitude speaks more definitely and strongly of the new spirit and nature, for which an altogether new external form is necessary. For if the former were true, the Lord could not have blamed the coming to the aid of the old garment with a new patch; whereas he already in the first figure requires a totally new garment. The difference between the two ideas is certainly not to be sought in this, for the full contrast is the same in both. What then is it? We must not take the old and new bottles as corresponding directly to the old and new garment; he who retains this notion, must misunderstand the whole discourse. Rather that which the Lord has compared to a garment, he now in the second instance compares to a wine. As in the first instance, starting from the old garment the opposite entirely new one is intimated only by the new patch, which is not, however, the new garment itself; so, in the second instance, the contemplation sets out from the new wine (for so should it be translated), with an understood contrast with the old wine, which as we shall see in Luke, is actually mentioned. Thus much is here plain: a garment is put on from without, but wine is received from skins or vessels inwardly; and what was first viewed rather as an external manner of life or even doctrine, appears now as a spiritual principle, as the spirit that moulds the habits, the life within which shapes the life without.* The new garment is the New Testament freedom and truth of external life, in which man lives and moves, the new wine is the internal spirit of such freedom and truth itself. And what are the bottles which contain and hold this spirit? They must necessarily correspond to the men who wear the garment; consequently that is true which might now be raised as an objection, that neither "the ancient Jewish nor the new forms" are alluded to, but the persons who may or may not be capable of being used. The figure is, moreover, scriptural (see Job. xxxii. 19); where the "new bottles" are either, as is probable, equivalent to bottles with new wine, or Elihu, in his inflated discourse represents the spirit which urges him as so mighty, that even new bottles would be burst by it.

The expression of our Lord, which is now shown in its completeness, has a twofold aim: that the new must not be mixed with or inserted into, the old; and that rightly disposed people must be chosen for the freedom of the new which he inculcates. But in the nature of things, the similitude will not absolutely suit in every respect, inasmuch as men and nations in themselves are no other than old men and nations: it suits, nevertheless, relatively at least for the relations of the time then present, and for all similar relations; inasmuch as while many are too firmly rooted and fixed in the old, and cannot, like old bottles, receive and retain the new wine and the new spirit, many, on the other hand, are found susceptible, unprejudiced, prepared, and, as it were, already corresponding to the new. Men put not new wine into old bottles—the Lord by this justifies at the same time the conduct of John, who treated quite rightly his disciples who were not yet ripe for the evangelical freedom and joy, and his own conduct in seeking for himself new bottles; or rather he justifies the wisdom of God, which sent to the men of that generation in near connection and succession, both the severe Elias and the benignant Son of Man (ch. vi. 17–19). The Lord, indeed, received his disciples in part from John the Baptist, but not those of them who were Pharisaically narrow-minded and rigid, such as now put the question to him; his accepted new bottles were publicans and sinners, whom he immediately called to himself. John indeed predicts the new wine, but not many receive it, as is proved by the very fact that there are yet fasting disciples of John, even long after their master had pointed them to the Bridegroom. To such the Lord meekly replies—Remain ye in the old, and leave to my disciples the new! Thus it is meet, and thus will we for a while be separate.

* Mark, according to the correct reading, αἴρει τὸ πλήρωμα τὸ καινὸν τοῦ παλαιοῦ, see Bengel, and on the construction of αἴρειν with a genitive, Winer's Grammatik, § 30. 6.

† "Christians should never call God's work upon them through Christ, a mending, but a new creation" (Von Gerlach). But there have been sad times, when men have talked about "moral mending and perfecting of our nature."

* When Seyler suggests that "garment and bottle are the external forms of life; the garment, to wit, the inner life exhibited in outward things, the bottle, as inclosing and containing that life on account of its self-preservation and refinement," is there not an inharmonious confusion between the bottle and its contents?

Finally, wherefore and what means the breaking of the old bottles, so that the good old wine is spilled, and the bottles perish, and thus a twofold injury arises from the false conjunction of things that agree not together? The new wine ferments, in order that thus it may out of must become true wine: Thus the wine bursts the skins—will, as it may be foreseen, burst them, as we read in Mark and Luke. As Matthew and Mark condense and break off the Lord's expression, it seems just to hint at this explanatory fundamental idea; but Luke in ver. 39 gives it plain and significant utterance. Yet how have short-sighted expositors on all sides perverted this undoubtedly genuine and important addition, because they cannot deal rightly with its meaning; and yet how simple and clear, how entirely appropriate to what precedes, when that is rightly understood, is the thought which it expresses! The emphasis lies in the εὐθέως, straightway, for the genuine new, of which the passage speaks (not an externally new form or mode as such, which people readily enough seize, as they do new garments, but a new and free and living spirit), does not easily and immediately take possession of people who are accustomed to the old. Not, by any means, as if the old wine were actually better; but he who has hitherto drunk it (being accustomed, that is, not merely to "old habitudes," but to the life and principle stamped upon them, the spirit of legal exercise and righteousness), feels that to him it tastes better; he says the old is more agreeable and pleasant. The Lord in his gracious wisdom says this, partly in blame (for men cannot and should not always tarry in the old, the years as they roll on bring their new growth), partly, also, in gentle apology for them.* Thus it must be, it lies in the nature of the case. I know well that your much fasting is to you, with all its severity, preferable to the freedom of my disciples. Length of time makes the old habitual pleasant to us; the yoke, otherwise intolerable, bearable and even easy. Here at the conclusion our Lord is also answering the first part of the question—Why do we with the Pharisees fast? He teaches, finally, that a time will come, when the new, which so few now relish, will better commend itself. When the new wine is old, thou shalt drink it with pleasure, said Sirach anciently (Ecclus. ix. 10). This is the meaning. Not merely as Schleiermacher says, that "he would not find fault with them for not liking the new wine, but holding the old wine as usual for better; the value of the new wine would come out in the taste, but this would be the case with them only by degrees." It is not our taste merely which is concerned here, but the actual fermentation and clarification of the new life and the new spirit, which, after the manner of new wine, is unready and imperfect within as at the first. The figures proceed with each new turn in the discourse more fully and deeply, into the reality, and its whole process. The bottles which contain the new wine, but should not, indeed, retain it for themselves, are the constantly chosen bearers and instruments of the new spirit; the people, who should drink it, are all others to whom then and thus are communicated the new power, doctrine, and discipline. This distinction must be well seized; typified in the relation of the apostles and the first disciples, it finds its ever recurring application to all time. Hast thou, for thy part, received the new wine of grace into a sincere and humble heart, into a mind which lays aside all that is past, as into a new bottle; then take good heed, that thou do not impetuously pour it out before all people to drink, and complain if they relish it not. Thus does the circumspection of our Lord's word fill up its meaning—Rejoice in thyself; no man shall constrain thee to fast; but cry not out too soon—Rejoice all with me as I rejoice! The divine Spirit in the spirit of man, when it at first approves itself a fermenting new wine, must itself become ripened and mild.* But when it is so, there is nothing more lovely, more heart-rejoicing, that goeth down more sweetly (Cant. vii. 9) to every unperverted taste and conscience than the thoughtful, powerful, affectionate testimony and exhortation of such disciples as have prepared themselves in wisdom and patience for the Bridegroom's will, from their first joy through all succeeding mourning, until his new thing in them is fully ready to be offered to the world. The more fully this testimony of the whole apostolical church since Pentecost has been published to Israel, with so much less sincerity of excuse can they allege of their old wine, that it is better.

*Seyler calls it emphatically a "word of excuse inexpressibly mild, and almost in 'scherzender' form," but where the Lord seems to speak almost in this style, he is only giving utterance to the deepest earnestness of truth in the most affectionate manner. Compare Luke x. 42.

*A Jewish saying (quoted by Sepp) has it: He who seeks instruction from the young and inexperienced, is like one who eats unripe grapes, or drinks new wine out of the wine press: to learn from the old, is to taste ripe grapes, and old wine.

THE ISSUE OF BLOOD.

(Matt. ix. 22; Mark v. 30; Luke viii. 45–48.)

Matthew records in the most concise manner in three verses, the incident which was interposed on our Lord's way to Jairus. As his recollections rise to him in more and more rich profusion, the apostle and eye-witness employs in his Gospel a more pregnant brevity of style (that the book may not become too great, John xxi. 25); and suffers himself not to be diverted to the right or left from the prescribed design of his plan. In addition, we must regard as coming to the aid of this as foreseen and provided by God for the first Gospel, the Apostle's own individuality, which is less adapted for sharply defining the small, characteristic traits of an incident, and on that account more fitted to arrange and combine events and discourses under great leading aspects; though never, however, contrary to the strictest truth of facts. Mark and Luke then fill up many things left in outline by Matthew; in perfect consistency with their characteristic, that of more searching, reflective, accurate, and most exactly faithful reporters. Yet this filling up must also be regarded as strictly faithful to truth. If any man, for example, would regard the narrative of the Ruler's daughter and the woman with the bloody flux, so self-evidencing in their incomparably artless originality, and living freshness, as invented, or either with or without design elaborated and adorned, we must lament his critical failing and account him fundamently perverted.

But in these narratives the words of our Lord are so interwoven with the circumstances occurring, that without understanding these, those cannot be understood; yet we must be on our guard against entering into the history too much. In this view, we must rather reckon upon too much than too little in the reader himself; that so our book also may not grow too large.

Who touched me? or, more properly: Who is it, who was it, that touched me? This question the Lord asks in the midst of the press of the crowd: the disciples marvel, and instead of answering they use that liberty to which they had been encouraged by his lowly intercourse with them; and by Peter's ever ready mouth throw out a kind of demurral as to his putting such a question at all. According to Mark, who may here be the more exact, it was, Who touched my clothes? or more properly, Me by my clothes? A well-meaning but incorrect dogmatic prudently remarks here that the Lord had well known all from the beginning, but that for the sake of men, and because he would not have his wonderful power thus experienced in secret and kept hidden, he procured its disclosure by such a question as this; but this springs from a purely human mistake as to the essentially human in the Son of Man, and plainly opposes the most distinct words of the Evangelists. First of all, the indefinite masc. ὁ ἁψάμενος, that touched, does not favor this view; but Mark further reports that the Lord turned round to find him who had done, or, as he speaks in relation to the known fact, her* who had done this thing, yea, that the woman came and told him all the truth. Consequently he did not yet fully know her from the beginning, rather nothing more than that which his genuine question expresses, that some one had touched him with such longing of faith as had drawn from him his healing virtue. Mark selects the words very carefully and with exact propriety: the woman ἔγνω τῷ σώματι, marked or felt in her body, that the fountain of her blood was suddenly dried up; but Jesus puts his question ἐπιγνοὺς ἐν ἑαυτῷ τὴν ἐξ αὐτοῦ δύναμιν ἐξελθοῦσαν, knowing that virtue had gone out of him; as he not only felt in his body, but at the same time knew in himself (τῷ πνεύματι αὐτοῦ), what had taken place.

According to Luke the Lord himself testifies this by a second word, which we should have been required to supply in Mark, even, independently of this, as the Lord's explanatory answer to his disciples' demurral, Somebody hath touched me, and, as I think, in a different way from the thronging crowd; hath touched Me, and not merely, like them, my clothes: thus does the Lord defend his unintelligently blamed question, and explains its reason by the same word which Mark has woven into his narration—For I perceive that virtue hathg one out of me. Ἐγώ, I, first and emphatically; if no one else, I at least must well know. Ἔγνων, knew, in the same proper sense as Mark has explained it: the bodily feeling with an inward consciousness of the internal and essential import and reality of what was taking place. The ἐξελθοῦσα, gone out, connected with the δύναμις, virtue, especially with the emphatic τὴν, the, in Mark, teaches us that it signifies more than an ordinary miracle, as many would sophisticate it. And consequently it remains undeniable after the distinct evidence of this narrative, that that power to heal (Luke v. 17, vi. 19), which was there inherent in him, and went forth from him, bears some analogy with that in human nature of which we know some little under the name of magnetism, as exerted through the medium of a certain bodily relation; and this is confirmed by further analogies, such as that of the Apostle's handkerchiefs in Ephesus.* But then the whole narrative, with the words that pertain to it, is especially recorded in such a manner as to show us the difference between the higher and the lower, between the healing and living power of the God-man, and the influence exerted by magnetizing physicist and physicians. The immediate discussion of this, however, belongs not to this place. But thus much, the Lord's word which we are expounding testifies, that to the efficacious influence going forth from him which heals the body, there must correspond a bodily virtue in himself, which might be imparted through the hem of his garment; but that this did not occur in a physical way without or against the intervention of his conscious will. And it is just to refute this very error of the woman which would otherwise have been confirmed and propagated, that he speaks and will not keep silence; and that he is constrained in all kindness to abash still more the ashamed woman, by bringing her into prominence. The physical virtue which passes over does not go from him without his will: that will is always disposed, stands, as it were, always open and prepared for approaching faith; and this is the reason why that which occurred could take place. Further, not without his knowledge, as is immediately shown: the touch which derived the virtue from him, was assuredly unexpected; but he marks it immediately, knowing it within himself, rejoicing over the faith, by which he is well pleased to allow himself even to be thus touched. We can only apprehend this spiritual-physical virtue through taking into account this spiritual relation: the people generally throng and press him, without that relation, but the timid touch which scarcely laid hold of his garment brings healing to the sick woman, because she has faith to be healed. A striking figure for the preacher, often used to distinguish the crowds from the little few around Jesus!†

* Which expression narrating post eventum (τὴν τοῦτο ποιήσασαν) should not be urged (as e.g. by Alford) as a proof that Jesus, when he put the question, already knew.

It is this faith which touched his person, that the Lord makes prominent in his last word, discerning what was directly needful in this unexpected occurrence. We find it only in Matthew, who thus in his brief narrative retains the essential point of the whole, namely, the contrast of our Lord's word with the woman's thought as given in ver. 21. That there was a certain admixture of an improper, and in the gentlest sense, superstitious notion in this thought, is proved by the circumstance that she thought she might steal away unobserved and unknown with the healing she had secured. There was something in her, as Grotius on this occasion profoundly remarks, of that idea of the Philosophers, Deum agere omnia φύσει οὐ βουλήσει (that God performs all things by nature not by will), and this our Lord could not allow to pass current, lest wide-spreading error should arise from it. Thy faith, thy touch in faith hath saved thee (σέσωκέ σε—as she had said, σωθήσομαι and Matt. adds ἐσώθη), not merely thy touch or my garment!* It was indeed, with all its lack of perception or acknowledgment, which does not affect the matter,† a strong faith which trusted that the hem of his garment could do more to heal her than the instrumentality of all physicians of whom she had for twelve years suffered many things, and was nothing bettered, but rather grew worse. The Lord now as ever praises such faith, and compensates her for all the pain and shame which his testimony for truth had required that he should not spare her, by his gracious θάρσει, θύγατερ, Daughter, be of good comfort! (Matthew retains only the paternally affectionate θύγατερ, daughter), which was immediately uttered in anticipation of the word that praised instead of blamed her act. O, how his love rejoices over such faith, in whatever form he finds it; that love which delights to give all, rather than to receive! It is his continual manner to ascribe all that his virtue effects to faith, since notwithstanding his δύναμις or virtue always ready in himself, πίστις or faith is yet the canditio sine quâ non of its ἐξελθεῖν or going out; (comp. Matt. ix. 29, viii. 13; Luke vii. 50, xvii. 19, xviii. 42.) Thus does he speak in every new instance, to encourage others that they also may believe, as well as to confirm those who have already believed. Mark and Luke add here his usual Go in peace; Mark besides this gives the assurance, so welcome to this poor woman, that the instantaneous cure of this twelve years' disease should retain its permanence—Thou hast believed, go in the peace which this faith brings, which hath healed thee; and be for ever healed of thy sad and long-suffered plague!

* [Strange that so evangelical an expositor as Stier, should condescend to have recourse, in explaining Christ's divine power, to the pretended science of animal magnetism!—Am. Ed.]

† Augustine: Sic etiam nunc est corpus ejus, id est, Ecclesia ejus. Tangit eam fides paucorum, premit turba multorum.

* Matthew does not most assuredly design to report, in contradiction to Luke, that now first at this word the woman was made whole. This is that reading of a modern exegesis which beforehand expected its contradiction.

† Alford refers very beautifully to this as being a miracle full of the highest encouragement to all who might be "disposed to think despondingly of the ignorance or superstition of much of the Christian world—that he who accepted this woman for her faith even in error and weakness, may also accept them.

JAIRUS' DAUGHTER.

(Matt. ix. 24; Mark v. 36, 39, 41 [43]; Luke viii. 50, 52, 54 [55, 56]).

Be not afraid, only believe! once more the same gracious invitation and excitement to faith, and the same contrast between faith and fear, which we have already seen in Matt. viii. 26. All that is to be held as true in the doctrine of "faith alone," is represented to us by this μόνον, only, in the region of external things, which the Lord himself every where regards and exhibits as similitudes of things internal. In Luke we have the promise connected with the πίστευειν, believing, of Jairus for his daughter: καὶ σωθήσεται, and she shall be saved. This does not indicate that our Lord doubted the correctness of the subsequent intelligence that the daughter was now actually dead, as the ordinary language of man terms dead, for the mother especially would not send the sad intelligence prematurely to the father on the way. If Jesus had hoped or certainly knew, as his word afterwards, even before he saw the particulars, might seem to say, that the maid was not dead, he must, to preserve the truth, have contradicted the intelligence at once before the people, and could not have allowed it to pass current, as he nevertheless did. His promise does not fully and openly announce, for so it seemed good to his humility, that he would, because he could, make her live again; but under this veil of generality it contained such an intimation: Fear not—be not disconcerted by even this message of death; let what may take place or have taken place, thou hast summoned me to be thy helper, and I will assuredly help. Only believe—tu contra audentior ito.

That the man had from the beginning been aware of his daughter's death, and had attributed to Jesus the power even to awake the dead, is inconceivable in itself, would be unexampled in the whole evangelical history, and is opposed by the resignation to the event of even Martha and Mary when their brother had actually died. The rapid condensing brevity of Matthew at the commencement of his narrative might lead the unwary reader to think so, but to prevent such inconsiderate reading we find the contrary expressed both in this and the other Evangelists. Matthew passes over the intermediate message, which was certainly not unknown to him, and in his brief and comprehensive reference to it throws back upon the former part of the transaction the impression and feeling of the latter. This is his manner; his Gospel delivers its narrative in this unstudied style, because he can pre-suppose a living tradition of the more minute details of important occurrences, before the subsequent Evangelists had rendered them permanent. But with all this he ever writes the truth; for strictly considered, the ἄρτι ἐτελεύτησεν,* she is now dead, means no more in the father's mouth than in Mark's ἐσχάτως ἔχει, she lies now in the article of death, there is the most critical danger, all haste is needful, probably she may be, while I am calling thee, already dead. Nothing else is obviously meant—and this is decisive—by Luke's ἀπέθνησκεν, lay a-dying (as ἀποθνήσκειν is elsewhere the beginning of dying, the danger and anguish of death, e. g. 2 Cor. vi. 9), from which he himself in ver. 49 distinguishes the τέθνηκεν, is dead. Consequently ζήσεται, she shall live, is not directly—she shall again return to life, but, she shall continue to live, survive the immediate peril of death. Mark quite correctly: ὅπως σωθῇ, καὶ ζήσεται, that she may be saved, and she shall live.

And now between the hope and fear of struggling faith, the Ruler's mind is agitated by a new thought. He who at first pleaded for the healing of his only daughter suspended between life and death, has now to ask—If she should now be dead, can the Master's helping power help me then? The people, whose excitement had been increased by the incident on the way, were now intent upon something marvellous which would take place in the Ruler's house; for the circumstance which had at first vibrated in uncertainty between life and death, has now reached its highest interest in consequence of our Lord's word of encouraging promise in reply to the message of death. Common curiosity now rules all, even to the extent of irreverent pressing and thronging. Our lord submitted to this as to the customary pressure of his great work, yet no longer than to the door of the house. Entering, he beholds the scene which Jewish custom exhibited in bewailing the dead; even there where he has determined in the power of the Father to bestow life. What is more natural than the first cry with which he arrests their lamentation: Give place! Ye weepers are not wanted yet! Thus we have it in Matthew: Luke, on the other hand, expresses it, Weep not; and Mark, Why make ye this ado and weep? The sense in all is the same: it is the indication of absolute assurance that he was bringing help,† as well as the deprecation of all that tumult which too commonly mingled itself with lamentation for the dead, as unbefitting the dignity of his own person and of the present solemn occasion. And then he adds—let it be remembered, before he had entered in and seen the child—that word of wonder which all the three Evangelists have retained alike—For the maid is not dead, but sleepeth!

* Which is no false supposition of the reporter, as Schleiermacher thinks.

† Bengel: Certus ad miraculum accedit.

This is so definite and precise that one might at first understand it in the letter, and yet with but few exceptions the whole church has understood it otherwise; rightly indeed, for the whole connection constrains us to do so. It is well known that it was the caprice of the late Olshausen to maintain the literal interpretation, from which many of his friends in vain endeavored to dissuade him.* To what Matthew and Mark briefly intimate—And they laughed him to scorn, Luke adds decisively, εἰδότες ὅτι ἀπέθανεν, knowing that she was dead, and in the clearest manner records afterwards, καὶ ἐπέστρεψε τὸ πνεῦμα αὐτῆς, and her spirit returned, just as it is written in I Kings xvii. 22. She was thus certainly dead, though the Lord speaks concerning her as concerning Lazarus (John xi. 11–15). This is his first raising from the dead, the only one that Matthew records, which could not have been wanting in his Gospel because of his testimony to the Lord's saying in ch. xi. 5.† Three awakenings from death the Spirit has caused to be recorded for us, although others may well have taken place; and these indeed in a remarkable and significant progression, which is in itself a corroborative testimony for this first: the maiden is here dead upon her bed, the young man at Nain was carried forth upon his bier, Lazarus had lain four days in his grave.

But why did the Lord speak thus? His word has a sublime universal meaning as it regards all who are by us termed "the dead" generally, and specifically with a two-fold design as it regards his then present hearers. To the tumultuous people without, it is veiled and repulsive, the opposite of that lofty language which would not have suited his lowliness, such as—Even if she were dead, I nevertheless can, and will raise her up! But to the desponding, wrestling father it would be no other than a repetition of—Be not afraid, only believe! Therefore he rejects the word of fear and dismay—She is dead! and substitutes another which promises to faith a re-awakening—She sleepeth! One whom it is his will to awake immediately as in this instance, sleeps indeed only in a short sleep of death. Even we have no other way of speaking it than to call it a re-awakening, and consequently thereby confirm the right of him who re-awakens, to speak of it as a sleep. But the Lord does not speak now with reference only to the present occasion. At this first resurrection which the Father gave him, there rises to his soul, in one great comprehensive view, the death and resurrection of all the children of men, and he speaks in language of sublime and majestic superiority over the narrow thoughts and limited lamentations of mortal mind. He speaks with the deep meaning of his subsequent word, in which he says concerning the God of the living that all live to him (Luke xx. 38). Bodily death is not essentially death: we know how the Lord elsewhere speaks of death and destruction, and may appropriately call to mind his words concerning the dead to be buried, in Matt. viii. 22. This the poor people understand not now, and they show how unsympathizing their lamentation had in reality been, how untouched their hearts, by passing at a bound from weeping to laughter, only seizing the manifest contradiction between his assurance and what they knew to be true. But the father, prepared beforehand for faith, may well in a certain sense have felt the meaning of the disguised words, as if the Lord had openly said—I will raise her up, as one that sleeps, so that she, notwithstanding all, is not dead!

The curious and the laughers must all be put out. The three alone, whom the Lord now for the first time makes prominent among the twelve, with the father and mother who will receive from his grace their daughter again, may be witnesses of the deed which was not to be performed for idle wonder. Not as Elijah and Elisha in old time enforced his prey from death with effort of body and spirit, does the Lord awaken this dead one. He utters the same simple word, in his immediate personal authority, with which he heals the sick; and takes her by the hand (Matt. viii. 15) to wake her up, as one would take a sleeping child. He addresses the dead as already living, so that they must hear the voice of the Son of Man (John v. 25, 28); and utters, with perfect confidence in the Father who hath given him this power, that incomparably sublime cry, which veils the loftiest dignity in the most tender affection, Talitha cumi! Mark, probably from Peter's communication, preserves to us this most distinctive utterance of the resurrection-word from the all-holy lips, which recurs once more with the same simplicity—Young man, I say unto thee arise! (Luke vii. 14); and finally in the last, Lazarus, come forth! (John xi. 43). Mark thus also teaches us, as by the "Ephphatha," ch. vii. 34, that in the ordinary intercourse of life our Lord spoke the language of the country; although this does not decide the question as to the language of the many longer discourses which were uttered before companies composed of learned and unlearned, Jews mixed with Gentiles. But the Evangelist does not translate it in its bare literality, but adds, in order to indicate the emphasis of the invocation and its authority σοὶ λέγω, I say unto thee; whence we learn further how the translation of our Lord's words in the spirit of their letter, was intended by the Holy Ghost.

* Hase indeed in his Leben Jesu calls the maid "the sleeper!" Braune also, unhappily, will unconditionally contend that the Lord literally said and meant—She is not dead. Even Neander, although "all the circumstances make it probable to him that it was but the condition of a trance," yet concludes that the Lord (who does not know or observe that?) spoke with reference to the result of the awakening rather than to death. Lange, on the contrary, rightly maintains that the decisive account of Luke that she was dead, is the only supposition on which the conduct of Jesus can be understood—quite truly. If it must be taken literally, it would be sleep merely, and not trance. Even Von Gerlach acknowledges that Luke gives it as his view that she was dead—but such a view of the Evangelist we hold for undoubted testimony.

† Which we find in Luke had been just preceded by the resurrection of the young man at Nain.

The other two Evangelists report two further expressions; yet only in indirect citation, as if with the exquisite feeling that no other and lesser word should follow upon the great ἔγειρε, Rise! The command to give meat to the awakened one, is not so much a confirming assurance that she now truly lived and was quite restored (although that might be necessary for the astonished people who were unable to realize it at all), as, if we mistake not, an indication of an affectionate care, which, even in the midst of the greatest things forgets not the least, and which would provide for the necessities of the exhausted child on her return to life. This word springs from the same amiable regard to this child which dictated the affectionate Talitha. He has given back life and health, and thus imparted help beyond the father's prayer or thought. But at this period he restrains that miracle-working power; it had restored a life physically healthy, of which the surest mark was the ordinary ability to eat and drink; and he now points them to the restored functions and ordinances of nature. He might, indeed, have awakened her as already nourished; but that would have gone, as we feel, beyond that fitness and propriety with which the miraculous energy of Jesus ever adjusted itself to the circle of earthly life. The second expression is that well-known prohibition with which he interdicts the publication of what had taken place, and thus would prevent, so far as in him lay, all mere vain-glorious rumor: yet the fame thereof went abroad through all that land—he has made even the dead to rise! Had this, indeed, not been the fact, he would not only have repeated his former οὐκ ἀπέθανεν, she is not dead, more distinctly to prevent error, but instead of the mere prohibition to tell τοῦτο τὸ γεγονός, this that was done, he would have given a full explanation of what had been done, and what had not.

She who touched in secret was constrained to avow it openly; he who publicly asked his request, is led into secret and exhorted to stillness. Let this be pondered well, that we may understand our Lord's meaning in all his wise and symbolical discourses and deeds.

THE TWO BLIND MEN.

(Matt. ix. 28–30.)

Through all the manifold variety of the ten miracles of healing which Matthew, placing among them the raising of the dead and the stilling of the sea, relates in these two chapters—as examples of what is generally stated in ver. 35, recurring to ch. iv. 23—there runs one idea, which our Lord three times distinctly announces, and the Evangelist (ch. ix. 2) once more testifies, viz: that faith is the great essential, and that the Lord, in the exhibition of his power, causes it to be done to his petitioners "according to their faith." The word to the two blind men is the same as that to the centurion; it was his chosen and loved expression—how often afterwards uttered by him! We observe, however, here even now in this extract of the history of the first period of our Lord's public life, the point of transition, by which he passes from instantaneous fulfillment of the desire, to the keeping of his petitioners waiting, in order to the trial and exercise of their faith. The foundation of this is, in general, that the Lord cared not so much for the acts themselves, as for the faith, which should afterwards seek and find spiritual help. In this particular case it must be added, that our Lord is fully aware of the increasing enmity of the embittered Pharisees (ver. 34), which keeps pace with the progress of his miracles, and therefore does not instantly respond to the cry of "Son of David" with which these two blind most movingly address him, as if he would at once hasten to acknowledge such a title. He kept them waiting, till they came to the house. And now the question does not run, Believe ye. then, that I am the Son of David? but, that I am able to do this, that is, what you signify by your ἐλέησον ἡμᾶς, "have mercy upon us!" open your eyes? Believe ye this firmly and faithfully, is it in this faith that you have persevered in following and in crying? O how his heart is rejoiced by the firm Yea, Lord, which they reply! According to your faith be it unto you! It is not co-operation that the Lord requires, so much as an acknowledgment and acceptance in accordance with his power. Every where beholding in the external its internal significance, our Lord can never too often, nor too decisively bear witness for posterity that this is what is distinctively necessary.

The prohibition finally—See that no man know it (as in ch. viii. 4, at the beginning)—has on this occasion, for the reason above mentioned, a yet deeper emphasis than before. Matthew designedly says here first ἐνεβριμήσατο αὐτοῖς, he straightly charged them (as before in Mark i. 43 in the case of the leper—with another meaning, Mark xiv. 5; John xi. 33), which certainly indicates human emotion. Suidas explains, ἐμβριμᾶσθαι, to straitly charge, by μετὰ ἀπειλῆς ἐντέλλεσθαι, μετ' αὐστηρότητος ἐπιτιμᾶν, to enjoin with threatening, to rebuke with austerity. Here there is mixed with the affectionate kindness which can never deny itself to faith, the vibration of that feeling still, which had made the crying in the street (Matt. xii. 19) so displeasing to him; but this again had its prudent reason in that wise penetration of all relations, which constrained him thus to throw a guard around his actions. If the Lord had never again thus forbidden and threatened, how would the perpetual concourse of all the sick have overburdened him, so that neither time nor strength would have been left to him for preaching the Gospel (Luke iv. 43), and the contradiction of the crucifiers to the people's hosannas would have broken out before the time.

THE MISERABLE SHEEP AND THE GREAT HARVEST.

(Matt. ix. 36,38; [Mark vi. 34].)

A new scene is now in preparation—the first mission of the chosen heralds of the kingdom; now in the first place to the lost sheep of the house of Israel, but foreshadowing in this beginning the future ambassage to the whole world. Matthew introduces it by our Lord's discourse concerning the laborers for the great harvest, spoken actually at this time and afterwards repeated by Luke on the sending forth of the seventy. But he previously mentions (ver. 36) the Lord's compassion for the people, and gives us in connection with it what we can scarcely consider his own reflection, but (as in ch. vii. 29) an indirect citation of the words in which that compassion may have been uttered. The ἰδὼν δὲ τοὺς ὄχλους, but seeing the multitudes, is immediately dependent on ver. 35, so that Hess seizes it rightly, "wherever he saw a crowd of Israelites" he manifested his pity over and over again, in these or similar words. (Hence in Mark vi. 34, we have the same on another occasion.) See Matt. x. 6 presently after, and again somewhat later xv. 24. Yet may it well be, that just at this time and to be inserted immediately before ver. 37, the Lord uttered these very words.

For the rest, the expression is evidently taken from the prophetic Scripture; for from the prayer of Moses before the Lord in Numb. xxvii. 17 downwards, we find this very natural image (by which in heathen antiquity also, the people are called flocks, and kings their shepherds) occurring in proverbial use through the entire Old Testament. As, for instance, in this its more obvious sense the prophet Michaiah uses it, when prophesying the death of the king (1 Kings xxii. 17). Then do the prophets use it with a deeper meaning in reference to the spiritual shepherds; and, condemning and mourning over these shepherds, describe in the same terms the poor neglected people: as in Jer. l. 6; Ezek. xxxiv. 5, 6; Zech. x. 2, 3. But its inmost significance is seen most clearly in that leading text Isa. liii. 6, where wandering sheep are used as a type of the state of sinners generally; not without intimation of their own fault (compare ch. lvi. 11), but with the compassionating reference to their misery predominant, as it is here. The two expressions in Matthew view the pitiable condition of this shepherdless flock under two aspects: in themselves and as individuals the sheep faint; but regarded as a flock that should be united in one, they are scattered abroad. The true reading is ἐσκυλμένοι from σκύλλω originally to rend, lacerate, thence to harass, exhaust, and (especially in long journeying) to tire out, as it recurs in a milder sense Mark v. 35; Luke viii. 49, vii. 6. Here it is stronger—sunk on the road, driven about without pasture; compare Zech. x. 2 יָעֻנּוּ, "they were troubled;" xi. 9, 16 נִכְחֶדֶת and נִבְחֶדֶת, "to be cut off" and "that is broken;" Joel i. 18, אֵין מְרְעֶה, "there is no pasture." On the other hand ἐρριμμένοι is not merely cast away (as if a mere gradation upon the former), but scattered one from the other here and there, wandering sheep, a flock no more; compare נָסָעוּ, "they went away," Zech. x 2; תָּעִינוּ, "have turned," Isa. liii. 6; וַתִּפָּזֵינָה, "and they were scattered," Ezek. xxxiv. 5; נְפוּצִים, "scattered," I Kings xxii. 17; without unity and connection, like the then Israel split into sects, their fellowship in the way of God dissolved; one by one overdriven, as a whole scattered abroad!

For they have no shepherds! With such compassion does he behold them who himself is come, their true and rightful shepherd, to revive them again, and bring them back to the fold: thus deeply is he afflicted for the "poor, misled people" whose guilt he merges in their misery, imputing that guilt all the more severely to those who had been instead of their shepherds their deceivers. O how his heart yearns to heal and to help! But how? It were a light thing for him who gave back health to the sick and even life to the dead, to bestow upon his people all needful earthly good, and defend them from all external evil; but all this would have been unavailing, and have rather aggravated than lessened their wretchedness. Quite different is the view which his word discloses to the disciples. The healing of their hurt must be a long process of labor upon their souls, and to be effected again by the instrumentality of man. But the discourse glides into another figure—the invigoration and gathering together of the poor sheep into the one fold of God, reappears under the notion of a seed-time and harvest. The Lord indeed mentions, definitively, only the harvest; hence many, comparing John iv. 35–38, apprehend here an antithesis of the Old and New Testament economies, according to which they are related as seed-time and harvest. In that passage, however, when narrowly investigated, there is no such meaning to be found, for in vers. 37, 38 the Lord places himself, the only and pre-eminent sower, in opposition to his apostles who should only labor upon the produce of his previous sowing. Such a notion is especially unsuitable to our context, inasmuch as the allusion of these words is not to any preparation already found, but, on the contrary, to a condition of absolute neglect. We have only, then, to understand the expression according to the analogy of the subsequent parables. Assuredly must the seed of the word of the kingdom be first scattered by the Son of Man and his succeeding sowers; but this entire divine husbandry upon and among the men whom he will prepare and gather to himself, is here embraced under this one name of harvest, as regarded from its final consummation. This is at once a consolatory and a mournful view, inasmuch as it is thus emphatically suggested, how much labor will be needed before so wide and desert a field can be transformed into the harvest of God: and yet that waste as it is, it is the Lord's and decreed to be his harvest-field, even as the wandering sheep are still his flock! The laborers are thus regarded not as at once reapers, who would only have to bind up the sheaves (which misunderstanding can only derange the general sense of the allusion); but their office and work embrace generally the preparation of the future harvest from the very beginning.

The harvest is great or plentiful! The Lord's immediate reference is only to the people and land of Israel, whose numerous and crowded towns the apostles, as is intimated ch. x. 23, would not very soon have gone over. He thought of many among the mass of the people who, susceptible of faith, should be called and made meet, even as he afterwards saw beforehand his much people in Corinth (Acts xviii. 10). The laborers—genuine, and worthily so called, are few, however many bear the name! But although the Lord had Israel especially in view, it is nevertheless impossible to admit that the thoughts of his heart in such a discourse did not stretch further, and that there did not mingle with them anticipations of that great harvest of God which should extend over all the earth; and this is our warrant for taking this word of his mouth which brings before the contemplation of every age the times then extant, as the text, also, of our own world-embracing missions. Is then the labor needed in order to the harvest, in one people, the neglected people of God, so great; how great will it be when extended over all the nations of the earth! Who is the Lord of this harvest? Jesus, in his meekness, speaks of the Father as such; but we also understood it of himself, the Son, to whom already the Forerunner had assigned the threshing-floor and the wheat as his, even as he himself then forthwith sends forth the laborers, those who were called to be fishers of mne.

A special emphasis has been traced in ἐκβάλῃ, send forth: that he would send them forth with vehement impulse of his Spirit, as zealous laborers; just as according to Mark i. 12, the Spirit ἐκβάλλει, draws, the Lord into the wilderness. But this word, which we find presently in Matt. x. 1, and often afterwards down to John xii. 32, applied to the casting out of devils, and then in other places of other forcible sending out (as Matt. ix. 25; Luke iv. 29), has yet in all other passages quite lost this accessory meaning.* Consult Matt. xii. 35, and more especially John x. 4, concerning the leading out of the sheep. We must regard it here as nearly equivalent to ἀποστέλλειν, send forth, ch. x. 5, only that here there may be a superadded meaning in the ἐκ, "forth," in harmony with the connection of the whole train of thought, such as—send out, from rest and comfort into the heat and toil of labor, for the performance of which none but the Lord of the harvest can give commission and power.† They labor not, in effect, whom he sends not.

But the weightiest element in our Lord's saying, the solemn key-note, the clear tone of which we would hear ringing at the close, is the challenge to the disciples—Pray ye the Lord! all the more emphatic, as this very Lord himself it is who announces that he will be prayed unto, and that he waits for their prayer in order that he may send. By such words of the Scripture is our weak thought ever anew confounded, while it is constrained to submit to the thousand-fold attested, but inscrutably marvellous mystery of the power of human prayer as a condition. That the saving of the lost sheep, the preparation of the great harvest, should be effected by the instrumentality of mortal men, we have before understood: but that the sending of such laborers, again, should be suspended on man's prayer; consequently, that the all-merciful God should permit the salvation of the world, and the gradual furtherance of his kingdom, to be dependent upon that compassion in men which having been by him first excited, urges them to pray and long for his own compassion—must ever remain a wonderful and impenetrable mystery. It is so—Scripture and experience attests it. What remains for us, then, but to comply with his command, and pray for ourselves and the whole world around us?

* Its use in the Sept. for שָׁלַח in the Old Test. is at least doubtful: e. g. it may have, as in Exod. xii. 33, the sense of "release and let go," or that of actual driving out as in Psa. xliv. 3.

† Not, however, on that account to emphasize βάλλειν; to urge, to drive out—as recently Father Zeller (Beugg. Monatsbl. 1851, No. 3) has explained it.

Certainly the disciples would not, nor could they, at that time, understand the Lord as saying—Ask of me, that I may raise up for the wretched people true pastors and preachers, who may gather out of them a people for God! He directed their thoughts by δεήθητε, pray, which is obviously an expression of the highest prayer, to the Fountain of love on high, to the God of Israel whose will it is not that his poor people should be left in their lost estate, who regards the scattered sheep as still his flock, and the field now waste as yet hereafter to be his harvest-field. Do ye not also take compassion upon the people? Pray then the Father, with me, that he send forth laborers! Whence it is necessarily inferred, that whoever thus prays offers himself, if it is possible, to labor too. So that is—Will ye, my disciples, not lend your aid, when so much is to be done? Thus he reminds them of their calling to the Apostleship, which had been certified to them already before the Sermon on the Mount. And thus he prepares them for the mission which immediately after followed, when he suddenly, and in a way which even this preparation had not led them to expect, declared himself to be the hearer by anticipation of the prayer which he had just prescribed, and in the Father's name the Lord also of the harvest, whose prerogative and whose will it is to send. He now first begins their mission, certainly, according to the common acceptation, as a discipline, preparation, and trial for themselves and their future Apostleship: but that there was blended with this an earnest zeal for the miserable people, yea, that regard for them was the main impulse of this mission, the Lord's own preface to it clearly assures us.

THE MISSION OF THE TWELVE.

(Matt. x. 5–42; Mark vi. 8–11; Luke ix. 3–5.)

This longer discourse is again indicated to us by Matthew in the most literal and decisive manner as spoken in its integrity on one distinctive occasion (let ch. x. 1, 5, be read in connection with ch. xi. 1). All, therefore, that has already been said in connection with the Sermon on the Mount, may also be used here in refutation of that strange and wilful opinion which imputes to the Evangelist an elaboration into one discourse of many sayings uttered at various times. This opinion is grounded strangely enough upon quite different reasons; sometimes upon the lack of connection in the whole, and sometimes, on the contrary, on its far-reaching comprehensiveness, which too completely embraces all futurity to be consistent with the occasion of its utterance. This latter acknowledgment and supposition is, assuredly, the only true one; but the conclusion drawn from it is only the more false. He who can see in this chapter a collection of loosely-bound and inharmonious fragments, has not yet understood it aright, as our exposition, it is hoped, will show. But he who is capable of feeling and marking the deep-founded unity of the discourse, which proceeds in its organic structure from the immediate present to the most distant futurity, from the concrete contemplation of relations near at hand to the widest view of all relations, must also and necessarily be driven to the conclusion that only the Lord himself could have constructed and given us such a whole. Would it not have been far more unnatural and wonderful, that an humble and reverent minister of Christ's word, in his record of that word should have formed such a profoundly systematic discourse out of scattered utterances, than that the Lord himself in the wisdom of his spirit should have spoken it? Yea, we boldly affirm, resting upon the continually recurring analogies of our Lord's discourses, whether lesser or longer, that on this mission of the twelve he could not have spoken otherwise than we read in Matthew. It was impossible, at the critical and significant beginning, that he should not look forward to the futurity which was to grow out of them; he could not fail to mark and to seize, in all that transpired within the sphere of his earthly life, the germs and prophetical types which were therein wrapped up. This we have distinctly seen in what we especially and distinctively called his "First Words." Now such a first word we have here. He is sending his apostles for the first time, and how could he but see in them his future ambassadors to the world? The most cautious view of this restricted, preliminary test-mission through the cities of Israel (as the Lord himself declares it to be), cannot but attribute to him the contemplation of the future and distinctive career of these same apostles, involving far more solemn and grander interests, the form and procedure of his kingdom even to the end, the position of all his ambassadors and followers. Nothing could, in fact, be more natural than this. Let it not be said, that though these might have been the secret thoughts of our Lord in connection with this mission, it would have answered no end to utter them beyond the necessity of the occasion, and the ability of his hearers to understand. This would be to misunderstand utterly the essential nature of all our Lord's discourse, which always and throughout, even where it does not so plainly declare itself as here, must have a prophetic character. Whatever he spoke from time to time, he spoke for futurity even to its utmost end, yea, even for eternity itself. This will become manifest when all the unwritten sayings of the Word made flesh (not one of which can fall to the ground, be utterly forgotten or lost) shall be disclosed and recovered, in their influence for mercy or for judgment; and to the believing apprehension it is already manifest in those words which show that they were spoken by the Spirit which forms the Scripture, in order that they might there be recalled and vivified.

Thus the Lord is here speaking to his apostles great words, far-reaching in their meaning; and he speaks them prophetically, just as his Spirit had formerly spoken in the Prophets. The progress of his internal contemplation assumes here as every where the form of a perspective view. The present and the immediate are to him the type of the more remote. In sending forth these, he contemplates all later missions of these apostles and their successors. The words which he now speaks to the Twelve in such a manner that their literal meaning can only apply to the present object, contain, in their spiritual sense, truths applicable to their whole future apostolical course. But from this typical starting-point the thoughts and their expression rise more loftily and freely into words, which the disciples scarcely understand at the time, much less use and follow out, but which must at least have awakened within them the consciousness of extended developments to spring from them, and which are given to them now in order that the Spirit in his time may recall and interpret them to their minds.

The discourse evidently falls into three main masses, the limits of each of which are marked out by a concluding sentence, and a fresh commencement taken. The Lord first speaks literally and especially concerning this first mission and preaching, which may be almost regarded as similar to the commission and stand-point of John the Baptist (ver. 7)—save that John performed no miracles, did not travel up and down, could not as yet preach the peace of the opened kingdom of heaven to the poor. This section, which pursues its way through simple directions having no reference beyond the present occasion, finds its most solemn conclusion in ver. 15, where finished unbelief rejecting their words, is referred to the final judgment. In ver. 16, a new section begins, with an almost abrupt declaration, which however unexpectedly replies to the question that the apostles might rightly ask—Does this then end all? Behold, I send you! that is, reduced to plainer words—I shall send you yet again, and amid conditions of much greater severity, even into the midst of contradiction and persecution. The expression, "send," corresponding to their name of apostles, now for the first time occurs in his discourse, and it indicates that then their full office is to be entered on, that great mission for which the present is but typical and preparatory. This section consequently embraces the apostolical period; the view extends to men generally, and the transition in their preaching from the rejecting Israelite to the Gentiles is plainly indicated (vers. 17, 18). Now first is announced the promise of the Spirit, and with intimation of persecutions (as in John xv. 26; xvi. 4); in ver. 22, the meaning is the same as afterwards, in Matt. xxiv. 9–13; and ver. 23 concludes with a catastrophe to precede the judgment, which, according to this connection, can refer only primarily to the destruction of Jerusalem. Yet not exclusively this: for the "coming of the Son of Man," as it is a type of a future and proper advent, so was it also typified in his present coming or immediately following whither his disciples were sent before. The prophetically-perspective vision beholds the progress of events as they actually are, in all their internal significance and entireness: in the periods which are formed by great epochs of development, the earlier covers and foreshadows the later; not, however, that the Spirit arbitrarily makes it a type, but because it already includes the latter as a germ. Consequently as the instructions (vers. 5–15), in the prophetical sense of their literal meaning, have an application to the more distinctive apostolical career; so does the apostolical instruction (vers. 16–23) find its application to all the followers of the apostles, to all to whom the Lord may ever say—I send you; being thus the immediately authentic missionary-instruction for all ages, disclosing its deeper meaning as centuries, and their varied experience, roll on.

This now comes into significant prominence in the third part of the discourse, the part which is developed with most completeness. The Lord's glance passes from the apostles to the disciples generally, who were to be the salt and the light of the world, ambassadors and witnesses to men of the kingdom of God, as in the Sermon on the Mount. This section began, generally, in the third person ("the disciple," ver. 24), and it only returns once to the direct style of address to the apostles (vers. 26–31), thence proceeding to the end with declarations quite general (with the exception of vers. 34 and 40, where, however, the apostles as such are not referred to alone—Whosoever shall confess me—He that loveth father or mother—He that findeth, etc. Here the condition of persecution which had been predicated of the apostolic period, is predicated as the permanent condition of his Church until the distribution of final rewards is seen in the farthest perspective. The continuous process and final issue of Christ's great cause are predicted as through warfare to victory; his kingdom is pre-announced as to all his subjects a Kingdom of the Cross, before the immeasurable rewards of glory are revealed. Such is the true method of this discourse, exhibiting its compact harmony, and progressive meaning; and it so entirely asserts its own unity, that even Olshausen in his exposition of what he calls this conglomeration of fragments in Matthew, involuntarily forgets his own opinion, and writes, for example on vers. 38–41, as if the Lord himself were speaking, and as if the "Redeemer himself were closing" a discourse with his own impressive conclusion.

If we look at the arrangement more in detail, we find that the first part (vers. 5–15) falls into a threefold subdivision: the commission, or sending, in the first, most distinctive sense; then, the equipment for it; then directions for their conduct in the execution of their commission. The sending—first of all, naturally, whither? vers. 5. 6 (with which, to indicate what is preliminary, we have at first, whither not). Then for what purpose? ver. 7, 8. (To preach the Gospel, in the power of miracles, and both perfectly free.) The equipment (vers. 9, 10), is likewise negative; partly in contrast with future times, partly as typical of them. Finally, the directions for their conduct (vers. 11–15), rise in their confirmatory conclusion to a far-reaching anticipation of the issue of the judgment, which thus forms a transition to the next starting-point.

Verses 5, 6. This limitation to Israel is not announced by Luke (ch. x.) as prescribed to the Seventy; but it is to be understood in their case, and ver. 1 intimates it plainly enough.* Only whither he himself would come, could the Lord send messengers; apart from every other consideration, this only would have been befitting. For could the Messiah and the Saviour satisfy any man with his mere representatives? Could the true Shepherd hand over a lost sheep to mere servants? Thus it is only his coming after them (and in spirit going with them), that gives to these missionaries the authority and ground of their commission. What the Lord now says is in its due time solemnly revoked (Matt. xxviii. 19; Luke xxiv. 47; Acts i. 8); while, for the apostle to the Gentiles, the commission is simply reversed—Not to Jerusalem, but to the Gentiles! (Acts ix. 15; xxii. 18; xxvi. 17). Not beyond Israel's borders εἰς ὁδὸν ἐθνῶν, into the way that leads to the Gentiles; yet in the way of the Samaritans they may go, which passes through the midst of Israel, but not εἰς πόλιν, into no town or city of Samaria. Speaking to the Samaritans in the way or abroad, as in the Lord's own example (John iv.), was not interdicted to them.†

Christ himself as the promised Messiah was first of all a minister of the circumcision (Rom. xv. 8), and in his own mission was sent only to the lost sheep of the house of Israel, as he declares in ch. xv. 24, repeating his own words from ch. ix. 36, x. 6, with similar emphasis. In merciful fulfillment of the promised grace, to them must the Gospel first be preached, and, in the same mercy, to prevent their stumbling and rejection, to them alone. Hence the Lord remains within their borders, only he does not repel those heathen who made advances, and who were not repulsed by the Jews themselves.*

If we now ask, what is the internal spirit and meaning of this decision, revoked indeed in the letter, for all future apostolic missions; the answer is near at hand. The first consideration to one who is sent of the Lord must ever be, that the immediate sphere of his activity should be accurately prescribed to him, and that he should know with precision whither he must not go, whither also he must. The wisdom of God in sending forth his servants (Matt. xi. 19; Luke xi. 49), deals ever in various methods and degrees as was the case with Christ, who chose for himself at first the narrowly limited, already prepared sphere of his influence; who formed within this, from among the susceptible and worthy, the germ of his great work, and afterwards provided for its furthest and utmost development. This is the character of the commission of his messengers also. There are for them those that may be called Samaritans and Gentiles, spiritually understood; in order that they may not transgress, presumptuously and rashly, the limits of their specific mission for the present time. Even the apostle to the Gentiles, whose instructions embraced all men, was yet aware of the measure of a rule, of a district assigned to him by God, beyond which he would not allow himself to wander in his zeal εἰς τὰ ἄμετρα, without his measure (2 Cor. x. 13). And when we closely examine these words in relation to those who were sent to Israel, we find even among the people of Israel a selection made, and a still narrower restriction imposed. It was enjoined upon them, not only for the future, but for the first πορευέσθαι, or journey, that they should seek out the susceptible and already prepared among the people (comp. ver. 11). For such are, properly speaking, the lost sheep of the house of Israel (שֶׂה אֹבֵד, Psalm cxix. 176; צֹאן אֲבֵדוֹת, Jer. l. 6), which involves more than merely wandering from home, comp. Matt. xviii. 12 with 14; scattered abroad, indeed, without shepherds; abandoned each one to his own erring way in which, unless sought after, he must perish, and thus to all intents lost; but sheep still, who let themselves be found by the shepherd. In a certain sense all Israel is, by calling, the Lord's flock; yet in the midst of Israel there are true sheep to be sought out, who need only the shepherd. The wolves of ver. 16, at least, have not the peace of the kingdom at once offered to them: even the good Shepherd distributed to them their "woe," instead of "blessed;" if perchance they might hear his voice even in that. We think then, that the Lord here in Matthew does in reality speak of the sheep in the same sense as in John's Gospel (chap. x. 26, 27). It must be remembered, however, that the servant is not justified in saying of any that they are not the lost sheep, until it is most decisively proved that they hear not the seeking voice. Where we are constrained to suppose that we have to do with such lost sheep, our commission is bound upon us by the great Shepherd, and is to be executed, as is necessarily implied, in the compassionate spirit of that Shepherd; not in the spirit of rebuke and condemnation, not proffering the word of faith in the spirit of a keen and impatient alternative, but in the spirit of patient invitation and allurement, going after them without weariness, until the lost are found.

* So that Olshausen's observation, that Luke, as writing for the Gentiles, would suppress this circumstance, seems to be incorrect.

† Although, indeed (as Braune remarks), the apostles would have been equally at a loss, at that time, in dealing rightly with the Samaritans as in dealing with heathen—and would have, we may suppose, disputed with them to no purpose.

* It is in perfect ignorance of the fundamental ideas of Scriptural truth, that men like Gfrörer would save the liberality of Jesus by the assumption that only the Ebionitish spirit has imposed this limitation on the Lord's words. We cannot but observe how readily these people detect the roots of Christianity in a Judaism and primitive Christianity of their own imagining; how slow they are to seek them in the Old Testament.

Verses 7, 8. Πορευόμενοι δὲ κηρύσσετε, And as ye go, preach, is not a tautological repetition of ver. 6, but has its distinctive meaning—Proclaim on the way, travelling round, going further and further, from one city of Israel to another, and announce that the kingdom of heaven is at hand! Afterwards in ver. 11 it is pre-supposed that after some tarrying, they are always to continue their journey. This was the case, in the most literal sense, on their first mission; but it was also, in a more extended degree, characteristic of their full apostolical office, which was thus distinguished from a pastoral connection with some particular place or district. Apostles must ever be itinerant preachers; to found and constitute churches is their province, but not to govern them individually afterwards. When Paul remained beyond a year in any one place, it is announced as something special; and we may assume the same with regard to the others, and their continuance in Jerusalem at the first was specially ordered. The substance of their first preaching in the towns of Israel, coincides, on the whole, with that of the Baptist's (ch. iii. 2), and with the simple, preliminary announcement of Jesus himself (ch. iv. 17); yet it is not without significance that the μετανοεῖτε, repent, is not found in it. For though they might not yet proclaim Jesus directly as the Messiah (ch. xvi. 20), yet the ground-tone of their announcement was not to be the severe summons to repentance, but rather the evangelical, "Peace be unto you: the kingdom of heaven is at hand, and will come even to you!" (Luke ix. 2, 6; x. 9, 11). The degree of knowledge which they had then reached, had ample scope for exercise; with the single restriction that they were not openly and publicly to preach the name of Jesus. We may suppose that they with difficulty restrained themselves to that message. The confident joy of their faith was not yet strong and free enough to correspond with their Gospel commission, and, contrary to its design, they rather declined to the Baptist's ground, as is intimated in Mark vi. 12. Yet more: John in the wilderness had already announced that the forgiveness of sins was to follow his baptism of repentance (Mark i. 4; Luke iii. 3, i. 77); but they made the preaching of repentance predominant in the Gospel which was committed to their charge, and thought they gave it only its due, until they better seized the design of their commission—repentance and forgiveness of sins (Luke xxiv. 47). These are now both embraced, for all time to come, in the "preaching of the kingdom of God" (Acts xxviii. 23, 31, xx. 25); and that it is called the kingdom of heaven from the very beginning, forbids for ever all intermixture with the affairs of the kingdoms of this world.

The additional authority to work miracles, was needful to them as an authentication now at the beginning; for who would have believed these fishermen and publicans without some such credentials? The Lord afterwards confirmed their word by signs following, until this in the course of time became unnecessary for their successors, and the demonstration of spiritual power in the cure of the soul's sickness took its place. The article is not in the original, but being inserted in our translation, "heal the sick," etc., excites a false idea, as if they were to heal all the sick whom they found, whereas they were only directed, following their Master's example, to heal such as desired it. In respect to the "raising of the dead," we find this sentence wanting in [many of] the most ancient manuscripts; it is transposed by the Vulgate and Syriac; and is inserted, neither in verse 1 nor in the parallel places of Matt. and Luke (comp. Luke x. 9, 17). It ought certainly, according to the true gradation, to have followed as the climax upon casting out devils (comp. ch. xi. 5); and we hold it as a spurious importation from a later time, since nothing is found in the first part of the discourse which does not literally hold good of the first mission, and their weak faith could not then be entrusted with this greatest of powers.* The direction, in a certain sense admonitory, freely to give what was freely received, does not refer to the working of miracles alone, indeed only in a lesser degree to this, for none but a Judas Iscariot would ever harbor the idea of being paid. It embraces all that they have to impart, at once the exercise of their power to heal and their preaching of the kingdom, indicating both as grace to be freely offered. No gift of God's grace is to be bought and sold with money (Acts viii. 20), or as Tertullian says: "Nulla res Dei pretio constat"—a comprehensive and most pregnant position, which cannot be too much laid to heart by God's ambassadors even to the present day: condemning all improper methods and commercial stipulations in preaching God's grace, all payment that surpasses the limits of their need (ver. 10), and all those unbecoming perquisites which are ungracefully attached to the direct ministration of the word and sacraments.

* Lange, indeed, defends the sentence by arranging the ideas thus: Help ye the poor in life (the sick) even unto raising them from the dead; the impure even unto driving devils out of them! But our main point is that here, at the outset of his instructions, as is proved by the subsequent part, the Lord does not only "speak symbolically," or with symbolical reference, but rather with a directly literal application of his words. As we could not conceive it said at ver. 1 that he gave them power over the dead, no more can we conceive it at ver. 8.

Verses 9, 10. The disciples might have supposed, after the command which they had received, that they must amply provide and equip themselves for such an enterprise; but the Lord forbids this: Make no express provision for yourselves at all; go forth without any further care, even as ye now are! This is the general meaning of these expressions, which in their literal sense were adapted to this wandering mission; and Mark and Luke, even in their very brief statement, make very prominent this specific prohibition of all equipment for their journey. What each man then had, he might take; but purvey nothing to be taken on the way: μὴ κτήσῃσθε—Mark μηδὲν αἴρωσιν εἰς ὁδόν, so also Luke. Equipment for a journey consists especially of three things—money, food, raiment. In Matthew the first is made very emphatic, since all the three kinds of metallic currency are mentioned (in Mark only χαλκός, brass, in Luke ἀργύριον, silver, for money generally), and the girdles also which served as βαλάντια, or purses, (Luke x. 4). This πήρα, or wallet ("scrip"), is according to Suidas, θήκη τῶν ἄρτων, a receptacle for loaves, hence the two other Evangelists mention also bread. The ὑποδήματα, sandals, of Matt. (not as opposed, according to Lange, to "hard travelling-boots") are manifestly a second pair provided for change, in the same manner as the two coats. (Compare Mark, which explains Luke xxii. 35.) Finally, the anticlimax descends to the minutest particular: He who does not possess a staff, is not to provide himself one by purchase (for all in Matt. hangs on the κτήσεσθε). Thus Mark and Matthew are simply at one in this, as also in respect to the shoes.* Many incorrectly think here (e.g. Sepp and Roos, relying on extensively circulated information) of a difference between the staff for defence and the staff for leaning on; and even (as Grotius) of a second staff not to be provided, as in the case of the coats and shoes; but who ever takes with him a supernumerary staff? The reading ῥάβδους, staves, in Matt. and Luke is a gloss that has taken its rise from this misunderstanding, which, not entering into the simple sense, would thus do away with the apparent contradiction to Mark. Their harmony lies in this, as has recently been rightly said, that the staff touches the extreme limit of what was really necessary to be taken with them and to be procured; but not even this was to be bought, if it were not possessed already; which is the same thing as Mark's taking it, if it were.

But this prohibition of all provision is, if narrowly examined, itself a glorious equipment; for he who thus forbids, thereby permits and commands them to expect in faith what they need; and to be fully assured beforehand of what they afterwards (Luke xxii. 35) were constrained to confess—that they should lack nothing. The Lord expressly makes prominent the foundation of promise in this prohibition—For the workman is worthy of his meat! The word laborer looks back to ch. ix. 37; the Lord of the harvest, will not permit the laborers whom he sends, to hunger. It is, first of all, a common proverb, which the Lord, as his wont is, dignifies and raises to its highest meaning; but then it is also a word of Scripture, as Paul cites it, I Tim. v. 18, scarcely meaning by his ἡ γραφή, the Scripture, the Lord's own words, but referring generally, as he is speaking of reward, to Deut. xxiv. 14, 15; comp. James v. 4. On another occasion our Lord also uses the expression hire or reward (Luke x. 7); in substituting meat here for hire, he has Num. xviii. 31 in his view, where the reward of the Levite's service is that they obtain what to eat; and Paul (1 Cor. ix 13, 14) appeals to the agreement and the Old-Testament right and the words spoken by Christ to his apostles. The workman shall receive his meat—that which is needful and convenient to him, in order to his working, but nothing more; that is, hire and yet no hire. He who does not work, may not eat; but he who does not eat, cannot work. The Lord will charge himself with the care of this when extraordinary missions are concerned; and it is his engagement to provide this hire for those whom he sends, and through human means where these may suffice. Consequently it is a narrow perversion, and mere fanaticism of the letter, with which the Spirit has nothing to do, to impose upon preachers to Christian congregations or missionaries among the heathen, literal obedience to these prescriptions of our Lord.* Our Lord never afterwards imposed it upon his apostles in its literal sense, as he himself explains it in Luke xxii. 36. See

* We leave it altogether undecided whether (according to Lange) Mark aimed beforehand to remove a misunderstanding which was likely to arise from the literal apprehension of the original expression.

* As in a book, which made much stir in its time: Irving's Missionary School after Apostolical Institution.

2 Cor. xi. 8; 3 John 5–8. Even the Gossner missionaries have humbled themselves from their proud humility, and been constrained in their regulations to admit the needful contributions of Christian brotherly-kindness: indeed they did not refuse even formerly the guineas offered them in London, because they might carry no money in their scrip; and probably many a one set out from Berlin with his πήρα, or knapsack packed with more than a single χιτῶν, or garment. "For needful use Christ himself had money, bag, and bread-basket too" says Luther. The spirit and meaning of this first typical mission and its accompanying instructions, as it was intended to be ever developed in the Church, is no other than what the great and disinterested apostle teaches us in 1 Cor. ix. It tells us ever that flesh must not be our arm, that we must not put our confidence in any mere external equipment and outfit; that we must lean upon no other staff than that with which the Lord furnishes us and sends us forth; that we must restrict our necessities as much as possible, and go on our pilgrim and witness way as disentangled and free as may be. Thus, indeed, it does teach us that there should be no rich livings in the Church for any man, no high salaries, no gentleman-outfit for heathen lands, but—the workman is worthy of his meat, and there it ends. What in these first missionary instructions is to be retained for all times and for all altered circumstances, the Spirit, who giveth ears to hear the true meaning of Christ, will teach; and from him may it be learned by all preachers, and bishops, and messengers to the heathen, and missionary committees!

In verses 11–15, the further directions for their conduct in their preaching office, especially for apostles or travelling evangelists with a special call, contain prescriptions as well for the commencement as for the issue of the testimony which they are to bear for the kingdom of God. For the commencement: Go ye—to whom? As far as ye know and can perceive; first of all even to the ἄξιοι, worthy, among whom the Lord has already been preparing your way! Secondly, how? With disinterested perseverance, avoiding all abrupt change, and restless wandering about from place to place! Finally, and this it the main point, with what? what have you to carry and to offer? Peace, in all the benevolence of the sinner-greeting mercy and love of God. The issue of this offer will be, even among those whom ye thought to be susceptible, that some will accept your peace and some will not. In this issue let it be your consolation, that the unbelief of the hearer shall do no harm to the true preacher; but let your action be, when the decision is final against you, to shake off the dust of your feet, and leave the scorners to the full and certain severity of judgment.

Verses 11, 12. What is here termed ἄξιος, worthy, the Lord afterwards in Luke x. expresses as υἱὸς εἰρήνης, son of peace, after the well-known Hebrew usage of בֵּן, son. They who in seeking peace already have its beginning, though concealed in a sense from themselves—the τεταγμένοι for πιστεύειν, or prepared for belief (Acts xiii. 48)—these are the sheep, who hear the voice; and to find out and gather together these, can be the only object of the apostle's office and testimony. These may be found sometimes afterwards even among the scorners; and he who has not yet despised, may be presumed to be capable of faith and willing to believe: but the regulation of the divine wisdom absolutely requires that those who are perceived to be ἄξιοι or strictly worthy, should be first addressed, in order that their faith may become a good foundation for further influence upon them. The question here is not of worthiness as such; they who are thus designated are such as are fitted, adapted, disposed, prepared, pre-arranged to hear and receive these words. Inquire who in it are worthy! What a difficult problem; one which, as the Lord presently anticipates, we never can resolve with perfect certainty: yet we should essay it, and sometimes it may fortunately happen that we can discover even from the world itself, who are the children of peace concealed among them. The prudent selection here commanded is the other side of the same precept which in chap. vii. 6 recommends the withholding holy things from dogs and swine. The abiding there till they go thence, that is, the seeking no other lodging,* was then literally prescribed to the disciples in opposition to the running about from place to place of the Jewish proselyte-makers; and that for many reasons: not to awaken the suspicion that they thought their entertainment not good enough—to teach them the necessity of acting so disinterestedly as never to leave their work half done, and think it accomplished when it is only begun—and to guard against their too quickly giving up those whom they have once addressed, as if they had not spoken to the right purpose. In its spiritual meaning this direction is opposed to all πολυπραγμοσύνη or officiousness, which begins in many places at once, holding out no where; it exhorts at the same time to quietness and as much collectedness as may be in the midst of their moving onwards with the Gospel, and condemns and forbids all suspicious changes of office and station among the servants of the Lord. It says: Abide till ye go thence, as ye were sent!

Salute the house, into which ye come: and what does that mean here? In Luke x. 4, it is forbidden to salute any man by the way, that is, with such kind of empty greeting as would cause delay and do no good: but the case now is quite different. So presently afterwards Luke (ver. 5) teaches what kind of greeting the Lord intends, just as Matthew in the next verse indicates by the coming of ἡ εἰρήνη ὑμῶν, your peace upon it: שְׁלוֹם לָךְ, or לָכֶם, Peace to thee or to you, was the Israelite's greeting; and this comprehensive and beautiful expression must be a reality on the lips of the messengers of the kingdom. They are messengers of peace, they bring with them and they publish peace; they would fain be to all, who receive their greeting, helpers of their eternal peace and perfect joy. For where, as among the Greeks, the salutation was χαίρειν, greeting, this word also becomes a reality in their mouth (James i. 1; Acts xv. 23): they adopt every good custom which might be a fit medium to express the benevolent, condescending love of God addressing itself to man. They wish good day, or good morrow with full sincerity whithersoever they come; and with heartfelt humiliation uncover their head, according to custom, yea, bend it more profoundly than others do, when their lowliness is understood. A servant of the Lord is truly courteous, for he has learned to be so in the high court of his King. When he has to beg, as the disciples then had, reception and entertainment, for his Lord's sake, he gives beforehand superabundant compensation out of the riches of the heavenly treasure which he has to offer. This word of our Lord condemns all such impropriety as obtrudes itself upon any man's house, without an amiable attention to laudable customs; all that official severity which, contradicting humility and love, so often repels; all that premature rigor of condemnation which has not paved its own way by gentleness and love. It is here that we discern the stamp of the new and gentle spirit of Christ. A prophet of the Old Testament, or the preacher in the wilderness, discharges at once his unqualified μετανοεῖτε, Repent! over all heads and against all hearts; but a New-Testament evangelist begins as a rule (for no rule is without an exception) in a different spirit. His whole introduction and exhibition of himself, and not merely the first words of his lips, should express the greeting of peace; so that wherever he goes, and as far as in him lies, his feet may be hailed as beautiful (Isa. lii. 7). This is the spiritual and internal meaning of this direction, which, as given to the apostles at their preliminary mission, indicated that their commission bore the relation of an introductory, preparatory greeting, to the subsequent μαθητεύειν and διδάσκειν, discipling and teaching (ch. xxviii. 19, 20). But it further teaches us in every age that this latter also should always be preceded by the introduction of the greeting of peace.

* The prohibition to accept invitations (as we read in Sepp), is not to be thought of.

Verses 13, 14. House is in this place, as in the former verse, equivalent to family, or the occupants, of the house (John iv. 53; 1 Cor. xvi. 15; Phil. iv. 22). That the Lord, after having spoken in ver. 11 of an individual τίς ἄξιος, who is worthy, should now enlarge the idea to embrace the whole house, is important as hinting to us that whenever it is possible we should embrace men in their family relations, and make it our object to convert not only souls, but families to Christ; even as the apostles did from the day of Pentecost onward (Acts ii. 39). The Lord speaks of the house as worthy, and thus comprises those who belong to it in one person at the beginning; although afterwards in the decisive progress and result, he could speak the very different words of vers. 21, 35, 36. If it be not worthy —for ye will ofttimes mistake, and bring your greetings of peace to those who are not children of peace—then the error of your love, which is always far better than mistrustful suspicion, will do you no harm, for the peace which they reject, ye shall retain. The Lord does not merely promise this, but the words ἐλθέτω and ἐπιστραφήτω are imperatives which say: So regulate your conduct that both may take place! Let it be in your lips sincere and earnest, that he who will understand and accept it, may indeed find that peace: take heed, also, that ye do not sin against the unworthy, but may be able, with a pure and unsullied conscience, to take back the peace again. This prophecy, that such contradiction would happen to them, conducts us, at the close of the first division of the discourse, to the second period of the apostolical labor: hence we learn that in that period the apostles literally did what the Lord here prescribes for such a contingency (Acts xiii. 51; xviii. 6). And Paul himself did likewise; so that, as is implied in 1 Cor. ix. 14, this instruction of our Lord to his fellow apostles was known also to him. In those narratives we find, at the same time, a plain answer to the question, so difficult ordinarily in special circumstances to be decided, when it is permitted us to give up unbelievers, and, free from their guilt, to leave them and go on.

In this preliminary and greeting journey, the matter was at that time more easily and more quickly decided. The Lord says: In case any shall not receive you, nor even hear your friendly greeting (which pre-supposes that the object of their mission was generally known in Israel), depart out of that house, or, if all the houses did the same, out of that city entirely, and shake off the dust of your feet! This is a symbolical action of stern testimony (Mark vi. 11; Luke ix. 5), a sign, that must have its significant meaning. First of all, it is obvious that it declares—We take nothing from you, break off all fellowship with you, as Luke x. 11 explains it. That would give it to be understood—See, we have desired nothing that was yours (for this is only dust); we have not sought yours, but you! (2 Cor. xii. 14). And this meaning we may not entirely exclude. But in the heart of this testimony there lies, as ver. 15 shows us, the further consideration that they, taking back their peace, renounce all participation in the guilt of the contemners, and leave with them that guilt instead of their peace—We will not be partakers of your judgment, we have done our part to you, and can leave you with pure hands. Thus we find the explanation, Acts xviii. 6. Many have compared the symbolical denunciation of judgment in Nehem. v. 13, to which the shaking of the raiment in the Acts seems to refer; but that is quite another case, since Luke x. 11 indicates quite decisively, as the fundamental idea, a renunciation of fellowship, and their leaving the guilt behind them for judgment. (In 1 Kings ii. 5, the guilt of blood is regarded as attached to the shoes of the feet.) If, as it is at least probable, since the Lord could have referred so simply only to a well-known custom, it was the practice of the Pharisaical and proud Jews to shake off the dust of their feet when they came out of heathen countries, the Lord's commandment receives a new meaning, of most distinctive and significant force—Those who put from them your tidings of the kingdom of heaven, belong no more to the house of Israel (ver. 6), but are no better than heathen. This admirably suits the transition to the following division of the discourse, which announces the publication of the Gospel to the Gentiles through the Jews' rejection of it and persecution; as it also suits the more immediate transition to the following verse.

Verse 15. The first "Verily I say unto you" in this discourse, which forms the first concluding period, in order to pave the way for the prophecy of the future application which it will find in Israel, points far forward even to the day of judgment. For the ἡμέρα κρίσεως, day of judgment (especially with ἐκείνη, that, Luke x. 12), is evidently, even without ἐσχάτη, the last day (comp. Matt. vii. 22). Only at that day can a judgment await the inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah, long since dead in their sins, which would be more tolerable than that of unbelieving Israel. (Think on ch. viii. 11, 12.) The more detailed exposition of this pregnant expression we reserve for ch. xi. 22–24, where it recurs with twofold emphasis, and is established by the assignment of its ground. We now remark only that the design here is not to say, that all who then rejected the first message of the apostles would thereby incur an irreparable and fearful condemnation, but that with prophetic threats he sees in the beginnings of unbelief its consummation, without cutting off the possibility of subsequent conversion and mercy in particular cases. Yet those instances were probably very rare in which a house or a city (not to say a soul), that would not listen to the first tidings of the kingdom of heaven brought to them by the disciples, afterwards received the Gospel as preached by the Holy Ghost. For we must consider that this Israel is the people prepared by God, through long ages, for faith, and that since the appearance of John the Baptist, the testimony uttered amidst this people, had been confirmed by an ever-strengthening evidence of its divine truth; and consequently, that this unbelief, which had its root in a hereditary obduracy, could only end generally, and as a rule, in entire hardness of heart. It is only over Israel that the Lord commands the dust to be shaken off, and this may have its valid application again in Christendom:* thus to act in the case of the poor, blind heathen can scarcely be justifiable on the part of any Christian missionary.

Verse 16 very significantly marks the return of the thought from the first conclusion which pointed to the Day of Judgment, to another commencement in the words now first uttered, "I send you forth!" This expression speaks more openly than before, of a future, proper mission of those whom he has called his ἀποστόλους, apostles. It is to this point, consequently, that the distinction belongs, which the Lord himself afterwards made in Luke xxii. 35, 36. This mission he speaks of, from ver. 16 to ver. 23, by anticipation, and, indeed, in such expressions, as literally taken, could scarcely be even preparatorily understood, and certainly were not yet to have a present application; so that there is an actual contrast between this and the former fragment of the discourse. This apostolical mission, as is pre-supposed in this transition from the former and is expressly stated in ver. 23, was designed prominently, and first of all, for Israel; yet there is intimated in vers. 17, 18, a transition to a wider field. The simple relations of the first itineracy, the seeking a reception, with the greetings of peace, are now changed: the persecution of those whom he sends, and the rejection of their message is now predicted; this, indeed, is much more than the not receiving, and not hearing of ver. 14. Hence we find that the Lord begins now with what in the first address came second; he speaks of their further conduct on their rejection, vers. 16–20, and then of the further issues of his Gospel and kingdom in Israel (vers. 21–23). In the directions for their conduct the comprehensive statement comes first (ver. 16), which just hints at their commission and preparation for it; and in such a manner that a more definite direction is developed from it: (1) Beware! and that too, of men (ver. 17); for ye shall by Israel be brought before the Gentiles, ver. 18. (2) But take no thought! for the Spirit of your Father will speak in you, vers. 19, 20. And what is the further and full issue of this testimony? Contention and hatred instead of the proffered peace, the opposition of their enemies against the children of peace, who have accepted it, vers. 21–22; nevertheless, salvation and blessedness to all who endure, ver. 22. Finally, a continuous and unceasing preaching of the Gospel, through the permitted fleeing of the persecuted into other cities, until there is once more a retributive catastrophe, through the coming of the Lord following his apostles, and putting an end to this condition of things, ver. 23.

* Even in an intenser degree, when the matter is viewed as Roos views it: "If those were punished more severely than Sodom and Gomorrah, who, at a time when corrupt Judaism and Heathenism waged full war with Christianity, did not receive and hear one or two insignificant apostles coming to them for the first time; what shall be the doom of those who have had the entire Revelation of God's will in their hands for years, enjoyed both sacraments, had multitudes of calls and exhortations to enter the kingdom of heaven, and yet remain impenitent?" On the other hand there are circumstances in which all this loses its force, where the Gospel finds multitudes of people who are scarcely better than heathen, where, as Lange describes it, "only the steeple tells that Christianity is here."

Verse 16. We now have presented to us in the most striking manner, two sharp contrasts, which are designed to excite the attention to the full and far-reaching meaning of the whole prophetic discourse. The former of these is introduced by the intermediate I send you forth, and in this the latter also finds its solution. Both are figuratively expressed; the former by a general human similitude, the latter by symbols of its own, which are taken from the deep symbolism of Scripture. Sheep in the midst of wolves—thus is expressed the position in which the sent will find themselves; it is an ἐν μέσῳ, in the midst, which does not however stand merely for εἰς μέσον, into the midst. It is spoken in the style of Æsop, but it was also a well-known proverb among the Jews, as we see in Ecclus. xiii. 18, and the Shir Hashirim Rabba, c. 2, §. 14, where God thus speaks concerning his people among the heathen. To send the wolf among the sheep sounds very perilous, but here the poor defenceless sheep are sent, contrary, as it would seem, to all right and propriety, into the midst of the wolves! and not merely to live and tarry among them, but even to wage a war of conquest against them.* The wolves are, first of all, with a glance backwards to the Sermon on the Mount (ch. vii. 15), the false shepherds and prophets of the house of Israel, whose enmity Matt. ix. 34, shows us had already begun to break out against Jesus, and would be still more furiously excited against the continual Gospel preaching of the Lord and his apostles. But ver. 17 intimates also that it is the nature of men generally as well as of the wolves to oppose God's messengers with malicious hatred; and what is the safe-conduct for so perilous a mission, what the equipment for so unnatural a commission, as that of sheep against wolves? This is amply and superabundantly included and promised in the single fact, that the sheep have a Shepherd, who sends them forth, and cannot leave or neglect them in the mission which he imposes. He does not send them forth as wandering sheep, like those whom they are to seek out, and save from the fangs of the wolves (the mission is not to the wolves themselves),—but as those who well know the way wherein he would have them go. It is here—As my sheep! for that most expressive, emphatic, and majestic Ἐγώ must not be overlooked, with which this new section begins. In the preceding, the Lord's "I" only occurred at the close (ver. 15), in the Ἀμὴν λέγω ὑμῖν, Verily I say unto you; but from this point onwards, we find the terms "I—for my sake—for my name's sake—I say unto you—whosoever shall confess me—I am come," etc., in increasing frequency to the end, recurring three and twenty times. He sends his disciples even as he is sent by the Father: thus at last is ver. 40 connected with ver. 16.

With an οὖν, therefore, which is derived from the critical ἰδού, behold, and carries full conviction with it, prudence is first of all recommended to them; they must consider well in every emergency what is required. Does the sheep put any trust in the wolf? Then the apostles should not merely take care of themselves like simple sheep ordinarily, but actually unite the cunning of the most cunning animal in nature, the serpent, with their own simple nature as sheep. We find φρόνιμος, wise, in the Septuagint version of Gen. iii, as the Greek of עָרוּם, "subtile;" and certainly the Lord refers to that fundamental passage for the signification of the serpent. They have to do, in a world which is full of wolves, essentially with that one being, who is elsewhere called the wolf (John x. 12), preeminently; with that one enemy, who is spoken of afterwards in ver. 38; with serpents and scorpions and all the power of the old serpent, Luke x. 19. The great point then is, to see through the cunning of the enemy, to set wisdom against wisdom; certainly to be at least as wise as the serpents. Yet not simply so, for they would then be like the wicked, and could not overcome them; therefore is the other in a wonderfully striking way connected with it, to make the counterbalance preponderate, and render them wiser unto victory. What words are these, which express the deepest truth and wisdom by a conjunction of images apparently contradictory, but which by that very fact awaken and stimulate the thought to understand them! Who can forget a saying like this, after once having heard it? Who can but ponder and investigate it, if he hold it to be of any moment that the Lord thus spake? First of all, they are weak, defenceless sheep as he sends them forth; then he will have and make them wise as serpents: no sooner are they considered such, than he will have them also be as doves! What means this? The tertium comparationis ἀκέραιοι, harmless, has been much inspected, though often without that single eye which alone can see the truth in the Scripture. It has been expounded, through a misapprehension of the gloss of Eustath. ad Homer. μὴ τινα κεραΐζων i. e. βλάπτων, therefore innocens (Isa. xxvii. 4, "Fury is not in me," חֵמָה אֵין לִי). And even—a view into which the great Bengel has been misled—κέρας, a horn, has been imagined to be the root, as if it meant unhorned, without defensive weapons, which, however would be ἀκέραστος. (A marvellous idea, that the doves have no horns!) But defencelessness has been already hinted in the word sheep, and surely is not to be repeated. The antithesis to φρόνιμοι, wise, not only permits, but requires that we interpret it, as it has been beautifully and perfectly expressed in the German Bible, "simple or single;" though Luther's "without guile" is not incorrect, if it is well understood that it only takes away from the φρόνιμοι, wise, all wicked δόλος, guile (John i. 48). As sheep are opposed to wolves, so are doves and serpents, simplicity and cunning. It seems a necessity, therefore, arising out of the very spirit of the words, that we thus translate, even though there be a very obscure ἅπαξ λεγόμενον (expression but once occurring). Certainly ἀκέραιος is quite equivalent to ἀκέραστος, both being from κεράννυμι, i. e. unmixed; in the moral sense pure from all malice, without anger and hatred, without malevolent cunning that inflicts injuries (and what there is of truth in the gloss of Eustathius, μή τινα κεραΐζων, is to be regarded as no more than a consequence of this). Hesych, καθαρόν, ἄκακον—Eustath. ἁπλοῦς πραΰθυμος—as also Etym. Magn. and Schol. ad Eurip. Orest. 922, cf. Phœniss. 950, have ἁπλοῦς.) The dove is not merely defenceless, but innocent, it knows nothing but that it is only a simple dove, which timidly flies away, and can neither attack nor defend. And as in the reality which alone could serve the purpose of the figure, this attribute of the dove becomes mere folly (see Hos. vii 11, where Ephriam is כְּיוֹנָה פוֹתָה אֵין לֵב, "like a silly dove without heart,") the Lord qualifies this simple innocence by blending with it the serpent-wisdom just as he extracts the false, evil, devilish element from the serpent's cunning by the simplicity of the dove.* Taking both in their proper sense, we have the true wisdom of divine love, in which however, the dove (the Spirit of God, afterwards ver. 20) is superior to the old serpent. The article employed in the second simile—the serpents, the doves—directs attention to the profound significance of these types impressed upon the animal nature. And now let Rom. xvi. be compared, where in ver. 18 we find first the ἄκακοι, "simple," who are liable to be deceived by fair speeches, because they are only such; and then in ver. 19, in the same sense as our Lord, the ἀκέραιοι εἰς τὸ κακόν, "simple concerning evil," who do not neglect to be σοφοὶ εἰς τὸ ἀγαθόν, "wise unto that which is good;" further, Phil ii. 15, and 2 Cor. i. 12, are also essential parallels.

* According to Clem. Rom. ep. 2. ad. Cor. Peter here asked: What then, if the wolves rend the lambs? and Jesus answered: Then the lambs, when they are dead, will have nothing more to fear from the wolves! an addition the apochryphal and inharmonious character of which is apparent at once.

But what a marvellous and is this, which requires the union of the wisdom of the serpent with the simplicity of the dove! This is easily commanded, we may say, but only pursued and attained with great difficulty. Difficult, indeed, it is, and requiring long practice; but he who requires it bestows it also—he alone who, in sending his servants forth, equips them for their mission. If thou wouldst see this wonderful union in its perfect exhibition, contemplate him; let him ever send thee forth anew, that his spirit and mind may be thine: so will he make thee what he requires thee to be; he will give thee wisdom to neutralize the cunning of Satan, and simplicity for thy single aim in the love and peace of God—a sound and single eye, penetrating without folly the depths of the world's and man's corruption, with a pure and honest heart overcoming every where evil by good; "so that thy wisdom shall never degenerate into cunning, nor thy simplicity into ignorance."

It is true, indeed, in one point of view, as Rothe says in his Ethik. (iii. 345), that "the true wisdom is the simplicity of the dove." Yet has the Lord, on the other hand, conjoined them by an and, and even placed the wisdom of the serpent first. Rothe himself acknowledges this as almost the most difficult of our Lord's requirements, modifies afterwards his former expression, and reproduces it in another form, that for us (who are never perfect in full and pure simplicity) the one must ever be the corrective and complementary test of the other—the true simplicity of the dove can never be, and may never be, without the wisdom of the serpent.

With this in view the following verses may be thus distributed—Beware of men, in whom the serpent fights against you, with the wisdom of the serpent—But take no thought, speak what the Spirit of your Father speaketh in you, with dove-like simplicity. Prudently taking heed, assuredly, but yet without care: thus the latter has the emphasis, so that we might say with Braune, "if there be any failure, let it be in the wisdom." It is presupposed, however, that there need be no failure, even in this.—On their first mission the disciples found but little occasion for this preparation (although the Lord afterwards, Luke x. 3, 4, in sending the Seventy, repeats, not indeed the word concerning the serpents and doves, but not concerning the lambs and the wolves, in the same sense, connecting it with the prohibition of purse and scrip). This time they returned to him unhurt without having been brought before the judgment or scourged,* but it will be far otherwise in the future, and our Lord gives them to know this beforehand, that when it shall come to pass, and he is removed from them, they may ponder his words (John xvi. 1–4).

Verses 17, 18. We have already seen the significant connection of this warning and prophecy with the whole discourse. This taking heed of men—even among God's chosen Israel, not merely of the open or concealed wolves (προσέχετε as in ch. vii. 15), but of human spirit and nature generally, its contradiction and enmity—is just what had been spoken of as the wisdom of the serpent. True theology teaches that all men are false. God's last and perfect exhibition of grace to Israel, the consummation of all his preparatory dealings, has made it manifest, alas, that the Israelites are only men, like all the Gentiles.* This expression already leads the way to the afterwards definitely announced transition of the Gospel to the heathen; and it also brings out the great truth, which, though not precisely exhibited at first in the case of Cornelius, has yet on the whole been universally attested, that Israel itself, rejecting the Word, turned it to the Gentiles; even as it was at the very beginning prophesied by Moses (Deut. xxxii. 21), with a yet more distant glance at the final re-action of the conversion of the heathen upon the Jews themselves. The Lord repeats in Matt. xxiii. 34, xxiv. 9, and especially almost word for word in Mark xiii. 9, etc., that which he now intimates to the apostles for the first time, as awaiting them in the future—compare especially Mark's tenth verse interposed as a further explanation. The delivering up to the συνέδρια, or councils (comp. on ch. v. 22), refers rather to the ordinary judicial process of the magistracy; but the scourging in the synagogues indicates the excited, irregular and tumultuous rage of the people as the impelling cause, and Acts xxii. 19, is a voucher that this generally was their lot:† finally, before ἡγεμόνας, "governors" (Proconsuls, Proprætors, Procurators), and even βασιλεῖς, "kings" (as happened to Paul in the Acts, and in Rome, for the Roman Cæsars, it is well known, were often called βασιλεῖς). This is, on the one hand, a prophecy of persecution even unto death, which the Jews could compass only by delivering them over to the Gentile authorities; and, on the other hand, an anticipation of the rising grandeur into which his kingdom was to be developed notwithstanding all such opposition. Deeply significant is the antithesis, lowly in its grandeur, between the princes and kings of this world and that "For my sake" which he now utters, and which would remind the disciples of ch. v. 11. He himself, who thus speaks, will stand before the judgment seat and the council, before Herod and Pilate, though he does not openly say so; and thus shall it be also with his ambassadors after him. Their history is silent upon the fulfillment of these words in a multitude of special instances. Εἰς μαρτύριον, for a testimony, has a double meaning, according as it is referred to αὐτοῖς, to ("against") them, the Israelites, or to τοῖς ἔθνεσιν, the Gentiles. To the rejecting accusers and persecutors it is a testimony for their own condemnation, for a manifestation of their guilt and enmity to the truth (as Luke ix. 5). To the Gentiles, who thus hear the word, it will be a testimony, instrumental in winning their conviction and believing acceptance when in progress of time the accused (as follows in vers. 19, 20) shall thus boldly and explicitly uphold their embassage and their preaching. In the latter discourse (ch. xxiv.), εἰς μαρτύριον takes a wider range, and intimates the unbelief of the great mass of the Gentiles also. Therefore the twofold result of their testimony is blended into one, in order to teach the apostles what their office is to be in all circumstances —to testify before every man, whether before kings in judgment halls, or the Gentiles generally. To hold fast this aim with steadfastness is the simplicity of the dove, which knows of nothing but the truth; and this direction to hold fast, under all emergencies, their testimony—a direction which is all the stronger because given in the form of an indirect supposition—serves as a point of transition to what follows.

* The being wise as serpents (not guilty in their cunning) is something very different from being cunning as Satan (which should never be spoken of)—see upon this Daub in Judas Ischarioth, i. 179–181.

* Scarcely could king Herod have had an apostle seized and brought before him as Braune holds to be at least possible.

Verses 19, 20. We naturally care more about the how than about the what; and in the injunction to act with the wisdom of serpents there is included a recommendation of such a careful, thoughtful, discreet management of the how of our testimony as will secure its being truly impressive and convincing. The witnesses are bound to prepare themselves, in greater and in lesser things, for the due discharge of their official testimony; as the Lord himself teaches by these directions and warnings so explicitly given long before. The essential what, or the substance of their testimony, which must ever be the same and unchanged, the simplicity of the dove itself takes for granted: he who is anxious about that, and fears that he may not understand and utter it aright, may well fear that all is not right with him. Such weakness may however exist, amid the terrors of the world's might: therefore the Lord says in his gracious condescension, πῶς ἢ τί, how or what, and includes both in τί, what, in his subsequent promise.* In Luke xxi. 14, 15 this is again

* "Sirach's counsel is very good: Take heed of thy friends! (Ecclus. vi. 13). But the warning of the Gospel goes yet beyond that: Προσέχετε ἀπὸ τῶν ἀνθρώπων" (Hamann).

† Thus the explanation of the συναγωγαί which Grotius sought in judicial assemblies, is useless and incorrect. Lange, however, comes nearer: "Now in the form of solemn ceremonial, judicial assemblies, now in the shape of zealot tumults"—though this latter is too strongly expressed.

* Hamann lays great stress on the precedence of the πῶς, and says, "It is not of so much consequence, what or how much, children, and we men generally may know; but all important how. It shall be given you first of all, and especially, how, and afterwards what ye should speak. This order seems to us men to be inverted; but it is certainly God's own, and sanctified by his use in all his ways." More ingenious and paradoxical than altogether true: for the what must ever be presupposed, and the how follows the specific what in every particular case.

yet more indefinitely spoken of, and Luther has there made the how prominent. Both must be pondered at certain times, the how and the what; yet not in such unbelief of the fear of man as to border on μεριμνᾶν, being anxious, "taking thought," or as it is in Mark xiii. 11, προμεριμνᾶν and μελετᾶν, that is, anxiously meditating beforehand for the coming emergency, and in Luke xxi. 14 yet more plainly προμελετᾶν. This is as absolutely forbidden to those who speak in faith and by faith are furnished for their speaking, as the previous provision of money had been; although diligent prayer for wisdom is of course supposed to be enjoined, the neglect and contempt of which would be no other than a vain presumption which blindly looks only at the present moment. The greater the necessity, the more extraordinary, important and unlooked for the circumstances may be, the more careful should be the preparation for them in humble, believing appeal to Him, who sends his servants, who furnishes them for their task, and who works in them. To us poor and infirm successors of the apostles it is not only conceded that we may meditate and even commit to memory our ordinary discourses, but it is made incumbent on us as a duty according to the measure of our infirmity: but when that which is predicted of the apostles in ὅταν παραδιδῶσιν ὑμᾶς, when they deliver you up, shall befall us also, then may we too, instead of our usual provision, lay claim to our interest in the promise given to the apostles. It shall be given you in that same hour, in which you need it. The same had of old been said to Moses (Exod. iv. 12), how much more confidently may Christ's disciples expect it! Given you from above, from God who giveth all that which, we having received, can only dispense (previously in ver. 8): and it is added τί λαλήσετε, what ye shall speak, in which στόμα and σοφία, mouth and wisdom (Luke xxi. 15), the how and the what are included. The Lord so unites them because the what given from above brings with it in the confident utterance of the lips, the how also in every case (that how not being merely the words and their form); or, in other words, out of the simplicity of the firmly maintained testimony, out of the pure surrender of the soul to the influence of the Spirit, the true wisdom as to the medium and form of that testimony must necessarily flow. The promise of the Spirit, who was to speak by the apostles, is here again an exponent anticipating the later, and properly apostolical mission; for in John xv. 26, 27 the same promise is still given as for the future.* The Spirit of your Father—for in this discourse, as well as in that on the Mount, and every where else, the Lord can only say, Your Father or My Father, never Our Father. The strong assurance—It is not ye that speak, but the Spirit—pre-supposes as its condition their full consecration in faith, without anxiety and without any mixture of their own work. Here is foreshadowed the great fundamental idea which pervades the whole of the following representations, and especially the third part of the discourse, viz: that in the great conflict and antagonism of Christ's followers and witnesses with the world, their individual personality vanishes. As in all their enemies there is one enemy and adversary (ver. 28), so in the disciples generally it is the Lord himself, it is in their words, the Spirit who testifies to the world—and even in their persons, for their office sake, the Lord is present (ver. 40).

Verses 21, 22. He who in ver. 8 could say, Heal the sick, and cast out devils! will not ensure these embassadors against impeachment and persecution. He who afterwards (verse 29, 30) assures them that not a sparrow falleth to the ground, or a hair from their head, without their Father's knowledge and permission, now plainly foretells that the persecution of his servants and dependents will proceed to the full extreme; and, further, that it will be permitted of the Father, being his counsel and purpose that thus it should be with his kingdom on earth. And what is here predicted concerns not the apostles and first witnesses merely as such, but all who with them believe, all who are Christ's in common; in verse 24, this universal application is openly expressed. Ye shall be hated, was already spoken in ch. v. 11 to all disciples. And see, further, the repetition of it for the most distant future (Matt. xxiv. 9–13; Mark xiii. 12, 13). The too curious investigations, as to whether this or that single expression in these various parallel passages, as we read them in the Gospels, may have slipped back from the later into the earlier discourses, cannot affect the question, it certainly cannot invalidate the truth of our representation given, for it must remain certain, that the Lord in his earlier teaching would more or less explicitly foretell the same things, which naturally were condensed into one great prophecy at the last for his apostles. In verse 21, there is a threefold gradation: first, the brother hates the brother even to death; then, parents their children; and, finally, which most contradicts natural ordinances, even children their parents. The martyrologies of the first age of the Church's history give the fulfillment. Ἐπαναστήσονται, shall rise up against, probably refers to their coming forward as accusers or witnesses (hence not sister and mother, but brother and father), which follows the delivering them up, and has death for its result: yet not without the general adjunct idea that they shall revolt against them; and therefore it is placed, where its exhibition would be most striking and fearful, in connection with the children's delivering up their parents.* Why, then, are they thus hated? For my name's sake, to which ye bear witness, even though there be no other evil thing found in you, but rather whatever is excellent and honorable (Acts xxvi. 9, iv. 17). Vir bonus, sed malus, quia Christianus; "a good man, yet a bad one, because a Christian." Wherefore, then, is this permitted? Luther seizes the central idea well in his translation—Ye must be hated: for as the third part of the discourse brings prominently forward with detail and emphasis, the fundamental principle of his kingdom, that the fidelity of believers must be tested in conflict (vers. 32, 33, 37–39); so is it pre-announced in this concluding period concerning enduring to the end, which recurs so emphatically in the subsequent discourses of our Lord. What is the end? First of all and especially, though without excluding the wider significance of the typical word (Rev. ii. 10, 26), it is that catastrophe which comes within the horizon of the second part of the discourse, and is indicated as a "coming of the Son of Man;" and therefore the σωζεσθαι is the being saved from the impending judgment; as it is also in ch. xxiv. 22. For that the Lord, up to this point, makes the condition of things, as it will be developed in Israel, the foundation of his prophecy for all times, we see immediately in the termination of this section, which leads the way to the commencement of a discourse that has a wider scope.

* We may not, however, say simply with Joh. von Müller (starting from the idea of our present theory): "Here is the evidence of the divinity of the Apostolical Epistles!" For the inspiration of Scripture is still, according to all Scripture itself, something more than this, in its narrowest circle yet more unconditional than the guidance of the Holy Ghost in common life and discourse. Compare our exposition of John xvi. 13.

Verse 23. Verily I say unto you—this occurs just three times in this discourse, marking the close of its three periods: at ver. 15 concerning judgment, at ver. 42 concerning reward, and here?—concerning a coming of the Son of Man which promises both at once, the punishment of his enemies, and the redemption and deliverance of his people from all straits, and from all oppression. In ch. xvi. 28, and Mark ix. 1 may be seen a clear confirmation of this view, which suits the whole context in this place, as we have traced it. The Lord here (taking us back at the conclusion to his first words, "I send you forth"), speaks of his coming as a judicial and final coming, as always when it is spoken of as still impending after his first coming; nevertheless, he speaks particularly of that day of the Son of Man, which in the destruction of Jerusalem typified the last day. Till the Son of Man come, and put an end to Israel—that end for which ye must patiently wait—and make ready for his kingdom a new and free revelation to the Gentiles. This great catastrophe is in the solemn prophecy of ch. xxiv. regarded throughout as a type of the final doom, so that many of the details in both wonderfully correspond. That great external tribulation which then came upon Jerusalem and the cities of Israel, was already less tolerable than the swift and instant judgment upon Sodom, and thus furnished a historical picture of what the Lord testified above in verse 15. In general, Hofmann (in his Weissagung und Erfüllung, ii. 267) is quite right, in holding that only the coming of the Son of Man in judgment, authority, and majesty can here be understood, and that thus the discourse must foretell the opposition of Israel—Verily I say unto you, ye shall not, thus fleeing from one city to another, accomplish your work in the cities of Israel (τελεῖν, that is, according to the apostolical aim, subjugate them); my (first) judgment must precede Israel's general conversion. All very true, but the typical fulness of the perspective figures must not exclude the more immediate reference. As the coming of the Lord to Jerusalem points onwards to the last judgment, so had that coming itself its faint type in the Lord's following his disciples to the places whither he had sent them on this first mission of all. This is expressly mentioned in the case of the Seventy (Luke x. 1), as here Matt. xi. has intimated it in the case of the Twelve. Thus much of truth is there in that exposition which feebly and incorrectly refuses to find anything beyond this in it.* How can we suppose this to suffice for the counterpart of verse 15, for the assurance of final reparation, judgment, and salvation, after such things as were to precede in verse 17–22! and indeed, strictly speaking, the Lord was not then to come to his messengers, but they were to come back to him (Mark vi. 30; Luke x. 17). He now speaks literally and strictly concerning the later period (for that they could not in a few weeks travel through, and flee through, the cities of Israel, it was not now necessary to tell them); but by obvious analogy his word would be felt, by those to whom he promises his coming after having sent them away, to contain some slight reference to the immediate present. The fundamental idea, therefore, in which all relations, the earliest as well as the latest, reflect each other, consists in this—Go ye, whither I now send you forth; persevere in patient performance of your duty in preaching and testifying through all persecution; ye may comfort yourselves with the assured hope, that I myself will come after for salvation and judgment. For every one sent forth by the Lord only enters again into the office of his forerunner; it is the Lord alone who makes every proclamation, confirms all preaching, and demonstrates it with his power, whether unto salvation or judgment.

Let it be further observed that the Lord not merely permits but even requires the flying of the persecuted from one city to another;† not

* It was taken from the place in Micah vii. 6, afterwards in verse 35 more fully cited—see there the Septuagint.

* Alas, even Bengel, against whose interdum dormitare we must, with all our reverence, be on our guard.

† Bengel holds a reading for genuine which adds to this text: And if they also persecute you in this, flee yet to another, a third.

indeed to keep silence and lie concealed, but that they may again preach there also, where new persecution will assail them. Ye shall not have finished the cities of Israel, that is, have been able to preach the Gospel and execute that commission in them all, for which ye are sent (Luke iv. 43)—there is not merely refuge implied, but that it will still be the region of official labor. That Israel remained (not merely, according to the old tradition, twelve years after the day of Pentecost, but till the destruction of Jerusalem) the assigned district of the labors of the apostles of the circumcision, is here declared again in an enlargement, for the second period, of the command given in vers. 5, 6, for the first; and with this agrees the arrangement of the words in Acts i. 8 (where ἕως ἐσχάτου τῆς γῆς, like אַפְסֵי אָרֶץ in the prophets, designates, first of all, the limits of the land, as a type of the ends of the earth), as well as the practice of the apostles. That only the cities, moreover (equivalent to πόλεις καὶ τόποι, Luke x. 1, καὶ κώμαι, Matt. ix. 35) are mentioned, is to be interpreted (as it may be almost superfluous to intimate again): You cannot accomplish your mission in the cities, much less with all the individual souls that dwell therein.* This then is true in the widest sense, inasmuch as no mission will thus accomplish the design of preaching throughout the earth (and must, after all, be content with at least bringing its testimony to every people) before the Son of man comes, that yet once more, that is, in an intermediate future time before the final coming, Israel will be converted and by their means not only the πλήρωμα of the Gentiles (for which alone up to this time arrangements had been made; see Rom. xi. 25), but all their might and multitude will be brought in.

The third division of the discourse comprises in its vision the remote and full end, promising by its third "verily" a corresponding reward to come at the same time with the judgment. And now rises into full prominence, released from the immediate present and the nearest future, the most essential prophecy, as concerning Christ himself, whose cross (ver. 38) is mentioned for the first time, so vital for all his followers in the way of their faith and testimony, and for the great and long enduring conflict of his kingdom unto victory. As the second part took its commencement from the conclusion of the first, so it is with this in relation to the second. First we have in vers. 23, 24, the key-note of the whole —As it happens to me, the Lord himself, so will it to my disciples! This discourse may be thus distributed: the warfare is noticed up to ver. 31, but from vers. 32 onwards the issue through warfare unto victory is more definitely indicated, in its necessity and in its security. We must ask permission once more to adopt, in our more detailed exposition, the form of our arrangement as before given, whose subdivisions, thoughtful readers, who grasp the form in the spirit when it is rightly given, will not be disposed to quarrel with.

I. The impending conflict (vers. 24–31).

1. The following of Christ incumbent upon all his disciples in conflict and opposition. He who was to follow (ver. 23), also goes before; he himself opens and closes the long procession of his people, his true Israel, through the world and history. (Isa. iii. 12: הֹלֵךְ לְפָנֶיכֶם וּמְאַפְּפֵיכֶם, He goeth before you and is your rere-ward.

A. The general position precedes: a. Negative (ver. 24); b. Positive ἀρκετὸν τῷ μαθητῇ, enough for the disciple (ver. 25).

B. A single example given for explanation, taken from the past, whereby the disciples might note what was before them: They have called him Beelzebub! (ver. 25). For see ch. ix. 34, xii. 24. Yet he was not diverted by that, but continued his testimony and sent forth his witnesses: hence transition to

2. The imitation of Christ in unfaltering proclamation, yea, with ever-increasing publicity; so that after his own testimony has ceased the preaching becomes more effectual, aspiring towards, and aiming at, the goal and end which will make every thing manifest.

A. The fundamental note first: Fear not! (ver. 26).

B. But speak out! a. The general fundamental law, which, in every sense (as the exposition will show) demands this (ver. 26); b. Therefore with ever-increasing openness and clearness.

C. The same in detail: Fear not! Now, as the discourse progresses, it discloses more and more: a. That one only fear, of one only and real enemy, is profitable and necessary (ver. 28); b. But in the contest with him, trust confidently in the Father! (vers. 29–31).

II. The certain issue unto victory (vers. 32–42). This, however, is not declared immediately and without any enlargement, but is exhibited in a manner to strengthen this confident, fearless faith throughout the hard and protracted warfare, by showing the necessity of the warfare in order to final victory; and the last and most profound answer is given to the question: Wherefore, then, must this be so? Consequently,

1. The necessity of the struggle in order to victory, which lies in this, that the disciples must be approved as worthy of their Master—the confirmation of the imitation of Christ by faithful confes

* As Von Gerlach also finds in this word the hint, that we must be ever mindful how far, if not externally, yet internally, the circle of our influence extends, and that no power of man can be in condition to make us, the servants of the Lord, inefficient or useless.

sion and adherence even under the cross. This is the fundamental idea which mediates between the contest and the victory, without understanding which we can comprehend neither the entire prophecy of our Lord, nor its long enduring fulfillment. From this point onwards we have positions more universal and of general application, the "ye" being now omitted.

A. Embracing all in one, with a foreglance to the all-disclosing judgment—for this great end a test of fidelity is essential; a. Whosoever shall confess me (ver. 32); b. Whosoever shall deny me (ver. 33).

B. Returning now to the intermediate development—The necessary way to this, as opposed to the false idea and expectation of the kingdom of God and his Messiah; strife and variance, which lead to the internal discrimination of those who are tested (vers. 34–36).

C. The confirmation which springs from this, from beginning to end; a most clear statement of the ground on which such conflict is necessary.

a. First special examples of this derived from the preceding ver. 37.

b. Then exhibited quite generally; and, a. in prophetic figure, taken from the cross of the Forerunner (ver. 38). b. Finally, that peculiar and most profound expression, which is the very point of the enforcement of the way of conflict into victory (ver. 39).

2. To this is appended as the brief but sufficient conclusion, the promise of abounding recovery of all that was lost, in the great recompense, the participation of the disciples as well in the rewards of victory, as in the struggle for them. As certainly as he who is to be crowned must first be tested, so certainly shall he who is tested be finally crowned. Yea more than that, the rewarding compensation as an exhibition of the divine love after so long sorrow, will scarcely keep any bounds, where any are fit for recompense. The promise which winds up all is addressed especially to the apostles, but extends beyond them to all the servants and witnesses of the Lord, yea, to all the persecuted and oppressed disciples generally, down to the very least, and to those who have taken the part of the least. Finally, nothing remains unrecompensed (vers. 40–42).

Verses 24, 25. The common proverb, whose immediate and distinctive meaning came before us in Luke vi. 40, is here applied in another sense; and there it is deduced from it as a further consequence, that if the servant should not think himself above his Lord, should not be proud when his master is lowly (John xiii. 16), should not shrink from suffering, when his master has yielded himself up to it—he should also, and this is the meaning here, not expect another and better lot than his master's. It may often be in ordinary human affairs, that the servant is above his Lord (Eccles. iv. 14, x. 7; Prov. xxx. 22), and so the disciple above his master; but then this is an exception to the rule, which the proverb rightly lays down; or, to adhere to our first view, the proverb still holds its right, for such exceptional master was not truly such, and such disciple did not, as a disciple, surpass his master. Or, the evil-disposed disciple may only think that he is above his master, as the ironical proverb says, which Bengel quotes on 1 Cor. iv. 8: πολλοὶ μαθηταὶ κρείττονες διδασκάλων, "many disciples are better than teachers!" Between Christ and his disciples the word retains, of course, its fullest propriety, for he is Master and Lord in the only absolute sense (John xiii. 13). Passing by the promise of victory and reward which lies in the back-ground of this doubtful intimation—for the Lord will not fail to vindicate his servants, the Master will not deny his disciples in the never-failing victory of his truth, the father of the household will not cease to provide for his own—we would remark here, upon the heightened nearness of relation thus expressed: First, master and disciples—as also the Rabbins had their μαθητάς; then Lord and servants—as the disciples of Christ acknowledged him for their Master, and were sent by him as his servants; and then once more, graciously relaxing this last relation, master of the house and they of his household. Just in this way was the relation developed during our Lord's life; they who found in him a Master and also a Lord, finally became his little children, the family around his table. Contemplating this relation yet more profoundly, the Lord is not merely the father of the household while on earth, but continues such, and is now more eminently such, in his church (as Von Gerlach remarks here). It is this which, with gracious consolation he now tells them. The various etymologies of Beelzebub or Beelzebul, about which we may contend, do not affect the subject; for this at least is certain, that it was a name of the chief of the devils, and particularly contemptuous, used by such as would not do him the honor of his more respectable name "Satan, the διάβολος" (i. e. Accuser). The charge more than once brought against the Lord, that he too cast out devils by Beelzebub, was the highest exhibition given before the crucifixion, of that most bitter hatred of the truth, of that most daring spirit of outrage against the lofty One, which naturally led to all the rest. Not that they absolutely called him Beelzebub, as the Lord here says; but he pronounces on all its base wickedness, as a judge, according to truth, and with the deepest consciousness of their insults, the true meaning of their words. He who is in league with the devil, hath a devil (John viii. 48), is himself the devil! Finally, let the πόσῳ μᾶλλον, how much more, not be overlooked; by which the Lord intimates at last, that his disciples and household must expect yet worse than he. And why? Because the disciple is beneath his master in the dignity of right and truth and power, cannot, in full innocence like him, resist and attack the enemy, and consequently must lay his account to be much less spared. Did they fail to respect the Holy One of God, and push their outrage even to the bounds of the sin against the Holy Ghost; how then shall we his disciples escape that scorn, which through our failings is seldom simply reproach for Christ, but too often our own desert? The innumerable and ever-renewed names of reproach cast upon Christian men, have for the most part their origin in some error or apostacy of their own, and point in warning and reproof to the guilt which gave them birth.

Verse 26. The οὖν is a real therefore, deducing the conclusion from the foregoing premise, though it may not immediately appear to do so. For we must discern and extract the promise, or at least the re-assuring intimation, which lies latent in the foregoing saying —They have hated and scorned your Lord, and yet he is still your Lord, he has not suffered his mouth to be stopped, has still built up his household and his kingdom. The full force of such a consequence appeared, indeed, first when that time came, in anticipation of which the Lord now speaks, after he himself through shame passed to honor, through the cross entered into his glory. Since then the firm foundation of the Church's confidence in defying the threats of men has been what is expressed in the apostle's prayer, Acts iv. 27, 28. But with this glance backward upon the Forerunner's way through conflict to victory, there is instantly connected a second glance forwards to that certain and final termination of all history, which finds its expression in a saying that recurs elsewhere in our Lord's teaching as a fundamental axiom for profitable application in many ways (Mark iv. 22; Luke viii. 17, xii. 2). The double form of the maxim may be explained as an intensive parallelism, or as referring the things covered which are to be revealed, rather to facta; and the things hid which shall be made known, rather to scibilia, as such. Or, again, what no man could see, shall become visible; what no man ever heard or knew, shall become audible and perceptible—in brief, there is most assuredly coming a universal revelation of all hidden things, a boundless assurance, the full meaning of which in relation to particular things, no human intelligence can exhaust or even conceive! But what means the For which makes this prospect the motive cause for the "Fear not?" First, it expresses the obligation to conform to this master principle of the divine government in our present conduct, and so to preach boldly the whole truth without reserve. (It is thus applied in Mark iv. 21, 22.) Next, it is a warning given to God's messengers, against that hypocrisy which comes from the fear of man (Luke xii. 2); for all faint-heartedness, unfaithfulness, neglect of his ambassadors, will be disclosed with the sins of the world, when both the one and the other shall be made manifest in the light of truth. Finally, it is a promise and consoling hope for the faithful, inasmuch as they may reserve every thing for the great day of revelation, and refer every thing to it (Col. iii. 3, 4; 1 John iii. 2). And if the whole world reject and misunderstand and scorn you, ye shall one day shine forth as the children of the kingdom and preachers of righteousness (Matt. xiii. 43; Dan. xii. 3) to their condemnation (Luke x. 11; Ezek. xxxiii. 33). Judge ye already, then, the wicked world by the world which discloses secret sins in the conscience (2 Cor. v. 11; iv. 2). Not merely in themselves before God, and in the conscience of believers, are the ministers of God's word approved as sent by him, but in the consciences of all men, even unbelieving men in the sight of God; and this will become fully manifest when the Lord shall bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and judge τὰ κρυπτὰ τῶν ἀνθρώπων, the secrets of men (1 Cor. iv. 5; Rom. ii. 16). What a prospect and expectation is this, to enforce on the one hand, the renunciation of all the κρυπτὰ τῆς αἰσχύνης, hidden things of dishonesty, in ourselves, and on the other, the declaring without restraint through fear of man, the whole counsel of God, which we are bound to preach!

Verse 27. "The Master bids his most confidential disciples reveal his most secret things, his most hidden ones to announce from the house-top his most hidden things; house-top and market-place are the lodgment of the voluntary carpenter from Nazareth" (Pfenninger). What ye hear: this refers in so far as the discourse is spoken for the future, as a prophecy, to what they were to hear from the Holy Spirit, who was to tell them what they should speak, as in Acts iv. 20. For the speaking of the Holy Ghost is addressed to the opened ear (Isa. l. 5; 2 Sam. vii. 27; Job xxxiii. 16, xxxvi. 10). It is, however, immediately parallel with the former, what I say unto you; for it is the Lord who ever speaks by the Holy Ghost, and before the Spirit spoke he spoke it himself. He, the great Revealer of all secret things, commenced in secret his testimony; uttering, indeed, plainly enough for all ears which could hear, much of that entire system of truth, which without restriction should be afterwards preached upon the house-tops and streets (Jer. xlviii. 38). It is designedly and strongly expressed, that he said to his disciples, especially to his apostles, much ἐν τῇ σκοτίᾳ, in the darkness, as if shunning the light, secretly for temporary secresy, to them alone in the ear, and not yet to all the people.* But when these lights were kindled from his light, they became lights of the world in ever-increasing diffusion of their light (ch. v. 14, 15). Ever-increasing, say we, and rightly; for this preparatory secresy of their Master, teaches the disciples that verse 27 is not to be followed with strict literalness, but between the beginning of the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, which the disciples' ears alone might hear (ch. xiii. 11), and the final revelation of all hidden things (verse 26), there must be conceived a gradual development and advancement of revelation. All truth should no more be preached every where and at once, than the Lord's peace, according to verse 34, should be cast abroad at once and instantly, through the whole earth: that would be a judgment of the world before the time. There is here, again, a similar relation of the apostolical preaching to the yet more public testimony of later times, as the Lord forcibly and clearly announces in Luke xii. 3, with the same expressions as are used here. The truth must be spoken, and nothing but the truth; this is enforced, against all reservations which might spring from fear: but there is also a wisdom of love, which knows how much of truth to teach, and when and where and how it should be taught.* This is not expressed here, because it does not belong to the fundamental idea, and because this third section deals in great universal principles and laws, without giving, as in the former, preparatory instructions of special application, which the Spirit in due time should provide for.

* Sepp very strangely and here inappropriately derives this form of speech from the custom of the synagogue, where the presiding elder first whispered the original text into the ear of the interpreter, who gave the sense in the dialect of the country!

Verses 28–31. Our general summary and plan has already shown in what light we regard the connection of thought in this passage. In verse 26, the Fear ye not is connected with them, but now in verse 28, it is critically opposed to another fear, which is commanded as alone profitable and necessary. In this command that warning, which we before noted in the reference to the revelation of all hidden things, comes out into fuller prominence. A promise follows, which demands a confidence in their heavenly Father, that should be the counterpart and resolution of that fear. First there is the assuring figure and example derived from the slightest thing which could compass the destruction of a living creature (verse 29); then comes the application to Christ's disciples, in another figurative example of the slightest injury that might befall them (verse 30); and finally, sounds out most impressively the third—Fear not therefore! established upon the ground of that promise and assurance (verse 31).

Verse 28. Thus, then, they actually kill the body—it is not merely can kill. So much is permitted to them, and it is pre-announced to his disciples, as it had been already in verse 21, and in John xvi. 2 This is more than was expressly mentioned in verse 25; but it is all that they do or can do: μετὰ ταῦτα μὴ ἔχουσί περισσότερόν τι ποιῆσαι, after that have no more that they can do (Luke xii. 4). And is that to be feared, and does it touch the proper life? The immortality of the soul, its undying continuance when the body dies, is here, as throughout the Scriptures, not merely taught as a dogma, but pre-supposed and taken for granted by the consensus gentium. He only, who as נָבָל, a fool, has gone so far as to say אֵין אֱלֹהִים, There is no God! and in denying the living God has contradicted the inner voice which teaches even the heathen to know a divinity and a hades, can persuade himself that his death is an annihilation of his personality. But this sense of the word concerning killing the soul, is itself only a foundation on which to build something further and distinctive, that immediately follows. The Lord already uses the ψυχή, soul, as we perceive, with the same transition from the lower to the higher meaning as afterwards in verse 39. He speaks directly of a possible killing or destroying of the soul. The former member of the verse contains a perfect exhibition of the utmost injury that can be inflicted on body or soul. Thus viewed, the question arises, May not wicked men, through their malice, kill the soul by seducing us to backsliding and perdition? and the answer is, Assuredly, but not of themselves, not by any power of theirs to which ye are surrendered as victims, as in the case with your bodies; they cannot do it without your own will and concurrence. Beware, therefore, be on your guard, so shall they not touch your souls! Herein is the transition to the remarkable second member of the verse, which, so far as we remember, stands alone in Scripture; for as to the same word it has been, and is still contested, whether God or Satan be signified. For our own part we hold this contest to be possible only so long as we fail to penetrate into the heart of the passage as standing in its connection. We have already signified more than once our assurance that we can only understand by him whom we must fear, the one pre-eminent and proper enemy and destroyer of the soul. Indeed, we are as firmly persuaded of this, as of any point in all exegesis, that the Lord here means Satan.* And these are our five reasons:

First, The ground-tone and fundamental idea of the whole of this portion of the discourse tends to confidence in the Father, who takes the life of the meanest sparrow under

* According to which sense Hamann wrote to Lindner—"One must first speak to the ear, and afterwards make the house-top his pulpit!"

* If possible more firmly so in this second edition, although the now deceased Von Meyer wrote me that I had by no means convinced him—that it was never any where said in Scripture that we should fear the devil! I take, however, e. g., 1 Pet. v. 8, as having the same sense: and Rom. xi. 20; 2 Cor. xi. 3, with some others, deeply pondered, give the same idea. Lange (p. 721) has done justice to my argument. [Yet the mass of interpreters will no doubt, despite the author's arguments, continue to adhere to the spontaneous reference in this passage to the Almighty.—Am. Ed.]

his charge, and much more, will not permit any evil to befall either the bodily or spiritual life of his children through any wilfulness of man. The correspondence then is exact: Trust only in him who can protect you; but fear him who would destroy you, and both can and will unless you fear him!

Second, As the two members of the sentence run quite parallel, it is not permissible to take φοβεῖσθαι, fear, in two distinct senses, namely, to understand it in the second case of the fear of God, which could never in the New Testament at least, and assuredly not in this passage, be thus made equivalent to φοβεῖσθαι ἀπό, stand in awe of. No, the Lord is speaking of an essential, proper fear, similar to what might be felt in regard to those who kill the body, but in the latter instance with the more emphatic μᾶλλον, rather. It is just this parallelism of the sentences that is most decisive against Alford, who thinks it a valid objection to the reference to God that the construction is changed, and that it is not again said φοβήθητε ἀπό τοῦ δυναμένου κ.τ.λ. (The δὲ μᾶλλον following upon μή makes φοβεῖσθαι the same in both cases.)

Third, Who is then the real destroyer of the soul, just as men destroy the body? and so much more to be feared than they, as the destruction of the soul is a greater calamity? Let it be observed that ψυχὴν ἀπολέσαι, destroy the soul, is something quite different from ἀποκτεῖναι, kill; it is the casting it into damnation on account of sin. The death of the body as such is not the death of the soul, but conducts it rather to blessedness, if the soul lives in God: so that persecutors rather benefited the martyrs than otherwise, by speeding their way to heaven. But to destroy the soul: that is never throughout the entire Scripture spoken of God, and to attribute this to him here, would be indeed a ἅπαξ λεγόμενον horrendum. Bengel, indeed, compares James iv. 12, but the simple ἀπολέσαι as the antithesis of σῶσαι (to deliver over to condemnation and ruin) is far from being equivalent to ψυχὴν ἀπολέσαι in such a connection as we find it here. God, indeed, destroys all flesh by a judgment of death, but not till all flesh has corrupted its own way (Gen. vi. 12, comp. Rev. xi. 18). But the destruction of the soul, its death distinctively, proceeds not from him: he cannot be said to inflict it, but only, as in the former case, to let that ruin manifest itself, which has taken place without him (Ecclus. i. 12–16). Further it does not here read: Εἰς γέενναν (although in Luke it stands under another aspect, as we shall presently observe: ἐμβαλεῖν εἰς τὴν γέενναν) but ἐν γεέννῃ, that is, in hell as in his province and domain. But hell is Satan's kingdom, and there, as we know from Matt. v. 29, 30 (which should here be brought to mind), the body will, together with the soul, be tormented and destroyed. Should we, finally, take objection to the δυνάμενος as too strong to be applied to Satan, we may say in answer, that this, so to speak, euphemistically significant paraphrase of the horrible nameless one who is yet well known, all the better suits the character of Satan, who has actually ἐξουσίαν, power and permission from God (Luke xii.) first to hurt the soul as a tempter, and then to destroy both body and soul in hell as a tormentor (Heb. ii. 14). He is, indeed, according to Matt. v. 25, the officer who casts those who are delivered to him into the prison.

Fourth, Thus only, inferentially, does the true, and more profound sense of the whole saying appear: Fear not men, the enemies of divers kinds, who, if ye are true to God, can at least but kill the body (as man in his vain fear so terms it); but fear that one real enemy, with whom, beneath and behind all flesh and blood, ye have to do (Eph. vi. 12), who alone can inflict the real irreparable hurt! the essentially wicked enemy, to whom ver. 1 had already pointed, as of most import to take heed of and overcome. Take heed to your soul, and save it from him; the death of the body at the hands of men need not then be feared.* We may conceive how such a word must have smitten the heart of a man like Judas. But we must also reflect that such a warning would be always necessary for all the disciples of our Lord, over whom is ever impending the danger of treachery and apostacy, and especially in the heat of persecution even to death. It would be very strange, however, and inexplicable, if he had united in one the command to fear God, who casts into hell, and to trust in him as a merciful Father. Our faithful Master and Forernnner, who had himself known by experience the tempter and destroyer, in our flesh and amid the enmity of the world, here exhibits to us in its perfection the highest master-piece of simplicity in wisdom; that we should see in all other wolves the one Wolf, amid the whole generation of vipers the One Serpent, and with so much humble fear of the Destroyer as firm confidence in the Saviour and Preserver, pursue and make good our way towards the end.

Fifth and last, What we have found in this place is entirely confirmed in the parallel passage (Luke xii. 3–7), and the expressions there used indicate to us yet more significantly the evil fiend. Ver. 3 predicted, that the fearless and free publicity of proclamation would, even after the apostles' testimony, go on to increase; and this is spoken as an encouragement to them. In ver. 4 the Lord speaks to them further as his friends, certainly with an affectionate and assuring tone, with which the immediate transition to fearing before God could scarcely harmonize. As my friends,

* "Yet in the dens of the murderers, who can rob them of the mantle of the body, they tremble not; their souls unwounded and unrestrained, soar into the light of heaven. Another fear, of another death, has thrown its holy protection around their hearts, so that the wicked fiend has no power irretrievably to destroy their souls." Thus beautifully speaks Lange in his Biblische Gedichten.

my trusted household, ye have nothing to fear either in me or the Father; yet I say unto you, in faithful love as your counseling friend—Think not therefore that ye may be above all "fear!" The great enemy is still near, and will desire to have you to the end—forget not that. Ye need not indeed fear man, but—and what now follows so emphatically and fearfully might suggest already to him who has ears to hear the frightful name of the Unnamed One—but I will forewarn you whom ye shall fear! (How is this a fitting lesson about the fear of God, for ages known to the least in Israel as essential!) Fear him, who, after he hath killed, hath power (through the wonderful permission and delegation of the Almighty) to cast into hell; yea, I say unto you, τοῦτον φοβήθητε! We know not with what ears he can hear this, who can think of the Father in heaven.* It is Satan who hath killed wherever there has been death, for all bodily death is from him (John viii. 44); especially where men have killed out of hatred—and the subject of the discourse is of such ἀποκτεῖναι (1 Cor. v. 5), entire humanity in a certain sense is concerned, over which the destruction of the flesh impends in death: and even as the Prince of Death is Satan considered a minister of the divine righteousness, as well of its mercy as of its wrath.

Verses 29–31. Στρουθία, "sparrows," are πάντα τὰ μικρὰ τῶν ὀρνίθων, all the smaller birds, corresponding in the Septuagint to the Hebrew צִפּוֹר; and ἀσσάριον, a "farthing," also taken up in the Hebrew as אִסָּר, אִיסָּר, אַסְפַּר, is the smallest coin, and hence was in Jewish as well as Latin proverbial use to express the smallest value (באיסר, בבאיסר). Now even two sparrows are only worth one ἀσσάριον; indeed in Luke xii. 6 (spoken a year later) the expression is made stronger, and for two farthings the fifth bird may be obtained over and above: yet in the providentia specialissima of God not one single such little creature, not the slightest worm, is forgotten or left to be the sport of chance! There shall no sparrow fall on the ground exhausted or starved, or by any cause killed,† without the knowledge and will of the Father (not of the sparrows but of men, who are his children). The Lord brings to our mind again—we have found many reminiscences of the Sermon on the Mount in this discourse—that precious word (ch. vi. 26) to which rejoinder might be made—Yet the fowls of the heaven do often fall upon the earth because they have found no nourishment; and in like manner—Yet the confessors die, and many of them even by the hand of the enemy! It does, assuredly, so happen, only not without the Father: this is the comforting assurance which the Lord gives. So far from your life being taken away without the Father's counsel and will, not one hair falls from your head without him (Luke xxi. 18; Acts xxvii. 34; 1 Sam. xiv. 45), or as the German proverb runs —Niemand euch ein Haar Krümmen mag, No one shall bend a hair of your head. They are all numbered by a providence which cares for all and forgets nothing; as much so as the stars of heaven are, which man can no more count than the hairs of his head.* Thus the example of the slightest hurt, which we should not even spend a thought upon, is brought into juxtaposition with the being killed in ver. 28, in order to embrace whatever possible injury might lie between these two extremes. The concluding inference of ver. 31, already found in the Sermon on the Mount, is a Jewish proverb also,† but is here invested with a higher meaning. The emphatic ὑμεῖς, you, which so strikingly closes this sentence and corresponds to the ὑμῶν, at the beginning of ver. 30, refers to those who are addressed, not simply as they are men (comp. Matt. xii. 12), but as they are children of God, disciples of Christ, heralds and witnesses of his kingdom, suffering for his name's sake. Shall one of these be forgotten? Shall not He, who numbers the hairs of your head, keep your head and your life in the hollow of his hand, so that whatever might befall them, shall not be without him, but shall, according to the gracious counsel of his will, be for your final good? Thus does the Lord graciously condescend to reason them out of all fear; and further, as he often founds his encouragement and exhortation upon that regard for ourselves which our own pride will never allow to be contested. Ye cannot doubt, surely, that ye are, each of you, of more value than many sparrows; then ponder well what follows from that! But the Lord utters this word with a profounder reference to the proof and testing of the children of God in the sight of the Father, to that internal and precious value, which is to be developed and heightened by sufferings. Apply it thus, he intimates, and know that just because ye are better than many sparrows, do men encounter opposition, giving occasion for that firm and resolute confession, in virtue of which

* Just in the same way as ourselves, with the same, indeed greater zeal against the wrong apprehension of this passage, does Reichel set it forth in his Jesaias (on Isa. xlix. 24): "Are not those horrible notions which men are taught to conceive of God the Father, as if he were an Apollyon, a destroyer of bodies and of souls; and which would impute such a meaning as would make him inspire and inculcate a real dread of his Father! Frightful exposition—the Lord Jesus speaks of the devil, and his words are referred to God the Father!—the Father, they seem to think, is a hard man, who strikes one, body and soul, into hell! About the devil it is of little consequence, all is right with regard to him. Is not that a sin and a shame?"

† Evidently this is meant, and not a flying down which resembles falling.

* The counsel and will of God are often contrary to our thoughts. Therefore, writes Hamann: "Let all our speculations fall like sparrows to the ground."

† Talm. Hieros. (tit. Shebiith, fol. 38, col. 4): A bird perishes not without God, much less a man.

you will one day be publicly confessed by your Lord, as is seen in what immediately follows.

Verses 32, 33. Just as in the Sermon on the Mount (ch. vii. 21–23) a prophecy of rejection from the judgment-seat of the Son was uttered against those who call him Lord, Lord, yet do not the will of the Father. There it was said, τότε ὁμολογήσω αὐτοῖς, then will I profess unto them, and the word has the general signification, to speak openly of any thing, according to its true character, comp. John i. 20 (ὡμολόγησε καὶ οὐκ ἠρνήσατο); Titus i. 16. We find it more definitely in relation to Christ in John xii. 42 (ἐπίστευσαν εἰς αὐτὸν ἀλλ' οὐχ ὡμολόγουν), comp. 1 John iv. 15. Here in Matt. x. and also in Luke xii., it is not followed by the Accus. (as in John ix. 22), but by ἐν, which, although founded upon the usage of the Greek, answers more probably to the Hebrew הוֹדָה with בְּ,* which first indicates acknowledgment, then praise, and finally the honor and glory which are paid to the Lord God. While our Lord sublimely attributes to himself judicial decision and decrees, and that highest personality, also, on the confession or denial of which all is suspended, he yet softens and qualifies the assumption by equalizing the relation and rendering it mutual: He who confesseth me, shall be confessed by me! The profound condescension of this expression is only appreciated when we reflect upon the Old Testament הודה ביהוה.* He confesses the steadfast confessors as his own, that is, in reality, for it cannot be otherwise, as he is himself in them. And that, indeed, not first at the last day—no, he confesses (or denies) at once, and with a reward which begins, at least when our true confession is made. The significance of that great promise with which the great warning must run parallel, is now, we should hope, made so plain, and its place in the progressive connection of this discourse so entirely vindicated, that it will not be possible to persuade us that it has been transposed from the later passages in which it occurs, to this earlier place. The οὖν, therefore, binds it closely with the preceding, for that test of fidelity is still the question! Be ye only so faithful, that the enemy may have no power to turn you away from me; so may ye be also assured of an eternal recompense, and let that be your consolation and encouragement before men! But let it be also observed, that the discourse becomes ever more general in its tone—πᾶς ὅστις, whosoever, with the "me" set over against this as the sole substance of all confession that is demanded. That no vain confession of the lips is signified, but the maintenance and consistent exhibition of discipleship in the whole life, in spite of the world's enmity and even unto death, is clear from the whole discourse, as well as from the passage in the Sermon on the Mount. Consequently, the denial, against which the threatening is directed, is not a transitory lapse of personal weakness, such as was forgiven to Peter, and such as very few of the Lord's disciples are free from, but the entire renunciation and abandonment of communion with the Lord (Luke ix. 26; 2 Tim. ii. 12). He who may have denied him, yet without persistent obstinacy, shall find grace through repentance. "He who said to the adulteress, hath no man condemned thee, neither do I condemn thee! will also say to us, and be more faithful than Peter was to him, though all men reject thee, yet will not I!" (Baxter). It is obvious, also, that while he requires the confession of the heart unconditionally, he demands the confession of the mouth only where duty and usefulness require it; and where its failure would be a denial. Finally, the conditions between us and him are in this matter the same as in the forgiveness of sins (ch. vi. 14, 15). First, He acknowledges us in his grace, when he receives us with all our past unfaithfulness and denials upon us; then it is essential that we confess him before men; otherwise, his confession of us as his own, will be retracted and denied.

Verses 34—36. What now follows down to ver. 39 forms "a circle of ideas which," as Wizenmann says, "never came from the mind of mortal, before Jesus." It is the transfiguration of all the prophetic expectations concerning the kingdom of God into the transcendent and future and heavenly; in perfect correspondence with the true sense of all prophecy, which never could, however, till now be so clearly apprehended and expressed. This is a testimony which is effectually thrown in the way of all who would build up the kingdom of peace on this side; from the Jews, whose great delusion it unsparingly overturns, down to the last foolish builders in the last days. In Luke xii. 51–53, the Lord once more repeats the same saying, and in connection with the reference to his own sufferings and death in ver. 50, which we have here in vers. 38, 39. Nevertheless, although every thing in his kingdom looks forward to what is beyond and to the future, to the finding of life, by all who are worthy of him, this heavenly kingdom does not give up the earth. Upon it, and in hot conflict, must the heirs of everlasting peace secure and prepare for their inheritance. "I came not to send peace, but a sword!" a terrible saying as it first sounds, but in the lips of him, the Prince of Peace, easily to be understood. None but he, the gracious and meek one, the Son of the Father's love might venture to speak so startling a saying as this. That he does not mean the sword of Mohammed, is declared by the consentient testimony of his word, his life, and his death. From ver. 16 downwards, he has been speaking of nothing but the violence of the world's might directed against his own; but not one word has he said of their opposing force to force. Sword, as figuratively the opposite of peace, signifies, first of all, war (see, e.g., 1 Macc. ix. 70, 73 in the Greek; and Jer. xiv. 13). But the war, which the Lord pre-announces, is the διχάσαι, division (Peshito, אפלגו) between those who accept, and those who reject, his peace. (In Luke xii. this term is διαμερισμόν, for which Tertullian in that place reads μάχαιραν.)

* [This construction however does not occur in the Old Testament.—Am. Ed.]

First of all, the Lord gives a general declaration, in opposition to the delusion which sprang from a misunderstanding of the prophecies concerning the Messiah's kingdom of peace. He then sustains his own true interpretation of the prophetic word by a special citation from prophecy itself, using the language of the Prophet Micah. The prophets prophesy, indeed, of peace (e.g., Psa. lxxii. 3, 7; Isa. ii. 4, ix. 7; Hagg. ii. 9; Zech. ix. 10), but you must not so understand them as to suppose that at my first coming, and without any further process, peace can be immediately cast upon the earth: for this is the meaning of the emphatic βαλεῖν, with which in Luke xii. 49, a second βαλεῖν is contrasted. "Glory to God in the highest!" necessarily precedes "peace upon earth!" This last can be attained only by a contest for the glory of God; therefore Christ, because he is come to bring true peace, is first of all come to disturb all false peace, and to excite a contest which is as profitable as it is indispensable. The peace of the house, family concord, is the noblest and most precious peace upon earth; but even this, if it rests upon a false foundation, cannot be left inviolate, but must be disturbed, though our "weak household-ethics" would preserve it at all costs. Peace is to be announced to the house, according to vers. 12, 13; but that very announcement effects the disruption of peace. Let the whole connection be examined in Micah, where in harmony with this (ch. v. 1–4), the Messiah is predicted as the Peace, and his kingdom (ch. iv. 1–8) as a kingdom of peace; but then a preliminary war is indicated in the travail of the daughter of Zion, which precedes her bringing forth. The sin of corrupted Israel (ch. vi.) is the great obstacle, and the kingdom of peace can only come as the late and final goal of a series of severe developments (ch. vii.). The Lord takes the words of this quotation from this last chapter; regarding rather the general scope of the prophecy as a whole, than the individual reference of the words themselves: for whereas the prophet speaks of sinful discord as already existing (though not without a glance, in vers. 5 and 7, at the enmity which God's faithful ones experience), the Lord here speaks of that discord which his coming excites, even where peace had been before; and hence he adds this meaning to the words of the prophet. He would seem thereby to express the anomalous idea that his Gospel was to have no new effect, putting the circumstances and relations effected by it on a parallel with the hatred and discord of men in their sins generally. The ἄνθρωπον, man, at the beginning, has a specific reference to the close of the citation, ἐχθροὶ τοῦ ἀνθρώπου, enemies of the man, and contains a variation from the prophet's words which indicates a deeper meaning. In Micah it is only אוֹיְבִי אִישׁ, Septuagint ἀνδρός, that is, of a particular man; but the Lord more accurately describes by ἄνθρωπος, used as in vers. 17, 32, 33, men generally, as he finds them upon earth, when he comes and offers them his peace. The ἀνθρωποι, who persecute, and before whom the confession is to be maintained, and any individual man who will become his disciple, and confess him, are in themselves alike. But when the Lord comes between them, there is a separation effected between that man who receives him, and all other men, whether father, mother, or any dearest relatives: and his own household become the enemies of that man, who, though he hates none, yet dares not love any more than Christ; the enemies of such ἀνθρώπου who cannot consent longer to maintain a false peace with ἀνθρώποις generally. The great necessity then is to give up every earthly human relationship for the sake of the household and kingdom of God! The widening circle of connections is just the same as in Micah: first children and parents, then relatives, of further degree (κύμφη after the Hebrew בַּלָּה), then acquaintances (οἰκιακοί, אַנְשֵׁי בֵיתִי) in the widest sense. It has been incorrectly assumed that there are here three examples of disciples, two being of the female sex; because the young receive the Gospel, and maintain their steadfastness in following Christ sooner than the old, and women rather than men. But the Lord takes the words directly from Micah, and consequently the significance of the selection must be found here as well as there, in the idea that these cases exhibit the discord in its most aggravated form; and the concluding sentence of our Lord confirms this. Once more, let it not be forgotten, though hasty readers of the Bible overlook it, that the man here is the confessor of Christ, and that this passage is the counterpart of ver. 21, looked at from the other side.

Verse 37. Understand once more in parenthesis—Such division it is quite necessary to permit, nay to occasion; for my faithful ones must thus approve themselves worthy of me!* This oft-repeated and severe saying (Luke xiv. 26, xviii. 29) is grounded upon the word of Moses concerning the true priests and Levites (Deut. xxxiii. 9, 10), as this again upon the history in Exod. xxxii. 26–29. That which the Lord God demanded in the Old Testament, with a strictness that required such an outward exhibition, Christ now demands for his own self, and here again takes the place of

* No sophistry can evade this. Roos remarks with sprightly truth, that the Redeemer did not say—The unskillfulness, singularity, undisciplined speech of my disciples will, alas, attract to them hatred and scorn; ah that they were wise enough to come off well with the world! He rather takes it all upon himself, that he himself excites men, etc.

God.* Only he who is one with God could thus, like God, place himself above father and mother, and demand an exclusive love, which should sacrifice even parental instinct. The principle of Matt. vi. 24 in the Sermon on the Mount is strictly applicable here. The rigor of the requirement, however, is abated by the perfect promise involved in the ἄξιός μου, worthy of me. Christ himself is the exceeding great reward of those who love him, the most lovely and the most to be loved, above all else. Because he is and ever will be such, he can and thus must speak.

Verse 38. A new and different meaning of the ἄξιός μου, worthy of me, discloses itself here, inasmuch as the most loving one has himself loved us even to the death of the cross! One thing is worthy of another by corresponding to it (which ἄξιος also signifies): we should therefore follow and cling to him even to disgrace and death. We, to whom that future, for which the Lord then prophesied, has become past and present, understand this well; but how marvellous must have been the sound of this word concerning the cross from our Saviour's lips, to his first disciples! This was not, like other sayings which he applied, a Jewish proverb, and was no where found in Holy Writ.† This was more anxiously brooded over by his followers than all that had been intimated in the sermon, or expressed in Matt. viii. 20; it remained inexplicable to the disciples, as oft as he repeated it (ch. xvi. 24; Mark x. 21; Luke ix. 23), and they could never be induced to receive it even figuratively in the full force of the figure. He who will submit to the death of the cross, will establish also a kingdom of the cross, before the kingdom of peace and of glory can enter in. He might have said—My cross, but he only intimates this in the word—Me (see ver. 25); he does not openly express it himself, but leaves it to his apostles and disciples afterwards to speak of their cross as his. The λαμβάνειν, take up, is a strong expression derived from the custom, according to which malefactors on the way to execution were required patiently to take up and carry the cross on which they were to die. Even so must every follower of Christ take up the cross, which on that account is properly his own, and essential to his following the Lord. It is already prepared and laid upon him; that he should make one for himself is unnecessary and forbidden. But the following verse teaches us that something deeper is meant* than merely bearing external afflictions for Christ.

Verse 39. The cross involved the idea of the deepest disgrace and ignominy, which man could then speak of; and the Lord therefore made it imperative that his followers should submit to its infliction, when the wicked for righteousness' sake, and the unbelievers for his name's sake, would have it so. The cross also was the most painful death, consummated through the most tedious agony: his will is, therefore, that we should stand ready and prepared to endure this or similar death, in the steadfast confession of his name. All this is strictly correct, but does not exhaust the meaning of the general and unconditional declaration, that every follower of Christ is to have his own cross which he must bear; for not all the disciples of Christ are so evil entreated and scorned, still less crucified or cruelly put to death. That the Lord speaks not merely of preparation for extraordinary conjunctures, but of the regular, and indispensable daily course of his disciples, is evident from the letter of the expression in this passage, and especially from the remarkable addition to it in Luke ix. 23: Let him deny himself, and take up his cross daily, καθ' ἡμέραν. We find such a saying only in this place, but its genuineness is most decidedly and certainly confirmed by the Syriac, Arabic and Latin versions. What then is that daily cross, which should never fail to await the follower of Christ, any more than the trial of every day (Matt. vi. 34) fails to await every man? Ver. 39 gives us the answer, and by this conclusion the former saying concerning the cross must be interpreted, and not conversely.

We have once more ψυχή, life, in that deeper sense in which we found it at ver. 28, pointing from the life of the body to a yet higher life. The striking declaration—He that findeth his life shall lose it, and he that loseth his life shall find it—contains, if both sayings are taken literally, a perfect contradiction; consequently the finding and losing must obviously, in the first place, be understood in different senses. We endeavor to extract its meaning thus: He who is εὑρών (one finding) to find it, and who thinks he has found it, by avoiding death, and who makes it his aim to preserve his temporal life (Mark viii. 34, ὃς ἂν θέλῃ σῶσαι; John xii. 25, ὁ φιλῶν), shall lose, shall forfeit it. But does this suit the second member—is ὁ ἀπολέσας he who thinks to lose it, or he who aims to lose it? Here something that actually takes place is intended, especially through the ἕνεκεν ἐμοῦ, for my sake. Consequently, in the second place, ψυχή, life, also must be taken in two opposite senses—He who gives up his life in the one sense, shall receive it again in another higher and better sense, as his true life. Now, since

* Ah that there were not an effeminate Church discipline, and household morality for God's own house too common among its rulers, who would at all hazards, maintain peace, even at last, between Christ and Antichrist!

† Neander brings forward a passage out of Plutarch (De sera numinis vindicta, cap. 9) where a similar expression, "to bear his own cross" is found. But we are far from concluding thence with him, that Christ could have spoken or did speak without any conscious reference to his own death upon the cross—for we have other evidence in abundance concerning Christ's consciousness.

* This saying signifies very much more than that they must be ever prepared for the punishment of death! (Schleiermacher, zu Luc. xiv. 27.)

the most obvious reference seems to be the cross immediately preceding, shall we harmonize it thus—He who loses his bodily life through bearing witness unto death (ver. 28), shall yet keep his life, shall find another; for he has only lost his body, not essentially his life or his soul? This will not suffice; for the promise would then have no distinctive relation to those who die for his sake, since in that sense the soul can never be killed or be lost. It is now time to think of Luke's καθ' ἡμέραν, daily, and of the ἀρνησάσθω or ἀπαρνησάσθω ἑαυτόν, which is connected with it (as also in Mark viii. 34; Matt. xiv. 24)—Let him deny himself! It is in this word that we are to seek the key and explanation of the cross, the meaning of that life, which must absolutely be lost, and be continually surrendered to a painful death, in order to the finding of the true and better life. The cross is the death of the old life for the putting away of sin, that the resurrection of a new life from God and for God may follow unto holiness. The ψυχή or life which is to be killed, which must be crucified, is the sinful self-life of the old man, which is truly death; and this dead life must be mortified and lost by an internal, continual crucifixion and self-denial (of which the taking up of the external cross is only an external expression), in order that we may find the living life, our sanctified, glorified, and eternal life. Our Lord's teaching, therefore, is precisely the same as that of Paul afterwards, in Rom. vi. 4–11; viii. 13. The promise, therefore, of an abounding, compensating life to all who are put to death by man for Christ's sake, however true this superficial sense of it may be, is only the confirming sign and symbol of an inward meaning, which has its application for all. This, then, is the last and deepest ground on which the necessity of the διχάζειν, variance (ver. 35), is based. For that which must take place in the world as a whole, must also be accomplished in the microcosm of every individual inheritor of peace and eternal life—the separation and abolition of what is sinful. He who does not comprehend and submit to this, who consequently, in the retaining of his old self-life, regards himself as having found his ψυχή, is lost; but he who gives up, in the fellowship of the cross of Christ, all that must die and pass away, has by such loss obtained the gain of eternal blessedness. Thus the great εὑρήσει, shall find, forms a transition to the promise of reward and victory, after the struggles and the pains of the great finished warfare, whether viewed as external or internal, in the macrocosm of the world, or the microcosm of the Christian's life.

But at this concluding point our Lord's design is to lead back his discourse to the point from which it started, and with which it must close, and to wind it up as one entire whole, which, commencing with the first mission of the apostles, rose gradually to these high prospects. After having, therefore, spoken more especially, from verse 32 onwards, with reference to all his future disciples, with the formula πᾶς ὅστις and ὅς, he now returns once more to his first apostles, in whom he beholds all their and his own future successors. Hence the promise of verse 40 stands simply as it does, addressing the apostles particularly by the you, and yet setting forth the promise as only implicitè for them, for he passes on to a universal reference—He that receiveth you! But he immediately generalizes what had been said to the ἀποστόλοις or apostles, distinctively, and in their highest dignity, and descends by three stages; confirming in the promises which he addresses to those who receive them and believe, his ambassadors and witnesses of every degree as those in whom he will acknowledge himself to be represented. The first word ascends even to the ἀποστείλας, "He that sent," from whom he came forth into the world; the last condescends even to the μικροῖς, "little ones," whom he nevertheless regards as his messengers.

Verse 40. The δέχεσθαι, receive, refers back to verse 14, and has now fully unfolded itself as meaning no longer the mere external harboring and hearing of those who in their preliminary mission brought the first peaceful greetings of the kingdom nigh at hand, but the acceptance and following of their whole message and preaching, with faith which leads to full discipleship. The and is a progression of the promise, and is at the same time equivalent to as; for in John xx. 21, when the time of special fulfillment was fully come, the Lord repeats the same impressive words to his apostles—As my Father hath sent me, even so send I you. The words which we have here, had before that been literally repeated (John xiii. 20), and with the additional intimation that the authority, which in its fullest force appertained to the apostles alone, should be shared in his degree by each successor (ἐάν τινα πέμψω). As in Luke x. 16, the same is said to the Seventy, with the addition of the opposite despising, and its consequence, which would not have befitted the character of promise which here marks the conclusion. But the first member—He that receiveth you, receiveth me, is only true through grace; the second—He that receiveth me, receiveth the Father, is essentially and fully true in itself. For no man, not even an apostle, can predicate of his relation to Christ the words and meaning of John xiv. 9, 10; it is not so much in their case the person, sinful and infirm, that is concerned, but the office, in which the Lord acknowledges his heralds, and will have himself acknowledged in them. He himself even, in a certain sense, demanded to be honored, not so much in his human personality, as in being the Sent of the Father; and thus it is that though one with the Father, he here humbly places himself on a level with them. He draws his own up to himself, while as the first and highest ἀπόστολος (Heb. iii. 1), he stoops down again to them. It is the same humility, always going side by side with his majesty, with which he places his "Me" under the ἀποστείλαντα or Sender, even as he had said (verse 32)—Him will I confess also before my Father which is in heaven. The Son bears witness upon earth, by testimonies which perfectly accord, both to his sovereignty over all things, and to his dependence upon the Father.

Verses 41, 42. The three descending stages below the ἀποστόλοις or apostles are: first, a servant, ambassador, witness sent of God, in general, who might be called in the New Testament, προφήτης or prophet, because the new apostolical dignity had now reduced what was once the highest, to the second place (hence ch. xxiii. 34; Luke xi. 49); next, a δίκαιος or righteous man before God, one who belonged to his saints (Acts ix. 13), though without special mission; finally, a μαθητής or disciple, even though he were a μικρός or weak beginner, for out of these μικροῖς the δίκαιοι and the προφῆται spring, and the Lord will have ἕνα τούτων ("one of these") received also εἰς ὄνομα μαθητοῦ ("in the name of a disciple.")* The promise is now given to the receiving and to the received in one, just as in ver. 22. ἐσεσθε μισούμενοι, ye shall be hated, was pre-announced at once to the preachers, and to those who believed their testimony. The δέχεσθαι or receiving is also regarded in the different corresponding degrees, from the believing obedience which is paid to the testimony received, down to the slightest refreshment which is afforded in the love of faith to the needy man because he is a disciple of Christ. All is embraced again within these two extremes, as in vers. 28 and 30 we found it to be between death and the losing of a hair of the head. Εἰς ὄνομα, "in the name," means, as freqently in the Mishna לְשֵׁם, עַל שֵׁם, מִשּׁוּם, מִשֵּׁם, for the sake of any thing; and in this that faith is pre-supposed even in the least exhibition of love, which makes its subjects capable of the reception of Christ in his servants, of the acknowledgment of his name, and only thus of the confession which will be rewarded. He who has done good to the confessors of Christ, from merely natural feeling, quand même not parceque (although, not because), derives not from thence any connection with his legitimate and finally victorious kingdom. Yet does this "in the name" descend in its comprehension to the lowest grade of faith, even to that which simply fears to deny to a disciple of Christ the cup of cold water; and the reward, as it is expressly declared, bears a strict relation to the reception which his disciples meet. He who can perceive and acknowledge the prophet as a prophet, and the righteous man as a righteous man, will partake of his reward—for through such reception he characterizes himself as likeminded with him whom he receives."* In the case of the μικροί, little ones, whose ποτίζειν, giving to drink, is here something different from, and less than what is meant in ch. xviii. 5, the Lord descends below the actual δέχεσθαι, receiving: therefore he does not promise to such the reward of a disciple, but simply (as Mark ix. 41), that he shall not lose his reward, that reward which is appropriate to him for that act. For every deed actually performed in love has its future reward (ch. vi. 2), if the right to it is not extinguished by preponderating sin: which brings to mind Luke xvi. 9 (the preparatory reception into the kingdom of peace, even though only as a Gibeonite and drawer of water cum spe ascendendi), as well as Matt. xxv. 40 (where mercy will rejoice against judgment, James ii. 13). Suffice it that though the manner of the fulfillment of those sayings remains among the mysteries of the last things, thus much is clear in this most gracious conclusion of far-reaching promise, that the Lord designs to comfort his own with his assurance that they are regarded by him as precious, and that the estimation in which they are held by man, will be matter of man's final judgment; that the least thing as well as the greatest in the development of his struggling kingdom, and in the fates of those who struggle for it, is regarded and recorded in their favor! There will come finally a day of reckoning, which will superabundantly reward all that shall deserve reward. Against that day the Lord gives his disciples the bond of his third, "verily I say unto you," as the seal of his eternal Amen—"I Jesus have said it with mine own mouth, I will repay it" (Philem. 19). Thus speaks he in his grace only of recompense; but he also leaves an undertone of denunciation to be inferred against those who despise—ver. 15 (Luke x. 16).

* We do not feel ourselves under obligation to give up this interpretation, so conformable to the context, on account of Lange's opposition, whose profoundly abstract ideal exposition we willingly leave our readers to compare with our own, and prefer it if they may. We refer, on our part, to the digest which we have given above, of the third portion of the discourse, according to which the great conclusion, that extends to all the messengers of the Lord, naturally requires such "various degrees beneath the apostolical dignity."

* Krummacher's Elias, (third Bandchen, p. 210).

THE REPLY AND DISCOURSE CONCERNING JOHN'S IMPRISONMENT.

(Matt. xi. 4–30; Luke vii. 22–35 [xvi. 16, x. 13–22].)

The opinion was first broached by Tertullian, that John himself in his prison became subject to weakness and obscuration of faith, and admitted into his mind doubts concerning Christ's person,—an opinion which was often refuted in earlier times, and, indeed, might seem to be very easy of refutation. We might be disposed, if it were urgently demanded, to allow thus much as possible in fact, viz: that the manifestation of Christ's kingdom was to his mind too long deferred, and that he would, by this public and solemn question, challenge the Lord to answer him by quicker action. Scarcely could we declare this, however, but we must again retract it, in deference to our own clear convictions. Pre-supposing the contents of John i. and iii. 27–36 to be true, it seems impossible, both on grounds of human psychology and divine administration, that this witness to the coming Light, created by God and sent as such, in order that all might believe in it, should have afterwards scandalized the world by his own unbelief. It is, moreover, just as impossible, that imprisonment should have proved too severe for the man of the wilderness, or that the meek and lowly One, whom his forerunner had instantly felt, when he came to his baptism, to be the Lamb of God, the appointed atonement, should ever have been thought by that forerunner too meek and too lowly in his journeyings of mercy. It is equally impossible that he who from beginning to end, bowed in such undoubting and profound homage before Christ, as the servant before his Lord, as the earthly before the heavenly, should ever have ventured to think of interfering with the lofty One, by the slightest word of human impatience. But let us now directly observe how the Lord in his discourse immediately commenced in honor of John. He disclaims for him (not without a design to contradict the misunderstanding of his message, which might possibly arise), in ver. 7, all inconstancy, and in ver. 8, all impatient desire of better days than he then saw, with a reference to his well-known character from the very beginning. Let us go on to hear, with ears rightly disposed, the impressive confirmation of vers. 11–19, where the testimony of the forerunner already come, is made the foundation for the assurance that the Messiah is also come; and we can no longer permit ourselves to regard the warning of ver. 6, as a hint which the Baptist himself required, and which might meet his own case. They who still think so, have not yet understood aright the whole discourse of our Lord, which indeed as a continuous answer most decisively explains the meaning of the question which had been sent. No, John acts in the prison, where he had heard from his disciples what he had received as no other than the "works of the Christ" (Luke vii. 18),* in precise conformity with his own great function, to point his disciples to this Christ. Because, while they are dependent upon himself, they are not thoroughly disposed to trust his own words alone; he therefore sends them to Christ that they may ask him themselves: and for their encouragement in going, He meekly permits them to do this as from himself, and by his commission; careless of any misconstruction which might ensue, and leaving its solution to his Lord who well knows his mind.

Nearly thus was the question viewed by Chrysostom, Euthymius, Theophylact, etc., among the fathers. Now, indeed, I stand almost alone (even since the first edition of the present work) in the maintenance of this opinion; since most even of the later orthodox expositors, with strange earnestness declare themselves for an actual doubt on the part of the Baptist, a wavering or defeat of his faith, a "reaction from his earlier position," etc.† They can bring many arguments for their view, and some of them containing much truth in themselves. As a general position, for instance, we are willing to admit that believers, men of God, may fail, and from time to time have fallen, into such obscurations of faith; but we cannot, by any means, admit the application of it to the present case. This would not be a sudden paroxysm of weakness in faith, such as every Christian knows by experience,‡ but would involve the deliberate, palpable, public scandal of the retraction of the testimony, officially given at an earlier time, and of the utmost importance, by the same person "who came for a witness" (John i. 7); and such an anomaly would be without precedent among all the prophets, messengers, and witnesses of God.

The excellent Neander, even, expresses his

---

* Alford is not quite right when he says that "this is the only place where that name (τοῦ Χριστοῦ), standing alone, is given to our Lord in this Gospel." Properly speaking it is not so given here, but it is only designed to say, that John heard "the Messiah works (of this Jesus)."

† Lange adheres undeviatingly to his opinion "that even the Baptist must be regarded as having been, for a moment, among those who misapprehended Christ"—against which, the second verse of Matthew, well weighed, already protests. Ficker, in his Sermons, "The Doubters of the New Testament," devotes to our text the third of his sermons, and places the Baptist himself among the doubters.

‡ Thus Hengstenburg in his Christologie.

opinion, that while "scientific knowledge and judgments, once obtained by logical induction, can never again be lost, so long as the powers of the mind remain unimpaired," the convictions of faith, which spring from processes of the higher life, are not so secure and lasting; but what shall we say to this, in view of the shifting, changeable scientific positions and logical inductions of our learned philosophers before us! We rather maintain, with the fullest assurance of right, that what comes to us from above as revelation, is far more immovably rooted in the mind than our philosophy and logic; and that most assuredly what is revealed by official testimony of the highest importance could never be left exposed to the consequences of the human infirmity of the witness, and thereby to the eventual public contradiction of that testimony. The divine permission may allow it to be so with us preachers and theologians; but the Baptist whose prerogative it was to be the herald of the Messiah to the Jewish nation and the world, occupied, in the counsels and plans of God for his kingdom, so high an official position, that we cannot suppose him to have been permitted by God to sink below it for a moment. We beg that this point may be carefully observed, as generally, in consequence of a want of adherence to the entireness of this plan, it is most unwarrantably overlooked. When John the Baptist testifies of Christ as the Lamb of God, that testimony must rest upon unclouded and distinct knowledge, penetrating into Scripture truth, and firmly held in the spirit; a knowledge and assurance, to say the least, as little likely to be lost as any logical induction. In Neander himself we perceive traces of a suspicion that his view is untenable, since he ventures to affirm that the author of the report of the doubting question could not have been acquainted with the earlier testimony borne by the Baptist to Jesus, else he would not have failed to notice it in his account! How little disposed we are to concede such ignorance in the Evangelists, our readers well know.

According to Von Gerlach, "John, notwithstanding his illumination for the earlier testimony, stood yet within the economy of the Old Covenant, and had the same internal conflict, as the disciples of Jesus had afterwards; for he found that, quite contrary to his supposition, the kingdom of God did not appear in external manifestation of power." Actually the same, does he think, as that of the disciples while yet receiving their training and not yet installed into their office? And did not his prophetic illumination, about which we hear nothing in the case of the disciples, his official grace and official consecration make any difference in his favor? The ambassador and his public character as such are too much lost sight of in the mere personal man. Nor is there the slightest trace in his earlier public testimonies of any proof that he did intend to announce a kingdom of external authority. It is also said that "in his temptation he lost the traces of the divine enlightenment"—but I would ask again whether an Isaiah in the economy of the Old Testament would have lost such tokens? Now the Baptist is greater than all the prophets before him, and stands upon the very threshold of the New Covenant. That single word concerning the Lamb of God reveals to us a degree of certain knowledge, which, while in harmony with the illumination of all former prophecy, left no room for those Messianic expectations to which even the disciples in some degree still clung. If the utmost were granted, that he for a while doubted, pondered, wavered in his prison (which, however we do not believe); yet the open and public question could never have been permitted of God. Von Gerlach again makes a concession, when he says that "it was his desire, at the same time, to direct his disciples to Jesus, through the resolution of the doubt"—to this we also adhere; but if he had desired the satisfaction of any mere doubt, for his own sake, he would not have asked, in a plain, broad question—Art thou or art thou not the Messiah? It is rather the very striking point of the question, which appears to be in conflict with his own previous testimony (This is He!), that in this background it presupposes him to mean (as all the people, after the discourse of Jesus would observe)—For my own part, I know and have borne my witness, but let him tell you himself, my disciples, that ye may believe (John i. 7). Every thoughtful mind must have thus understood this question put by this witness, must have supposed that another meaning lay beneath it; somewhat as if the minister of state should let the king be asked, if he were really king.

Finally, it is said that the "obscuration" which befell the "witness of the light," did not consist in any uncertainty as to the person of the Lord (this, however, is the literal sense of his question, which, consequently, is given up in its letter), so much as in a kind of "impatience" which could not await the critical time:* but we have radical scruples about this; for not only must it necessarily have sprung from a grievous lack of spiritual perception in John, but it would further involve a contradiction to that ever humble relation of John to the Lord, which rendered such reminding and prompting utterly impossible to him. Lösselt has lately put this in the most objectionable form: "Scarcely was he in the prison than the time began to seem already long, before Jesus began to glorify himself in him (?); and thus failing, he not only entertained doubts himself, but infected his disciples also." This is thoughtless and foolish language concerning the greatest prophet, who himself well knew his fate as a

* To Hase "it was not doubt but monition." So Lange thinks, "the question of John has not been sufficiently considered in the light of an impatient desire for Christ's open manifestation."

† In his Wochenblatte—"Der Fischer" (1845, No. 50).

prcphet, and suffered patiently, all the more patiently as he had announced for the Messiah only the death of a victim.

In opposition to all these various hypotheses, whether strongly or firmly held, of otherwise orthodox men, I cannot but take my stand with Niemeyer, who, in his Charakteristik der Bibel (new edit., i., p. 57), firmly adheres to the right, against all these untenable views, and though not following the traditional orthodoxy in other respects, does so with great simplicity of judgment ; and with Schleiermacher, who sets out with the assertion that "John himself could not have entertained doubts as to the Messiahship of Jesus," although he then hazards the supposition that the words of the messengers have been by abbreviation placed in that false light. We think this latter idea not at all necessary. As those words lie in the record, John does not merely permit a question to be asked "for appearance," an idea that is to be instantly rejected, but with an earnestness which both Jesus and the people understood, bids his disciples go and ask him themselves. We cannot see any thing inappropriate in this view, and its acceptance alone makes the whole procedure conceivable and comprehensible. "To direct his disciples to Jesus, nothing more would be wanting than distinctive explanations from their master," is the opinion of Braune ; but we cannot agree to this, for in the case of the greater part of John's disciples, who were not induced to go to Christ, the direct contrary was the fact. Nor was it a "circuitous way," but the only one which would succeed, to send some of them directly to the Lord.*

But enough of preliminary polemics and defence ; let us go to the text. What Matthew communicates in this entire chapter, is a progressive series of sayings, spoken continuously, and forming one great concerted discourse, gradually advancing towards its climax, which, in vers. 27–30 gives the most complete answer to the question that had been received. The Evangelist plainly asserts this in vers. 7 and 20 (in both cases alike ἤρξατο, began), and in ver. 25, ἐν ἐκείνῳ τῷ καιρῷ ἀποκριθείς, at that time he answered ; and it is no objection to this that Luke, who, in ch. vii., gave the greater part of this discourse in literal unison with Matthew, has afterwards recorded sundry repetitions of it as actually uttered on another occasion, ch. x. and ch. xvi. 16. We do right, therefore, to regard the whole, as it here lies before us, as the discourse of Jesus on occasion of the message of John ; and shall take a general glance at the process of thought in its advancing development, before we enter upon the exposition itself. The well-disposed reader, to whom our summaries may have already commended themselves, will find this arrangement confirmed, by reading it again after the exposition has been read. The one fundamental theme from beginning to end may be thus expressed: The Lord speaks of the faith and unbelief of his own generation, in the twofold testimony extant in it, which both prepared for and offered the kingdom of heaven ; the kingdom which was as assuredly come as the two ἐρχόμενοι, or comers were.

The whole resolves itself into three main sections—for in the things of God, we find almost every where a trichotomy. First is the direct answer to those who were sent (vers. 4–6), as an introductory preface, which already intimates all that follows ; then (vers. 7–19), the continuous discourse to the people concerning John and Christ, in their harmony with one another, and consentient testimony ; finally, from verse 21 onwards, the conclusion addressed to the faith and unbelief of his own age, uttered with the highest contrasts of severity and gentleness.

I. The answer to the messengers points out the manifest signs of him who has come, both in his dignity and in his humility—as shown in miracles and in preaching, whose agreement both with prophecy and with each other, should be evidence enough for faith ; and in that lowliness, also prophesied, at which unbelief takes offence. In this the two following sections are already sketched and prepared for, which may be defined as first, exposition of the testimony now among them, but which so few believed, and then warning against unbelief ; at the close of the whole, however, there is an additional invitation to faith, proceeding from most obvious mercy and grace. The indication of the signs in word and work is directed apparently to John at first, from whom the question came ; as the gracious One was not willing harshly to unveil before the people by any word of his the state of things in the messengers themselves, to their shame and offence. First, it is given generally, those things which ye do hear and see ; then follows a specific statement in consistency with prediction. In verse 6, however, there follows another sign of the appearance of the Messiah, also the subject of prophecy, but which is a stumbling-block to men ; and the Lord uses such an expression as must refer to the disciples of John, first of all (a slight contrast with their Master being implied), and, at the same time, to all who are unbelievers. Warning and promise to unbelief and to faith, are here interwoven ; and consequently we may regard μακάριος, "blessed," as being a prelude to the gracious invitation which in vers. 28–30 forms the conclusion.*

* Alford will not altogether accept my view, but concedes that "the idea of his faith being weakened by his imprisonment, is quite inconsistent not only with John's character, but with our Lord's discourse in this place." Be it so. If he now, being himself convinced, only desired a declaration from our Lord's own mouth, this declaration certainly was not intended for his own sake, but for his disciples to quiet them, to "set them at rest" as Alford says. Wherein, in that case, do we differ ?

* Not that our Lord himself consciously and purposely so ordered it. The harmony and signifi-

II. In order, however, decisively to prevent all misunderstanding of the mission, and that he may take the question, in the sense in which John put it, as occasion for a further and true answer to it, the Lord proceeded, when the messengers had departed,* to speak to the people concerning John. But he speaks of John as the forerunner who had come, and consequently, at the same time, and afterwards more expressly, concerning himself as also come. This is, so to speak, the predominant instruction and exposition in the middle of the discourse, which lays the foundation for the warning and promise of its decisive close. The substance of its contents is: the public, though generally discredited, testimony of the days of John the Baptist, and of Christ for their contemporaries, in its convincing connection and harmony. Specific instruction (vers. 7–15) precedes, and a progressive reference to unbelief and faith (vers. 16–19) prepare for the following most emphatic threatening and promise.

1. The instructive comment speaks in vers. 7–11 of John, in vers. 11–15 of Christ; but the latter reference is veiled, as always, before the people, so that the name "Christ" is avoided: yet all who had ears to hear must have heard in his words evidence enough as to who that "Son of Man" (ver. 19) could be, who came as John had come. Concerning John, first, what he is not, convincingly to refute the misapprehension which might arise among the people then (and among expositors now); by a natural figure describing the earlier John, the unshaken man of the wilderness (ver. 7), and then, in plainer and stronger terms, describing John as he then was, and now is, the same man in imprisonment, who even there is consistent with his former self, and does not, through inconstancy or desire of freedom, put a question concerning that now, which he had then so fearlessly testified (ver. 8). Assuredly, a most plain and undeniable argument! Then follows positively, and based upon this, what he is: not only a prophet; like one of the prophets (still in transition from the negative, ver. 9), but the greatest among all, and after all the messengers of God down to this time: the forerunner of Christ (ver. 10), himself predicted by other prophets, the only one enjoying this honor save that One, who is emphatically ὁ ἐρχόμενος (the Comer), and therefore the greatest of all the prophets, the Baptist (ver. 11). And if this man has fulfilled his function (for in his prison he is even now drawing nigh to the end of his mission), who then am I? The Lord does not now utter this openly, yet it is decisively involved in these words, which only derive their full exposition from a general view of the whole connection and spirit of the context.

And now, the kingdom of heaven itself arises before us in its altogether new dignity, so that he in it who is least, is greater than the greatest who are without and at its threshhold, as we find it still in ver. 11. It enters in with power: such is the meaning of the designedly obscure sentence (ver. 12), which is so arranged as to embrace the mighty, constraining witness which had been borne, and its results, both in the mighty opposition of unbelief, and the mighty pressing in of faith; blending the whole into one vivid description of the great crisis, which has plainly arrived. It is the time of fulfillment! The time of prophecy, of preparation is past (ver. 13); the forerunner, who is himself a portion of this fulfillment is come (ver. 14); and therefore—but the remainder scarcely needed to be expressed: He that has ears to hear, let him hear! (ver. 15). This is the conclusion of the comment upon the present circumstances which had transpired.

2. There now follows a reference to the unbelief and the faith which responded to that mighty testimony which was so publicly given to the kingdom of heaven in this important age. That reference, however, is predominantly to the predominant unbelief of the generation as a whole; for the circumstances of the case required this, the few who believed in the midst of so overwhelming a majority of unbelievers not being in the first instance regarded at all. The universal unbelief of the childish children of this age, which had nevertheless beheld and heard the most wonderful things, appears as uttering its own condemnation, dishonoring itself while dishonoring God. The two who had come are placed in opposition to their own generation, which, in its infatuation, would neither hear the law nor the Gospel, neither submit to repentance nor accept the kingdom of heaven; this opposition being first exhibited in a vivid and convincing simile (vers. 16, 17), and then in a direct, explanatory declaration (vers. 18, 19). But, finally, there is an encouraging glance at the rare and infrequent faith, by which the childlike children of wisdom—her truly docile and instructed scholars—justify the revelation of God in the twofold unity of its exhibition, and are themselves evidence and seals of the truth of the testimony both of John and of Christ (John iii. 33).

III. The sublime and impressive conclusion is now sufficiently prepared for, which is put by the Spirit of the Father into the lips of the Son, his soul being first moved to holy wrath, and then by quick transition to gentle and inviting meekness. That which, in ver. 6, was expressed as a combination of threatening and promise, warning and invitation, is now distributed in detail; the "blessed is he" being resolved into woes, denounced against those who have been offended in him, and gracious invitation to corresponding blessedness for such as come to him and accept his yoke.

cance which are preserved in a poetical work of art through all its detail, is not regarded as the result of an elaborate arrangement marked out either before or during the writing of it; but our comments upon the organism of the words of the Holy Ghost have been foolishly misunderstood, as if some such thing as this was signified.

* As Matthew significantly does not omit to remark.

1. The threatening of impending judgment upon the general unbelief is as yet confined within the limits of Galilee (with allusion to ch. x. 15), the immediate scene of our Lord's first wonderful works; the towns being named first (two of them selected as examples, vers. 21, 22), and then the proud capital (vers. 23, 24), the specification of which contains a latent reference to Jerusalem.

2. The invitation to blessedness and rest for the soul, which does not cease, even in the midst of general unbelief, to sound forth in accents of meekness and patience, is put by the Father into the mouth of the Son, through an internal consolation, which he received at the same moment, stilling the holy zeal of his indignation by the view of the Father's never-failing honor in his simple ones. Hence, the Lord first answers this secret inspiration (vers. 25, 26), by a lowly yet sublime glorification of the Father, which submissively sees the good pleasure of God's counsel as the ground of the procedure depicted in vers. 16–19, and of the resulting faith and unbelief, though its wisdom the wise cannot comprehend. This is followed by the preaching of the Gospel to the poor and the wretched (verse 5), bursting as a stream of love from the depths of this profound and mysterious principle. The Lord descends from the high contemplation of his eternal dignity, and the Father's eternal counsel, to the wretched objects of his Gospel of mercy. The Father hath delivered all things to the Son, he reveals and imparts blessedness only through him; but the Son invites all,* all, that is, who feel their misery and their need of him, in order that they may find refreshment and rest under his easy yoke, and his light burden!

Here, then, the answer to John's question reaches its fullest emphasis and expression—I verily am He; come unto me, and wait for no other! Here, also, the Gospel of Matthew (which being the first, was yet written with the same aim as the last, to produce the belief that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God), reaches its first impressive concluding point, so that we may fitly make it the close of the first portion of our exposition.† We might pause here to remark and to adore the divine wisdom, also, in the arrangement of the Gospels; especially to observe the significant conclusion of Matthew's chapters, as they progressively follow. Ch. i. closes with the most holy name of Jesus—ch. ii. with that of the despised Nazareth—ch. iii. gives the voice from heaven, which testifies of this Jesus of Nazareth, This is my beloved Son! Upon this trilogy of introduction, ch. iv. follows at its close designating and opening up the scene of his words and works—ch. vii. gives the grand conclusion of the first great discourse—ch. ix., after the first cycle of examples of his miraculous works, which already excited the enmity of the Pharisees, casts at its close the glance of mercy upon the great harvest then waiting in the land—ch. x., at the end of the first mission, directs that glance into the far future, where nothing should remain unrewarded—and ch. xi. closes with this sublime, Come unto me! And so also may it be seen in the same way how ch. xii. (chs. xiii. and xiv. in contrast with each other), chs. xvi., xix., xxii., xxiii., xxv., terminate respectively in the most significant conclusions.

Verse 4 is indeed spoken, corresponding as it does with the words of the message, as if the Lord regarded the pregnant question as actually the question of John himself, and directed to him, also his answer. But this is only the result of his gracious condescension to the weakness of the messengers, with which he sympathises even as their master had done; and we cannot so regard it as to say (with Alford) that the Lord would not have thus answered, had not the question come directly from the Baptist himself. Or, are we to receive the words of Luke (vers. 18, 19), according to their plain letter, which in προσκαλεσάμενος ἐπεμψε, calling to him—he sent, and yet more in δύο τινάς, a certain two, seems to intimate that the whole matter proceeded directly from John? No, Luke, although he has not recorded the Baptist's earlier direction of his disciples to Jesus, and here appends an explanation of the subject in all its relations (vers. 29, 30), yet pre-supposes, from his earlier (ch. iii. 22), as well as from the immediately following discourse of Jesus, that his thoughtful readers will understand him aright, when he thus objectively relates the circumstance. The individual Evangelists naturally pre-suppose and take for granted rather too much than too little in their compressed narratives, without comments; and we must remember that we now have the whole under our eye. Nothing was nearer the Baptist's heart, since the first public manifestation of Jesus, than to direct his own disciples to him, with an incessantly repeated—Behold the Lamb of God! this is He! We perceive this once and again in John i. 29–37, and John iii. 24–36 is an example and testimony instar omnium, of the manner in which John from that time to his imprisonment, dealt with and spoke to those of his disciples whose minds were not yet clearly convinced as to the claims of Jesus. Consequently, those who were still his disciples, who remained attached to him, and would rather adhere to him in his imprisonment than go over to the Nazarene, were eo ipso, only such as could not and would not believe that that Nazarene was the Christ. When Luke, therefore, writes δύο τινὰς τῶν μαθητῶν αὐτοῦ,* "a certain two of his dis-

* Not merely the Son of David, and the seed of Abraham (ch. i. 1).

† Although in another, and more formal relation, the beginning of the Parables in ch. xiii. might have well formed the commencement of a section.

* The reading διὰ τῶν μαθητῶν, in Matthew, though now preferred, is to us doubtful. At most ciples." He takes it for granted, by a pre-supposition natural enough to himself, though perhaps, if we may say so, not sufficiently mindful of Theophilus, that the forerunner had on good grounds sent these men to Christ. John, who had said before—But I must decrease! and who had a clear perception from beginning to end, of his one only duty to prepare the way, in his own entire course, for him who was to come, knew that he was to fulfill his course only through imprisonment and death, that thus he must contribute to destroy all carnal expectations of the Messiah, and then make way for him to whom his own mission referred. It is an object deeply impressed upon his heart, to send, before his own expected death, all such as were not convinced by him of the Messiahship of Jesus, to Jesus himself; and he selects, of his own accord, two among the number of those thus situated, possibly two pre-eminent doubters, for this decisive mission. His question, like that of the Lord himself, in Matt. xvi. 13, has the benefit of the disciples in view. But when the Lord makes answer—Go and show John again those things which ye do hear and see, he only refers them again, for their conviction and humiliation, to what they had already done—Tell him again, that he may again tell you—these are the works of Christ! The question was, Do we look for another? are we, by renewed weary waiting, to expect a Future which never appears? The answer cries in impressive response—No! He is here, he whom ye look for, all that was to come, is manifestly before you, to be heard, and seen: prophecy has become reality and history before your eyes and ears, as well as those of all the people (Luke iv. 21). The hearing refers first of all to the rumor which (according to Luke vii. 17) had gone forth throughout all Judea, and throughout all the region round about, concerning the wonderful works of Jesus, and which had been reported to John. The seeing adds to this the then present confirmation to their eyes; for in the same hour, Luke tells us, he cured many of their infirmities and plagues, so that no further answer was in reality needed than—Open your eyes, and ye find it so! But then the words which follow, further embrace both the hearing and the seeing in one; and it is not without significance that what they hear comes first, thus placing the last-mentioned preaching of the Gospel before the seeing of the miracles. (For here Matthew is more exact than Luke, who inverts this order.) To speak quite strictly, the seeing must turn to hearing, the miracles must become words, and the works must be witnesses, that so, by hearing them, faith may come. The miracles confirm the preaching, but the preaching explains their significance: hence, in verse 15 it is only—He that hath ears to hear, let him hear!

Verse 5. The Lord had indeed, in a certain sense, said all in this first word, but he graciously points with his finger to evidences of his mission, even in deference to their desire, performing himself the work of the Baptist to John's disciples. In exhibiting these in detail he refers to passages in the prophets as fulfilled; but with a grandeur of application which should be evident to our modern scribes, in proportion as it is free from any such petty exhibition of personal marks and signs, as their wisdom, in a certain sense, rightly repudiates. The same Isaiah, to whom the Baptist had appealed when his authority was questioned, out of whose prophecy he had taken his testimony to the Lamb of God, is on that very account brought forward again by Jesus himself. He predicts in ch. xxix. the siege and destruction of Jerusalem (but not merely of that which was immediately impending, comp. ver. 3 with Luke xix. 43), then the blinding and delusion of Israel, then the great change that will twice take place between the forest and the field, the fruitful field and the wilderness—first in the rejection of Israel and the admission of the Gentiles, then finally when Israel's hardness shall pass away, so that the deaf again hear the words of the book, the eyes of the blind see, and the meek (πτωχοί) have joy in the Lord. The same prophecy recurs with additional emphasis in ch. xxxv., the sublime concluding chapter of the first portion of Isaiah's prophecies. When Idumea is judged, the desert shall blossom abundantly, and the salvation of God shall appear; when the eyes of the blind shall be opened, and the ears of the deaf shall be unstopped, then shall the lame man leap as an hart, and the tongue of the dumb sing praise! That which in these two passages, pointing far forward to the final restoration of Israel, is obviously predicted, as we say, in a spiritual meaning, as typical of internal spiritual healing (though the second of them includes external prosperity), our Lord here indicates as having received also a physical fulfillment, or as embodied in his miracles of healing. He quotes in the same manner as his Evangelist does (Matt. viii. 17); for in the living relation between prophecy and fulfillment there is a reciprocal alternation, so that prophetic announcements which were delivered in sensible figures, are illustrated in their spiritual reality, and on the other hand, predictions not intended in their external sense, are nevertheless fulfilled in physical embodiment (The entrance of Christ into Jerusalem upon the ass, as the Prince of Peace, is an instance in point.) The Messiah's miracles of healing, as such, and as physical in themselves, could not be predicted, since prophecy deals with the internal meaning and mystery of things; they could only be contemplated beforehand in the same signification which they bear to those who behold them in their external and actual appearance, viz: as symbols of spiritual healing. The accordance, first, between Christ's preaching of salvation to the poor and the miserable, and his beneficent miracles of healing, and it only freely describes the circumstance as it appeared—the disciples were permitted to ask as in John's name.

then the accordance of both these, of what is both heard and seen in him, with what is written concerning him who was to come, constitute his works a sign and testimony that it is He.

The Lord, proposing to give examples (of course not complete) of his works—the miracula, prædicta, beneficа, multa, varia (Bengel) which testify of him, constructs a succession of three members, each of which embraces two parts joined by the conjunctive καί, and (which Luke does not observe). He mentions the blind and the lame first, out of the prophecies, one being taken from each; he then connect the deaf, found in both these passages, with the lepers, found in neither. Isaiah's saying concerning the dumb is passed over, as also much else in the detail of fulfillment; for instance, the casting out of devils (which in Luke, ver. 21, had just taken place before their eyes) is included in the healing of the sick. For the Lord who takes no delight in the detailed relation of his own works, though he must now condescend to it, hastens with profound meaning to that greatest act, which transcended all prophecy or expectation—the dead are raised up—in order to connect it, for its right interpretation, with the πτωχοὶ εὐαγγελίζονται, the poor have the Gospel preached unto them. For it was already a proverb among the Jews, that God always goes beyond his promised grace, and gives ever in addition something new and still greater. There must of course have taken place more awakenings of the dead than one, when the Lord said this; we read of the first in Matt. ix., Luke has recorded the other at Nain, and this also was included in all those things which the disciples of John showed him of.* Now, because the works of Jesus had gone so far as the raising of the dead, and yet he did nothing further for the advent of his kingdom or the deliverance of their imprisoned master, the disciples of John told him of these things with some mixture of displeasure and offence at such a state of things, just as before in John iii. 26. The Lord penetrates all this. He does not now say—And captives have deliverance preached to them, according to his quotation from Isa. lxi. 1 at Nazareth, where the spiritual meaning was plain. Still less does he say—And the kingdom of God is made manifest, which, uttered now, neither the people nor the disciples were capable of understanding. But he quite unexpectedly, though rightly, according to prophecy and fulfillment, appends to the greatest miracle of raising the dead that last and greatest of all testimonies, which itself exhibits the true significance of all the former—the preaching of the Gospel to the poor!† This last is taken at once from Isa. lxi. 1, and xxix. 19: the εὐαγγελίζονται, have the Gospel preached, falling at the close of the answer, has the chief emphasis, that the kingdom of heaven is come: the πτωχοί, poor, are, first of all, the externally mean, to whom, without money and without the Rabbinical price for teaching, the joyful tidings are announced as a free gift, but also, and essentially, the poor and mournful in spirit, such as those of which Isa. lxi. 1 speaks.† The preaching of repentance went forth also to the rich and exalted, yea, rightly understood, to those distinctively; the Gospel belongs to the low and the miserable. The preaching continues ever to this day, and produces in men's souls all these works of Christ, of which history is full, and more abounding and truly than could then have been heard and seen with bodily eyes and ears. The blind see (Acts xxvi. 18), the dead arise, hearing the voice of the Son of God (John v. 25), which is immediately connected with the former by καί.‡ Those who sit in the prison-house hear of it when it is announced to them by those who yet know not themselves the meaning of what they say; or those who will not know and embrace it: for there follows one more καί, which introduces the critical seventh member of the paragraph.

Verse 6. This καί is not but—the offence of many at the humble circumstances of the Messiah, notwithstanding all his wonderful works, is also a token and sign of his person derived from prophecy (Isa. lii. 13–14, liii. 2, viii. 14). The Lord gives utterance, thus, to what he had ofttimes experienced since his first manifestation in Nazareth, to what had, alas, become now as well known as his works themselves; yet it is not included in what they had heard and seen, and should tell John again; but (as if to intimate that) this manner of speaking passes into warning, which might be applicable to the disciples themselves whom he addressed:§ I know well that ye have yet somewhat in your hearts against me; else would ye not have come to ask, when the

* It is made equivalent to certainty, by internal evidence, that the young man at Nain was raised after the daughter of Jairus; and so the various reading τῷ for τῇ ἑξῆς, Luke vii. 11 (overlooked by Ebrard), acquires a decisive significance in the harmony. [In this transposition of these events, however, the author stands almost alone among harmonists. He is still influenced by his theory of exalting the accuracy of Matthew at the expense of that of Luke.—Am. Ed.]

* For thus must it be translated, comp. 2 Sam. xviii. 31, Septuagint; and with another subject in the passive, Luke xvi. 16. That the poor preached the Gospel, cannot be the question here.

† Certainly not, as Schleiermacher supposed: "Those who are not in condition in the legal sense to shine out, πτωχοὶ κατὰ νόμον καὶ παράδοσιν."

‡ This is the truth in Schleiermacher's strange idea that the raising of the dead is to be taken only figuratively, since otherwise there would be a tone of vain-glory quite foreign to the manner of Jesus. How has this great theologian stumbled and lost his way, when the true exposition of Scripture is concerned!

§ There is no ground whatever for referring this warning to the Baptist himself, and thence to derive a supposed proof that he himself had been offended in Jesus.

answer which ye have received had been already so plainly given. The truly poor understand the Gospel message, and receive it in faith, so that they rejoice in the Lord. To all others the works testify aloud: This is He! yet the preaching which they also hear, being no more than preaching, so that even the raising of the dead is no more than a call to dead souls to life in God, shows them the great truth, that he is not such a Messiah as they expected and would have. To him who gives not his heart to the preaching, all miracles are vain for its explanation, and remain themselves misunderstood. Thus, then, the Lord gave a plain and concise answer to a plain and concise question—and the concluding words touch precisely the spirit that put the question. Instead of crying—I am He! (which indeed would have been but of little service), he searches out in these disciples, and in the people (with regard to whom this last saying was a transition to the following discourse) all that unbelief and delusion which stood in the way of the acknowledgment of himself, in order that their faith might be excited to overcome all offence, and respond to him—Yea, thou art He! to Him who sometimes proclaims his wonderful I in kingly majesty over all things and over all persons, and sometimes restrains it as here, though with all his humility it cannot but come out in the final words of his reply; in the σκανδαλισθῇ ἐν ἐμοί, "shall be offended in me."

Verses 7—11. Now first, as the disciples departed or when they had gone, Jesus began to speak concerning John: by which the Evangelist would assure us, in an undertone, that he had not referred to the Baptist before, especially not in his last saying touching offence. But why did he let them first depart, and not utter what follows in their hearing? The Evangelist's observation makes a latent design perceptible, without anticipating, however, the thought of the reflecting reader by any direct reflection of his own. The disciples of John had obtained what they wanted, a decisive answer to the desire of their question, which, if not directly expressed, was plain enough for their after-meditation. Any thing further said for them or done in their presence, would have had an evil effect. Would it have been fitting that the Lord should endeavor, by detailed and continued explanations, to ripen or hasten the development of the slowly struggling faith of these not insignificant "men" (Luke ver. 20), upon whom their master had already expended much pains? This would have been far less effectual than the brief message with its piercing point at the close; and would have assumed before the people the unbecoming appearance of exceedingly sedulous anxiety concerning them on his part. Or, was anything further requisite to be communicated to John? Assuredly not, for both the angel of preparation and the Angel of the Covenant understood one another perfectly well, according to a far better plan of common operation than that which, as is the opinion of many fools, they had concerted in the lodges of the Essenes. What our Lord goes on to say concerning John, it was needless that his disciples should carry to him for his consolation; and its appearance would have been that of adulation to the people. But so much the more necessary was it that the people, in whose minds the great question had excited many thoughts, should have a further testimony and assurance that John was not, as at first sight it might have seemed, in doubt concerning Jesus.*

The entire history of the Baptist, which at the time caused so great a sensation, had now to a great extent faded away and become old; the Lord, therefore, wisely takes this occasion to bring it back to the people's thoughts, and speaks concerning it in a manner similar to ch. xxi. 24, 25. He commences by giving his due honor to the man who in this inconstant, childish generation had fallen into unhonored oblivion; and by pointing out the permanent dignity of the prisoner, whom he, however, does not release. He founds upon the testimony of his forerunner, which, without miracles (John x. 41), had awakened so universal a response, the evidence of his own Messiahship, and of the presence of the kingdom of heaven. The general concourse of the people to the preacher in the wilderness, however little permanent effect resulted from it, was a public confession on which an appeal to them might always afterwards be founded; they had willingly heard the announcement "Repent ye," they had for the most part submitted to baptism, and thereby confessed not only that they were sinners, but that they admitted repentance to be the only way to the kingdom of heaven. All this they are reminded of by the Lord's questions, and by the sharp sayings which recall the scene, and vividly paint it before their memory. How was it then, when ye flocked to the wilderness? While he thus speaks concerning John, he is in reality speaking also concerning them, and piercing their hearts and consciences.

Verses 7—9. These words of our Lord belong pre-eminently to those of his discourses which most illustriously exhibit his wisdom in teaching. Under a simple and popular expression, the essential meaning of which every one who heard it must have understood, and the strongly marked form of which would cleave to the memory, there is concealed an endless fulness of deep thoughts and of interwoven relations, which only by degrees would rise before the thoughtful attention. The thrice repeated—What went ye out for to see? is itself a most emphatic reference to the impulse which urged them to go forth, and also to what they learned from thus going forth, bringing forcibly to their minds both the one and the other. But what follows each similar question in progressive development, is arranged with a precise and specific purpose. The discourse proceeds from the reed of the wilderness, from the external scene thus vividly recalled, to the man or the person who was to be seen there, and then advancing still further, to the dignity of his personality, as a prophet. The great point here to which the rest leads is this—to mark out this man in the wilderness in the well-known, deeply-stamped character of his whole life, first in his constancy in opposition to men, then in his self-denying severity against himself, and finally, in his high office and calling of God. Nor is this enough—a third climax is observable. The first question joins issue with the secret thought and expectation of many, that the rigor of this new preacher of repentance would soon relax, and that he would not stand immovably firm to his first appeal.* But the second question, after the former has shamed their secret suspicion, introduces by the ἀλλά, but (which thus receives its full force), another application and turn of his challenge. The under tone of the first was—"Is it not true, that such was your first thought, and that it would have well pleased you to find it so?" The second, on the other hand, conversely signifies—"Is it not true, that ye assuredly did not, and could not have desired that, when ye sought the man in the wilderness, having already heard of his clothing and manner of life?" Finally, the third question does not like the second merely seize their external impression of his personality as they found him, but takes hold of the conviction, which the preacher's words produced in all their minds, that he was a prophet (ch. xxi. 26)—"Is it not true, that ye found in him a prophet, and were constrained to acknowledge him as such? But rising above all is the circumstance that the Lord only says they went out to see somewhat, using, indeed, first the strong θεάσασθαι, to gaze (as if they had gone to a spectacle), which is afterwards softened to the more customary ἰδεῖν, to see; while he does not say, though it would have better befitted the going out to a prophet, that they went out ἀκοῦσαι, to hear. This is spoken with the same tone in which the Lord formerly rebuked the superficial, inconstant, and capricious conduct of the people (John v. 35); and prepares the way for the similitude of the sporting, childish children given below. Men should go forth to hear a prophet; but this was far from their thoughts: and here lay their great fault, in spite of all their crowding forth, their astonishment, their confession, and their baptism. Again, taking the other side—they went to see, and yet did not rightly see; for in a true prophet the prophet is really to be seen, and in this case the whole manifestation of his life showed and preached something pointing to his great message. All these thoughts the Lord's words would excite—how much he could say with his few words! (John vii. 46).

* This correct view is found distinctly and expressly maintained in Chrysostom (Hom. xxxvii).

The reed shaken with the wind, in the first question, should be understood at once literally and figuratively; for the expression, which is certainly taken from the locality of the wilderness near the Jordan, just beforementioned, included both. Assuredly it was not to see the reeds out in the wilderness that ye went forth—or did you suppose, did you wish, to find in the man that was there a compliant, changeable prophet of the people, a man like yourselves, and not a firm and steadfast prophet of God? (Eccles. v. 11). That would have been, in its kind, no better than a mere reed. No, though there was the appearance of this, it was, at the same time, another impulse which sent you out, a presentiment of that which you actually there saw and found. This first question is followed by no such responsive antithesis as the others; for the answer is sufficiently understood in itself—The man in the wilderness stood like an iron pillar, and like a wall of brass against the whole land, against the priests and councillors as well as against the common people (Jer. i. 18); he adhered immovably to his first—Repent ye! This the people well knew. And this of itself was convincing testimony that this same man could not have been moved by the temptation of persecution to exchange his witnessing—"This is he!" for a doubtful and questioning—"Art thou he?" It was not, then, from doubt that he put the question. But that it was not from impatience to be released from prison, what follows goes on to show. He who was so severe against others, was equally rigorous against himself. Ye remember well that as the sedges of the desert were around him, so also his garment was of camel's hair, with the leathern girdle about his loins: there was no μαλακὰ ἱμάτια,* soft raiment, no ἱματισμὸς ἔνδοξος καὶ τρυφή, gorgeous apparel and delicacy (as Luke explains). Assuredly ye did not expect a worldly forerunner of a Messiah coming in worldly pomp? Such a one would not be sought, would not be found in the wilderness; and if the man of the wilderness is now imprisoned by Herod, he did not fall into this imprisonment as a courtier, whose desire was upon worldly good living (though there he would fare better than upon his locusts), but in consequence of his rigid preaching of repentance to the king. Behold, yonder in Herod's court are worldlings and flatterers enough, for king's houses are the place for them:† there the rule still holds good, which ordered in the time of Ahasuerus

* Roos: "We shall see how long this new preacher of repentance will carry on his preaching. He will presently become tired of it, will abate his severity, and become again like one of ourselves."

* Which phrase appears similarly in Homer. Odyss. ά 437. Iliad ώ 796, and other Greek authors, e. g., Diodor. Virgil also designates the Serica as "molles lanas." Plautus, Bacch. i. 1, 38, speaks in the same way.

† There is no evil in his wearing the costly garments, who is born for and called to the court. Comp. Hamann, i. 324, and iii. 75.

that none might enter into the king's palace clothed with sackcloth (Esther iv. 2); there cry they to the prophets as they did to Amos —Prophesy not here, for it is the king's court! (Amos vii. 13). But John has been the Elijah of this Ahab. The Lord's words thus graze on the edge of condemning the thoughtless court of the day, though without letting fall a single expression which might have been capable of an unseemly construction in the minds of the people, as spoken against the king himself, for he does not speak in the singular at all. His only care is to obviate the people's offence against the imprisoned John. He only intimates briefly—Such are in kings' houses well received, but come not into kings' prisons; and thus, regarding the man of the wilderness and the man imprisoned as one, and consistent with himself,* he paves the way to the third great word—A prophet! In this he only gives expression to the truth which was at last admitted by all, but he confirms it with his own ναὶ λέγω ὑμῖν, yea, I say unto you, and immediately goes beyond it by his still greater—More than a prophet! (περισσότερον is here, as always in the New Testament, neuter, and thus corresponds with the threefold τί). This was something new and unexpected, a text which instantly required further illustration. The people might immediately, if the Lord had paused here, have hurried his words to the conclusion—Is he then the Messiah himself? And yet has he sent to ask thee, and challenged thee as the Messiah? What dost thou say, and which is it of the two? For what is there between prophet and Messiah? But the Lord leaves no space for their foolish imaginings, but immediately adds his own impressive solution of the mystery—For he is, what he himself testified in his question of deep meaning, the forerunner who prepares the way for the Messiah!

Verse 10. As such he is περισσότερον προφήτου, more than a prophet, in a twofold respect, according to the external designation of the Scripture, in the internal relation of his office, the one corresponding to the other. It is his pre-eminence among the prophets, that this is written by them concerning him, so that he is also consequently an ἐρχόμενος, one who was to come. John had with his uniform humility included himself in the expectant "we," and by speaking of looking for another, if Jesus were not he, had once more said—I am not. He had formerly chosen of the two passages which predict his coming, that one in which the humble and unpretending character of the voice is given to him, not that of a prophet or a servant sent of God. The Lord now graciously rewards him for this by placing himself on a level with him (afterwards vers. 18, 19), as sent like himself, and by giving prominence to the other passage which calls him the angel or messenger of God. Ὁ ἐρχόμενος was the general expression for the Messiah, derived from many such places as Psalms cxviii. 26, xl. 8; Hab. ii. 3, etc.; but the fundamental passage which at the close of all prophecy, brings into prominence and finally seals this appellation, is Mal. iii. 1.* The Baptist could not but have thought of this Scripture when he framed his question, and therefore our Lord emphatically shows that John is there exhibited, with himself and before himself, as also a מַלְאָךְ, or messenger, and in the very place where the מַלְאַךְ הַבְּרִית (messenger of the covenant) is spoken of; and thus he gives him back the οὗτός ἐστι, this is He, which the servant had formerly applied to his Lord. But as it refers to himself, the prophecy in the Lord's lips is curtailed, and its full meaning concealed. He speaks in precisely such a manner, as to utter the consciousness with which he beholds himself in this Scripture, while, at the same time, his humility as the Son of Man is involuntarily and undesignedly exhibited—he so changes the text that instead of the Hebrew and Septuagint reading לְפָנַי, πρὸ προσώπου μου, before me, before my face, standing alone, it is thrice said πρὸ προσώπου σου, ὁδόν σου, ἔμπροσθέν σου, before thy face, thy way, before thee.† The Lord who speaks by the prophets, in Malachi announces himself as the coming angel of the covenant—My messenger shall prepare the way before me (comp. Luke i. 16, 17, to go before the Lord their God, and also verse 76); but this the Lord who is come as the Son of Man may not as yet openly declare, it is enough that by the threefold σοῦ, thee or thy, he signifies that he is marked out and referred to by the Father. See how, without directly uttering it, he nevertheless announces his ἐγώ εἰμι, I am He, in his sublime humility! And note how that necessary humility by which he exalts the Baptist to the highest point of honor, by placing him on a level with himself, becomes the loftiest testimony to his own dignity: for that greatest thing, which makes John more than a prophet, consists in nothing but this—"because he is my forerunner!"

And this is the internal relation of his office, for the sake of which the Scripture distinguished him and wrote beforehand concerning him. The prophets prophesied from afar (ver. 13), but this man announces the instant coming of him who was already born, testifies of him who was already in their midst, points with his finger to the Messiah as he walks, stands as the friend of the bridegroom by the bridegroom's side (John iii. 29). He prepares his way—that is the substance in common of both passages, which were written concerning him. In uttering this finally, our Lord gave the key to the preceding words concerning the preaching to the poor, and the offence taken against himself, and likewise paved the way for what subsequently follows concerning the unbelief of the present generation. Repentance! repentance! that is the preparation of the Lord's way, and the way of his kingdom, as the voice in the wilderness testified loudly enough to all consciences. They only who through repentance have become poor take no offence against the Gospel. This great word which recurs to the mind continually in this discourse concerning the preacher of repentance, finally appears in ver. 21, as the point of final decision between God and men. Let it be further noted in connection with the next verse, that if John, the preacher of repentance κατ' ἐξοχήν (by eminence), understood the whole relations of his preaching more fully and profoundly than all others before him, so also he could not have been, in the knowledge of the humble Messiah, who proceeded to spiritual victory through the path of suffering and self-renunciation, less than some of them, for example, Isaiah.

* We cannot understand how this can intimate, according to Schleiermacher, that John was not yet in prison.

* Compare Hengstenberg's Christology on Malachi.

† The perfect harmony of the two Evangelists, in a citation so strikingly daviating, is very remarkable.

Verse 11. "The Baptist" was a cognomen which John had soon received among the people and his disciples, from the striking and hitherto unheard of character of his public function. Probably at first a name of reproach or blame on account of his presumption (John i. 25), it had passed into a general descriptive appellation, and among his own disciples (Luke vii. 20), was used as a title of honor, since their master had included his whole mission under that term (John i. 33). The first three Evangelists give him this name; but here the Lord's own mouth confirms twice in succession, this title of honor as the highest and best designation of this man's dignity and position. He does not say—The preacher of repentance; for this would not have distinguished him from other prophets, and the Lord would leave that to speak for itself in the consciences of the people, till, in ver. 21, he plainly utters it himself. The baptism of John, that to which the people submitted, involved the general confession of the people, which was forced from them by the divine authority (Matt. xxi. 25) of this forerunner; and thus they justified God (Luke vii. 29). Concerning this baptism, the Lord now utters the impressive word, confirming it by the single Ἀμήν, Verily, in the midst of this discourse (stronger than the ναί, yea, ver. 9, afterwards vers. 22–24 only πλὴν λέγω ὑμῖν, but I say unto you)—Among them that are born of women (earthly, mortal men like יְלוּד אִשָּׁה, Job xiv. 1, xv. 14), there hath not risen a greater than he, none greater hath been especially raised up, sent and commissioned of God;* ἐγείρεσθαι, to raise up, being used as by the prophets (Luke vii. 16, John vii. 52), hence also of Jesus himself, Acts v. 30 (as also per catachresin of false prophets, Mat. xxiv. 11–24), as itself closely connected with being born (Mat. iii. 9), inasmuch as God provides and appoints his servants from their mother's womb, summons and sends them forth whensoever he will, already qualified by nature according to his predetermined purpose. In this הֲקִים, to raise up, according to Old Testament language, both the human birth and the divine ordination, are included. Among all those who were born of women and called by God to their office and its function, there had been none greater than the Baptist, whose difference from all his predecessors is defined by that one word. He is not simply regarded as the greatest among them, but as standing alone. We shall hear presently in ver. xii. 13, that "his days" are already the introduction of a new period, and that he stands contrasted with the law and the prophets, being beyond their circle. And yet even this high elevation of John is only a transition, in this discourse which rises from greater to yet greater things, to that final and highest utterance: Notwithstanding, he that is least in the kingdom of heaven is greater than he! Not so much for John's own sake has all this been said, but for the sake of the testimony to the kingdom of heaven now come. Not that the people were to attach themselves to John as his disciples, when they could no longer go forth to him, because the Lord had called him from his work; but that they should come to him, whose way the Baptist had prepared.

And is he then, is Christ himself, the μικρότερος, lesser, who in regard to the Baptist is yet more externally humble and unreputed than he; who coming after him is yet preferred before him; and in his existence from the beginning is in a superabounding sense μείζων αὐτοῦ, greater than he? The words were thus understood by such fathers as Chrysostom and Augustin, and by old expositors as Euthymius and Theophylact. Menken also has lately undertaken to support this view, with ingenious and specious arguments. But, however this might seem to suit ver. 6 at the first glance, a deeper penetration shows that it does not in reality; and a thorough and full exposition overturns it altogether.

First, let it be observed that the comparative may not be thus immediately and absolutely taken for the superlative; and this of itself undermines all those views, which elsewhere rightly enough, but inappropriately here, speak of Christ as having humbled himself to the uttermost. Thus understood, the comparative must, in any case, immediately refer to John; and it cannot be regarded as strictly correct, that Jesus was inferior among the people to John, who had now declined, or had been so when John was the centre of the people's concourse (for see John iii. 26; Matt. iv. 25, viii. 27, ix. 26, Luke v. 1, vii. 16, 17). Further, it will commend itself to all right feeling, as quite dissonant from the whole spirit and tone of this discourse, that the Lord should now throw off the veil of humility which he had assumed from the beginning, and suddenly break forth with the open declaration—Verily, I say unto you, I am nevertheless greater than he! The less can he be supposed to say this, as this and more than this is self-understood in the sacred dignity which pervades the whole discourse. Again, it is not external manifestation and repute among the people which is spoken of in ver. 11; neither as it regards the Baptist nor the μικρότερος, for it immediately follows—In the kingdom of heaven. Thus it is an actual position and estimation before God in that kingdom, or in relation to it, which is referred to. We have it significantly in Luke—μείζων προφήτης οὐδείς ἐστιν, "there is not a greater prophet," and John is thereby not simply placed in the rank of the prophets, but before them and above them; consequently, that which is placed in contradistinction and superiority to him, must indicate an altogether new, and yet higher, degree and dignity. It is not the Lord's design to decide whether John is greater, in his own proper personality, in his nearness of communion with God, in the degree of his holiness, than Abraham, or Moses, or David; he only assigns to him a peculiar and pre-eminent rank as it respects his office* as Baptist, and forerunner of him who was to come. (He does not say directly—John is greater than all these; but merely—No one among them is greater than he: not expressly—No one is equal to him.) As the "greater" in the former part, being a proper comparative, pre-supposes the less, just so the distinctly contrasted ὁ δὲ μικρότερος, or "lesser" implies the greater with respect to itself, and that too in the kingdom of heaven. It is decisive, finally, upon this point that Jesus as its king could never speak of himself (no parallel can be found of the kind), as being in the kingdom of heaven, even the greatest in it—just as a king might be termed the highest in the state. He is not in the kingdom, he comes not into that kingdom; but the kingdom itself comes in, and with, himself. We have examples of the Lord's use of the expressions concerning the greater and the less in the kingdom of heaven, in the plain parallels of Matt. v. 19, x. 42, with which the question of the disciples, and this answer in ch. xviii. 1, 4 harmonize. Consequently, ὁ μικρότερος ἐν τῇ βασιλείᾳ does not signify one that is externally and apparently less in regard to the ancient prophets or the Baptist; but, according to its obvious and literal sense, every one that is less in comparison with others greater by his side in the kingdom of heaven. Then comes in the natural significance of the article, making the comparative equivalent to a superlative—He that is less than all others connected with him, must, consequently, be the least. As we might say—Which is he who is wiser (than all others) in this room? But the emphasis falls sharply upon the contrast of the two comparatives: the less and the least in the kingdom, is yet greater than all who are without, even greater than he, who among those without has no superior.

* Let the progression of the whole discourse referring to him be well observed: A man—a prophet—the greatest!

And thus we find the simple and weighty thought of the whole saying, in the emphatic ἐν; in the contrast between the within and the without. Now, but also now first, is the kingdom of heaven come, present, and thrown open to the entrance of all (ver. 12). There are then two ranks—all the prophets raised up by God, and John at the last immediately before and at the introduction of this kingdom; but now also the disciples of Christ, who are the first within this kingdom, its actual subjects and citizens upon earth. Here comes in a new birth above the being "born of women" (John iii.), here is that better thing provided for us (Heb. xi. 40), here do the disciples of Christ see, and hear, and possess all that so many prophets and righteous men were obliged to wait for (Matt. xiii. 16, 17), which John himself, who dies in prison without becoming his disciple to whom he sent all men, received not upon earth. Let the remarkable passage in Zech. xii. 8 be compared, to which we may almost suppose the Lord was referring. It was the high prerogative of Moses to hear the Lord's words mouth to mouth, and not in dark speeches, and to behold his similitude (Num. xii. 6–8); but now every disciple in this respect is already as Moses the greatest of the prophets (Matt. xiii. 11; Mark iv. 11). He hears and sees, however, in addition, much greater things than ever Moses did. A Christian scholar and catechumen, who has in childlike simplicity learned his "Our Father," knows and enjoys more than the whole Old Testament could give; and so far stands nearer to God than even John the Baptist, whose position was the threshold between the Old and New Testaments, standing at the door without himself entering in. This holds good, however, not merely of knowledge" (Von Gerlach), but of the whole position as before God, of the possession of the better things of grace, even though in connection with little knowledge. For the having and being is here the true knowledge.

Verse 12. By this, which is the only correct exposition of the preceding verse, we have laid the foundation for a thorough comprehension of that which follows. The kingdom of heaven—this is still in continuation the fundamental idea, that is, the kingdom of heaven as come, and among them. It is not doctrine only that the Lord brings and offers to his hearers, but a new, long-promised long-prepared, now first established institution. A new condition of things begins with this, the kingdom of heaven is come upon earth! This is the meaning of the great now, ἄρτι, νυνὶ δέ, which he cries from this time forward. It began, properly speaking, with his own days, the days of the Son of Man (Luke xvii. 22); yet he reckons, in his gracious lowliness, the days of John the Baptist as included in them, between the ἀπό, from, and the ἕως, until. The days are of course the whole period of his official activity, which now drawing to its close in his imprisonment, might be spoken of as concluded. It may, however, be asked, whether the Lord reckons the ἀπό from the beginning or from the end of this period. But when it is considered that the Baptist appeared to Israel not very long before the Lord himself, and that for a certain space their testimonies ran together, and that the forerunner was distinguished from all the other prophets as the coming one belongs to him who was to come, we cannot hesitate to include the Baptist's term in the great new age. It is the prelude to the opening of the kingdom, the actual beginning of the immediately following now, and John's announcement of the kingdom of heaven as nigh at hand was already an invitation which the Lord himself, and by his disciples, only took up and continued.

* Thus much, in any case, must be supplied after μείζων in Matthew, if not just προφήτης in the strict sense, since in the New Testament there are no more prophets, properly speaking. The discourse here runs upon official position and corresponding degree of knowledge; it is that which is meant by προφήτης in Luke, which addition, therefore, is not correct.

The Lord goes on to say, that in this great era now opened, the kingdom of heaven βιάζεται, suffereth violence—and what is that? Verbally, it is uncertain, whether it is in the passive or middle voice, and in what signification it is used. First of all, βιάζειν or more commonly βιάζεσθαι means to use violence upon a person or thing, to overmaster, constrain, do violence to; hence also, to pursue any thing with the greatest earnestness and zeal (Ælian, H. V. xiii. 32; Josephus, Ant. vii. 9, 2; Philo, Chernb. p. 127 c.). In the passive voice,* the meaning here might be, as Luther gives it, and either in a good or bad sense—The kingdom of heaven is outraged and opposed, or, They strive and use violence to enter into it. But then βιάζεσθαι in the middle voice signifies to do any thing with vehemence, to use violence, in the accomplishment of any thing, as Luke xvi. 16. (Hence βιαζόμενος or βιαθάμενος is connected with the verb as an adverb—powerfully.) Let us now first compare the parallel in Luke xvi. 26, where the word is commonly received in the good sense (εἰς αὐτὴν βιάζεται equivalent to βιαζόμενος ἁρπάζει, that is, breaks into it, may press in unhindered, as the counterpart to Exod. xix. 54 in the Sept., which Grotius refers to), and there it must indicate an unfriendly violence against the kingdom of heaven. For, first of all, the πᾶς, every one, in that passage can thus only be properly explained. The language of John iii. 26, that all men came to him, might indeed be the exaggerated words of the envious, but the Lord himself could not possibly have said that—every man presses with violence into the kingdom of heaven,* which would ill accord with the lamentation over the prevalent universal unbelief that Matthew records. Further, this interpretation would contradict the whole connection of Luke's discourses from ch. xiv. to ch. xviii. We shall at that place show in detail, but must now take it for granted, that the sayings recorded there were not unskillfully gathered together from a variety of occasions, but were actually connected together by the Lord himself, introducing designed repetitions with new meanings and connections. The parables of Luke xv., xvi. form a complete whole, to which the intermediate and interposed words strictly belong. The sinner's repentance or punishment, how he is either gained or is lost, is spoken of first in parables addressed to penitent sinners and self-righteous Pharisees. In the third parable, and at the end of the first three, the love of God in seeking the sinner is exhibited as yet bearing with the eldest son; then does the householder set before the new and unconfirmed disciples the wisdom of the sinner, to save him from the danger which threatens him even after his conversion, by a lesson of fidelity in earthly and heavenly good; the last parable, finally, exhibits the punishments which will all accrue, when the sinner, like the Pharisees, in proud, practical unbelief in God's retribution, despise the love of God which seeks him and calls him to repentance—and this last the Lord introduces by some preparatory words to the mocking Pharisees: Ye self-righteous ones are all the worse sinners before God (ver. 15), for ye despise the revelation of the divine love! Law, Prophecy, Gospel are all before you, but ye receive nothing aright, ye rage, and blaspheme against the kingdom of God which is preached to you, because ye have for your lusts (ver. 18) weakened and set aside that law (ver. 17), which the kingdom does not abolish but establish. With regard to you it may be said—all men outrage and oppose that kingdom, instead of meekly hearing and accepting it. Certainly, even if this deeper connection is not admitted, the but which in ver. 17 follows the πᾶς, every man, decisively shows that ver 16 can only be designed to blame the conduct of the Pharisees. Consequently Luke's meaning is like Matthew's in ch. xxiii. 13; compare ver. 12 in the latter with ver. 15 in the former.

But hastily to conclude that the βιάζεται, suffereth violence, here in Matthew must consequently have the same bad sense—that the kingdom of heaven suffereth the violence of opposition, and is mightily repelled—would be to set out with the false supposition, that the two places must necessarily use the expression in one and the same sense. When our Lord repeats his earlier utterances in another connection, it is rather his wont to apply them in a different way, to exhibit another aspect of their comprehensive and many-sided meaning. And one of those pregnant and profound sayings we have here in this βιάζεσθαι. In Matthew the Lord proceeds immediately afterwards to speak of the believing acceptance of the convincing and public testimony then extant concerning the kingdom of heaven now present; but the one-sided reference to the violent resistance to that kingdom would have been an irrelevant introduction to that topic, would rather have diverted the thought from it. The view which Luther takes, and which has predominated in the interpretation of the church, viz., that men struggle to enter into the kingdom of heaven (as Luke xiii. 24, And they who use violence obtain it and take it by force—Hesych. βιάζεται. βιαίως κρατεῖται), suits the connection to a very great extent, better indeed than the former, but not altogether. The essential and fundamental thought, which pervades the whole passage, vers. 10–15, is the mighty and convincing witness which the kingdom of heaven bears to itself, and not the resulting faith or unbelief, which first begins to be spoken of in ver. 16. Further, we must regard the first member—ἡ βασιλεία τῶν οὐρανῶν βιάζεται, as referring to something pertaining of itself to the kingdom of heaven now published; otherwise the second meinber would be only a tautological repetition which would be utterly out of keeping with the pregnant, pointed brevity of these striking and new announcements. The Lord is speaking of the great assured fact that the kingdom of heaven has come, that it openly proclaims and offers itself (ver. 15); and it is this which he places in opposition to the prophesying of the prophets, and the preparation of Elias. Luke's εὐαγγελίζεται—it is preached as joyful tidings, by deed, and word, and all the signs of this great crisis—is the proper parallel of the first βιάζεται, in this place; this is the central, all-comprehending, and fundamental idea, which would be without its corresponding expression, if that is not found in the βιάζεται. What, then, is its full meaning? The word has here no more and no less than its active sense, which passes into the middle—The kingdom of heaven proclaims itself loudly and openly, breaking in with violence; the poor are compelled (Luke xiv. 23) to enter in; those who oppose it are constrained to take offence. In short, all things proceed urgently with it, it goes with "mighty movement and impulse" (as Dräseke preaches about it), it works effectually upon all spirits on both sides and on all sides. Bengel well says, though somewhat one-sidedly, sese vi quasi obtrudit—for the βιάζεσθαι embraces as well the drawing as the repulsion of men's minds; both are at once its one mighty working.*

* The preference of which Schweizer (Stud. u. Krit. 1836, 1) has maintained.

* To qualify it (as Bengel does) with the addition —πᾶς βιαζόμενος—every one of the few who seek to enter, attains it only by violence—is in the highest degree forced.

It may be hoped that the first member of the paragraph is thus made sufficiently clear by lexicon, parallels, and context, and the second now remains to be investigated, καὶ βιασταὶ ἁρπάζουσιν αὐτήν, and the violent take it by force. It is immediately evident that the βιασταί, violent, are not robbers by violence (perverse expositors have actually thought that such, converted from their former life, are intended; for what do we not find in exegesis?); but βιαστής has its usual Greek force, one who shows and uses his own strength, one who applies violence to any thing consequently in the obvious transition of the continuous discourse, it is strictly equivalent to βιαζόμενοι.* Must we then, now at least, translate with Luther in a good sense? But the ἁρπάζειν, take it by force, for cupide et violenter arripere only in a praiseworthy and commanded sense, will not alogether harmonize; in that case we might have expected the more precise and distinguishing οἱ βιασταί; and the parallel in Luke εἰς αὐτὴν βιάζεσθαι, press into it, altogether fails to accord with this ἁρπάζειν. It is our opinion in consequence, as the two vocabula so entirely correspond, that βιασταί must have the same full and double meaning as βιάζεται, as indeed is indicated by the absence of the article, which leaves it indefinite. In a case where exegesis perseveringly disputes which of the two views of a passage capable of two senses is correct, it is generally found that both are one in a third deeper meaning, and that the disputants in both cases have both right and wrong in their argument. Our view does not necessitate any tautology in the two sentences. The first speaks of that mighty excitement which the breaking in of the kingdom of heaven in itself occasions; the second points out inferentially (and this is the tendency of the whole discourse) the result as seen flowing from this cause in the present age, and thus constituting signs of the time. The kingdom of heaven breaks in upon the age with power; and what this signifies with regard to its first and proper introduction, we find continually repeated in narrower circles, as it approaches a land, a town, or a house, and begins to spread its fame. Its constraining power does violence to all; but it excites, at the same time, in the case of many, obstinate opposition. He who will not submit to it, must be offended and resist; and he too who yields to it, must press and struggle through this offence. Thus the kingdom of heaven does and suffers violence, both in its twofold influence: it exerts a mighty power itself, and a mighty power must be put forth towards it, whether it be of faith or of unbelief; for its testimony produces an instant separation between these two. When the preaching of repentance precedes, and the Lord himself comes after, then is the critical time for such βιάζεσθαι, as is seen in the βιασταῖς for and against. Then men begin to contend about it, and no man can keep aloof from this general movement. This contention and strife, ἁρπάζειν αὐτήν, is consequently in both directions, for and against: it is the common expression of the enmity of unbelief and the struggle of faith together; and in Luke xvi. the Lord takes only one of the sides for his immediate object. The best translation into German is—The kingdom of heaven braucht Gewalt, requires force, and those who use force, seize upon it; and the intermediate struggle between unbelief and faith, the false ἁρπάζειν of the Messiah, John vi. 15 (as if his kingdom was to be thus ἁρπάγδην set up), is also included. If this twofold meaning (which is explained by a reference to Matt. x. 21 and 35) is not quite clear, we must finally consider, that not only do both exhibit themselves in fact connected, but that they necessarily in their mutual influence occasion one another—When some would enter, others oppose them; and when those oppose, the former struggle all the more vehemently against them. Bengel, in order to maintain the exclusively good sense of ἁρπάζειν (in Neander, "to struggle for it with all the soul"), says that the lamentation over unbelief and opposition only begins with ver. 16; but this is not true, inasmuch as the whole discourse in its two aspects as exhibited in the paragraphs beginning with vers. 20 and 25, is prepared for and given in germ, not only in ver. 6, but also in ver. 12. Nitzsch (System, § 141) will not let Schweizer keep him from finding in this passage a commendable violence put forth, and we perfectly agree with him, concurring also in his position, drawn from the depths of our Lord's discourse, that "the seizing with violence, of which the Lord speaks (Matt. xi. 12), pre-supposes the days of John and of Christ, or their calling" (we would rather have said—their drawing and seizing men, their doing violence), and that thus nothing Pelagian is to be attributed to the proper power of man; but when he discerns in the βιάζεσθαι, and ἁρπάζειν only this one meaning, actively and passively opposed, only the kingdom of heaven suffering violence from those who seize upon it violently,* we must demur, and assert that the Lord signifies also the excitement which it creates, as seen in the opposition, and that in the βιάζεσθαι of the kingdom of heaven there is first of all an active sense of its coming and influence, even what Nitzsch is obliged to presuppose in the call of the days of John and of Christ.

* Von Gerlach's expression—"it spreads itself abroad with power," adheres rather too much to one side.

* As no article is prefixed, the two personalities of Jesus and John cannot (as Lange thinks) be intended, as if, by their means, the kingdom of heaven was "violently brought to light."

Verses 13—15 John has been from ver. 9 more expressly designated as standing alone in his relation, now he is most decisively so; he is not included among "all the prophets." They have prophesied, continuing to do so after their death, in their Scriptures; their prophecy came to an end, first of all, with Malachi, until Zacharias the father of John, and Simeon spoke the last prophecies, of which the last of all, Simeon's word, already passed over into an announcement of him who was come: thus, until John, that is, looking at the time (as before ἕως ἄρτι), until the days of the Baptist; but also, looking at the substance of their prophecies, until this point of boundary between time past and the after time, between prophecy and fulfillment, between the Old and the New Testaments: for the messenger who prepares the way, the Elias in Malachi's last words at the end of the Old Testament, is actually its winding up and transition to the New, the preaching of repentance in order to the kingdom of heaven is the internal unity of the law and the prophets, inasmuch as both announce the future time and him who was to come. Hence, Mal. iv. 4 comprehends all in the one word—Remember ye the law of Moses! We have shown at length on Matt. v. 17, in what sense the law, as well as the prophets, prophesied; in Luke the law precedes, according to common usage, but here it follows, partly because the sentence passes on from speaking of the prophets, partly for the sake of giving emphasis to this point—And also the law! The man who stood on the threshold between the two economies represents both; as the preparer of the way for the Messiah he is on a level with all the prophets (to whom in a certain sense Isa. xl. 3 already applied), and yet as the distinctively last forerunner of him who was to come, he is himself the beginning of the New Testament, of the new time of fulfillment (Mark i. 1, 2). Ver. 14, as the fullest conclusion of all that had been said, signifies this; and gives its most significant explanation by means of and, which is here equivalent to for. But the open declaration, that John is himself actually (αὐτός) the Elias prophesied in Malachi, is again mysteriously* limited by the formula—εἰ θέλετε δέξασθαι, that is, if ye will receive it and understand it as it was intended, if ye will receive him, as ye should, temporarily as such; that is, until in a second later fulfillment the actual Elias shall come. For our Lord will no more contradict John's negative (John i. 21), than his own declaration (Matt. xvii. 11, 12), where he himself testifies both that Elias will come, and that in the person of John he has already come once. The definite article in Malachi (אֵת אֵלִיָּה הַנָּבִיא), must indicate the actual, historical person of the Tishbite, and the Jewish expectation expressed in Ecclus. xlviii. 10, has its foundation in truth. This the Lord designedly leaves open, by not only saying Ἠλίας without the article, but also by pointing in ὁ μέλλων ἔρχεσθαι to a yet future, and proper coming of Elias.†

* As Von Meyer, also, wrote to me: "I prefer decidedly the passive and good sense."

* With an intimation which did not, as was formerly thought, contain an accommodation to Jewish expectation and mode of speech, but involved something quite different.

† Our Lord was far from intending to say—Ye shall expect no other Messiah! (As according to (Αὐτός ἐστιν is less than οὗτός ἐστι, ver. 10.) Thus much only will he say, that in the person of John "the Elias to come," exhibited himself for this time; and he thereby uttered the last word on this subject that was to be uttered, for Elias and the Messiah pertain to one another, as the mockers under the cross (ch. xxvii. 47) also knew. The question had not been expressed openly, Σὺ εἶ ὁ Χριστός, Art THOU the Christ? and the answer does not openly express what was yet to be veiled from the people on account of the carnal expectations which hung around it, but it went far enough to enable every understanding hearer to think the rest, and to hear, as if it had been spoken, Καὶ ἐγώ εἰμι ὁ Χριστός, And I AM the Christ. Then does the word break off, saying all by saying nothing, and by expressive silence crying aloud the truth—He that hath ears to hear, let him hear! This formula, in common use among the Jews, and which often recurs in the Apocalypse, does not challenge to obedience, as many, reaching too far, would interpret it—qui intelligit, obediat; but at this point only qui audit, intelligat! Enough is given for faith to hear, and yet something remains for personal, voluntary hearing, understanding, and accepting; for the spiritually deaf cannot be made true hearers by any operation of power from without. All the mighty pressing testimony of the kingdom of heaven leaves yet room enough for that wonderful coguntur volentes, which applies to the relation between God and man, and which was previously expressed in εἰ θέλετε, if ye will. "The kingdom of heaven is matter of conviction, conviction is matter of conscience, conscience is matter of freedom" (Dräseke).

Between this first pause in the discourse, which ver. 11 in Matt. defines, and the complaint and reproof which then begin in impressive contrast—But the men of this generation will neither receive the Elias nor the Messiah, have ears to hear but hear not—Luke interposes a paragraph which is not recorded as spoken by Jesus himself.* The εἶπε δὲ ὁ Κύριος, and the Lord said, is at least a correct gloss, if not the genuine reading, in order to indicate the end of the parenthesis inserted by Luke. It is his purpose to explain, for Gentile readers especially, the name Βαπτιστής, Baptist, and the relations of the whole subject to which the Lord's discourse is directed. He places the Pharisees and Scribes in opposition to all the people and the Publicans, or the multitudes and the private man.† This was the report of Luke in his third chapter, and does not contradict the other account (Matt. iii. 7), which does not say that the Pharisees were actually baptized, but the contrary—compare ver. 6. A mere coming to this baptism like that of the Pharisees, John did not accept; their coming proudly and hypocritically, and yet not truly coming, was their rejection of the counsel of God, and their sin: on the other hand, the common peoples hearing and justifying God was good in itself, a confession which all the more surely came from their conscience, as the preacher of repentance had without any preliminaries, and contrary to all expectation, commenced his severe and stern announcement of the kingdom of heaven. Notwithstanding, if this vox populi vox Dei made the unbelief of the Pharisees all the more blamable, it only served, as regards the people themselves, who did not persevere, but after their first submission abandoned John again and believed not in Christ, to condemn them by their own acts, as a foolish generation, in earnest about nothing.

Verses 16, 17. What kind of men are these, what kind of a generation is this? To go out into the wilderness, to hear, to justify God, to be baptized with the baptism of repentance—and not repent! to be baptized with the baptism of repentance for the remissiοn of sins, which the gracious Son of Man immediately comes and preaches to all the poor as his Gospel, to flock around him, to behold his miracles, to hear his words—and then be offended in him because he is not a Messiah after their mind, and does not preach a kingdom of heaven without the condition of repentance! Is there any thing like this by which it may be understood, with which it may be compared? Thus as it were in his astonishment, the Lord uses the Rabbinical formula of which the first traces are found in the Old Testament (Lam. ii. 13; Ecclus. xxv. 15, in the Greek, ver. 11) —*Τίνι δὲ ὁμοιώσω, as we find it also in Mark iv. 30; Luke xiii. 18–20; with an echo of it in Matt. vii. 24, and elsewhere. In Luke is added: Whereunto shall I liken it? for the Lord will only use a comparison which is strictly according to truth, and in his mouth the corresponding Rabbinic phrase (To what is it like?) has its full and perfect meaning, לְמָה אֲדַמֶּה or לְמָה הוּא דּוֹמֶה. And what is the answer in the following similitude? Strictly only this—They are like themselves, a γενεὰ αὕτη, this generation, unique in their kind! But if they are spoken of in the gentlest terms, the similitude of the folly of their own children, when perverse and fickle, would suit them, though far from meeting the case in its deep reality: for when the old exhibit the childishness of children, it becomes something far more than mere childishness. It cannot but be noted, further, that the Lord, nihil humani a se alienum putans, as he took notice of the rending of the mended garments (Matt. ix. 16), and the domestic concerns of the children in their bed (Luke xi. 7), so also observed the children's play in the market-place, and finds in every thing material for the analogies of his wise teaching Bengel's interpretation μέλλων is spoken simply tanquam e prospectu Veteris Testamenti in Novum—to which Alford correctly opposes Matt. xvii 11).

---

* Although Grotius, De Wette, Meyer, for example, unnaturally maintain this.

† Ἀκούσας of course refers to the people, who once heard him, the Baptist.

As the play of the children represented the actions of their elders (here counterfeiting wedding and funeral, the merry music and the dirge after their manner), the Lord sees in it an instructive and real pattern and likeness of human nature; as we might often say, looking thoughtfully at the doings of the children—Even such are men!

The general reference to the common dispositions of mankind Luke retains in the ἀνθρώπους, men, but the more specific reference to which Matthew adheres in the γενεὰν ταύτην, this generation, was to the generation living in that then extant and most important age. To this generation both John and Jesus belonged as having come to it and been born in it, and this so far justifies the simile, in which the complaining children must signify those, whose severe or gentle preaching was displeasing to the residue of the age. It has been attempted, though without any foundation and with no result, to explain away this most striking application. Olshausen understands by both classes of children, those who make advances and those who reject them, the capricious contemporaries of Jesus; and will have the meaning to be, that the one-half of this generation desires this, the other that, and thus no concerted influence can be brought to bear among them, for they are like a band of peevish children: but this is in direct contradiction to the explanation immediately and suitably given in vers. 18, 19. *Lange would reconcile the explanation with the simile by an inversion of the relation—As the one set of children requires from the other dancing or lamenting, according to the tune, so does this generation desire that their prophets should be guided by its caprice; but this is foreign to the simplicity of a popular similitude, and explains away the deep meaning of this simile, which is not altered by the Lord himself in application. To compare the preaching of God to the world with the play proffered by children to children, and thus to place the two personages who had come to it in the very midst of such a generation, is a profound exhibition of their lowliness and condescension, and is in perfect accordance with the actual fact. Was it not thus with them both? did they not stand thus as men among men, each in his own way condescending to the age, to its need and its desire? It was, indeed, with full publicity that they proclaimed their offers, ἐν ἀγοραῖς that is, in the streets and broad ways (Cant. iii. 2, Sept. for רְחֹבוֹת), instead of which a various reading derived from Luke has in Matthew also ἐν ἀγορᾷ, in the market-place. The fundamental idea that first strikes us must be this—Play, foolish child's play without earnestness or perseverance, is the characteristic of the spirit and doings of this age. But there follows immediately a second thought—He who has come from God to this age, a man among men, comes into the midst of them and offers them a most solemn and earnest play. Then finally comes the complaining conclusion—He is, alas, only regarded and treated as one who has invited them to mere pastime, and on that account he is not understood, and therefore is rejected. For it is implied in the background, that they cannot but observe that this dancing or weeping is something different from, more earnest and real than their play: therefore they are not pleased with it now, though otherwise pleased with so much in him. The children who invite, and play to the others, are not, when we narrowly investigate it, designated as the foolish and self-contradictory ones;* but the blame falls upon the others, who in both instances are displeased, to whom nothing is right, not even their just explained self-will. We must adhere to the plain explanation which the Lord himself gives in vers. 18, 19; and must not be diverted by the turn of the language, which less logically than picturesquely, includes all in one—This generation is "like unto children"—for this is only designed to say in general, as we often find in the other parables—It so proceeds with this generation, that this is the effect produced.

Piping and mourning, a gracious invitation to joy and to peace, or a rebuke commanding repentance; these are the two alternating and blending key-notes of all God's preaching to man—the preaching of the Gospel, and the preaching of the law. The preaching of the law reached its most rigorous conclusion in John, the Gospel began to sound forth its richest grace from the lips of Jesus. But both these methods approve their perfect accordance, in these two, whom the wisdom of God sent in succession yet together, into an age of crisis and decision. The Baptist baptized unto the forgiveness of sins, proclaimed the kingdom of heaven, and spoke of the bridegroom; Jesus, on the other hand, refrained not from crying, at the beginning, through the process, and at the close of his ministry, Repent ye! and denounced his woes upon the same generation of vipers which had heard the same denunciations from John. The unison of the two preachings is ever this, Through repentance into the kingdom of heaven! But this internal unity of the law and the Gospel the world understands not, and therefore rejects both. We have piped and mourned unto you, according to one concerted plan—thus rightly speaking, they cry together; and to this juxtaposition with John the Lord again condescends, when he proceeds with the ἦλθε, came, used alike in both cases. But why, finally, does not the mourning stand first, as the preaching of repentance had taken precedence?

* In the Biblische Dichtungen, which generally give such admirable exegesis, more, indeed, than many a commentary; but on this occasion the point is not hit.

* As Lange (Leben Jesu, ii. 2, 761) has said in opposition to me. They are not, by any means the same individual children in the application, but by the "children" generally, first the former, then the latter proposal is rejected.

Because the offer of the kingdom of heaven has been from the beginning the joyful groundnote of all; it led the people into the wilderness first. God can say, now as ever, that he begins with grace: even the Ten Commandments were prefaced by—I am the Lord thy God!

Verses 18, 19. The γάρ, for, as demonstrating ὁμοία ἐστι, is like, indicates a simple and apt interpretation of the simile, in the sense in which we have already explained and defended it. It is not now said—John the Baptist, for that would have required a corresponding epithet for the Son of Man, which it is not his purpose now to assume. Further, it is not said expressly—Christ came. The two who had come present themselves before us in their entire personality, and according to all that had been predicted of them, the one who should come, before the other who should come. This designation would at the same time assure the people, if it were necessary, that the one who had come must certainly know who the other is, and did not put the question from any private doubt. Ἐσθίων and πίνων, eating and drinking, in both cases the present participle, not as in the German Bible, distinguished as preterite and present; for the two forms continue in conjoint testimony before the eyes of this generation, just as their twofold preaching is in strict accordance: Now in his imprisonment John has not become an eater and drinker!* The hyperbolical expression—Neither eating nor drinking, probably thus spoken by our Lord, receives in Luke the covert explanation by adding bread and wine; and in this we discern a reference to his food in the desert (which Luke has not mentioned elsewhere), as well as to the word of the angel which dedicated him to be a Nazarene with spiritual power, even as Samson had been a Nazarite with physical strength. He did not eat and drink ordinarily like other men: No man ever saw him eat; so that he stood as it were, above and confronting all other men, just as Jesus walked in their midst. It was the same condescension in John as in Jesus, only in another form; the contrast and unison of both constituted the fullest exhibition of the condescension of God to the need and the cry of this generation. The legal, strict ascetics received the man of their choice, who should have suited them; though it was only to humble their pride by telling them that all their strict severity, wherein none of them could excel him, would not avail for the kingdom of heaven, without repentance! They who were waiting and longing for the consolation and joy of the kingdom of heaven received their preacher in Jesus, who, with all his Messianic ἐξουσία, authority, in word and work, yet dealt with them so entirely as the Son of Man (and not as מַלְאָךְ, messenger), that he must have been after their mind, if they had been in themselves, or had been made by John, poor in spirit and prepared for his Gospel. But they would only play; and that their own old play, each one after his own fashion, only seeing and never hearing! They who, at other times, were so easily moved to dance or to mourn at the sound of any pipe; now that God proposes to them the true play, find neither the one side of it nor the other, after their mind. Of the severe they say—δαιμόνιον ἔχει, He hath a devil! Not indeed immediately, for at first they were constrained to say—He speaks truth, he is a prophet! for his words of lamentation sunk deep into the heart. But they would not smite upon their breasts, and therefore they soon came to say—But he carries it too far with his enforced and strange mode of life, he is altogether too gloomy; and finally, as the result of all, they stopped not short of—He is possessed, he hath a devil and is mad, why hear ye him? (John x. 20). We learn here, though it is not elsewhere recorded, that such was the way in which John was spoken of among the mass of people after he retired before Jesus in the narrative. As he declares it, this must have been as notoriously true as what he, in his patient humility, said concerning himself, that they scorn him as φάγος καὶ οἰνοπότης, a man gluttonous and a wine-bibber (with a behold, however, preceding), a friend of publicans and sinners. Thus God could not please this generation; what they find wanting in John, they condemn in Jesus, and conversely: they defend themselves against the severity of the one by thoughtless levity, and against the graciousness of the other they pretend to assume a godly strictness; and what befell these two central representatives of all God's ministers, has its historical parallel in all ages. The legal element is too rigorous, too earnest, too morbid, for the people; the evangelical too lax, free grace being, to all Christian Pharisees, a suspicious and too liberal charter for all kinds of sinners. To this day the servant of Christ tries now the one and now the other in his preaching and the manner of his life. One, according to the spirit with which God endues him in sending him, has more severity in his tone; another more gentleness, though both agree in one. But those who have no ear, no heart to receive the truth, have all the more mouth and boldness to condemn its witnesses, and to pronounce their rash verdict upon them, or upon every thing else—This or that is too violent and forced, too severe or too soft, too earnest or too mild, too narrow-minded or too expansive—and if they have nothing else to say, too ordinary and human! To such a generation as this the true Messiah never comes, though with his forerunner he long since came; for it ever thinks of still another than this true one, and they look for this other, or do not! It appears as if, like foolish children, they know not what they would have; but in fact they are not children, and know very well what they would not have—neither repentance, nor the grace which repentance obtains.

* To conclude from this present tense, that John must have still been actively engaged in his baptism, is entirely wrong. Yet Sepp, who knows nothing of the harmony, brings this forward, for the sake of casting an aspersion on the German Bible!

But are all men actually such, so that God has sent this preaching upon earth altogether in vain? Did no man justify God, who sent John and the Son of Man; did no man submit to the truth of God? Did all stumble at the offence, so that none were saved? Did not the βιάζεσθαι, violence, of the kingdom of heaven awake a corresponding good βιάζεσθαι in any hearts? The parable leaves this question unanswered; but as the preceding discourse had already given the encouraging answer, we must suppose, in order to harmonize this sorrowful lamentation with that, that the Lord would add some complementary word which would intimate that he spoke of the generation as a whole, but not absolutely without exception. With such a well-founded anticipation we pass on to the concluding sentence, which has been as much confused by expositors as ver. 12 itself. First, what is the wisdom, which is thus, in one word, so plainly contrasted with the childish folly previously depicted? Assuredly as is self-evident, the wisdom of God, or God himself, as he is wisdom, and therefore is personally spoken of as having τέκνα, children. The whole similitude as before viewed was a profound development of the saying of Solomon (Prov. xxix. 9), that "if a wise man contendeth with a foolish man, whether he rage or laugh, there is no rest," he cannot gain his point; and our Lord's expression evidently points to that same book of holy writ, in which so much is written concerning "wisdom." (Let ch. i. 20–33; viii. 1, etc. etc., be consulted.) Thus God now comes before men, that is, in the person of those whom he sends; just as in Luke xi. 49, the wisdom of God is expressly indicated by the Lord as the wisdom which sends the prophets.* This is all that is meant here according to the whole connection; and we cannot refer the word to the Son of God as the essential wisdom, however true that is in itself, for such a reference is less suitable here than in the passage just adduced in Luke. For how can we suppose him, who has just exhibited himself as the eating and drinking Son of Man, who had humbly placed himself through the whole discourse in juxtaposition with John, thus suddenly speak of himself, and especially in the presence of all the people? That wisdom of God, which sends prophets and apostles, Elias and the Messiah, now ἐδικαιώθη, was justified. Now, though in the Greek this word often signifies to give a man his due by correction, even by condemnation (as in Rom. vi. 7), it never signifies blaming unjustly. Many expositors have perversely forced this meaning upon it, and even Luther, who quotes the old adage about the egg being more cunning than the hen—as if the lamentation still continued, and the Lord would say that wisdom must be content to be thus condemned and opposed by her children. The New Testament δικαιοῦν, like the Old Testament הִצְדִּיק, permits no such signification. Thus wisdom is justified, that she is wisdom, she is acknowledged, and her due honor given to her (Scholium: ἐτιμήθη), just as Luke (ver. 29), had previously expressed it. And who are her children? Solomon tells us, in whose words wisdom so often addresses her disciples as—My son, my children; and who (ch. xxvii. 11) says, "My son, be wise, and make my heart glad, that I may answer him that reproacheth me!" This is strictly applicable to our passage. Yet not as many turn the thought, that she is justified and defended, and approves herself in the end in the person of her children; that is, in the tone of lamentation still —She must thus be justified.† The emphatic πάντων, of all, of Luke might indeed be adduced for this—It is incumbent upon them all to stand forth in her demonstration and defence.‡ But ἐδικαιώθη, as something already past, is opposed to that interpretation, which would have required the future—They will justify themselves, even the publicans and sinners, whom ye now so much scorn! Still less may it be understood as if the τέκνα were the prophets and witnesses, on account of whom the justification should follow; for the children of wisdom are her disciples, not her preachers and teachers, and assuredly Christ himself, could not be included under that designation. The word is thus simply reduced to this—The truly childlike, docile τέκνα (preparatory to the νήπιοι, ver. 25), are opposed now to the childish παιδίοις;‡ such children of wisdom, who yield themselves up to her motherly care to be nursed, and even are new-born of her, understand her, acknowledge her, whatever the evil world may say:

* This is decisive against Sepp's application, who, combining this with Luke vi. 40, would read —Yet the wisdom of both these masters (John and Jesus) is justified in all their children.

* In which sense we might have understood Luther's translation, if he had not unhappily himself explained it otherwise—as we have mentioned before.

† As Braune says: "Thus the weakest Christian must help to assert the honor of his Lord, and to stop the mouth of wickedness."

‡ Consequently we can least of all understand, with Von Gerlach, and the ancient Greek expositors, δικαιοῦν ἀπὸ τῶν τέκνων, as if the persons here stood instead of their charge or accusation—Wisdom shall be absolved from the charges of her children, that is, of the perverse Jewish people! The objection that καὶ is not but, has no force when the usage of the New Testament and its Hebraizing proverbial forms are considered, although Nitzsch, who is generally so exact in his dealing with the word of Scripture, holds (Predigten V. Auswahl, p. 123) that "wisdom must justify herself against her children"; but this is in opposition to the whole context, and to Solomon, to whom reference is also made.

and the ἐδικαιώθη simply expresses this internal acknowledgment, which wisdom receives from them. It is put in the past tense to add to its force—It has been so from the beginning, whosoever has become a true child of wisdom has known and acknowledged her (thus giving the πάντων of Luke its full meaning): consequently even in this foolish generation there will not be, there are not wanting, docile souls who give God his glory. Thus the καί is to be taken as ἀλλά—but they do not all speak thus, some there are who wake up from the frivolous sport, and observe God's earnest dealings, the truth of God; find in repentance (ver. 21), the key which unlocks the preaching of John and the Son of Man, experience the refreshment which is promised to the weary and heavy-laden—in short give wisdom her due as her true and genuine children. There is couched in this ὀξύμωρον (oxymoron), by which wisdom, that should approve herself to all, is said to need justification even to those who acknowledge her—an undertone of lamentation, which by the καί is still connected with the preceding words, and which has confused the best expositors (as Bengel's obscure and diffuse comment in Luke shows). And in this is also implied the great grievance, that those others (as Job xxxviii. 2) have condemned the wisdom of God, and darkened it by their revilings,* so that their offence must be pressed through in order to that justification, which ought never to be necessary; and the children of wisdom, having inwardly acknowledged her, must outwardly also bear witness in her defence against that opposition (for this also as an inference is included in the δικαιοῦν). But this defence is far from being successful in any γενεά (generation); for the same offence is taken against the τέκνα or children as against the ἐρχομένους or those that should come, and the Pharisees ever continue their taunt—Look at the publicans and sinners, his only dependents! or the Sadducees—See the people who fast and who pray, the disciples of the master in the wilderness! What remains then in such a state of things? That one thing which the Lord simply declares—The docile and obedient, at least, whether many or few, acknowledging and confessing the wisdom of God with their hearts and their lips, have justified that wisdom, and have known how to discriminate all varieties of God's preaching like true hearers, and to harmonize like true disciples the diversified methods of the preachers. If this is concealed from the mass of a whole generation, if they deny it or utterly reject it, yet is this ἐδικαιώθη, "justified," a permanent and steadfast fact. Thus have we already the prelude, in the soul of Christ, to that consolation which the Father reveals to him in ver. 25; and this solace is the fundamental key-note of that rest and calm which concludes the whole discourse.

* "We must justify wisdom, though such ought not to be the case, and is itself a reproach to man; for he who requires that wisdom should be justified to him, is himself a fool" (Roos).

Matthew has more reasons than one for not immediately proceeding with what follows, but interposing as it were a new heading to his discourse—a practice which, we well know, he very sparingly adopts. He makes here a little more emphatic the pause which here and there is sometimes to be understood, in all the longer discourses: he further impresses it upon us by the ἤρξατο, he began (which is not merely a note that the suspended discourse goes on again, but is closely connected with ὀνειδίζειν, to upbraid), that the Lord now assumed a tone of severity in condemnation which he had never assumed before. He thus gives an explanation, by the way, concerning those many miracles which his Gospel had not specially recorded; and, finally gives a very significant intimation that the μετανοεῖν or repentance afterwards mentioned by the Lord was the great and essential point. On the other hand, the τότε ἤρξατο,* "then he began," leaves no room for the supposition that sayings uttered on other occasions are collected here, more especially as the internal connection of the whole of the chapter is entirely opposed to that supposition. According to Luke x. 13–15, 21, 22, the Lord repeated all this on the mission and return of the Seventy, nor can we see any reason why that repetition might not have taken place; for the discourse there as well as here is consistent and connected, and we find within the limits of each individual Gospel, evidences that it is our Lord's method often to repeat what he had spoken before. We find that in Matt. x. 15 a prelude was given of what in ch. xi. is expanded in detail: now when that prelude occurs again in Luke x. 12, what could be more natural than that the same detail should follow it once more? and that not in the thoughts of the compiling Evangelist, collecting together the sayings of the Lord, but in the spirit of the Lord himself, who in his pædagogic wisdom and condescension, had already begun to repeat some of his most impressive and important sayings.

Matthew's exhibition of this discourse would have been without its full and perfect close, if to the simile of vers. 16–19, there had not been added a yet severer denunciation of their guilt (vers. 21–24), followed by the return to gentle and affectionate invitation (vers. 25–30). The Lord first lightly condemned the unbelief of the generation as childish folly; but that must not suffice, for these unbelievers are no children, and their deeper guiltiness he must more severely denounce. His ὀνειδίζειν, upbraiding, as it is on that account ntly designated by Matthew, is not merely a lamentation over labor expended in vain, although that belongs to human zeal of rebuking love, but is pre-eminently the jealous anger of holy truth against their sin. Gracious as is the Son of Man in his exhibition of himself as the friend of publicans and sinners, he can also insist upon repentance, and threatens judgments upon the impenitent as severely as John himself: yea, more rigorously and severely than he, since he is himself the Judge. There is no other who will come after him, but he that has come will one day come again to judgment!

* Which Alford also correctly urges, as proving it to be "quite impossible that this should be a collection of our Lord's sayings uttered at different times," and regards it with perfect truth as rather "a token of the report of an ear-witness, and as pointing to a pause or change of manner on the part of our Lord." [This whole theory of a repetition of our Lord's discourses, is a mere shift in order to make out that Matthew's topical arrangement is also a chronological one.—Am. Ed.]

Verses 21–24. The Lord utters a woe which is the antithesis of the blessed in verse 6; just as in the Sermon on the Mount, according to Luke vi. 24–26. He gives a preintimation of what the desolate end will be (Matt. xxiii); but now he goes not beyond Galilee, where the great light had hitherto shone most brightly into the darkness. The Chorazin here alone mentioned, and the well-known Bethsaida, are specified as representatives, for the reason which Matthew gives, of many other κωμοπόλεις, villages, standing in similar case: in contradiction to these the capital stands alone, with its more definite and impressive καί σύ, and thou, as we said before; that is to say, not as the capital of Galilee, properly speaking and in the ordinary sense (for this was Tiberias, the residence of Herod, whither the Lord on that account more seldom came), but Capernaum as in reality greater and more proud, which had taken the place of Nazareth as "his own city" (ch. iv. 13). He does not rebuke Nazareth by name, though so malevolent towards himself; the affectionate and sorrowful love with which he ever thinks of it forbids that, as also his wisdom, which would avoid every appearance of evil. He does not rebuke such as have injured and persecuted himself personally, but such as have refused to repent. We read of no enmity or persecution to which he was subjected in Capernaum; but the careless and indifferent reception of his word and works was yet worse, and more condemnable than any eruption of malice would have been; it bespoke that slothful, dead, impassive indifference, for which nothing more could be done. The exaltation of Capernaum to heaven is generally regarded as referring to the honor which had accrued to it from being the dwelling-place of Christ; but though this was the immediate cause of the special allusion to its name, we cannot admit that allusion in this expression. The Lord's humility would have prevented that; besides which the contrasted bringing down to hell points to another interpretation. The words do not refer to any honor which he had put upon this city, but to a state of external prosperity which would come to a frightful end, to the imperious and sinful pride with which she had exalted herself. According to Benjamin of Tudela, Capernaum lay so high, that at first sight it appeared higher than Carmel; and Nonnus on John vi. 59, calls it βαθυκρήπις Καφαρναούμ, "deeply founded Capernaum." Probably it was not without figurative allusion to this external pre-eminence that the Lord indicated it as the Galilean Jerusalem, and in such a manner that the unnamed city on the hill must be thought of when he announces its coming fate. The expressions themselves, however, are taken from prophetic Scripture, and point back to the pride and ruin of Babel or Babylon (Isa. xiv. 13–15; compare as to Jerusalem and Israel, Isa. lvii. 9).*

The δυνάμεις, mighty works, which were done in you, which were done in thee, refer back to vers. 5–12; since the wonderful works of our Lord were a most decisive testimony and demonstration of the offered kingdom of heaven, and they constituted in themselves a most effectual preaching of repentance and faith. How much that is not recorded may the πλεῖσται, most, of ver. 20 include! All the works of Christ are a call to hear, a confirmation of the word so strong, that unbelief is by them rendered the more inexcusable (John xiv. 10, 11, 24, x. 37). It cannot be sophistically explained away that the Lord manifestly, both here and there, assigns to the miracles which their eyes beheld, the highest place among the external means of grace appointed of God. As he indicates in the μετανοεῖν, repenting, which lays the ground of the πιστεύειν, believing, springing also from a preparatory degree of it, the decisive and distinctive turning-point on the side of man, (and this explanation is also essential to the understanding of vers. 16–19), so does the judgment take its rise from the despising of God's miraculous works, a judgment, therefore, more fearful than that which will fall upon the heathen cities, to which no such signs were given.

With the two cities, two others are first contrasted; and then one city to one of them: Tyre and Sidon, laid waste, according to prediction, by Nebuchadnezzar and Alexander, lay in the neighborhood, and their judgment was the less as they still stood restored in a measure from their ruin (Acts xii. 20, xxi. 3–7, xxvii. 3).† Hence it could only be said

* We find traces of the once celebrated city Capernaum in the earlier records of travellers; but no ruins of it are discernible now. (Comp. Robinson's Palestine on this point.) [The latest researches tend to identify it with the modern Tell-Hûm. The author's reasons for abandoning the usual reference of our Saviour's expression to the distinguished privilege of his teaching, are unsatisfactory.—Am. Ed.]

† But it is obvious that the Lord does not intend these new cities (to which Sepp thinks he might, in his obscure visitation of Phœnicia, have paid an acceptable visit!), but the ancient cities, which the prophets rebuked, and which had been laid waste · for these are the proper parallel with Sodom.

of Sodom afterwards, with increased emphasis, that it would have remained to this day. The guilt of unbelieving, contradicting Israel had even in old time been represented as surpassing that of Sodom and Gomorrah, bye-words among the prophets for wickedness; how much more may the Lord so speak, now that they have consummated their unbelief! In Deut. xxxii. 32, Israel is likened to Sodom, as also in Isa. i. 10; but in Lament. iv. 6 and Ezek. xvi., it is further added that Israel's abominations were greater! Let the pride of Sodom, as it is depicted in Ezek. xvi. 48–50, be especially observed; and it will commend the view of the exaltation of Capernaum, which we have given above.

They would long ago, in their time, when the judgment was coming upon them, have repented in order to avert it; and, indeed, in sackcloth and ashes, like Nineveh, which thus escaped its judgment (Jonah iii. 6; comp. 2 Kings vi. 30; Jer. vi. 26; Dan. ix. 3). Many regard this latter addition, not as strengthening, according to the tone of the whole discourse, but as softening the expression—They would at least externally, have humbled themselves, and thus, like Ahab (1 Kings xxi. 27–29), made propitiation; but this is altogether inapplicable here, for the Judge, as in Isa. lviii. 5, looks at the sincerity of the heart. Thus much, however, the addition to μετενόησαν, repented, tells us that the penitent expression of guilt, true penance as such, is to be made prominent in connection with "change of mind," and consequently, Luther's translation may be justified. Let it be further observed with what absolute and sublime assurance the Lord speaks as Judge, and therefore as Searcher of hearts and as knowing all hidden things: the Father exhibits to him the coming judgment, and gives him at the same moment the glance of omniscience, so that he can speak of what would have taken place in any age, among any people, under any circumstances. This is not merely a common mode of speech, but must, like all the Lord's sayings, be precisely interpreted. It directs us to that scientia media de futuro conditionato sive futuribili, as the schoolmen have it, which is not, however, an invention of Jesuitical casuistry, but the only true reconciliation of the counsels of God with the freedom of man. The history which contains the visitations of God's anger against Tyre and Sidon, and the destruction of Sodom to this day, rests not upon any coherence of natural events simply, nor upon the unconditional decree of God, but upon the freedom of man; their judgments were drawn down upon them by their sin, and would not have fallen upon them, if the doomed had repented in time.

But now the Lord's words rise yet higher—They would have repented, if the greater means of grace had been afforded them! This is a deep saying, and of vast and far-reaching consequence; a dictum probans that cannot be too much pondered, against all that narrow and bigoted dogmatism which, swifter to judge than the merciful and righteous Lord himself, would rashly decide the eternal damnation of the heathen, not to say of all those multitudes of Christians, who, in their life-time, never had what might be called a clear testimony of the truth. To say that God is under no obligation to give the grace of life equally to all sinners, and that he was justified in punishing Sodom and Gomorrah in their iniquity, does not help the case; for God is under obligation to no sinner, and he would have been justified in punishing the whole world, instead of redeeming it—but yet he did redeem it. When the Redeemer himself, whose coming into the world is itself the great, decisive witness of all-merciful love, declares that the failure to repent, and therefore the want of salvation, was, in the case of many, the result of the lack of great grace—what is the irrefragable inference which must ensue? Is it merely that the half-permitted, half-presumptuous question is excited—Wherefore did not God give to them, or will he yet give to them repentance? No, it follows, according to the plain answer which he himself appended, that it will be more tolerable in the day of judgment for Tyre and Sidon, Sodom and Gomorrah, for heathen, Jews and Christians who have been hurried in their sins to eternity, but who, with fuller grace, might have repented, than for those who enjoyed upon earth the complete testimony of God's will, but rejected it against themselves. This word stretches far and deep. There is promised to Sodom (in Ezek. xvi. 53–55) a bringing again of their captivity and a return to their estate; but that indefinite Old Testament expression receives here its true meaning and explanation. The day of judgment can only be the last day of final doom;* as there will then, however, be no more room for preaching or conversion, but only the full revelation of what had been already decreed, it might seem to follow that an intermediate state of grace and corrective judgment must be presumed, between their judgments recorded in history and their final judgment, between the death of the sinners, and that damnation of unbelievers which will follow the finished preaching of the Gospel. Thus does the Lord speak words which might be thought to oppose equally the false dogmatics of condemnation, and those of general restoration: those carried away in their sins may yet find space of repentance, but those who rejected the full testimony of the Gospel will find no more salvation. There is a veil, however, thrown by our Lord over the whole subject of the dealings of God's judgment beyond time (Rom. xi. 33): he only uses the indefinite ἀνεκτότερον

* In the external judgment upon Israel, to which these words have been incorrectly limited, there is only a symbolical exhibition of what is here indicated. Otherwise the Lord must have spoken in the preterite instead of the future—It would then have been more tolerable for Sodom, than it will be for Galilee and Israel when their calamities come.

ἔσται, it shall be more tolerable, which might be applied simply to degrees of condemnation corresponding with degrees of salvation. He does not predict the damnation of any particular inhabitant of Chorazin, Bethsaida, or Capernaum, for he speaks only of those cities in the mass; no more does he determine the conversion and salvation of any individual inhabitant of Sodom and Gomorrah. For it does not by any means follow that they who believed not when the long-suffering of God waited for them in the flesh, would believe the preaching of the Gospel to the dead; so far as πάλαι ἂν μετενόησαν, they would have repented long ago, might be applied in general, there would seem to be some room left for hope in that mercy of God which never forgot mortal man.

Verses 25, 26. Olshausen's confident assumption that the formula ἐν ἐκείνῳ τῷ καιρῷ, at that time—occurring in a similar way in ch. xii. 1—indicates that what follows was uttered on another occasion, springs from his already mentioned idiosyncracy concerning Matthew's collections of our Lord's discourses, and is refuted both by the train of thought, and by the ἀποκριθείς, answered, which cannot be understood of anything but a strict connection. Every unbiassed reader must discern here something more than the mere indefinite beginning of a discourse, equivalent to the Hebrew ענה; nor is it merely, as it were, a third ἤρξατο, or began (after vers. 7, 20), indicating a new turn in its sentiment; but the internal contrast to the following with the preceding words leads us to its meaning. The Lord answers his own words, which had passed from lamentations to threatenings of judgment, by a quieting discourse, in which, submitting himself to the Father's righteous decrees, he returns back again to the language of gracious invitation. Regarding these new words as addressed to the Father, the answer will be understood in all its profound meaning. The Father had previously spoken to his Son by a secret inspiration which comforts his soul, and stills its holy perturbation; and the Son now responds to that secret voice by his ἐξομολογοῦμαί σοι, I thank thee—even so, Father, thy counsel is right, I will only thy righteous will and decree! Such an internal process in the soul of Jesus, when we conceive it aright, prepares the way at least for the sublime words of ver. 27; and on their repetition (Luke x. 21), the consolation seems to have been strengthened in his living remembrance, for we read ἠγαλλιάσατο τῷ πνεύματι, he rejoiced in spirit.

This is, so far as we know, the first public invocation of the Father before all the people,* and the only one which occurred before that final period, when Jesus twice (John xi. 41; xii. 28), thus spoke in the hearing of man, and the last instance in Gethsemane, and on the cross. It indicates an extraordinary emotion excited by a moment of sublime and critical solemnity. He calls him Father, but does not add Lord, in the absolute sense, which only became the Son under the veil of prophecy, and in the deep humiliation of his humanity Lord of heaven and earth—this is something more; it is generally the solemn invocation of prayer, and here particularly the appropriate reference is to that sovereign counsel which embraces, penetrates, directs all things that are. But what is that decree of the righteous Father, his concurrence with which the Son so solemnly declares, with his "even so" of glory and praise? That not all can be saved, and, therefore, indeed, should not be, that salvation is only given to the humble who receive it, but denied to the proud opposers. Did the Son find his solace in this, and shall we poor children reject it? Let us take good heed, that we do not likewise fall into the condemnation of the wise and prudent! Let us rather endeavor, so far as we may, to enter into the feeling of the heart of the God-man, which blends together and reconciles the sayings—More tolerable for Sodom than for thee, and—Come unto me, all ye that are weary! The giving or denying of salvation is not expressly mentioned, yet nothing less is meant by the revealing and the hiding, inasmuch as all must depend upon the knowledge of the counsel and economy of salvation. In the deep and mysterious ταῦτα, these things, which concisely includes the impressive contrasts of the preceding discourse, the faith and unbelief, the μακάριος, blessed! and οὐαί, woe! and the things concerning them, inconceivably much is said, but inconceivably more is unspoken. The wise and prudent (σοφοὶ καὶ σύνετοί, significantly twofold) are obviously those who are prudent after the flesh, the proud whose blind wisdom opposes the eternal wisdom of God (ver. 19; 1 Cor. i. 19–21, 27. According to Hagada shel Pesach, p. 5, the Jews said every year at the Passover, We all are wise, we all are understanding, we all have knowledge of the law; thus perversely appropriating Deut. iv. 6–8, since they were quite ignorant of the very essence of the law, knowing no more of the preaching of repentance, than of that which was its end and aim, the reception of grace in Christ. In the grandest and most general application of the words, the Jews must appear as the falsely wise, the heathen as the docile babes;* although the word penetrates much deeper, and found its first application in the distinction of the Scribes and the common people, the Jews and the Galileans; indeed, in our own day, it asserts its truth in ever new dis-

* Roos: These precious words are the first record of communion between the Son of God and his Father, which the Evangelists have given us.

* In the Clementines (Hom. viii. 6) it is quoted: ὅτι ἔκρυψας ταῦτα ἀπὸ σοφῶν πρεσβυτέρων καὶ ἀπεκάλυψας αὐτὰ νηπίοις θηλάζουσιν, "that thou hast hid these things from wise elders, and revealed them to sucking babes"—in which Hilgenfield rightly regards the Jews as the wise elders, and opposed to them the Gentile Christians (comp. Hom. xviii. 15.)

tinctions between the falsely wise and the truly simple, so that the revelation may be concealed even from many a doctor thought to be orthodox. It is the Father's will to reveal his salvation to all, even as it is the Son's to give rest to all; but just as only the heavy-laden can find that rest, so can the wisdom and truth of God be revealed only to babes and simple ones.* To give this revelation to the wise, and to give this consolation to the satisfied, are alike impossible, for that would be to give to those who will not receive.† In the salvation of any man, that freedom which is permitted to him by his Creator, must exercise a deciding influence: and this is the inscrutable and unimpeachable counsel of the Father, which must ever be adored, even when through the opposition of a free agent, the revelation becomes a hiding, and in giving a withholding (Deut. xxxii. 4, 5). Thus will the righteousness of God be justified to the children of wisdom, even in its ἀποκρύπτειν, hiding. Νήπιοι, babes, are the פְּתָאִים of the Old Testament (Psa. xix. 8, cxvi. 6, cxix. 130; Prov. i. 4, etc.), who are free and accessible to instruction, who yield themselves up like little children to be taught and disciplined: and in this word the Lord has in view that great passage (Psa. viii. 3), which he afterwards so sublimely explained. He then rises from this little band of μικροί, little ones, who, however, under the training of God will become men and conquerers, to the supreme and only Father, and subsides from his holy indignation into the εὐδοκία, it seemed good, addressed to him (comp. Luke xii. 32). It is the same sacred will of the Father, which shows itself as good and gracious to the saved, and as righteous to those lost through their persistent guilt; and it is now sealed by the Even so of the Son, who would so willingly save them all. The ἐξομολογοῦμαι (incorrectly translated by Erasmus, gratias ago, I thank thee; as also of late by Ebrard—for that would have required εὐχαριστῶ, John xi. 41), expresses praise which springs from, and consists in acknowledgment and accordance: Bengel, therefore, says with as much depth as truth—summa ἐξομολογήσεως filialis, ηα Pater! This is the decisive yea, which protests against all the contradiction of worldly wisdom, and will be justified at the last day and through eternity; and it forms the transition to the following words concerning the Father and the Son.

Verse 27. Besides in this place, and in the parallel of Luke, we find in the first three Evangelists only once more "the Son" occurring absolutely, and that is in Mark xiii. 32. This utterance of our Lord is, as men say, entirely Johannean; and that it occurs in Matt. and Luke is sufficient to show the unison between these Gospels and the Gospel of John. We find an evidence of the genuineness of these words in their obvious correspondence, uttered as they were immediately after John's message, with the testimony which he had once given to his disciples concerning the Father and the Son (John iii. 35, 36); just as we found in Matt. ix. 15, a similar reference to John iii. 29. No exposition can exhaust, no dogmatic speculation can penetrate, the depths of this saying, which points to the deep things of the Godhead. We do better to spell it out in simplicity with the babes, and thus to yield up our souls to the mighty and effectual revelation of the Holy Spirit, who will teach us what is the confession of the Father and the Son. The first thing which such child-like reading emphasizes is the distinctive "to me:" seeking him in obedience to his subsequent exhortation—Come unto me! we shall find him, and in him, all that he may and will reveal unto his own. Then comes the παρεδόθη, are delivered, as inscrutable as it is absolute, which by no means applies only to the Son of Man in his humanity, but to the Eternal Son, who also as the Son hath received all things from the Father (John v. 26). Πάντα, all things, is just as comprehensive in its range as the previously ταῦτα, these things, to which it corresponds; but the Son cannot simply say, that all things are revealed unto him. He himself is the revealer, even as the Father is. It is not all power in heaven and earth (Matt. xxiii. 18), which is immediately contemplated here; but the full perception and knowledge of eternal truth, and the justification of the supreme wisdom of God's counsel. God is himself truth and wisdom, he knoweth himself in the trinity of his being, reciprocally as Father and Son in the unity of the Spirit. But the third Person is not here expressly mentioned, because he was not yet manifest, as the Son was in the Son of Man (ver. 19). What completeness does this give to the discourse of this chapter, compact and rounded as it every where is, when such a testimony to his divine and eternal dignity is set over against the deep humiliation of him who had come into the generation of that age! The Son hath all things to reveal and to administer, but as given him of the Father; thus, even while he is testifying of his own supreme dignity, he first gives honor to the Father, and then proceeds to cry: Come unto me, for only with me and in me, is every thing to be found!

The common translation "knoweth" does not fully correspond to the ἐπιγινώσκει, which signifies a perfect and living perception and knowledge: hence we have in Luke x., γινώσκει τίς ἐστιν, knoweth who he is, that is, what the names Father and Son would signify *ad intra. No man knoweth that—a gracious

* "Because the babes, not perverted, are in reality more cultured than the wise and prudent of this world" (Petersen, Lehre von der Kirche, i. 135).

† Most assuredly, those who are wise in their own conceits, are here ironically referred to, so that we cannot say with Von Gerlach—The wise might better descend to the level of the babes, than these rise to the level of the wise. It is, alas, far otherwise, and that is not the Lord's meaning.

* Thus by a true interpretation we repel a cerand earnest warning for all the wise and prudent, who conceive themselves qualified to investigate what is in the nature of God, without the illumination of the Spirit of God. Well had it been if Christian dogmatics, both before and since Athanasius, had remembered this warning of the Son, and been content to speak of the mysteries of the Trinity in no other words than those which the Son reveals to the babes, and gives to the heavy-laden who come to him as their living and life-giving knowledge! It was first said, No man knoweth the Son but the Father. The intermediate idea, unexpressed, but which is necessarily deduced from these premises, is, that we must know the Father, in order to know the Son. It is further added—But the Father doth not reveal himself immediately, but in the Son. Thus it remains established, as it is testified in John xiv. 8, 9, vi. 46, i. 18, that the Son alone immediately knoweth the Father as such and in himself, all others know him mediately through the Son. The Son revealeth simply, as the ἀποκαλύψαι at the end (without our translators' addition—him) is designed to signify: He revealeth himself, and in himself the Father, and πάντα ταῦτα, all these things, of eternal wisdom in the plan of salvation, which have their issues in eternal salvation and condemnation.* This is the mystery of God, of which Col. ii. 2 speaks, be the true reading whichever it may; and this is the internal principle contained in Rev. x. 7, which is to be fulfilled in history. It might have run in conclusion, after the analogy of Scripture usage elsewhere, as Matt. xvi. 17; John vi. 45—And to whomsoever the Father will reveal; but this form of expression which was used in ver. 25, is now limited to its only possible meaning and application, just as the sentiment of ver. 46 immediately following ver. 45 in John vi. The Father only revealeth in the revelation of the Son. But whatever appearance of arbitrary, exclusive election in the will of God there might be in ᾧ ἐὰν βούλεται, to whomsoever he will, is emphatically removed by the words that immediately follow, in which the Son himself then present calls all to himself!

Verse 28. This sentence is as universal and unconditional as the preceding. But it must be attentively observed that the Lord does not continue to speak of revelation and knowledge: they who would know and see, must come, and receive the revelation in the living experience of the ἀνάπαυσις, rest; that only being the true learning of God's simple ones.* Only by living experience of God's grace can we know God, and this proceeds from faith to faith. What then is the way to faith in him who has come, in which the offence is overcome, and salvation is attained through him? In theory it is the casting away of all wisdom and prudence of self in order to a childlike concurrence with the Ναί ὁ Πατήρ, Even so, Father, which the Son utters for our example; but in practice, without which theory has no value, it is the obedience to the word of that same Son, the acceptance of that word which the Son of Man in meekness and humility utters to the children of men—Δεῦτε πρός με, Come unto me.

The whole of this comprehensive conclusion of the discourse (vers. 28–30), is an inexhaustible text which can never be preached out! Who is it that invites, beseeches, and calls? The eternal Son of the eternal Father, for us become a Son of man! Whom does he call? All, all who will know themselves to be what they are, weary and heavy-laden! What does he promise to them? Refreshment and rest for their souls! What does he require as the condition? Nothing, absolutely nothing but coming; and when they are come and have already received his consolation, only the abiding with him, learning of him!

In Ecclus. xxiv. 19, 20, the eternal Wisdom utters her own praise and invites men to herself, and the Lord here uses words which almost seem to be the echo of that passage in his own spirit, for he must often have read those words. The first Δεῦτε πρός με, Come unto me, is uttered with divine majesty, precisely as the Lord God, the Holy One of Israel cries (Isa. xlv. 22): פְּנוּ-אֵלַי וְהִוָּשְׁעוּ כָּל-אַפְסֵי אָרֶץ, Turn unto me, and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth! This single word in the mouth of one Son of Man, calling all others to himself that he may save them from all their need, is ample and sufficient testimony that he is more than man: this is the manner of a man who in his greatness is even the Lord God (2 Sam. vii. 19, 22; 1 Chron. xvii. 18). He only who could speak of himself as in ver. 27, could follow it with ver. 28.† O, how does the eternal tain recent criticism, which asserts the aorist ἔγνω to be the true reading, as it was found in many ancient quotations of the fathers; imagining that the Evangelists saw themselves constrained to change the expression on account of its dangerous service to the Gnostics (who held that the God of Jesus was an altogether new and hitherto unknown God).

* If we were to supply αὐτὸν τὸν Πατέρα—which, indeed, seems at first to be right—we should overlook the design for which this αὐτόν is omitted; that is, in order that the end should round off into the style of the beginning, with a general idea. It is revelation, generally, that is concerned.

* As Roos has very beautifully said, "Our true notion of the divinity of the Son depends not upon any hard thought, or scholastic subtilty, but upon this—that the Son be in such sense the end of our coming, believing, desire and hope, that we never go beyond him for their satisfaction." In which connection of vers. 27 and 28, we may once more observe that the Son immediately reveals himself and only in himself the Father.

† Roos again: "Clearly to perceive and to feel this, we have only to imagine an apostle saying—Come unto me, etc. Would not such words in the mouth of an apostle be meaningless and blasphemous presumption? The same may be applied to all the sayings of our Lord, wherever he speaks of himself. We need not so anxiously and carefully go about to collect proofs of Christ's divinity."

mercy of God express itself in the tenderness and grace of the Saviour's human heart! How natural it is to regard him as looking round, and stretching out his arms and saying—Only come unto me, come, and wait no longer for another; I am he, let me not wait upon you! How would he, after this grief over those who were rushing into judgment and sorrow, take his own comfort in those whom he might solace, to whom he would all the more ardently extend all that salvation which the others had cast away or refused!

All men are actually weary, and heavy laden; laboring and dejected under the yoke of sin and vanity, of death and destruction; and so far the invitation is to all. This might be our first simple exposition, which would then make κοπιῶντες καὶ πεφορτισμένοι, that labor and are heavy laden, only the same thing viewed under two aspects, active and passive. But with this it must also be observed, that he by no means excludes those who are miserable through physical and earthly external unhappiness, though he gives them no promises of help merely as such. We find no example of his having invited to himself the merely wretched in body; and we must interpret the words in the same sense as the poor and the mourners are understood in the Sermon on the Mount. Hence we have here, at the conclusion, the true interpretation of the miraculous works which, in ver. 6, were exhibited as signs of the Gospel preached to the poor. If the heavy-laden feel their burden as the burden of their spirits, then shall they find rest unto their souls. The contrast of the yoke and the burden (vers. 29, 30), tells us that the Lord lays his emphasis upon "heavy-laden," as the peculiar and fundamental idea. But what is the burden of the soul, which may be exchanged for his light burden? First of all, as it regards Israel, in whose midst this cry is heard, the Pharisaical yoke of the law (ch. xxiii. 4); then, further, also the law imposed of God (Acts xv. 10), with all its wearisome and hard observances of worship; then again as regards all men, it is sin, on account of which these laws are imposed by God or man, with all the disquietude of an evil conscience without atonement, and the service of things that perish and satisfy not; yea, all that oppresses and weighs down the soul in the utmost comprehensiveness of these words, from that restless, hot pursuit of sin, which finds no peace, as the most wicked children of the world well know, down to the gratuitous burden which even a Martha among the disciples of Jesus may impose upon herself. Thus heavy-laden in ten thousand ways are all men every where, and so the "all" of the invitation is an open contrast with the "no man" of ver. 27. But why then do not all come to him? This question leads us to observe that κοπιῶντες (that labor) is subject to a necessary restriction and connects itself with πεφορτισμένοι (heavy-laden), as τῷ πνεύματι (in spirit) with πτωχοί (poor). It means not here, according to its usual meaning elsewhere, those who labor simply, and strain their energies; for such vehement personal labor and exertion, so long as it is fruitlessly put forth, effectually hinders from coming to the only source of reinvigoration; but it means, according to the proper and original idea of the word, those who are exhausted and spent, who, pressed down by their burden, can bear it no longer. (Thus the καί is a Vav exegeticum for "because," as in John xi. 26.) Though he may call all, yet is his call heard only by those who feel their burden and would be freed from it: this is the mediating link between the offer and the acceptance of salvation. Where the law, and sin, and the world, and the flesh have so long burdened the Spirit, that the soul is brought to confess and mourn the burden, to despair of deliverance in its own strength; there is that spark of longing in the spirit to which grace can address itself, and which it comes down to meet. The Lord stands in the midst of humanity and utters his call: he who follows him approves himself thereby as one susceptible of salvation, and whose will is rightly disposed; all others, who have long heard his call in vain, will one day hear in earnest the awful—Depart from me! (ch. xxv. 41). But he does not now cry in another voice, Remain at your distance from me, all ye proud and satisfied ones, who are better pleased with the galling yoke than with my easy burden. No, he cries also to them, Come ye too, but come as the weary and the wretched! So will I give you rest also (compare ἀναπαύσω Isa. xxviii 12, in the Heb. and Sept., where עֲיֵף clearly corresponds to κοπιῶν; Isa. lvii. 15, Sept.; Jer. xxxi. 25 in the Heb.).

Verse 29. The yoke here does not involve the idea of subjection to authority; this would be actually opposed to the context, for the Lord explains himself immediately afterwards by learn of me! The expression was used proverbially among the Jews for the receiving of instruction, and discipline, as is plainly seen in Eccles. li. 33, 35, and also in passages like Jer. v. 5; Prov. i. 8, 9. The Jews speak of a עוֹל תּוֹרָה, "yoke of the law," and in the Mishna we find קבילו עליכו עול מלכותא קדישא, "take upon you the yoke of the holy kingdom." In the Sohar the yoke of the kingdom of heaven is spoken of, and elsewhere the Tephillim (prayer-fringes) are represented as the cords of the yoke, by which God binds Israel to himself. We find it said, "How beautiful is their neck, which beareth the yoke of my precepts; it sitteth upon them as the yoke upon the neck of the ox, which ploweth the field, and nourisheth both himself and his master." This proverb as a Jewish one, had indeed a legal origin and a legal savor clinging to it—but the Lord speaks catachrestically of his easy yoke, though not without intimating thereby that obeying as well as learning, was involved in coming to him: as a gracious teacher, whose heart is set on having disciples, the Lord just offers and recommends his yoke, his doctrine and discipline; then proceeds a little farther, and leaving the first simple promise κἀγὼ ἀναπαύσω, and I will give you rest, gives all clearly to understand that this ἀνάπαυσις, or rest, is not in its fullest extent to be instantly secured, but that a continuous learning in his school is essential, to which a continuous and progressive finding will correspond. The former is the condition of the latter. They who seek their soul's rest out of him, are the most heavy-laden of all, for they find an ever-increasing burden of disquietude; they, however, who come to him, will most assuredly find what they perseveringly seek. He encourages the proud children of men—who, even after finding the true teacher, learn so unwillingly and so slowly—to progress in his instructions, by the assurance which he adds, that they shall ever find in him a meek and lowly Master. For I am meek of heart, although I spake words of such stern condemnation, vers. 20, 24; I judge, because all judgment hath been committed unto me of the Father, as the Son of Man, but condemn no man who only cometh and learneth of me. I am lowly of heart, notwithstanding that I have borne witness to myself as Son of the Father, vers. 25–27; I place myself among the foolish little ones, to share in every way their experience. Both meekness and humility (not merely the latter) are human attributes, which only the one Son of Man so possesses that he can fully claim them as his own, and unconditionally proclaim them. This is indicated by τῇ καρδίᾳ, in heart, which refers probably to both, and opens to us in the most engaging manner the full, voluntary condescension and love of his incarnate Jesus-heart. This is the only instance in which καρδία is spoken of in connection with Jesus.

Ye shall find rest unto your souls, is literally taken from Jer. vi. 16, and not after the incorrect rendering of the Septuagint. This promise, as it is finally given, comes after the testimony to his meekness and lowliness, in order to intimate to all who progress in the school of Christ, that nothing else is to be learned from him but the becoming, through his grace, by degrees what he is (Eph. iv. 2). For meekness and lowliness is itself the rest of the soul, even though the burden and disquietude may not be externally removed. Anger and pride create disquietude: he who finds not rest with the meek and lowly One, must be still oppressed by them; the failing is in him, and not in the yoke and burden of Christ.

Verse 30. Has he then also a yoke and a burden? Assuredly, for the heavy-laden can find no help without subjection to the grace and truth of God. The one yoke only gives place to the other: independent and gods we can never be (Rom. vi. 16–18). But the Lord only terms that which he opposes a yoke, in contradistinction to the other, just as Paul speaks of the law of faith. There it is a law, and yet no law; here it is a yoke, and yet no yoke. Hence the adjectives which are appended—easy (or pleasant, agreeable) and light—in a certain sense, revoke the word, in its strict meaning. The yoke is no burden imposed, but actually a means by which burdens may be rendered tolerable and easily borne. St. Bernard cries, "What can be lighter than a burden which takes our burdens away, and a yoke which bears up the bearer himself?" This is the gracious aspect of the words, as they regard that new nature which, learning from the love of Jesus to love both God and man, can say—His commandments are not grievous! But for the old Adam, which, in its stubbornness and pride, can never know rest, and as such is never to be revivified but to be put to death, the easy yoke and light burden is no other than—the cross, of which he had already spoken in ch. x. 38, 39. This is undoubtedly the undertone of meaning which they who learn of him will perceive in due time; it is contained in the thrice repeated ζυγός μου, and φορτίον μου—The yoke and the burden, which I myself bear as your Master and Forerunner! What fulness of meaning does this give to the words of the meek and lowly One, who so graciously submitted to the uttermost self-denial and the burden of the cross! Thus it is only, at first—Come unto me! and immediately on coming there is a first refreshment. Then comes the continued learning of him, and finding that only through him, through following and resembling him, the rest of the soul is gained. Finally, there is the persevering advancement under the yoke of his cross, in all the profound meaning of that word; with which is connected, however, the gracious encouragement that arms the Christian against all the opposition of fleshly impatience and refractoriness, the assurance that approves its truth in sure experience—My yoke is nevertheless, easy, my burden is nevertheless light.* And when that day comes, which shall make manifest those who preferred to bear the yoke of Satan, and the burden of sin, it will be found that the Lord's words were truth, and that his most burdened follower had an incomparably better allotment in the profound peace of the soul which he bestows, than all the slaves of lust with the disquietude of their guilty conscience. Dost thou not yet know this, dear reader, dost thou not say Yea and Amen to this from thine heart? Then take it now to thyself, and let the word of thy Redeemer pursue thee in all thy ways, until thou art constrained to yield up thy heart to its obedience: Come unto me! Learn of me!

---

* "It is not difficult to be a Christian. Only make the earnest attempt; take not up the Gospel, however, as a light thing, but upon both shoulders" (Braune).

THE DISCIPLES PLUCK CORN ON THE SABBATH—THE SON OF MAN LORD OF THE SABBATH.

(Matt. xii. 3–8; Mark ii. 25–28; Luke iv. 3–52.)

The chronology of this incident is altogether uncertain in Matthew, as it is not his object to give a consecutive narration of the events, but here in chap. xii. only to depict the enmity of the Pharisees, as shown on two Sabbaths, in order thus to prepare the way for the principal discourse directed against them from verse 25 onwards. Luke, however, gives a very exact determination of the time, inasmuch as he calls the Sabbath on which the ears of corn were plucked, δευτερόπρωτον, second-first ("second after the first"), a word unfortunately found no where else, and regarded as obscure even from the earliest antiquity, and which, indeed, it would be most convenient to omit, as is done in the Syriac, or to cancel as a false reading.* It is not our object to enter minutely into such collateral circumstances. Along with the majority of commentators, and last of all, Lübkert (Stud. u. Krit. 1835, 3. 664), we are inclined to prefer the opinion first established by Scaliger to all the other opinions of the learned who have exercised their ingenuity on the point,† according to which the first Sabbath after the second Easter-day is the one meant, σάββατον πρωτον ἀπὸ τῆς δευτέρας του Πάσχα, because from this day seven Sabbaths were reckoned to the Pentecost (Lev. xxiii. 10–16). This would also be the time that corresponds best with the plucking of the ears of corn. Yet we cannot herewith decidedly dismiss the really very plausible statement in Bengel's Ordo temporum. This, first of all, connects itself quite as simply with the most ancient interpretation of the Church fathers (Chrysostom and Theophyl.), respecting the coincidence of a Sabbath either immediately going before or coming after any new moon or feast day, which was generally called also a Sabbath and was observed as such (as the first Easter-day, Lev xxiii. 11; comp. Exod. xii. 17): he thinks, however, that it is specially the Sabbath before the new moon of the month Nisan, fourteen days before the Passover, that is here denoted (John vi. 4). The so-called Sabbath (feast-day) which fell upon the new moon itself, שבת וראש חדש, was called a σαβ. πρῶτον, or great Sabbath; on the other hand, the foregoing day (on which 1 Sam. xx. 18, ss., had been read) was called שבת מחר חדש δευτερόπρωτον, i. e. δεύτερος, equivalent to secundarius (as in δευτεροδεκάτη in Jerome, and δευτερόλεπτα in Tzezes). True, it may be objected to this, that the plucking of the ears of corn must have taken place after the waving of the sheaf of the first fruits, for, otherwise, the Pharisees would have found fault with it as contrary to Lev. xxiii. 14, rather than with the violation of the Sabbath in general; still, as Bengel himself remarks, a reply may be found to this in the answer of our Lord to the Pharisees; and the rest of the chronological arrangement as framed by Bengel, as well as the remarkable coincidence, that precisely on this Sabbath, 1 Sam. xx. 18, ss. (near to which is the passage here cited by Christ), had been read, will not allow us altogether to reject this view. Partly on account of this circumstance, partly because Lübkert (as also Wieseler) has not thought the great Bengel even worthy of being mentioned, we have deemed it right, by way of exception, to direct attention to his interpretation. Wieseler's latest hypothesis brings the year-cycle but too directly into the simple statement of Luke; by which, however, nothing is gained. At all events, the feast mentioned in John v. must be the Purim, which again, however, will not correspond with Bengel's chronology, and the whole subject remains involved in uncertainty; all the more so, as philologically it is impossible even to determine whether δευτερόπρωτον means a second following upon a first (as δευτερόλεπτα may be interpreted)—or a first of a subordinate rank. We willingly leave the enigma to the learned, although for us also it has in it something attractive.*

At the time when Jesus went about in all the cities and villages unweariedly teaching, and preaching, and healing (chap. ix. 35), it happened also on a certain Sabbath, that his disciples, urged by actual hunger, in walking through the corn fields, began to pluck a few ears and to eat. Innocent conduct in general, expressly allowed by the law (Deut. xxiii. 25), in contradistinction to an act on which any charge of theft might be founded; it is still done, in order thus to see the gift of God in the harvest that is drawing near, and to taste beforehand a little of the bread which he causes to grow out of the earth. Here Matthew, who must have best known the fact, expressly observes that they had been hungry; which, in following their Master, for several hours might well have been the case. But the Pharisees (as after chap. ix. 11, Matthew concisely designates the then representatives of this class of men so hostile to Christ) were also in the neighborhood, also walking upon the Sabbath; for the ἰδόντες εἶπον, when they saw it they said, is here to be understood more directly than at chap. ix. 11, as is evident from the ἰδού, ποιοῦσιν, behold, they do, immediately following ἤρξαντο, they began, and afterwards from ver. 9. They went listening beside or behind Christ, and would gladly also have measured after him whether perhaps he would walk a step beyond the allowed Sabbath-journey. There is no Sabbath stillness in their souls, but they are full of evil purposes to go their own ways, to find their own desires, and to speak words out of such hearts (Isa. lviii. 13, Heb.). They have no notion how the disciples walk with Christ, either hearing God's word from the mouth, or silently offering praise in the great temple of creation. Scarcely have the disciples begun to pluck a few ears, when they come forward with their Behold! as if they had surprised them in a great sin. If Luke gives their words, as addressed to the disciples, Matthew certainly gives them more correctly as addressed to the Master: Do thy disciples break the Sabbath before thine eyes, and dost thou not rebuke them; that we, who are fortunately here, must needs interfere? Is this what they learn from thee? Behold, now, we see it! Οὐκ ἔξεστι, is not lawful, so in their foolish pride do they lay down their little statute which had been added to the law of God, and which in reality (according to Maimonides, Hilchoth Sabb.) forbade* the plucking of ears on the Sabbath as a kind of reaping. O how might Christ have replied to these malicious ones otherwise than he did, and in terms befitting their character, sharply rebuking them, and putting them to shame by his powerful censure! But he is now in a Sabbath tone of mind, to which that would not be suitable. He does not let himself be drawn into the petty school question as to what the מְלָאכָה, work, which was forbidden on the Sabbath, means, and whether the plucking of a few ears (or, the rubbing them also with the hands, as Luke adds), belongs to it, although, it only corresponded to the cutting and helping oneself to meat on the Sabbath (which belonged to the meal, see Exod. xii. 16). No, he kindly recompenses good for evil, overcomes their folly with a genuine Sabbath word of his own wisdom, and almost obtrudes upon them the unwished for salutatory doctrine in opposition to their whole Pharisaism, the great doctrine respecting the significance, limits, ground and purpose of every law relating immediately to outward acts, even in the case of that law having been given by God.

* As if some one had added δευτέρῳ to πρώτῳ as a gloss, and from this the monster had arisen—a groundless conjecture!

† Grotius and Pareau: The σάββατα which followed the great festivals were πρῶτα, or distinguished above the rest, or great (John xix. 31); here, therefore, the second of these three great ones, the Sabbath after Pentecost; which, however, seems too late a period. Capellus and Rhenferd: There were two πρῶτα at the beginning of the civil and ecclesiastical year. Wetstein: δευτερόπρωτον, הָרִאשׁוֹן שֶׁבַּשֵּׁנִי, the first Sabbath of the second month, on which, in the section (Lev. xxi.–xxv.), the shew bread also occurred. Hitzig: According to Lev. xxiii. 11, precisely the 15th of Nisan. Wieseler: The first of the seven first Sabbaths in the great week of years which forms the Sabbath-year.

* As a specimen of his time, Roos also could not resist the temptation to dispute the point with the renowned Bengel.

Verses 3, 4. Inasmuch as these Pharisees, with all their looking, had yet hastily overlooked the one circumstance which belonged to the species facti, Christ fulfills all righteousness, and mentions forthwith the fact that they were hungry, which had not been unperceived by him in the disciples, and which now on reflection he even feels in himself; for he says, at first indirectly, adducing the similar conduct of David, "when he and they who were with him hungered," in no other than a humble spirit, "I and they who are with me are also hungry." The τί ἐποίησε Δαυίδ, what David did, thus comes in direct opposition to the ποιοῦσιν, do, of the accusation as a suitable reply. Have you not read this? Often enough, indeed; but they have never read it aright, never understood it. In Luke οὐδὲ τοῦτο —nor this also—might point in general to their being much read in the Scriptures; but if, according to Bengel, 1 Sam. 20 had really been the portion read on this Sabbath, it might also be an injunction that they should call to their recollection a chapter further on in the history of David. In this case, it would be a delicate hint, how accurately Christ observed the arrangements respecting the reading of the Scriptures in the synagogue. Mark has, in addition to the citation, the difficult phrase ἐπὶ Ἀβιαθάρ, in the days of Abiathar, which can scarcely have been added by a later hand, and which deserves a word or two of explanation, inasmuch as it has likewise been magnified by those commentators who are ever on the alert for difficulties and mistakes on the part of the disciples of Christ. The priest named in 1 Sam., is called Ahimelech, son of Ahitub (chap. xxii. 11), but his son was Abiathar (chap. xxii. 20), and his father may also have been called Abiathar (which almost corresponds to the meaning of Ahitub), if it is the same that is spoken of in 2 Sam. viii. 17. Nay, he may have been called Ahimelech as well as Abiathar, see 1 Chron. xv. 11, comp. with xviii. 16, xxiv. 6. In short, as often happens, the names are used interchangably, and it is quite possible that both father and son may have had both names. The ἐπί denotes the time when the high priest flourished and held office (Luke iii. 2; iv. 27), and which of the two was priest or high priest, is also a question which cannot be determined. Consequently it is not at all necessary to suppose a change at any rate unimportant, of the name in Mark, but either the time of David and that of the high priest Abiathar (who soon succeeded his deceased father), belong in general to the same chronological epoch, or the Ahimelech who gave the shew-bread was himself also Abiathar. But enough on subordinate points, and now to the matter itself.

* Comp. on this Sepp's Leben Christi, ii. 329 and 454.

You will not think of finding fault by your οὐκ ἔξεστι, it is not lawful, with what King David did, he whom ye laud so much? That David, although he came at first alone (1 Sam. xxi. 1), yet desired the bread, at the same time, for the young men who were with him (Mark and Luke), and who had been "appointed to such and such a place," is evident in the history when attentively read (see there vers. 4, 5); the necessity of hunger is so naturally pre-supposed in the whole narrative that it is for this very reason not expressly named; finally, the going into the house of God, the tabernacle at Nob, follows from vers. 7 and 9. See how carefully Christ reads the narratives of the Scriptures, and how he has them every moment as it were present to his mind! R. D. Kimichi on 1 Sam. xxi. also expressly understands David's words: כִּי רְעֵבִים אֲנַחְנוּ, "for we are hungry;" and treats with great fulness of this remarkable incident, about the shew-bread, and also of its happening to be the Sabbath when the fresh supply was laid out, as well as about David's journey on the Sabbath. It is a Rabbinical rule which is also applied to this instance: Danger of life displaces the Sabbath (שִׁפְקַּח פִּיקּוּח הוֹרֵשׁ הַשַּׁבָּת)—and the Talmud expressly enjoins that even on the great day of atonement, it is lawful, in the absence of pure meat, to give forbidden nourishment to a man overtaken with weakness or extreme hunger. Nor do we read further on in the Scripture, that the listening calumniator Doeg or the angry Saul afterwards made an accusation of this, that the bread which had been given was holy; and what David says (chap. xxi 5) contains an assertion and doctrine very clearly justifying what he had done.* Christ, therefore, by the οὐκ ἀνέγνωτε, have ye not read, completely refutes the Pharisees e concessis: Here was a stronger οὐκ ἐξὸν, was not lawful, that of a divine command for the house and sanctuary of God, than your statute which you have brought against us—will you find fault now with the king and the priest?

Verse 5. Or, letting alone what these two once did from special warrant, and in an exceptional case, will you rather abide by the rule of the law? Well then, not merely does the sacred history relate exceptional instances of necessity, but the law itself ordains labor on the Sabbath as a duty. Thus Christ takes a step higher, from the particular instances with which the doctrine was connected to the development of the general doctrine: That the mere outward working or not working, without further reference and significance, can never have been the aim of the divine commandment respecting the Sabbath. For, as Scripture proves, there are exceptions to all external law, of whatever kind it be: in the first place, allowed exceptions of necessity (which general idea is expressed in Mark by the χρείαν ἔσχε, he had need); then, even commanded exceptions of duty. The first example has respect to the disciples having eaten (containing a reply at the same time to the charge which the Pharisees had perhaps forgotten to bring against them, of eating before the first fruits were waved), the second more especially to the breaking of the Sabbath. The first is taken from the life of the anointed king, the other is from the office and law of the priests (already named in the first); for he who now justifies himself is king and priest in the highest sense. The laying out of the shew-bread which has just been mentioned in the house of God, then the offering of the double sacrifice on the Sabbath (Num. xxviii. 9), to which belongs the kindling of the fire, otherwise forbidden in houses (Exod. xxxv. 3; Lev. vi. 12), and the whole temple service in general has to be performed by the priests in the temple on the Sabbath. This then would be a very grievous profanation (βεβηλοῦν, Exod. xxxi. 14, Sept.; 1 Macc. ii. 34), as Christ here expresses himself, with somewhat of irony, in order immediately to refute, it in the ἀναίτιοί εἰσι, are blameless. For this, also, there are Rabbinical sayings: In the sanctuary there is no Sabbath (אֵין שַׁבָּת בְּמִקְדָּשׁ); the killing of sacrifices displaces the Sabbath (דְּהַתָּה שְׁחִטָּה אֶת שַׁבָּת). The internal truth, however, to which Christ here points, in a different spirit from the Rabbinical, is none other than that to work the works of God belongs to every place and time, and is rather the true priestly sanctification of the Sabbath and the sanctuary; for, as at another time, on a like charge being brought against him, he rises still higher: God himself works evermore on the great Sabbath after the creation of the world (John v. 17).

Verse 6. To all this Christ now adds a word pointing to the dignity of his own person (ch. xvii. 25, 26), in virtue of which he is entirely, and with the highest right of freedom, exempted from outward law, and thereby preparing the way for the conclusion of the address (verse 8). He expresses this, however, not by the direct form—ἐγώ εἰμι, I am he, but again, by the modest form of the third person—Here is one greater than the temple. The reading of the neuter μεῖζον (which Neander still prefers) would only say: Here something is reckoned greater, more important, namely, compassionate regard to the hungry, or however it may be stated;* but we cannot regard this as any thing else than a false correction, since the comparison with the temple instead of the temple service would in this case not be very suitable, while, on the other hand vers. 6 and 8 exactly correspond to each other, if Christ speaks of himself. As the Sabbath gives place to the temple, so Sabbath and temple give place to the greater, the Lord of the temple and Sabbath. He reminds the Pharisees of the enigmatic word (John ii. 19), with which they would certainly be familiar, as also of Mal. iii. 1; and thereby declares again in his own manner who he is—the Messiah, the true King David, the true High Priest, himself the archetype and Lord of the temple. His disciples, too, who have left house and goods for his service, that they might follow him, are collectively priests in the sanctuary, consecrated by him, just as David's companions in his lowly condition were by the already anointed king. This accessory idea unites the whole, and leads over to what follows.

* In which Melancthon (Loci, p. 137, ed. Aug.) finds the same thing already expressed as Paul says in Titus i. 15.

* According to De Wette, the Messianic work. Neander at least is for referring it to the "manifestation of Christ as a whole" (as πλεῖον Luke xi. 31, 32)—to which we afterwards also take objection.

Verse 7. Christ, prepared in the moment for a complete reply to the charge of the Pharisees, adduces the testimony of history, the law, and the prophets against them. If history and the law have already spoken of particular cases of exception, he now shows, secondly, how the prophetical Scripture opens up the general import, and the true spirit of the outward law. It is a passage already brought before the Pharisees in ch. ix. 13, but which he here again brings to their consideration, while he imparts to his address a severer form than hitherto, rebuking their ignorance, and therefore the sin committed on their part: If ye had understood this, ye would not have so uncharitably found fault with the innocent. On the import of the citation from Hosea we have already spoken at length in chap. ix., and we find here also (in opposition to almost all commentators), as connected with the main preceding sentiments, the compassion of God towards men, who willeth not that any one should hunger in order that a sacrificial Sabbath service may be rendered to him, a service in which he can have no pleasure when it goes against the love that springs from his love. The fundamental idea here expressed, is undoubtedly this, that the design of the Sabbath, as of the sacrifice, is not that men should do or bring something meritorious; but that God may show favor, and impart blessing to us. But there is here to be added the natural inference and application that the compassionate One who makes all his laws and ordinances only for the sake of man, will have them observed in no other spirit, in no way contrary to compassion. Somewhat similar, therefore, is ch. xxiii. 23. It follows, therefore, although it is not merely this that is intended to be literally said,* that in cases of collision, the royal law of love, from which alone all commandments take their rise, is superior to a Pharisaic outward adherence to the letter of particular commandments.* Thus the disciples, on this occasion, in their holy simplicity (as blameless as the priests in the temple) had no thought, when they plucked the ears of corn, about whether it was allowed or forbidden; their accusers, however, "by condemning the innocent," became themselves very guilty (verse 8). Christ concludes, thirdly, with a doctrine of far-reaching import, which indeed returns to the case of Sabbath-breaking now on hand, in order to draw a decisive inference with respect to it, but which, at the same time, enlarges, almost transfigures, what is special in it. He utters, in his overflowing wisdom, which he will not and cannot restrain, a sublime truth in addition to verse 6, and still more enigmatic, the meaning of which those Pharisees could not apprehend; therefore we, for whom it has been written, are to understand it. For the saying that "what a prophet speaks in the wind posterity reads,"† finds its highest application in Christ.

First of all, we must entirely set aside all those commentators who, misled by the intermediate sentence in Mark (of which we shall presently speak more particularly), are for understanding by ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου, בֶּן־הָאָדָם, Son of Man, with the article in this stance, man in general.‡ This would be contrary to the sense in which the expression is every where used by Christ, who always designates by the "Son of Man" only himself, while, in addition to this, the designation κύριος τοῦ σαββάτου, Lord of the Sabbath, belongs to the same person who was just before said to be τοῦ ἱεροῦ μείζων, greater than the temple. But do we read in Mark an intermediate clause of a highly original character, which it is impossible to regard as spurious, and which speaks of ὁ ἄνθρωπος, Man, quite generally? How does this agree with our interpretation of the passage before us? Well enough; and neither are those right who, in the address which is fully recorded by Mark, understand Christ as speaking only of man, so that ver. 23 also must be interpreted according to that view; nor those, on the other hand, who understand it only of the person of the one "Son of Man;" the two opinions about which commentators differ harmonize when we go somewhat deeper. Why is Christ called the Son of Man, but because he represents humanity as a whole—because, as a second Adam, he bears in himself and sets up a new humanity? This is the key to the whole statement, according to which, in the first place, Mark ii. 27, as the words stand, contains a truth as sound as it is simple. So in the Talmud, R.

* As Von Gerlach, along with the great majority of commentators: That the entire "ritual law" is to be subservient to the supreme "law of love." So formal a distinction is in general foreign to the Old Testament, and least of all does it lie in the genuine sense and connection of the prophetic passage which Christ brings to bear on the subject.

* Which might also be applied with equal force to so-called moral duties.

† In Knapp's Christoterpe (1838), "Funken vom Leuchter" [sparks from the candlestick] (by J. Fr. v. Meyer)—would that in our time also these might fall into many hearts for their illumination.

‡ Kleuker emphatically refutes this, Bibl. Sympathien, p. 318.

Jonathan says literally: "The Sabbath is in your hands, not you in its hands, for it is said: 'The Sabbath is for you'" (Exod. xvi. 29; Ezek. xx. 12). It is, according to God's design, an ordinance and institution of mercy for the good of man, appointed, in the first instance, for rest and refreshment (Deut. v. 14; Exod. xxiii. 12), and then, further, for blessing and sanctification. This, too, is the real ground of that question, which Christ addressed to the Pharisees eight days afterwards, whether one should save life or destroy it on the Sabbath (Mark iii. 4). While the Pharisees, cleaving to their statutes, scarcely rose to the level of Moses' law, and knew not at all properly what or wherefore the Sabbath was, Christ here points them to the first and deepest ground and origin of it, opens up to them the fact that the rest of the Creator on the seventh day was a typical rest for man, and the blessing of the day a boon for man. True it is, on the other hand, that man, as also the whole world, has been created for God and for the promotion of his glory; but the glory of God does not demand an outward work-service in which man may bring a gift and offering to God, for God wills to bless, give, and gladden also by the Sabbath—so that to inflict pain upon a man, and, for example, to let him hunger on account of the eternal so-called Sabbath, runs directly counter to the internal nature of the Sabbath. But while Christ, who gives forth his doctrines, as Moses gave the laws in the wilderness, as they were called out by the various occasions of life, here specifies the Sabbath, he at the same time speaks by synecdoche of all law and its institution in general; his statement means, as we read also in 2 Macc. v. 19, of the temple which has just been named here: "God has not chosen the people on account of the place, but the place on account of the people." The import and order of his reasoning are therefore very evident, inasmuch as he rises from man in general and the ordinance hitherto in existence, which dates from the first ἐγένετο, was made, to himself, the Son of Man, who, moreover, introduces a new state of things to men. First proposition: Already in general under the Old Testament law, nay, from the creation downwards, the Sabbath, like any ordinance of God, was designed for man; for which as yet general doctrine, after adducing the testimony of history, the law and the prophets, he, in an allusion to the book of Maccabees, even goes beyond the canon pointing to the echoes of the prophetical Scriptures, and the foreshadowing of the New Testament doctrine found in the apochryphal writings. Second proposition: Therefore (Mark ὥστε), I, as the Son of Man, being already as man, in the state of things which has existed hitherto, no servant of the Sabbath according to your perverted ideas, and, moreover, being greater than the temple in the new state of things which begins with my coming, am much more abundantly Lord of the Sabbath.* Upon which the address closes again, with a most direct application to the case in hand.

That a complete reply may be given to the charge in ver. 2, Behold, thy disciples do, etc., he now includes in this his prerogative and freedom—Those who are with him. The Son of Man, i.e., the new man in Christ, the second Adam, in the new order of things, in which all preparatory institutions were fulfilled according to their original significance—not we as men, such as we are, are called lords of the Sabbath; for, although the Sabbath is made on our account, we are yet only so much the more for this reason bound and obliged to keep it—but Christ also the Lord of the Sabbath in the proper sense, in so far as in honor of him, the eternal Son of God, every Sabbath from the beginning has been celebrated, brings as the Son of Man to us, his brethren and members, that freedom and lordship through which, in the New Testament, every one is in Christ exalted above all imposed law as such, because he fulfills it not in the bondage of the letter, but in the liberty of the Spirit. In these words of Christ there certainly lies the germ of that apostolical doctrine which we find afterwards expressed in Rom. xiv. 4, 5, 17; Col. ii. 16, 17. Does it follow, therefore, that they declare a complete abrogation of the Sabbath as a day consecrated by God for man, above other days, and set apart for special blessing? By no means, and those who can find no Sabbath in the New Testament understand neither that apostolical doctrine nor the statement of our Lord in this passage. Not by doing away with the Sabbath, but by renovating and glorifying it, does he show himself to be the Lord of the Sabbath. We find here rather the most emphatic confirmation of the inviolably continuance of the σάββατον in the all-expressive ἐγένετο. Note: Moses has given you the Sabbath—but the Sabbath has been from the first, when all things came into being, when the world and man were created. As already in the reception of this commandment into the decalogue, which contains only what is original and permanent law for all men, not what was temporarily designed for Israel alone, so again does Christ, in the words διὰ τὸν ἄνθρωπον, for man, set forth the universal validity of the Sabbath originating from the creation (not like the temple, only on account of the Israelitish people). So long as man lives on the earth he is to have a Sabbath of God; the necessity of his nature, and the ordinance of the Creator for meeting that necessity, always correspond to each other. But in this has Christ shown himself to be Lord of the Sabbath for his church, for the new humanity in him, that he has changed the day from the end of the old world week which passed away for ever with the still Sabbath of his grave, to the beginning with which an entirely new state of things commenced, and that he has made the day peculiarly his own, the Lord's day, and has united to the remembrance of the first creation, whose Sabbath was broken and rendered servile by sin, the praise of the new creation, effected by him who became a son of man for man's sake. Thus has he given to us the Sabbath anew, without literal commandment, as in the Old Testament, but by the free operation of the Spirit in the Church, so that even no defect of knowledge in this particular, no error of church doctrine has as yet been able to deprive the day of its Lord.* Thus do we, sanctifying the Sabbath in Christ, now look freely and joyfully forward to the future σαββατισμός (Heb. iv. 9), in which the rest of God in man from the redemption-work will unite with the first rest from the creation-work; on the other hand, before the appearing of Christ, the best Sabbath devotion could only point backward in humility and repentance, because of sin, to the lost peace of the Sabbaths of Adam in Paradise.

* The whole discourse is pervaded by personality, that of man in general, of the Son of Man as representing humanity and raising it to a new elevation. This view closing at last with the κύριος corresponds very ill with the indefinite sentiment, Here is something greater than the temple! as Neander would explain it.

THE WITHERED HAND—IS IT LAWFUL TO DO GOOD OR TO DO EVIL ON THE SABBATH?

(Matt. xii. 11–13; Mark iii. 3–5; Luke vi. 8–10.)

From the frequency with which the Sabbath is spoken of in the Gospels, as it is here again, we may infer the importance of this subject: for, even in the narrow misconceptions of the Pharisaical Jews, there yet lies hid the truth, that the Sabbath which was given to them had something great and specially holy belonging to it. In all the discourses of Christ on the subject, directed against Pharisaism, we look in vain for an expression in which it is distinctly stated that at any period all days are to become alike; if the one which we have just considered contains no such statement, so neither does any other.

According to the account of Matthew, who is very careless as to the order of time, we might suppose that what follows here took place on the same day, did not Luke specify another, and, in all probability the next, Sabbath. Then, as always, Christ sanctifies the Sabbath by going to the synagogue, then also the Pharisees begin παρατηρεῖν, to watch him anew, and he again, according to Luke xiv. 13–16, instructs and confounds them in quite a similar way. If we had not in Luke ch. vi. (as also again in ch. xiii. 15 the same statement) the account corresponding to that of Matthew, how would the critics have spoken of a different report of evidently the same occurrence!

In the first account, also, we find this difference, that, according to Mark and Luke, Christ himself puts the question which Matthew lays into the mouth of his enemies. Luke observes, besides, that Jesus knew their thoughts, and anticipated the question of their hearts, by giving outward expression to it: ἐπερωτήσω ὑμᾶς, I will ask you, with which—probably more correctly, for then the account in Mark and Luke (the interrogative ἔξεστι without τί) becomes the same—is to be construed: ἐπερωτήσω ὑμᾶς τι, I will ask you something, as in Matt. xxi. 24, ἕνα λόγον. It is the same as in the case of the centurion's speaking (Matt. viii.); and Matthew represents as an expressed question, in the same manner as he does there, the διαλογισμούς or thoughts of those who watched whether he would heal on the Sabbath.†

Mark and Luke narrate exactly that Christ, at first acting with perfect frankness, and in order to put it to the proof whether hostile stubbornness will yield to sympathy with the unfortunate, called him forth: Come forth and stand in the midst! Now is the disputed case before their eyes, itself speaking and testifying to the unprejudiced; now goes forth the bold, irresistibly pressing question, to which the obdurate Pharisees had nothing to answer. He humbly sets them up as judges, while in the exalted dignity of simple, invincible truth, he puts their folly and wickedness to shame. Do you yourselves give forth your ἔξεστι, "it is lawful," on the case, so that I may act accordingly: Shall I now heal the man, or, because it is the Sabbath, shall I not? This, however, he expresses forcibly: Is it permitted or right to do good on the Sabbath, or to do evil. The answer is, of course, self-evident, and it is also so for the next part of the question, which comes nearer the case in hand: To save a life (ψυχήν quite indefinite, a living being), or to destroy it? Even yet the question represents the case in a generalized form, but it does represent it so far as healing is a σώσαι, a saving and restoring of the life-power or health, while, on the contrary, not healing when one has the power is an ἀπολέσαι, or destroying, as every omission of well-doing on any occasion presented to us is evil-doing. Thus does Christ, with simple decision, reduce all the

* We rather find that, under the pressure of necessity, the divine right of the new Sabbath is ever more fully demonstrated in theory; to promote which, church days, prize writings, societies, are useful, although not yet on a perfectly clear principle. I may be allowed to refer on this point to what I have said in my commentary on Isaiah, lvi. 2.

† Ἀπολέσαι in Luke is at all events the more correct explanation for ἀποκτεῖναι. Should the latter be genuine in Mark, it would not do to say that it does not belong to ψυχήν, but stands by itself in opposition to ψυχὴν σῶσαι.

complication belonging to the disputed questions as to what is or is not to be done on the Sabbath, to the highest clear law: Thou shalt not do evil, thou shalt not hurt thy neighbor even by the refusal of helping love. With sufficient irony Christ thus shuts up the disputers to the conviction, that doing good must be lawful also on the Sabbath, but that doing evil, that is, precisely their Pharisaical keeping of the Sabbath, is by no means so. Upon this follows what Matthew alone further narrates as Christ's discourse.

Verses 11, 12. In these verses he discloses the unfeeling nature of their evil thoughts, and shows that what men will not do from love is done from self-interest; for, although Christ speaks on the friendly supposition that a man will save the life of the poor sheep, and how much more render assistance to a man—yet, properly speaking, he pre-supposes the answer in the hearts of those whom he has put to shame: "Yes, we would do that in order not to suffer loss in our property!" Hence he gives emphasis to ὃς ἕξει πρόβατον ἕν, that shall have one sheep. Accidents of this kind with sheep, oxen, or asses, must at that time have been acknowledged exceptions; not till a later period do we find even this forbidden in the Talmud, perhaps, not without occasion from the words of Jesus. Whenever Pharisees forbid works of love towards our neighbor as unlawful, let them be put to shame by presenting an analogous case, in which their own profit or loss is at stake!—And now again with reproachful severity comes the benevolent conclusion from the Saviour-heart of the Son of Man: How much better is a man than a sheep! Thus speaks the love of God which compassionates all men, and will assist their distress in body and in soul. By how much the man is better, by so much the less is his health, the healing of a diseased limb, to be placed in comparison with the saving of a perishing animal. Consequently it is indeed lawful to do good on the Sabbath—whereupon the words in Matthew point back to what goes before in Mark and Luke. We are certainly not, however, to confine the application of this to bodily benefits, and the saving of life; for how much better is the soul of man than the body. Works of soul-healing, soul-saving, alone reach the man properly so-called; hence all the present operations of home missions, which have the object of drawing men out of the pit of perdition are, in the truest sense, a Sabbath work.

Verse 13. Who has any thing to say against my doing good now to this man? Thus does Christ look around, again asking, and—O the gentleness and kindness!—would have still waited to answer any word that might be addressed to him. But he knew, at the same time, that they would be silent with the mouth, and yet would hate him more bitterly in their obdurate hearts because of the truth; hence (according to Mark), the holy anger which he manifests at the same time that he humbly puts the question—anger, which is the same thing with grief at sin. They are silent. Upon this he did not touch the sick man, did not even stretch out his hand, that he might certainly do no external work on the Sabbath, but spake the words (as all the three Evangelists agree): Stretch forth thine hand! That is, as much as to say: Thou canst do this, thou art freed from thy malady (Luke xiii. 12). And behold, he could do it; it became, in the act of stretching it out, whole as the other (1 Kings xiii. 6). The miraculous cure, which we might expect to be performed after the hand was stretched out, was already done in "the speediest and most spiritual manner"—as Lange expresses it.

BEELZEBUB—CHRIST DEFENDS HIMSELF AGAINST THE CHARGE OF BEING IN FELLOSHIP WITH SATAN.

(Matt. xii. 25–45; Mark iii. 23–29; Luke xi. 17–36.)

It is a question, and one which must find its answer in a harmony of the Gospels, whether the occurrence here related by Matthew, as connected with what immediately precedes, belongs to the later period, which Luke seems to assign to it, since the identity of all the particular parts of the discourse, which are as strongly marked as they are closely connected, is too great in this case to admit the supposition of a repetition.* But whether the sequence of the particulars, as given by Luke (who not only first introduces at ch. xii. 10, the account given by Matthew vers. 31, 32, and omits that of Matthew vers. 33–37, because he had already given something of this in ch. vi.; but also connects the parable which, in Matthew forms the conclusion with the beginning, and gives a different conclusion), whether this arrangement in which he deviates from Matthew be the more correct, we very much doubt; for, in the connection of the longer discourses, Matthew is generally the more exact.[?] Christ has healed a demoniac whom the devil made blind and deaf, which circumstance, as giving occasion to the discourse,* Mark does not at all mention, while Luke mentions only the dumbness. Κωφός signifies deaf as well as dumb, (comp. Matt. xi. 5). This striking double cure draws from the astonished people the bold and open question: Is not this indeed the Messiah? Who will now contradict it any longer? The Pharisees feel themselves challenged by the question to come forward, and, according to Mark, these are Pharisees who had come down from Jerusalem, and think it necessary to show their superiority to others in learning. The fact stands clear before their eyes; the powerful conclusion, however, which the simple popular understanding draws from it, must, on no account, be held good. Thus it is as if the cast-out devil had just entered into them, to make them blind with a more wicked blindness, and from being a dumb devil had, for a change, become one speaking blasphemously. Here, probably, these Pharisees say for the first time what, according to Matthew ix. 34, on a similar (later) occurrence was impudently repeated, by them outright. They maintain it, however, at once openly, emphatically, quickly replying with their contemptuous οὗτος, this man, to the wondering οὗτος of the people; nay, they give forth as masters in a learned faculty a most strongly affirmative judgment: This man doth not cast out devils but by Beelzebub; εἰ μή, it is no otherwise, we know it!† That is more than the δαιμόνιον ἔχει, he hath a devil (ch. xi. 18; John vii. 20, viii. 48, x. 20). He has not merely a devil, but Satan himself, the prince of the devils (Mark βεελζεβοὺλ ἔχει); he is the most wicked of conjurors. They not only think this blasphemous thought, but speak it, or rather they thrust it forward without even themselves truly thinking it; finally, they do this as the leaders of this people! and, with this clenching word as by a master-stroke, the whole subject of the source of his miracles is to be for ever set at rest, the power of God in them set aside, the people, who were disposed to believe, rather led to cherish the deepest contempt for Christ, horror towards the ally of Satan! Here it was necessary for Christ to speak, and truly he speaks as the Lord. But he speaks only, he does no new miracles either to prove his dignity in an overpowering manner (see afterwards vers. 38, 39), or even to rebuke the wicked blasphemers, and to make them dumb. All those qualities that we have hitherto admired in his discourses and answers are found united here: the gentleness and humility which no personal offence, not even the most wicked reviling, can provoke; the uniformly lofty, calm temper which returns not reviling for reviling, but can rise from the most patient testifying for the truth to the rebuke of insolent unbelief; the holy judicial anger in harmony with love, which teaches and persuades in circumstances in which every other would have thought it unsuitable and useless; the immovable certainty and clearness of his position in relation to the sin of man and the kingdom of the devil; the fulness of wisdom which, on every occasion, at once reaches forth from its deep treasures, surveys the present, the past, and the future, lets us see into the Scripture, reveals the secrets of hearts, the judgments of history even to the last judgment, and then, again, in the most familiar and persuasive address by parable and proverb, declares the truth with an all-subduing, penetrating power; finally, his majestic and unique personality, which must attest itself in every thing, which never can nor will deny itself. Let any one study thoroughly this one discourse, and say whether any other but the Son of God in the flesh could so speak, whether any one among men could either consciously or unconsciously fabricate any thing like this!

* Alford says very strongly in opposition to Greswell, who maintains such a twofold occurrence of the same discourse, that upon such principles it would be quite as easy to prove that there took place four different crucifixions and resurrections.

It is again really one discourse which Matthew gives us; the interrupting challenge addressed to him (ver. 38), is replied to by Christ, only by continuing to express his thoughts. He defends himself against the charge of confederacy with Satan, by adducing first of all most conclusive proof against such a charge (on to ver. 36); from this he rises higher, and rebukes those who insolently set aside what he thus proved, and this is the main idea of what is said to ver. 45. Here also he at first warns against the highest, the unpardonable sin, which the Pharisees at that time were in a fair way to commit; then he threatens more decidedly the entire perdition which will assuredly follow it. The former embraces vers. 31–37, and already, at the conclusion, points to the judgment, when the repeated defying challenge by which he was interrupted gave him occasion, now prophesying of total unbelief, to carry it out to the highest and last sign.

He does not at once rebuke them thus: How unreasonable are your words? how must they, wise as you are, proceed from bad hearts, from wicked lying against the truth! He does not begin with the deserved rebuke which they had afterwards to take before the whole people (ver. 34); but from a calm elevation, as if it were a friendly discussion upon a subject not at all affecting his own person, he begins with a few plain and undeniably stated general positions. These contain the first ground of his defence: Granted, according to your own words, that Satan's kingdom exists; it cannot surely make war upon and overthrow itself—a very general propositition about every kingdom, city, house, true in the great, the lesser, and the least (ver 25)—and an application to Satan's kingdom as deductio ad absurdum (ver.

* Who perhaps might confound it with Matthew ix. 33, 34.

† Beelzebub (God of flies), a mocking euphemism (from 2 Kings 1, 2) for Beelzebul, i. e., lord of the dwelling; not, however, of the possessed as being inhabited by demons, as some have thought, but ruler of the abyss, prince of hades [rather of the ærial space, Eph. ii. 2].

26). Then comes the second reason from the other side, which more nearly touches the disputed case, and in which he declares what they conceal, affirms what they knowingly deny: Rather does the kingdom of God attest itself by my casting out devils. Here also, with the utmost humility, he first of all classes himself with common examples (ver. 27), in order from the general proposition—Where Satan yields, there God works, to make the higher application—The kingdom of God is come (ver. 28), the conqueror of Satan, the serpent-treader (the Messiah, ver. 23), is virtually present in my person (ver. 29); to which is added (ver. 30), finally, as a transition to the now well-founded rebuke, the proverbial saying sharply distinguishing the two opposing kingdoms, his and Satan's associates.

Christ sees the thoughts of the heart behind the words which were spoken in his presence, a circumstance which the Evangelists regularly repeat from time to time, in order to indicate the entire internal suitableness of his answers. Yet, notwithstanding, he himself also teaches and proves, even when he sees that spiteful wickedness which will not be instructed. How much more ought we, who know not the heart, to follow his example in this respect; how ought we rather to suppose ignorance to be helped on the part of those who are hostile, than blasphemy, and not withhold the salutary doctrine! He who, in the wilderness, gave even to Satan the answer which he would and could never receive, in order to render what was due to him, does the same here, and would have spoken thus even though the wickedness of all who heard him had been already incorrigible. But this was certainly not yet the case; perhaps in the worst originators of the blasphemy there was still a hidden germ of obedience to the truth, more probably, at least, in the better or less bad among those who joined in what was said, as such are wont to do; finally Christ certainly could not be silent for the sake of the poor deluded people, among whom the worst error, if boldly spoken, will find access. Besides, we are not to suppose that between the truth and the worst denial of it there is no common ground for explanation and defence; there is, and remains, so long as we speak to men, even for the highest truths of the humanly attested kingdom of God, the common understanding of men to which the Son of Man here appeals. For where the testimony of the Spirit of God is not listened to, there is always unreason (Mark vii. 22).

Verses 25, 26. Taking up the words of the blasphemers themselves regarding the ἄρχων τῶν δαιμονίων, prince of the devils, Christ at once says, e concessis: On the existence of a kingdom of Satan and the unity of it in the one head, we are agreed! O the specious unreason of the vulgar rationalism, which could and can speak here of accommodation! With the highest earnestness of truth, even in those places where he maintains it against the most contumacious denial, Christ rather confirms the true idea which his opponents express, even to the most complete inferences which they do not now perceive: the fundamental idea of a kingdom is its self-inclosed, firmly compacted unity; by how much it fails in this, by so much it is no kingdom in the strictest sense of the term. A prince who puts down and casts out his own servants and subjects, is no prince. While Christ, descending from the great to the small, shows upon the principles of reason and experience that every community is and must be dissolved by being in opposition to it, he takes it for granted indeed that such a thing does take place in human societies;* so much the weightier is his assertion that there is no such thing as this in Satan's kingdom. The mention of the house also, the family, as the smallest society which cannot subsist without unity, is here so natural that there is no necessity to find an occasion for it in the fact that Christ at that moment was teaching in a house (ver. 47; ch. xiii. 1; Mark iii. 20). It is possible, however, that his afterwards carrying out the analogy of the "house" (ver. 29) instead of the kingdom, was occasioned by this circumstance. In Luke xi. 17, (where the middle member πόλις, city, is wanting), Luther translates wrongfully, "And one house falls upon another in such a kingdom;" it must evidently be construed as the Syriac has it—Where there is an οἶκος ἐπὶ, οἶκον, i.e., a house striving against itself, divided against itself, falls, is destroyed. (The family is designated metaphorically by the house in which it dwells.) This view alone agrees with Matthew, and corresponds to the main idea that runs throughout the passage. Οὐ σταθήσεται, shall not stand, is equivalent to Mark's οὐ δύναται σταθῆναι, cannot stand; in which the passive form† is to be particularly noticed: the prince or head of a family will not be able to maintain or preserve his kingdom or house (Luke xi. 21), if he himself in his place of power encourages division and strife. Then it is directly said, and will soon be manifest, that it hath an end, as Mark says, in addition. Would that it were so with Satan's kingdom! But Christ, by a valid conclusion derived from the undeniably acknowledged existence of this kingdom, denies the absurd hypothesis of his opponents, that Satan casteth out Satan—as he purposely with emphasis says that Satan attacks himself in those who are his, his own sovereign power in his servants and subordinate devils; for then he would, indeed, be at variance with himself; prince and kingdom would not be one perfect unity, as Christ who knew the fact, maintains that they are, and therefore under the name Satan comprehends the closely and firmly united whole.

Here, already we have a hint which helps us to the understanding of the words which follow in vers. 31, 32, namely, that human wickedness is distinguished from Satanic by this, that in the former, because there is also still error in it, and not an absolute evil will, there is division against itself. The kingdom of human sin here upon earth is, as such, in reality a divided falling Babel, in which one sinner is against another, and so the power is broken. But in the background of this confused scene, the will, plan, kingdom, and power of Satan stand firm and united: the proof in fact, of such another kingdom being behind all the sin of man, discordant in other respects, lies in the fearful, otherwise inexplicable harmony which appears in this Babel-confusion, whenever it goes against the kingdom of God in Christ. Then must those who in other respects hate and are hostile to each other, become friends and allies, for Satan uses them as his arms and household stuff to accomplish by their means what he will, and well he knows what he will. He will certainly do no hurt, on his part, to even the lowest devil in the host of hell, for the evil counsel and will in the head and in all his spirits is one and the same, which cannot contradict and conflict with itself. It may, indeed, appear in the particular instances, when we look at the human side, as if one devil does cast out another; in reality, however, it is no expulsion, but the one devil gives place to the other deliberately and willingly, at the word of command. Beelzebub, or any superior devil, never does from caprice or whim what the powerful ones of the earth so often do, who remove their servants from place to place, in accordance with or against merit,* but it is, throughout, the connected plan of one will, one power, in this kingdom. In the single word: There exists a kingdom of Satan—much, every thing indeed, is said. Christ, indeed, here implies (though in the whole of Scripture this is hardly ever stated), that Satan is a king, notwithstanding he is an already condemned and overthrown usurper (he receives this name elsewhere only in Rev. ix. 11, where the writer speaks metaphorically with a half play upon Prov. xxx. 27, and in Job xviii. 14); yet what is to be understood here is the not to be despised kingly power in this kingdom (hence Jude 9, according to which Satan also belongs to the "dignities," the kings by God's grace or righteousness), and there are even thrones of Satan set up in particular places (Rev. ii. 13).

---

* Grotius cities Cicero de Amicitia: Quae domus tam stabilis, quae tam firma civitas est, quae non odiis atque dissidiis funditus possit everti?

† Ammonius: σταθῆναι μέν ἐστι τὸ ὑφ' ἑτέρου στῆναι δέ, τὸ κατ' ἰδίαν ῥώμην καὶ προαίρεσιν.

Verse 27. Christ meekly and humbly, without the least personal pride that would have shrunk from it, or personal anger that would have been provoked by it, takes into his mouth all the contempt and blasphemy directed against himself, even the most horrible part of it, that which charges him, the Holy One of God, with being an ally of Satan. He speaks in order to refute it, as if he were bound to defend himself against it, and thus assumes the monstrous hypothesis: If I cast out devils by Beelzebub—in this form, willingly accepting the concession, that he actually cast out devils, and thereby, first of all, condescends to place himself on a level with every other Jewish exorcist, in order to claim for himself at least what they concede to their children; the casting out of devils is in every case done only from a good, a divine power. It is a humble, conceded analogy of the same kind as John x. 34–36. Nay, he even shows a kindly feeling in this, pointing to something good in the Pharisees by bringing into notice their acts which were wrought in God. You so thoroughly despise me, that you cast me out to Beelzebub; I willingly give credit to the Pharisees for what they perform in faith in the name of God. For nothing is said here of those who cast out devils in the name of Jesus (Mark ix. 38), as, in this case, the conclusion from them to himself, which forms the principal idea of the inference, would be lost; because the Pharisees would by no means in such cases allow any authority to the name of Jesus. That Christ means his own disciples and apostles (chap. x. 8), among whom, moreover, there could scarcely be a disciple of the Pharisees, can be the opinion of only those commentators who read altogether without reflection, or of the timorous ones who, according to their somewhat narrow theory, cannot allow that there was any casting out of devils in Israel besides that which was done by Christ (among whom Chrysostom leads the way). The ὑμῶν, your, stands in direct opposition to him and all his, and the υἱοί, children, denotes also not Jews in general (Jewish exorcists, Acts xix. 13, your fellow-countrymen; this would be ἀδελφοί), but nothing else than disciples of the Pharisees, Acts xxiii. 6.*

If their casting out of devils had been a mere delusion and superstition, then indeed Christ with all his humility, could not for the sake of truth have placed his own on a level with it, could not have appealed to it as a fact of their conviction, as he does in the ἐκβάλλουσι, cast out, of his question, in which he grants that it was a real casting out, quite as true as his own ἐκβάλλω.† We leave undecided in what relation this may have stood to the τρόποις ἐξορκώσεων or methods of exorcism which, according to Josephus (Antiq. viii, 21, 5), Solomon is said to have bequeathed to the Jews, the practice of which was at that time also still common; but, if Justin Martyr (adv. Tryph. p. 311) appeals against the Jews to the fact that devils yielded to the name of the "God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob," as they did to no name of king, prophet, and patriarch—if Irenaeus, and likewise Origen, acknowledged the still continuing exorcisms of the Jews in the name of God (see the passages in Grotius), we may see with what reason, and with what sense, Christ might ask: ἐν τίνι, by whom, and by whose power, do your disciples cast out devils? Certainly not by Beelzebub, a supposition which he had just refuted as impossible.

* Kleuker, "A Human Essay upon the Son of God and Man."

* Even if the discipleship had not much significance in other respects, still the Pharisees certainly appropriated those exorcists to themselves and their party, appealing thereto against the Sadducees. Accordingly Von Gerlach's question is very much out of place, "How can we know that these were disciples of the Pharisees?" The Sadducees admitted the existence of no spirits whatever! Nor is it arts learned in the schools of the Pharisees, whereby devils were actually cast out, that are here spoken of—but the believing work of orthodox Jews, which, however, was of rare occurrence, so as not in any way to hinder the astonishment at the totally different power of Jesus.

† Unaccountably wrong and yielding to a preconceived opinion is Menken, who understands Christ to refer to the most worthless jugglers and to say, "Such hateful and impure conduct do ye allow to pass without question and call it divine?

Verse 28. At first he condescendingly places his acts side by side in general with those of these disciples, but now, as was right, he sets the ἐγὼ ἐκβάλλω, I cast out, far above any such acts performed by them. Here, first of all, express mention is made of that kingdom which is not merely opposed to the kingdom of Satan but which overcomes it, notwithstanding all its power and unity, namely, the kingdom of God, of the eternally stronger One who everlastingly upholds the kingdom. It is mentioned here in a stricter sense, in so far as it was future for Israel and now visibly come on the earth in their midst. In general, wherever devils are made to yield, there is the kingdom and Spirit, or powerful energy of God; but the kingdom of God which comes in Christ, is something different from what was already among the disciples of the the Pharisees, the Spirit of God by which he casts out means something more than what is conceded in regard to them in the ἐν τίνι. Luke says: By the finger of God, an expression which Christ in his more detailed discourse probably used along with the other, and which very appropriately points to the history in Exod. viii. 19, where the magicians themselves were constrained to acknowledge by this expression the difference between magic and the miracles of God (comp. also Psa. viii. 4; Exod. xxxi. 18), whence it came to be a proverbial form of expression that God's finger works mightily. What in Isaiah (after Moses) is called the redeeming arm of the Lord, appears here as, so to speak, the but slightly touching finger. Strong emphasis must be laid on the ἐγώ, I, in this verse, in order to feel the full force of Christ's inference: "I with all that belongs to me and that goes forth from me, I with my holy walk and witness for truth —can signs wrought in support of Beelzebub help me, as I stand before you, my whole teaching and working which are to you well known? Truly, then, he would be, in the strongest possible sense, against himself, and assisting his most decided enemy. Not, therefore, the isolated acts of casting out devils or miraculous acts as such, but all taken together as attestations, which cannot but come from God, of him who reveals and declares by his whole being the kingdom of God, prove it beyond contradiction: His word is true, the kingdom is come! Ἔφθασεν, has come upon, as has been observed before, expresses more than ἤγγικεν, has come nigh (chap. iv. 17). It has come upon you (2 Cor. x. 14), unexpectedly broken in upon you,* already present and attested, since I am here and work. What follows then, further? That in me, he who was to come is come, the Serpent-bruiser, according to the first and oldest promise, the Conqueror and stronger One, whom the prophets announce under these names—wherewith the discourse passes on to what follows.

Verse 29. Satan is the strong one, but the stronger than he, ὁ ἰσχυρότερος, overcomes him. This name is expressed in Luke, and reminds us, at the same time, of the Baptist's word (Luke iii. 16; Matt. iii. 11); for, even in these passages, it is not merely ἰσχυρότερός μου, "stronger than I," but there is in the expression a general name by which Christ was distinguished: He who in every comparison is in himself the stronger, superior to all with him and against him, who is and remains the unconditionally strong and mighty One. Perhaps, as has already been observed, Christ expresses himself in the parable with immediate reference to the house in which he is speaking, but, at all events, he speaks from the prophetical writings, as he almost always does when he announces himself as he who was to come. Not merely does he look back to Gen. iii. 15, but still more definitely does this testimony contain an evident allusion to the subsequent prophecy of Isaiah. When the Lord himself comes after the voice in the wilderness has prepared the way for him, he comes as a strong One (בְּחָזָק, not quite accurately rendered in the Sept. by μετὰ ἰσχύος), and his arm rules, conquers for him (Isa. xl. 10). This is the general import in which the words of the Baptist and of Christ agree.

The passage Isa. liii. 12 comes nearer still to the words of Christ: He shall have the strong ones for a prey, bear them off as spoil אֶת-עֲצוּמִים certainly the Accus., and again not accurately rendered in the Sept. by ἰσχυρῶν

These rather are the marks of what is evil and devilish! But I cast out without profit, out of love, without means and formulas; this pure divine work is forsooth from Beelzebub, and that which really proceeds from him is divine!" Such an interpretation is refuted by a right reading of the text. Sepp, indeed brings it forward anew (ii. 362), in his own manner, always hunting after something peculiar and abusing the text itself. Neander, too, cannot reconcile himself to the thing, and calls the plan and concession upon which the whole discourse is built, a supposition κατ' ἄνθρωπον—which is retracted afterwards at v. 30.

* Which lies in the ἐφ' ὑμᾶς (comp. 1 Thess. ii. 16), hence Wesley in his New Testament quite correctly, "Unawares, before you expected; so the word implies." See also Dan. vii. 22, in the Sept.

μεριεῖ σκῦλα); where the common superficial interpretation falsely places the great one among other רַבִּים, and represents him as sharing the booty with other strong ones and heroes.* Finally, in that most profound passage, Isa. xlix. 24, 25, exactly answering to the words of Christ, we find taken out from this indefinite number the one, the strong one, whom the Messiah overcomes and spoils. It stands at the beginning, in the first chapter of the third principal part of all Isaiah's prophecies, where, with the greatest clearness akin to the New Testament, the great redemption is represented as a spiritual one, and the preparation of Israel as an implanting into the suffering and glory of the true servant Israel. Here, we find, as a concluding assurance at the end of the chapter, the question just as Christ here puts it: Can the prey be taken also from the strong one (גִּבּוֹר, Sept. strangely γίγας), and the prisoners of the rightful one (צַדִּיק, he, who although a robber, has yet a right of property in them) be delivered? To this is given in answer, the prophetic assurance: Yes, even the prisoners shall be taken from the strong one, and the prey of the usurper (עָרִיץ) shall be set free, be delivered; for I myself will contend with thine adversary (יְרִיבֵךְ, sing.), and redeem thy children! It is necessary to look at this passage (which Christ has evidently in view), so thoroughly confused in the Sept., and carefully to observe, that here a person is mysteriously spoken of who is called both עָרִיץ and צַדִּיק, oppressor and righteous, because he now has in his power, partly by force, partly according to justice, the prisoners whom he has secured as prey, and, for this reason, a process is here spoken of which is to be successfully carried out against this יָרִיב, accuser, Satan.† The close connection between Christ's words, and those of the prophecy, is expresssed most exactly in Luke xi. 21, 22, not merely by way of giving more coloring to the parable; if Matthew gives more correctly the connection of the address as a whole, Luke, on the other hand, has in this particular instance given the original expression. As Paul in Col. ii. 15 refers especially to Isa. liii. 12, so here, Christ refers to it and chap. xlix. 24, 25 together. It appears, at first sight, as if he would only give forth a general parable again concerning a strong one, and a stronger one who must overcome him, and this aspect of his words has been retained by Matthew, in his πῶς δύναται τις, "how can one." But even Matthew, by the article before ἰσχυρός, stronger, hints at the proper special sense of the parable, which then in Luke comes fully into view. The house or the αὐλή of the strong one here spoken of, is the world, whose prince he is called and is, while his σκευη, or goods, Hebr. כֵּלִים, in a comprehensive sense are men, whom he not merely possesses as house furniture, but even uses as his tools and instruments, his weapons the same, therefore, as the σκῦλα in Luke. These, the robber himself, has already taken by plunder (for the word corresponds, also according to the Sept. to the מַלְקוֹחַ and שָׁלָל in both passages of Isaiah), and now they are to be, as much by right as by force, again taken from him. They are his possession and his property (ὑπάρχοντα), and with them he is armed (καθωπλισμένος). With these he is proud in his confidence (ἐπεποίθει), for, without men as the vessels of his iniquity, he could not reign and work evil upon the earth, but would be the poor naked devil, alone in his dark and long since finished empire of hell. But he shall not keep his αὐλή and παντοπλία as his anti-paradise, he shall not hold his goods in the false peace of his servants, for the stronger One, the conqueror, overcomes him, mightily destroying this peace, so that it may become the peace of God, and the strong ones taken from the strong one, he now allots for his own service, as his well-earned spoil, as his prey of victory and honor in the world (the διαδιδῶσιν in Luke again parallel to the יְחֻלַּק in Isa. liii. 12). Let any one refute if he can this profound connection of the prophetic word, as also of this discourse of Christ, which takes it up, with the most fundamental principles of the Bible, in order to reduce this lofty statement, significant even in the minutest detail, to a general, indefinite parable; let us rather learn here, how the mysteries of the kingdom of God lie every where in the background of these parables. Let us further mark what is also said: The stronger one comes to save only us men, but to drive out and to judge devils for our salvation.

Finally, what is to be understood by the expression, except he first bind him, which Matthew and Mark put into Christ's mouth, certainly as a word of peculiar importance? It is the same as ἐπελθὼν νικήσῃ, come upon him, and overcome him, in Luke. This, again, was evidently spoken for Jewish Scribes, since, according to their doctrine, it was expected of the Messiah that he would bind Satan —a true expectation, to which a passage at the end of the Scriptures (Rev. xx. 2) corresponds. The binding is effected by vanquishing, through which his right, and therewith his power, is taken from the צַדִּיק (righteous). But what is to be understood by the πρῶτον, first, upon which alone the καὶ τότε, and then, can follow, the binding of the strong man himself by conflict with him, ere his house, the world, can be taken as a prey from him, and his σκεύη, σκῦλα, men, wrested from him?* Christ means this, we must say, in two senses, the one of which already shadows forth and contains the other. First of all, indeed, the act denoted by the πρῶτον must already have been done, inasmuch as Christ shows himself to be the stronger one, by his already casting out devils: this is true, for he came into the world into Satan's house, as he who in himself was from eternity the stronger, so that the departure of devils at his word and name, from such as were possessed, was a thing of course (Luke x. 18). But then this casting out of Satan from those who were bodily possessed, is still by no means the real overthrow of his work of sin, the real redemption of those who have been under his power (Acts x. 38), but a prophetic figure and pledge of that which was yet to be done. Consequently Christ here predicts, at once, the great conflict and victory of his death, and his descent into hell (see afterwards ver. 40), the πρῶτον or first of which had already taken place: so that his word, in its deepest and most completely fulfilled sense, is the great text of the Passover discourses (see John xiv. 30, xii. 31, 32; Heb. ii. 14, 15; Eph. iv. 8–10). Thus has Christ bound the strong one and overcome him, not properly in this his earthly house, but beyond it (as indeed the words affirm, the πρῶτον expressly distinguishing from the εἰσελθεῖν) in his own most proper domain and province: from that time forth is his house spoiled, and Christ now does this ever more and more by his instruments, by the same whom he has rescued from Satan. Christ, too, will gain for himself an army for this conflict and victory which has been decided from all eternity, but which is to be carried out gradually in time until the end of the world; he will gather together vessels for his use and service to build and adorn his house. This is the last point to which the words of Christ, presenting something new from whatever side they are considered, conduct; this is the deeper reason why Christ began thus indefinitely: Can any one overcome the strong one? (Mark says no one can.) In his own strength and might Christ will say, "No one can do this but I, the stronger one;" with me, in my name, from this time forth all my followers, all who decide for me shall be able to do it.

* So also Sack unfortunately, because the present exegesis of the Old Testament imposes on the best. The רַבִּים are the same as in the foregoing verse, only differently understood. (Comp. on account of the ב, Job. xxxix. 17) [The author has so far outrun "the present exegesis" of this passage in Isa. (or rather gone back to the most ancient one), that few interpreters, after Hengstenberg, will probably follow him in it.—Am. Ed.]

† Here, then, also we have the true explanation of what the imprisonment (Isa. lxi. 1) properly is. Observe, besides, that of this tyrant and robber such a thing as saving, converting, gaining cannot be spoken, but solely the disarming, binding overcoming.

Verse 30. Here is another sentence from the holy lips of Christ which, in order to perceive its depth and fulness, might be presented ever anew to most believers with a "Go and learn what this meaneth." It is a proverb in use among men, applied to cases and circumstances in which there is no neutrality allowed between the strictest either-or, in which every one is to show himself, and must show himself, as for or against. It is difficult to see how a Chrysostom and Euthymius should have understood by him who is not with Christ, and is therefore against him, the devil—what a strange statement would this make! Yet many, even to the most recent time, are of opinion at Christ here still speaks of the complete unity of Satan's kingdom; this, however, only gives the point of connection which lies behind, and what Christ will say is: In the contest between these two kingdoms which embraces every thing, and out of which nothing is or is done on the earth, your proverb thoroughly holds good in reference to me, the determined adversary of the adversary, and to those who are mine; we, too, must be firmly united and not at variance among ourselves.* In order, however, not to misunderstand the emphatic with me, we must take a look forward to the parallel saying (afterwards to be interpreted)—"He who is not against you, is for you" (Mark ix. 40; Luke ix. 50). In this case, the disciples hastily and short-sightedly added their we to the I of Christ which alone decides: He follows (thee) not with us, he follows not us! This outwardly visible fellowship, founded on the fact of following Christ, must not be the ground of our judgment, as if he were not with Christ who casts out devils in his name; humility and love should rather reckon every one a friend who does not declare himself an enemy. Quilibet praesumitur bonus, donec probetur malus ("every body is to be presumed good, till proved bad"), this principle in law, so capable of abuse, is yet true here. He who is not with you, is against you, that is as much as to say against me—this Christ will affirm of no visible church of his believing followers whatever, he has not even granted it to the apostles. He cannot, and will not, thus unite himself with his followers in an extra ecclesiam nulla salus ("no salvation outside the church") falling under men's judgment, by saying: He who is not with us, is against us—he rather in that passage places the you in opposition to himself, as it was right that he should. But so soon as he, in whose person and fellowship the great alternative presents itself, appears, then, on the other hand, he cannot say, "He who is not against me, is for me." Precisely in opposition to this mischievous error, which would suppose an impossibility, is the statement which Christ here makes.*

* Almost to the same effect Roos speaks of the binding of Satan to himself, that he can no longer use the powers of his angelic nature with such full authority, or such entire might, and the disarming him or seizing of something else upon which he relies, with which he covers himself. Yet, to the latter should not be reckoned the right over men (Isa. xlix.), which is no mere "right of war."

* Neander (following Schleiermacher and others) finds that Christ in this saying also repels the Jewish exorcist as those not with Christ, and who therefore cast out devils. How can one thus, by the very ingenuity of the expositor, hide from himself the great simple truth! Bengel gave at least a different turn to this view, and read in ver. 30 e contrario: "Your disciples are, and gather with me"—which, however, does not in truth belong to this place, and would not be so expressed.

The false Gamaliel-prudence thinks that it will save itself: If only we are not found fighting against God—and leaves the kingdom and work of God to take its course, without helping it by profession or by action, and thereby coming to the knowledge that it is from God. Let the indolent and undecided only not mock, only not persecute, that is thought to count in the meanwhile for something. But this is the middle party of whom Christ knows nothing, and of whom he makes no account, but condemns them and casts them over to his enemies. When Christ spoke on this occasion, as generally when he stood testifying of the kingdom of God in Israel, there were before him his disciples and his enemies, between them the class consisting of the seemingly neutral, outwardly undecided: many whom he had healed, who were ashamed to speak against him, although their hearts were not yet for him; many impressed with his preaching, who yet could not get loose from themselves and their position in the world; many stupidly indifferent spectators of his works and listeners to his words. Yet this middle party was not at that time very numerous, and the more powerfully the βιάζεσθαι or "violence" of the kingdom of God pressed upon them and penetrated within them, it would become always less; it, even then, became ever more and more a matter of necessity to decide for or against this Jesus of Nazareth, whether he were from God or from the devil, whether he were Christ or a deceiver. In the later periods of the church, on the other hand, the class of people who think themselves, and appear to others to be not against him, has become great, and indeed the greatest; it is properly for this state of things in his kingdom that Christ speaks this prophetic sentence of rejection as king and judge.

The "with me," then, means the true inward fellowship of the heart, of the will, and therefore also of the life, in confessing Christ and working for him, not the belonging to any party formed by outward consent and discipleship. It pre-supposes, certainly, that he has appeared with his testimony by the Spirit of God; in every country and among every people on the earth, this strict separation and decision begins whenever he comes and appears. It is his royal right to bring it. True, the more there is of what is divinely good in a man, the more of heavenly truth in opposition to the error and sin of the world, so much the more will the same be approximately true also of him, that he urges all who come into contact with him to decide; still, no sinful man can presume to say: In me, in my person, the decision is made for judgment, either for or against! This He only can say who is altogether truth and love itself, in the divine royal right of the only begotten Son; he who now says to all "Follow me!" and declares at the same time: Those who have not listened and obeyed, I will not know at that day! Wherefore not? He tells us in his word: he who is not with me, who does not decide for me and yield himself up to me, who does not become mine in the obedience of faith, although he imagines himself and appears to be "not against me"—I know and say it, he is nevertheless against me! How so, then? Already inasmuch as, previous to this yielding up of himself to Christ, every sinful man is by nature against him, as being against God (Rom. viii. 7). The enmity of the heart is therefore still there; if it were really overcome, then must the heart be with me. Neutrality here is no neutrality, but a remaining on the side of the enemy; indolence here is no mere indolence, but opposition; the merely not believing and not obeying is still resistance and rejection. This, however, is not all; there is more than this. To be against Christ is not merely to be in opposition to God as we all are by nature (which can and is to be atoned for, forgiven, taken away)—but it is wilfully to maintain and to aggravate such resistance, it is to resist the truth of God in its last and clearest revelation, the love of God in its highest manifestation, the power of God in the Holy Ghost which would win us and restore us. And truly that is a fearful degree of guilt, enough for the judgment! He who has perceived and experienced so much that he does not join himself to the open enemies of Christ, and yet is not won and overcome for him, has often all the greater resistance to him in his heart; so that, as regards the furtherance or hindrance of Christ's cause by the outward life, it is a question whether the neutrals are not the worst enemies in the great contest. But with all this it is to be well observed that it is only he, the Judge, who says this, only he knows it who knows the heart. We who judge of the internal state of a man only by the external marks, in which we may be deceived, who must abide by the other saying in Mark ix. 40 and not judge before the time, dare not say personally upon conscience of any one whatsoever, Thou art against Christ, because so far as we see thou art not with him! He alone speaks thus far: He who is not with me—and applies it to the conscience of the individual: Thou also art meant here, I know it of thee, and thou canst and shalt know it when I disclose it to thy heart. This saying, severe as it is, yet leaves room enough for charity in our judgments, as Braune has justly observed (but giving a one-sided prominence to this), "The most different views respecting the dignity of Christ do not exclude any from him, if only there be left to him the dignity of one sent from God; and the feeblest pointings to him are not to be called a scattering."

* What Elwert and Ullmann have recently said on the relation of the two proverbial sayings, we purpose to consider more particularly in connection with Mark ix. 40, in the second edition.

The first clause of the saying is decisive and incisive, inasmuch as it touches the principle of the heart in which must be either the with or the against; but the being with him or against him, although first and foremost it means this internal principle of the life, is yet so expressed as to embrace the outward manifestation and expression in the whole conduct and character. For, indeed, as is the tree so is the fruit, as is the treasure of the heart so are the words of the mouth and the whole conduct. Now this—as being, so to speak, the test and proof of the striking assertion—the second clause brings forward into the full light of the entire truth which is here intended to be spoken. Christ does not first require this: He who is and would be with me, must gather also with me! He pre-supposes this as self-evident in the perfectly parallel expressions: Every one ὢν μετ' αὐτοῦ, that is with him, is also a συναγων, one gathering; every one μὴ συνάγων (because inwardly κατ' αὐτοῦ is also outwardly) a σκορπίζων, one scattering.

In the expression gathereth, Christ connects what he says slightly with the foregoing figure in verse 29, as also with the ground-idea of the whole discourse, namely, that there is a unity of the kingdom of God as opposed to the unity of Satan's kingdom; still, the expression is so general as to include also other figures, and, indeed, is itself quite independent. What, then, will he have to be gathered? Not treasures for the pomp and splendor of a Romish church-throne, not even property for founding and establishing an evangelical state-church, not names on the roll of those who own his name; but souls are to be gathered, as vessels of honor to be used by the Master of the house, which before were the house furniture of the evil one; fruits are to be gathered for the eternal garner, seed which itself again bears fruit; sheep are to be brought to the shepherd, which the wolf scatters not again. They are, first of all, brought to him, led to him, gathered around him (Matt. xxiii. 37), but, at the same time and in addition to this, they are brought together into unity and concord, into the strong fellowship of conflict and victory formed by his united flock and church. What a work, what a commission for the members and laborers of the kingdom, this gathering together in one the children of God who are scattered abroad! (John xi. 52). For this every subject must labor and work, for this every one who is in heart with the King will of himself work. To this gathering belongs also all preparatory work of any kind of παιδαγωγία εἰς Χριστόν (bringing as a "schoolmaster" to Christ) manifoldly exercised in the midst of our earthly calling, with a true eye to the one end; then, the bringing to Christ properly so called, the strengthening and upholding of those already brought to him, the removing of the stones and making a plain path for his followers, the uniting and bringing into connection all that is separated and isolated, in short the entire building up of the house which is to grow together in love, the entire sowing, and watering, and tending for the great harvest.

Christ in these words designates his kingdom as one that is indeed come in him, but the building up of which is to be progressively carried out by his followers. Satan's kingdom subsists already on the earth in every human heart, in so far as it is against God and Christ: Christ has, indeed, first bound the strong one, but the subsequent spoiling of his house has since been going on from people to people and from soul to soul, by the labor of those who enter upon Christ's service (John iv. 38). Shall we now, in reference to activity in the fellowship and service of Christ, shrink from the same strict alternative which recognizes only gatherers or dispersers? May we at least here think, that the undecided and indolent, though he may still in heart be entirely or partially against Christ, is yet not so in his acting, does not outwardly hinder or injure the cause so long as he conducts himself in this neutral way? Neutrality is impossible, says Christ, impossible as regards the internal state of the man, and therefore, also, as regards the actions which proceed thence; both are one. A man who is in heart altogether with Christ cannot but gather for him every where and in every thing, even without knowing and willing it; his light illumines, his anointing gives forth its savor, he bears rightfully the title of the old Roman emperor: "always extender of the kingdom"—at least as much as in him lies. No one is so much a hermit upon earth, even though he lives as a hermit, that his life is not related to others in the connection of influence; Christ, however, will have no hermits, but laborers, and in whomsoever his Spirit is, he brings them to work for his kingdom in all the work of the calling which each one has. The same, therefore, holds good on the other hand: he who does not take the field with me against Satan, is not merely himself as yet under his yoke, but serves also in his kingdom; he who does not take his place and arms for the lawful king against the usurper, is reckoned by the latter as upon his roll, that roll which he holds up before the people to let them see how great it is. The unfruitful tree stands as an offence in the way, and cumbers the ground (Luke xiii. 7). The greater the honesty and apparent absence of hostility from without, so much the more dangerous the offence, so much the more is every suppression of the name of Christ, when he should be acknowledged and praised, equal to a denial of him, so much the more efficacious also in the merely not working. In like manner, where there is an outward position in life to which the eyes of others are directed, where, in a word, there is an office to lead and to teach the people, such as these Pharisees had, this saying applies in its highest truth: He who gathers not with me scatters abroad. He scatters only more and more what is already separated from God, and is another spoke in the wheel for the kingdom of the wicked one, that kingdom which is also not yet fulfilled among men, but which ceaselessly moves towards this end wherever the Spirit and power of God does not interpose. He scatters himself in his indolent standing still, which, indeed, is not standing still, for he goes ever further from the kingdom of God, while he imagines himself to be only standing before or at the door, without yielding himself up as an instrument and workman in the house; as on the other hand, he who gathers in his diligence and zeal, at the same time, unites whatever in his own soul may yet be out of Christ into a firmer unity of faith and life proceeding from Christ. For this sense, also, lies beneath the general saying which comprehends all fulness of truth.

Finally, for we are not yet done, emphasis is to be laid in the second clause on: He who gathers, but not with me, whose gathering is itself a dispersing! Nay, this is really the extreme point of the paradoxical antithesis. No one can truly (not merely in vain or mistakenly) gather to him without gathering with him; hence it is not said merely: He who does not gather to me. To bring souls to Christ in one's own strength and reason, with a selfish object—how can that be possible? Thus far, certainly, the προφάσει, "in pretence," in Phil. i. 18, does not extend. As there is a passive, so there is also an active, false friendship with Christ. Some ask: Am I then against thee, merely because I am not for thee? Others again: Am I not with thee? see my zealous labors for thy kingdom? But Christ looks into the heart, and says: No, thou art, nevertheless, not with me, thy labor is in my sight only injury and destruction. O how many famous and proud laborers in the building up of the church and kingdom are included in this sentence! They gather, indeed, but not with him, not in his mind and spirit, consequently, also, not to him and for him—if not to draw disciples to themselves (Acts xx. 30), making merchandise of dear-bought souls (2 Peter ii. 3), yet for a form, party, church or sect. These, in great things and in small, act upon the maxim: Every one is to follow Christ with us. Where this is not done they repel and disperse, and those, too, whom they have gathered to themselves, they have thereby turned away from Christ. To create such confusion, so that Babel may seem to be again revived in Zion, is Satan's greatest art and pleasure; then he mocks, when that which has no place in his empire, namely, that Satan cast out Satan, is yet done in the kingdom of God, when the subjects dissever the kingdom, and Christians cast out Christ.

Thus the first clause of the saying strikes terror into the open enemies of Christ by the already pronounced judicial sentence: You are against me! in which lies, indeed, the entire condemnation of enmity to God. But it also lays open the heart of the externally neutral hypocrites, to whom the same judicial sentence belongs. The second clause, while it first of all shows to these hypocrites their inward state from their outward character, at the same time lays open to the real disciples of Christ all their remaining indolence, indecision, and perversity, and constantly shames even them into being entirely, both outwardly and inwardly, with Christ. He who is not yet entirely with me, is in so far still against me; that in you, and belonging to you, which does not yet gather with me, disperses! We must, indeed, shrink with fear from this sentence of truth, did there not immediately follow the gracious assurance that there is forgiveness for all sins, except the one which is committed only when a man has become wholly like Satan.

This comforting assurance follows somewhat remarkably and significantly here, where, after having adduced proof in detail as to the entire opposition between the kingdom of Satan and the kingdom of God, an opposition that reaches to the heart and life, the will and conduct of every individual, Christ declares the punishment of those sinners who wilfully mistake this. The first part of this rebuke is a warning against the unpardonable sin, in contradistinction to which, with the most gracious gentleness, the forgiveness of all others is declared. This sin, which already showed itself typically in the blasphemy against God uttered by the Pharisees, and therefore derives its name from this, Christ marks out (as in warnings is very natural) as the fearful end of the way upon which they then were, and as, in some measure, coinciding with their present sin; hence, in vers. 34–37, the address runs as if they had already committed it, while yet, in vers. 31, 32, it is only indefinitely set before them by way of warning. The intermediate sentence, which unites these two, is in verse 33: Will not such fruit at last grow upon such a corrupt tree, if it does not now let itself be engrafted into the good tree? We might also divide the passage in another way, and say: Christ shows the unpardonable sin, first, in its peculiar greatness in itself (more generally ver. 31, more emphatically repeated, ver. 32); then, in the source or principle whence (by increasing persistency in evil) it must at length result (if the corrupt tree will not know the good, so as itself to become good, ver. 33—the figure properly applied in the address of vers. 34, 35); finally, in its consequences, the inevitable condemnation according to the general law (in ver. 36), and according to the more general fundamental law (in ver. 37), for judging the internal state by the outward expression.

Verses 31, 32. The Διὰ τοῦτο λέγω ὑμῖν, "Wherefore I say unto you," which Matthew puts instead of the Ἀμήν, "Verily," of Mark, has its own proper sense; therefore—because, according to what has just been said, the opposition between Satan's kingdom and God's, between fellowship with me, and fellowship with the wicked one, is so clearly an attested fact; therefore, I say further to you gainsayers and calumniators: It is a very serious and dangerous thing! Many a one may be against me, may speak or act against me, even for a whole life time, and yet forgiveness stand open to him; but there is, even in this world, a wilful contradiction and resistance which forfeits all grace for ever—therefore, I have reason to say to you, beware!

That, in the divine judgment, while internal sin as such is condemned, yet it is also apprehended and judged in its expression, and also that words, as the most decided evidence of the principle of the heart, are before actions—this fundamental idea, essential to the understanding of the whole passage, is announced in the first words; all sin—this is the most general, truly proper name, to which belongs also what was before excepted. Lest we should associate with this word first of all (as, alas! men are wont to do in their superficial use of words), so-called common, simple sins, Christ immediately intensifies the expression, and puts between these common sins and the unpardonable sin, blasphemy—not as an isolated, casually dropped word, but as the fruit of an evil heart. In Mark it is expressly said: αἱ βλασφημίαι, ὅσας ἂν βλασφημήσωσιν, blasphemies whereinto soever they may blaspheme, and Luther rightly adds: Wherewith they blaspheme God; for, although βλασφημεῖν occurs elsewhere in a wider sense, here it is certainly this sin in so far as it is committed against God, and can be forgiven only by God, consequently, blasphemy against God is meant, even where it expresses itself as calumny against a man (Erasmus here, convitium). Ἀφεθήσεται, by no means merely, Can be forgiven; for from this can the actual forgiveness follows of itself, according to the great and richly provided grace of God. Still less, as some think, who unsuitably render the words, trying to blunt sharpness of the expression, are they to be taken in a comparative sense: For all other sins, forgiveness is, comparatively speaking, possible; but absolutely, as it stands: They shall be forgiven. So much the more directly and strikingly does it stand in opposition to the entirely unconditional οὐκ ἀφεθήσεται (shall not be forgiven) in respect to the βλασφημία τοῦ Πνεύματος, blasphemy of the Spirit, or (as Mark more concisely expresses it βλασφημεῖν εἰς τὸ Πνεῦμα), the εἰπεῖν λόγον κατὰ τοῦ Πνεύματος τοῦ Ἁγίου, speaking a word against the Holy Ghost. What is this? It is still more definitely limited by its being opposed to speaking against the Son of Man, inasmuch as for this latter sin also there is forgiveness. Many find here a gradation according to the rank of the three persons in the Godhead; but, in the first place, the first general βλασφημία certainly does not refer to God the Father in particular (for which supposition there is not the slightest ground), and then, in the second, the Son is expressly set forth, not in his divine nature, but as the Son of Man, liable, in his state of humiliation, to be unknown and calumniated. The aggravation of the sin, in respect of its guilt (Mark ἔνοχός ἐστιν), as is implied in the antithesis between the Son of Man and the Holy Spirit, is determined not by rank of the object against whom the sin is committed (according to which the Father would very improperly stand lowest in the Trinity), but by the increased clearness of the revelation of God, in proportion to which, of course, sin must be committed always with more of consciousness and will.* All sin and blasphemy is against God, consequently also against the Son, and in like manner, against the Spirit of God, through whom the revelation of truth, the rebuking and drawing of the sinner is accomplished The phrase, sin again the Holy Ghost is, in so far, an improper designation, at least very liable to be misunderstood, and in which a departure is made from the word of Christ. In proportion as a man resists God and is disobedient, from the degree of general unbelief (Acts vii. 51) on to the last grieving of the Spirit in the saints (Eph. iv. 30), in the same ratio he sins also against the Holy Spirit. All this is forgiven, says Christ. Nay, he speaks still kindly: He who speaks (and acts) against me, against my person as the Son of Man, although already accredited as the Son of God, and come from God—whosoever calumniates me, this I judge not! Thus far is the grace of the New Testament dispensation opened up here in opposition to the typical Old Testament, in which even the simple blaspheming against the name of God had no atonement provided for it, and was punished by the sinner's being cut off from the people.† Saul spoke and acted against the Son of Man (1 Tim. i. 13), even after the Spirit had vindicated his claims to be the Son of God; the Jews crucified him after the resurrection of Lazarus, and yet he said of them: Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do. The mockers on the day of Pentecost knew not what that was, until the words of Peter entered into their ears. Ananias lied to the Holy Spirit; but whether he also blasphemed him, we do not know. All this is not yet properly the sin which Christ here means. But it may be questioned whether Caiaphas (Matt. xxvi. 64, 65), did not blaspheme the witnessing Spirit, when he called the confession of Christ a blasphemy; for the "Thou sayest it," intimates that he himself well knew what he yet wilfully asks.

We observe, that "against the Holy Ghost," means against the most direct and conclusive testimony, by which the person who, nevertheless, contradicts and resists is yet entirely convinced, consequently, sins with the most complete knowledge and wi l; and this is the idea most essentially belonging to the unpardonable sin, which might certainly be committed also before the day of Pentecost, for, otherwise, Christ had not spoken of it here to the Pharisees. It was possible so to calumniate Christ in his state of humiliation as that it should be blasphemy against the Spirit, brought perfectly to the consciousness by the truth of his doctrine and the dignity of his person; it is possible still so to blaspheme Christ in his state of exaltation, as that it is seen by God to proceed from the ignorance of unbelief (1 Tim. i. 13) against the Son of Man, against this Jesus of Nazareth (Acts xxvi. 9), and therefore is forgiven.

* Thus, Origen already refuted the error that might seem to find support in this passage, as if in it the Holy Ghost were placed above the Logos. Not because the Holy Ghost stands higher, is the sin heavier, but because he who has received the Holy Ghost stands higher in the Christian life.

† "What clearness, majesty, and freedom on the part of the Saviour, thus, in the midst of this warm controversy and conflict to distinguish so sharply between different enemies, so that according to what is here said, all the enemies of Christianity, in every age, must be distinguished" (Brauno).

Christ certainly speaks here of an individual act, nay, rather of an individual word, for in such expression all sin completes and attests for judgment; but the individual expression is, of course, so significant only as the fruit of the tree, and an emanation from the depths of the heart (vers. 33, 34). As Grashof simply and strikingly observes, it is the same here as with the Raca and Fool (chap. v. 22). Consequently, the expression pre-supposes an internal state developed up to this point, in which lies the sin properly so-called, which is always something belonging to a state, never an isolated speaking or acting as such.* Where are we to look for the sin to which, in opposition to all others, Christ unconditionally denies forgiveness? How has the want of understanding, even in those who are otherwise most intelligent, confused his clear words! How humbling to find such a man as Wesley, for example, saying that he finds "nothing more clear in the Bible" than that this sin is neither more nor less than what these people here did: "the ascribing those miracles to the power of the devil, which Christ wrought by the power of the Holy Ghost." Menken, also, is of opinion, that this blasphemy was only possible at that time, when Christ was present in visible personality, and performed acts through the power of the Spirit of God—but we cannot so lightly pass over the depths of this dreadful word. It is, rather, pretty clear from the warning words λέγω ὑμῖν, I say unto you, that those Pharisees were only on the way towards this highest degree of guilt;† and although this should remain doubtful, yet, at all events, the same must be possible now, much more even than then. Or, shall we say, that the convincing manifestation of the Spirit of God, in word and in power, is less now, than it was then in Christ upon earth? Does there not lie in the antithesis between the Son of Man and the Holy Ghost, a real reference to the days of the Holy Ghost, after the days of the Son of Man? The more powerfully and convincingly the Comforter, who is come, reproves the world by and without the word, of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment, the greater the works which the apostles do after Christ (John xiv. 12), i.e., the more comprehensive and convincing the works of Christ, as wrought by his followers in the history of the Church and the world, appear, so much the more impossible now, than before, must it become from century to century, for any one who wilfully rejects the testimony of the Spirit, to retain the plea of ignorance in such conduct, upon the ground of which it might be forgiven. The blasphemy against the Holy Ghost has been here and there committed since Christ appeared, but it is to be pre-eminently the sin of the last time, the consummation of anti-christianity. It is the substance of that to which the type of blasphemy against God (under the Old Testament dispensation) remotely corresponds.

Christ speaks, certainly, not de peccato hominis cavendo, quamquam in hominem non cadente (of a sin to be avoided by man, though not occurring in man), for his clear and true word has in it no mere empty bugbear, knows nothing of contradiction with itself, as this title of a once famous and well-meant writing would in vain reconcile the homini cavendum with the in hominem non cadens. What Lange, again maintains (Leben Jesu, iii. 126) is not true, namely, that a man cannot blaspheme the Holy Ghost with perfect knowledge of his doing so. "If man can truly love God and what is good, then must he also be able to hate God and what is good"—says Grashof in answer to this, and the apostle of love testifies that there is a sin unto death (John v. 16). So much, however, is certainly true in that well-meant opinion, that the highest sin, the pure, or rather the altogether impure hatred of the good and holy Spirit of God, which expresses itself in conscious blasphemy against him, is no longer the sin of man in the ordinary sense, but of Satan. If it has gone thus far with a man, he is then no longer merely under Satan's power and delusion, but has himself become a freely acting and conscious Satan. This is as truly possibly and real, as that there can be no restraint of a compelling grace to prevent the continued sin of man, so that it must be the end of the downward course, the same actual abyss into which Satan fell in his first complete fall. It is not, therefore (as Gurlitt thinks), contemptuous indifference to all that is good and holy which is here spoken of—of which Julius Müller truly says that it is impossible—but positive hatred. This transition of unbelief "from the merely tolerable character of indolence and cowardice to that of the most hateful falsehood," Nitzsch also designates as at least a conceivable height of resistance (System, § 142).

* "For this sin is not a merely outward act, as if, by the secret magic of certain words which do not emanate from the depths of the heart, one could commit the worst sin and consign himself immediately to eternal perdition." So Jul. Müller, On the Doctrine of Sin, vol. ii., p. 476 (Clark's Foreign Theological Library), who in general quite agrees with our interpretation.

† Mark iii. 30 by no means says, that Christ imputed this sin to them, but only explains the name which he gives it from the occasion that certainly foreshadowed it.

From this we may hope it will be understood, why Christ can do nothing else than denounce against the Satanic sin, Satan's everlasting condemnation without forgiveness. His words indicate this relation between all sin and blasphemy and this blasphemy peculiar in its kind, by the striking expression τοῖς ἀνθρώποις, to men, to which Mark gives still greater prominence, so that all other sins belong τοῖς υἱοῖς τῶν ἀνθρώπων, to the sons of men, while the blasphemer of the Spirit (the singular ὃς δ' ἄν) appears as a man fallen from the human state, a monster. The expression neither in this world nor in the world to come, cannot mean here the Rabbinical עוֹלָם הַזֶּה and הַבָּא (this age and the age that has come), as the time before and after the appearance of Christ; for, in this case, there could have been no αἰῶν μέλλων, future age, when Christ spake; still less can ὁ αἰὼν οὗτος (this age) mean, as in the writings of the apostles, the evil world without God and Christ, for in it there is in general no forgiveness. It means the time before and after the death of man.* It is in so far, certainly, a proverbial expression for now and never, Mark οὐκ ἔχει ἄφεσιν εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα;† but when Christ speaks proverbs they become truth in his mouth, he never speaks animo commoto (as Kuinöl thought), so that his words are not to be taken in their exact sense. The jejune sense (with which Alford also satisfies himself) goes completely against the letter, namely, that if a sin is forgiven or retained here, it is, therewith also, forgiven or retained in the world to come. This is precisely what we deny. Of the utmost importance, when the words are taken exactly as they ought to be, is the demontrable inference ex vi oppositi that other sins are forgiven also in the world to come. "Neque enim de quibusdam veracitar diceretur, quod non eis remittatur neque in hoc saeculo neque futuro, nisi essent quibus, etsi non in isto, tamen remittetur in futuro" (Augustine, de civ. lib. 21, c. 24). Nay, Christ has already maintained much more than the mere possibility of forgiveness for some sins even in the world to come, when he declared that all sin, except this one, shall really be forgiven, at all events in the world to come.‡ And there is good ground for this, indeed it cannot be otherwise; for, as there can be no standing still either in good or in evil, but must be a development onwards to the full degree of ripeness for the eternal fire or for eternal life, so also, in the other world, it goes on till the last judgment in the same way as here upon earth: all sin which belongs to a man at death developes itself either to the blasphemy against the Spirit, to the Satanic sin, which alone casts down to eternal fellowship with Satan,* or it is through means of not yet ceasing grace, taken away and forgiven.† But, let it be well observed, it is forgiven also in the world to come, by no means, expiated, discharged, purged away by fire or forced away. All salting with fire (Mark ix. 49), and all purifying pain, can only awaken in the freely acting creature the penitent faith which lays hold on grace—in that world not otherwise than in this.

The sum of what has been said is this: The blasphemy against the Holy Ghost, which at last remains only for the judgment, is the consummated absolute sin of the devil, to which man also may arrive; and this Christ denotes, according to Mark, by a peculiar word adapted to the peculiar nature of the sin, a word which perfectly corresponds to the fundamental idea of his discourse: ἔνοχός ἐστιν αἰωνίου ἁμαρτίας or ἁμαρτήματος (for which κρίσεως is certainly only a gloss), he is guilty of an eternal sin. Here we look with horror into the abyss of guilt, for which only the abyss of condemnation remains. We cannot, therefore, see our way, with Meyer and all those who believe in a final restoration, to add to the words: "As long as it continues"—with which, strangely enough, just as before with the cavendum and non cadens, what he goes on to say stands in contradiction: "Because it pre-supposes an entire hardening and an incurable wickedness." We regard the unpardonable sin—the eternal sin of which Christ here speaks, and of which he was led to speak, from a special occasion, so that he characterizes it according to one of its forms, here definitely foreshadowed—not merely in this or that one of its manifold expressions, but in its deepest ground, which Christ here at the same time lays open. It is the rejection and—on account of this its inherent eternal nature as a sin—the eternally unpardonable rejection of the perfectly known, immediate, testimony of the Spirit, with which the Holy Ghost has proffered truth and grace, developed in a human being, till it brings him to be of the same nature with Satan. It is committed when the man, with entire conviction, knows what, in complete wickedness, he does; for thus did Christ on the cross, mark the limits of forgiveness and atonement. It is distinguished from every other pardonable sin of

* If as Julius Müller thinks: "αἰὼν μέλλων is the period of the manifest, consequently of the perfectly realized, Messianic kingdom, which is not set up till after the resurrection and the judgment of the world"—where then remains the continuity of the time embraced by neither-nor?

† As in Sepher chasidim, num. 234, one Jew says to another: I shall not forgive this, neither in this world nor in the world to come. This may be added to what is here adduced by Grotius.

‡ König (Die Lehre von Christi Höllenfahrt), p. 238.

* Precisely to the same effect Julius Müller: "Rather must the sinful development, if it be not reversed by the redemption, every where complete itself in the blasphemy against the Holy Ghost."

† By no means merely in the sense in which Von Gerlach weakens and trifles with the words: "He who through great anxiety of mind has not experienced the comfort here, may there first attain to the enjoyment of forgiveness"—as if this alone were meant by "forgiven!"

man by this, that in it there is not even a minimum of Satanic deceit practiced upon the understanding (Gen. iii. 13), or compulsion of any nature, or by any creature, upon the will, but sheer evil is willed, spoken, and done instead of the known and rejected good, the lie, as such, instead of the blasphemed truth. That it should be forgiven is impossible, not on God's account, but on account of the creature, who has put himself under such a ban, that he henceforth remains incapable of repentance and faith in divine grace.

When Christ here designates the sin against the Holy Ghost as that which is alone unpardonable, while yet the Scripture speaks of sins unto death, for which no repentance, no grace, and no sacrifice can be of any avail, it follows, beyond contradiction, that all such passages are to be understood merely of different forms of development and expression, but, at bottom, as speaking of one and the same sin. In this light 1 John v. 16; 2 Tim. iii. 8; Jude 4, 12, 13; Heb. x. 26–31, vi. 4–8, are to be viewed; while, from the last cited passage, it may be seen, that the fall into such an abyss, even of those who have been regenerated, is possible and real. But that not merely those who have fallen back may commit the unpardonable sin (as some have thought), is very evident again from 2 Tim. iii. 8.

Verses 33–35. With how much propriety for the explanation of what goes before, this tracing back of the outward expressions to its internal ground now follows, we have already seen, and have little to add by way of interpretation; all the less that Christ, evidently repeating, recurs to his Sermon on the Mount,* as, in what he says about trees, and in the expression, "generation of vipers," he goes still further back to the Baptist's first repentance sermon, with which these people had again to begin. From the last outbreak of diabolic sin, he turns warningly back to its first source in the heart of man! Ποιήσατε, do ("bring forth"), seems at first to be a Latinism, inasmuch as the tone of address now anew takes the form of a logical demonstration, as at ver. 25: Imagine, suppose, or put the case—still there lies beneath the surface of this, as the German "setzet" well renders it, the proper sense of the word, derived from the planting of a tree; for, as the parellel accusatives show, the expression is strikingly brought up on purpose from the ποιεῖν καρπόν to the tree. If you will bring forth fruit, then first bring forth the tree for this! To suppose the tree to be good will not do. Against the false interpretation according to which Christ would merely say: Suppose the case—Julius Müller has also objected, that in this sense, the confirmation ἐκ γὰρ—γινώσκεται, (for from—is known), would not be at all suitable. The same learned writer (not always acutely exegetical) denotes here the two main ideas of the text quite correctly: As from the quality of the tree the quality of the fruit follows of itself, so the good and evil actions of man follow from the good or evil state of his heart; but this state is itself again conditioned by the fundamental determinations of the will, ποιήσατε τὸ δένδρον κτλ., (Von der Sünde, ii. 79, 80). This is well said; for the ποιήσατε which, first of all, ironically expresses the impotency of nature, immediately takes the force of an earnest challenge. For, in order to do and speak what is good, the tree, the fountain, must become different. The λαλεῖν, speaking, proceeds only from the εἶναι, being; in the heart is the fountain whence the words of the mouth flow, and their being good or evil is manifest from the state of the heart, to him who knows the heart, just as vice versa the words betray the heart to the judgment of men, and in spite of all hypocrisy expose to conviction also before the tribunal of God. For the fountain cannot but overflow according to its nature and kind (James iii. 11). The expression ἐκ τοῦ περισσεύματος λαλεῖν, speaking out of the abundance, is from Eccles. ii. 15, Sept. What is denoted by περίσσευμα, abundance, is further called Θησαυρός, treasure—the innermost storehouse of life in the heart of man, open only to the eye of God, where those influences which determine the personal state and character form themselves, in order thence to flow forth again in the expressions of the life (Beck). It is not good or bad words and works, that make a good or bad man, but *vice versa. "If the heart be worthless, then the virtue also is worthless." Christ's sharp word of rebuke here comes as a good word from his holy truth in love, while the finest hypocritical speeches, smooth as butter, are only so much the worse on account of the venomous source whence they proceed. The man forms himself freely between the kingdom of God and Satan; the strong one is not so strong that the bad man who is bound in his service, nay, developing to his likeness, should yet not be bad in a criminal surrender of himself; nor is the stronger One so strong as to make the bad man good by force. The good man and the bad: these are not by nature two different kinds of men, but we are indeed all bad (chap. vii. 11; Mark vii. 21; 22), and the good man here, as opposed to such in the highest degree, is Christ,

* Into which Luke (ch. vi. 45), as we there saw, has inserted this passage. We hold, at all events, that the present occurrence does not belong to the period before the Sermon on the Mount.

* Compare the saying of Aristotle, which Neander cites in the Deutsche Zeitschrift für christl. Wissenschaft (1850, p. 1o2). [The passage to which Neander refers is in the Nicomachean Ethics, Book ii. ch. 4: "Actions are called just and temperate, when just and temperate men perform them; but just and temperate men are not those who do these actions, but who do them in such a way, that is, as the just and temperate do them. But the most of mankind do not act thus, but betake themselves to mere words, and think that they are then philosophers, and that thus they will become good." And he compares them to the sick, who consult a physician, and do not follow his prescriptions.—Am. Ed.]

who now even speaks good words to them, and then all who, as renewed men, participate in his grace before and after his coming in the flesh. Christ, as the γινώσκεται, is known, at the beginning indicates, will here, in connection at the same time with all that proceeds, say and ask: "If my fruits, works and words are good, works of love and words of truth, am I myself, then from God or a friend of Beelzebub?" For the most evil man is he that speaks evil against the good man who bears witness of himself by his goodness. The worst tree plants itself, inasmuch as it will not know the good tree, from which healing is to come to it, will not let itself be planted into it—therefore is it known at last by the worst fruit.

Verses 36, 37. What the tongue speaks is very significant; for the small member not only does great things, but it is also nearer the heart than the hand is. Men may, with wilful folly, say: A word or two spoken which meant nothing, what is there in this? I have surely in this done nothing bad! The history of the world and of man's life every where refutes such folly, and says loudly: Words are acts, which work most deeply and lastingly, even in the spiritual sphere in which works alone are taken into account; and this not merely the words of the leaders and representatives of the people—to whom certainly it chiefly applies—but in general; nor is it merely discourses which at the time seem great and powerful, but the smallest word which, after it has escaped the tongue, thou canst never recall, is a seed which grows and bears good or evil fruits, such as can never be computed. God, however, judges sin not according to its effects, but according to the motive and intentions. Here thou sayest again falsely against the truth; I only speak so and so, the heart means nothing bad! Yes, in those rare instances in which this is true, the words will not be charged against the heart; but in by far the most cases, indeed in general, the word is the proper expression of the heart, showing its real character more surely even than the act. Where the gehenna burns in the heart, there hypocritical works are of no avail, the course of the natural life which cannot be restrained, catches fire upon the tongue, and the whole body, however outwardly clean and pure, is tainted by the evil words (James iii. 6). Let one only hear what even those who are most honored speak within their four walls, or even in public! There are words of anger, of scandal, of pride, envenomed words against their neighbor, words of rebellion against God, that weigh heavier in the balance than many deeds, nay, lay open at one view, the whole treasure of evil into the heart, from which alone they could proceed. Hence, also, there is in the first and second tables of the decalogue, not to mention that all its commandments point in the same direction, a command expressly for the mouth. Immediately after the command against idolatry and the worship of images, comes the one against taking the name of God in vain, and immediately before that against the covetousness of the heart, is the one against falseness of speech, which always is and ought to be, an evidence of the former. This reaches far and deep. Did Christ, first of all, speak of blasphemies as the worst words which are the expression of the worst sin, and then, coming downwards, designate as "evil" in general that which the mouth brings forth from the heart—he now descends still farther to the πᾶν ῥῆμα ἀργόν, every idle word (placed before in an absolute form for emphasis), which implies still less than the apostle's πᾶς λόγος σαπρός, κενοὶ λόγοι (Ephes. iv. 29; v. 6). Where there is no good fruit of truth and love unto edification, there this very unprofitableness and emptiness is itself an evil fruit; before God's judgment, however, not even the smallest word which a man has ever spoken is forgotten! Ἀποδώσουσι λόγον περὶ παντὸς λόγου, "they shall give account for every word." How dumb shall they then be, and have not a word to answer for a thousand, if the justifying good words, proceeding from the spirit of grace and prayer, do not weigh heavier in the balance of the Judge!* It will, we hope, be seen, with what perfect justice Christ here, instead of the principle of judgment which most commonly occurs in the Old and New Testament: "To every man according to his works"—lays down the more appropriate one, which we find in ver. 27. Even in human judicial processes, this is a proverbial rule, as Eliphaz expresses it in the book of Job, where the discourse was precisely concerning unprofitable words (Job. xv. 2, 6). By the tongue we write for ourselves the most decisive protocol of our future trial before the tribunal of the highest Justice, and all that was in us, all that we have done, or as good as done, speaks then loudly in our words as a silencing confession, as our own testimony.

What Luke (ch. xi. 16), introduced right before, along with the calumny: By Beelzebub, etc., as the occasion of Christ's address—was according to Matthew only now objected to him, in reply to what he had said. So much, however, we would learn from Luke, did we not perceive this also in Matthew from the thing itself, that those who demanded a sign were different persons from the blasphemers. They are not quite so bad as to reject all his signs as the decided work of the devil, but all that he had given hitherto, were not sufficient to prove that they were from God; they want to see another which goes still farther than these, to see a sign. As Luke rightly adds, and as in Matt. xvi. 1; John vi. 30, 31, the demand is repeated as a sign from heaven. Now, these words of wilful unbelief are not much better than the foregoing, and therefore Christ does not change his strain on account of them, but only makes them the occasion of carrying out the warning, which he had brought to the threshold of the judgment, to a complete prophetic threatening of the doom that was ready to break over the unbelieving generation. What the challengers meant by the "sign from heaven," we will leave to be explained at ch. xvi., and here, first of all, interpret the answer, which he there repeats to them with closer reference to the signs of the times then already present. He uttered this in the presence of all the people (Matt. verse 46; Luke τῶν ὄχλων ἐπαθροιζομένων, which only indicates a being together or a gathering together, not precisely a thronging towards him), and he includes the Pharisees in the whole race which was like them, and was expressing itself by them. He predicts Israel's destruction and judgment, which will break out, if this people, as a whole, persist in their unbelief, even after the last sign that is yet to be afforded them, and if they reject the testimony of the Spirit when the risen Son of Man is justified, and once more preaches to them repentance unto the forgiveness of sins by the apostles in his name. He announces this last and most perfect sign taken from the hell that had been vanquished, a sign which had all the value of one from above, and which indeed became such on the day of Pentecost (vers. 39, 40). Then, he announces the unbelief of the people under that preaching of the apostles, as in the present—the unbelief of Israel in their Messiah, which is condemned by the faith of the heathen who listened to a Jonah, and who even sought out a Solomon (vers. 41, 42). Consequently (vers. 43–45), the final and complete destruction, if after a previous casting out of Satan, his power shall again take possession of this people, and in a worse form.

* A writer in Tholuck's Anzeiger (1848, p. 311) has taken great offence at the expression "justifying words," and sees in it a want of "unity and exactness of dogmatical interpretation." As if this heresy against the exact terminology of dogmatics were not here only Christ's own expression!

Verses 39, 40. Israel is not merely an evil generation (which Luke alone has, as are also all heathen, but, as Matthew in both places significantly adds, an adulterous, which alludes to the special covenant of God with this people, which they had broken. Γενεὰ μοιχαλίς cannot denote here merely, or in the first place, a generation begotten by adultery, and is therefore wrongly compared with John viii. 41, but one which commits adultery; idolatrous in heart, with all their Pharisaical ornament on the outside, just as, in former times, in open idolatry (Hos. i. 2, ii. 2, 5). But already in this allusion to the adulterous children of the adulterous wife, as also in the γενεά, generation (which corresponds to the γεννήματα ἐχιδνῶν, verse 34), there certainly lies, at the same time, a reference to the sins of the fathers out of which the children are begotten in order to fill up its measure, and hence, also, an explanation of the final destruction, by the fearfully continuous progress of evil from generation to generation. The seed of adulterers is itself adulterous in the twofold sense of which we read in Isa. lvii. 3, and Wisd. iii. 16. iv. 6. They demanded signs of which they already had enough, from the desert onwards, where they tempted God, and put him to the test whether he would do this and that according to their lust; and just in the same way do they now act towards Christ. But, although the long-suffering of Christ continued to perform miracles until his hands were bound in Gethsemane, still, no signs of such a kind were given in answer to their request, but that last one which he had already at the beginning announced to them (John ii. 19) in answer to a like challenge, the sign of the prophet Jonas; and this, too, was to be in vain for them! For they who believed not Moses and the prophets, could not believe on Christ, even though he were to rise from the dead.

The explanation which Luke gives, verse 30, of the sign of Jonas, does not by any means contradict the one here given by Christ,* but is only an abridged an indefinite statement of what Matthew gives in detail in vers. 40 and 41; as well the similitude of the resurrection as the call to repentance. We could, indeed, scarcely understand the more obscure account of Luke without the assistance of Matthew, but we ought, therefore, with grateful docility, to receive what the Spirit has caused to be written for us, and not wilfully darken what is clear. The history of the Old Testament presents no more striking example of a wonderful preservation from certain death than that of the prophet Jonah; nay, it is singular in its kind, inasmuch as the prophet, although as it were shut up in death and buried, yet came forth again to life: therefore is this history recorded as a similitude and type of the resurrection of Christ, as, in the sphere of the type, a resurrection of one really dead was not yet possible. The expressions in the book of Jonah intimate plainly enough to him who reads aright, that the spirit of prophecy, even then, wrote them with reference to Christ. The prayer of Jonah (ch. ii.) was really uttered in the belly (Heb. מְמֵּעַי) of the fish (κήτος an indefinite expression in the Septuagint for דָּג גָּדוֹל, great fish); for the deliverance follows in verse 11, and to take this in the pluperfect, and understand at the beginning: Out of the belly, i. e., after he had been saved, and was out of it, would be too far-fetched. The whole prayer in his distress is certainly, at the same time, a thanksgiving, a confident expectation of help, with which the prophet, even from the bowels of the fish, sends up his cry to God's heaven and the light of life; but this is his faith, which was the speedy result of his finding that he miraculously remained alive within the fish, and that he could pray for help. The Spirit, in his record of the prayer (for in such histories, still more than in other places, the difference between the written and acted history holds good, so that we do not expect to find the bare actual occurrence literally in the word), views, in perfect accordance with the system that pervades all Scripture, the depths of the sea (בְּלֵב יַמִּים, ver. 4), as being the same with the abyss of the realm of the dead, where the floods of destruction, the waters of Belial drown; the belly of the monster is the belly of hell (בֶּטֶן שְׁאוֹל, verse 3). Thus from the prophetical text are derived the expressions of Christ in this place, with which he places the type there already indicated, completely in the light of fulfillment: the κοιλία, belly, corresponds, as to the מְעֵי הַדָּג, "bowels of the fish," so also at the same time to the בֶּטֶן שְׁאוֹל, "belly of hell," and the καρδία τῆς γῆς, heart of the earth, points back at once to the בְּלֵב יַמִּים, "midst of the seas," and to the הָאָרֶץ בְּרִיחֶיהָ בַּעֲדִי, "the earth with her bars was about me." If Christ meant to denote by these expressions nothing more than death and the grave, inasmuch as the body lay in the earth, then, not only would the heart, the centre of the earth, be too strong an expression for his sepulchre in the rock, besides its being not true that the Son of Man was himself so long in the earth—but what is chiefly to be objected to this is, that the word of fulfillment would thus remain behind the word of prophecy. No, he means—let a theology or dogmatism, which shuts its eyes to these things, say what it will to the contrary—his actual abode in the Sheol, the realm of the dead, beneath, and in the heart of, the earth,* or, to speak in dogmatic phraseology, the descent into hell, of which Eph. iv. 9 testifies. What the type could only shadow forth outwardly was, in its mysterious and essential significance, fulfilled in him who thus entered into the strong man's house to bind him there, who proved himself to be victorious over him in the highest power of the quickening Spirit of God, even when the leviathan appeared to have swallowed him up, and when it was said over the earth, The prophet is devoured, it is all over with him. "But thou hast brought forth my life from destruction, O Lord my God" (Jonah ii. 7).

* Which, according to Schleiermacher, is again "only a false interpretation of the reporter's own, which he has mixed up with the words of Christ," namely, on the supposition of its being a reminiscence already weakened and confused! Neander, unhappily, almost to the same effect says, that verse 40 is an entirely unsuitable, later addition, the sign of Jonas only representing the "manifestation of the Son of Man as a whole" in contradistinction to every single sign or miracle. That the resurrection was a sign only for believers, is against the whole Acts of the Apostles (from ch. ii. 32, 33 onwards), against Rom. i. 4, and all the apostolic preaching.

Three days and three nights—not longer, and then will the Son of Man come forth to life, as it happened with Jonah.* Then, just as Jonah preached to the Ninevites, a new preaching will begin, in which the risen Saviour will be a sign for repentance unto this generation, as Jonah, saved from the fish, was to the Ninevites. Then will he, who even now (a greater than Jonas is here!) displays himself to your eyes and ears as the true sign, the bread from heaven (John vi. 51), be, by the highest possible miracle which seals all that went before, offered to you as the bread of life; then will follow upon this sign from beneath, wrought upon the Son of Man by the power of God, the Pentecostal sign from heaven—for Daniel's vision of the glorification of the Son of Man begins from that time to be fulfilled (as Christ, Matt. xxvi. 64, in the depth of ignominy, announces by a "from this time forth"). All this, Christ sees and signifies in his words: those who heard him plainly understood so much, at least, as they afterwards came to show, namely, that he would rise again after three days; therefore they set a watch upon the grave until the third day† (Matt. xxvii. 63, 64).

Verses 41, 42. But the sign of Jonah, too, will be in vain! Christ speaks here, in continuation of the prophecy, by no means merely of the unbelief in his person then manifesting itself, as one might be led wrongly to suppose from the καὶ ἰδού, ὧδε, and behold, here. He only goes out from the present, taking it also into his view as he does by saying: Now already in my words and works, which prove that the kingdom of God is come more than Jonah or Solomon did (ver. 28; chap. xi. 12–15, 21–23). But he especially speaks of the last preaching of the Spirit after his resurrection, for he compares with it the preaching of

* Since microcosmically the heart of man actually corresponds with the innermost part of the earth, for which compare James iii. 6, and Prov. xxvii. 19, 20 (and if possible our interpretations of both passages).

* Although it is not without significance that, precisely on the third day, corruption in general begins to appear, we are yet certainly not at liberty with Hofmann (Weissagung u. Erfüllung, ii. 262) to make that alone the ground of Christ's words, which expressly refer to Jonas. Comp. also 1 Cor. xv. 4.

† The refutation of the trifling and presumptuous after-reckoning of the three days and nights belongs only to a note. In the Talm. Hieros. it is expressly said: "Day and night make together a space of time (עוֹנָה), and the part of such is as the whole." The Jews reckoned νυχθήμερα (2 Cor. xi. 25), and said, so many days and nights (Gen. vii. 11; Exod. xxiv. 18). (Compare Esth. iv. 16 with v. 1; 1 Sam. xxx. 12, 13; 2 Chron. x. 5–12; 1 Kings xx. 29.) Consequently, if Christ died at the end of the first day, and arose at the breaking of the third, there are three day-night periods, and he says here nothing else than in the other passages: "In three days, on the third day." According to König (Höllenfahrt, p. 197), Damascenus Studita has ingeniously reckoned, that Christ was thirty-three hours in hades as he was thirty-three years on the earth. This might really almost harmonize—better, at least, than the very summary combination of Oetinger, who speaks of forty hours in the grave answering to the forty days after the resurrection.

Jonah after his deliverance. As the Ninevites did not see the sign of the prophet with their eyes, but believed and repented upon his preaching (εἰς τὸ κήρυγμα, see Winer's Gramm., p. 338), so, and not otherwise, was the risen Son of Man, whom they no longer saw with their eyes, a sign to the Jews in the preaching of his Spirit by the apostles. That, moreover, the people of Nineveh may have known something of Jonah, from their expedition to Israel under Pul (2 Kings xv. 19, 20), and may have seen the fulfillment of his prophecy (2 Kings xiv. 25), at all events have heard from his own lips the wonderful history of his deliverance from the depths of hell—all this, although not declared in the narrative (Jon. iii.), may yet be pre-supposed as probable, from the great success which attended his preaching; it is intimated to some extent (ver. 5), in the words: Then they believed in God—which may indicate in general, it is true, the ground of all repentance (to which Christ here also points), but may mean, at the same time, the miracle of divine power before narrated. Be that as it may, the comparison which Christ here makes implies, that the sign of Jonas was not in vain for the Ninevites, but this generation will not, in like manner, receive unto repentance the preaching concerning the resurrection of the Son of Man, although powerfully attested by the Holy Spirit.*

Greater than Jonas! greater than Solomon! If such a comparison of the Lord from heaven, who is over all, with children of the earth, of the incomparable One with those who are altogether as nothing before him, and who in reality derive all that they have only from him, is, on the one hand, an expression of condescension and love, asking in sadness, Am I less than those, that you despise me so?—on the other, the propriety of the comparison is based on the divine consecration, which exalted Jonah and Solomon into types of Christ. When Christ, in his own history or in that of his kingdom, points to histories in the Old Testament with a like as (ch. xxiv. 37; John iii. 14), there, in every case, is a resemblance not arbitrary and only then superadded, but one already prepared in the type. As the typical explanation, Like as Jonas was in the fish's belly,† preceded the affirmation, A greater than Jonas is here!—so does the following comparison with Solomon pre-suppose an entirely "like as," i.e., in like manner, a typical reference to Christ of the person, power, wisdom, and glory of Solomon, of all that characterizes him as Solomon. If it was fit for Solomon to be placed in comparison with all the children of the east, with Egyptians, and with all heathen poets (1 Kings iv. 30, 31), so it is fit for Christ himself only to say: A greater than Solomon. Only in the sphere of sacred history, at least in types that but faintly shadow him forth, does he find his like, i.e., such as are worthy even of being mentioned side by side with him, with the words, Here is one greater! We find even in the Old Testament, in Nathan's prophecy, and in the Psalms founded upon it, how Solomon's reign of peace, his building the temple, his splendor, his marriage, point prophetically to the future; here, in addition to these, it is especially his wisdom that is spoken of, as Matt. xiii. 16 points back to 1 Kings x. 8. The queen of the South is not so much placed in antithesis as a woman to the Ninevites, (ἄνδρες Νινευῖται, which indeed is only אַנְשֵׁי נִינְוֵה), but, by way of climax, as one who came even from the ends of the earth, from the far coast of the foreign country that bounds the known world,* to seek out the anointed of the Lord who was so much renowned, while Jonas came to the Ninevites in their own country.

We may certainly, however, apply the words of Christ in the widest sense, and, taking into view all the renowned names of wise, and all the wonderful destinies of remarkable men, all the missions and preachings confirmed by signs of whatever kind, say: Here is a greater than any Jonas-miracle! Here is a greater than any Solomon of his nation and time! For the history of him who, by the suffering of death, was crowned with glory and honor, is the miracle of all miracles in the world's history for every one who asks a sign; the words of the Word are wisdom itself for all who inquire after wisdom and earnestly seek it. What then shall we say of the unbelieving generation of fools in Christendom, who esteem the fables of the heathen and the histories of the world's heroes more remarkable than the cross and the victory of Christ? who run after this or that ancient or modern "hero," or "classic," or "genius," and say: Here is one almost as great—or, again, Here is one really as great, or finally, Here is one greater than Christ! As the excellent Dannhauer on the text exclaims, in reference to his own time: "Carthusians and Flagellants shall stand up in the judgment against the philosophers of this day, and condemn them." What Christ said in chap. x. 15, and xi. 22–24, he here again says more strongly, from another point of view: As the Gentiles who, till then, remained impenitent, have a more tolerable judgment than Israel, so at least shall those who have repented, who sought, even from afar, the truth of God which appeared in the midst of Israel, condemn Israel by their example—in that great judgment in which all of every country and time shall appear together, and all the guilty, besides the protocol which they themselves have written, shall be confronted with all witnesses for their

* At all events Christ least of all intends to say what Lange strangely understands him as saying, viz., that the Messiah is come even as Jonas came—a stranger, a poor, unknown, nameless man, attesting himself solely by the power of his inner life! For he plainly speaks of something future.

† With which ὥσπερ ἦν — οὕτως ἔσται, moreover, the veritable reality of all that is recorded of the prophet, as corresponding to the real history of Christ, is maintained and proved.

* As already Homer called the Æthiopians "the farthest out among men."

conviction, whose conduct cries out with reference to them: Might you not also have done so, and even much more? The last sign of the Messiah, then, will not be that Israel shall judge the heathen, and rain fire and brimstone upon the Romans, but that the believing heathen world shall condemn Israel (chap. viii. 11, 12; xxi. 43; Rom. ii. 27). The Nineveh of this Jonah will be Rome, whose power bows before the sign of the cross, and Greece will seek and find in this Solomon the true wisdom. But as for this evil and adulterous generation—its latter end will be terrible and worse than any former destruction and judgment, as is now shown in verse 43 to verse 45. And why so? "Because thou hast not known the day of thy visitation!" (Luke xix. 44).

This transitional idea, which is only presupposed in Matthew's epitomized collection of Christ's discourses, is given in Luke xi. 33, 36, as having been also spoken by Christ; for these words in Luke stand plainly in close connection with what goes before, and are there, where several transpositions occur, to be introduced between vers. 23 and 24. They are again a repetition from the Sermon on the Mount (as at verse 33), and need no further interpretation here. We have only to observe the connection here, according to which, what is meant to be said is: The light of my preaching shines even now clearly enough, and after the sign of Jonas will be set still more clearly on the candlestick, although, the blindness whose light has become darkness, sees it not. Εἰς κρυπτήν, in a secret place, may be the Hebrew idiom for the neuter, or may mean really a crypt, a concealed passage or vault;* the sense remains the same. The ἀστραπή, bright shining, verse 36, is equivalent to φέγγος, light, before, purposely, however, expressed more strongly, in order to mark that the light does not struggle through with difficulty, but, victorious over the darkness, instantaneously illumines every thing. These words, spoken in a spirit of mingled sadness and kindness, and only hypothetically, of a complete illumination by the light† of God, now only conceived as an ideal, contrast all the more fearfully with the dark closing picture in Matthew, to which we must now turn.

Verses 43—45. The words are a parable, in which Christ (an evident proof of the unity of these discourses), turns back at the end to the beginning of his address; he takes the casting out of the devil from an individual demoniac as an illustration, in so far as he announces an aggravated return of the evil one. It thereby becomes worse with this man than it was before, and so will it be also with this generation! It is the same generation, of course, that was spoken of from verse 39 onwards, although besides (which shows the truth of the interpretation that refers the words only to it), the beginners in the faith (verse 23), may also take warning from such a threatening prophecy. Thou hast Beelzebub! said the masters in Israel to him. He has patiently refuted them, kindly warned them, sharply rebuked them; now, at the conclusion of his address, announcing the end of the people, he has come so far as to retort upon them: This evil generation is the great demoniac, in regard to whom all previous casting out will at last appear to have been vain. As before, at verse 29, mankind as a whole was represented as Satan's house and household, so now it is especially Israel, viewed collectively as his abode, and as having fallen anew by their own guilt. We will just examine the details of the parable, that we may then see more clearly its application.

The unclean spirit which dwells in the demoniac, as is supposed by way of parable, is still to be understood as one of the many subordinate demons, and not the prince of them himself (who, in Mark iii. 30, has the same general title). He is in reality gone out of the man, which pre-supposes an expulsion by the power of God.* Christ—we might say, with special design—accumulates in a few words strong and massive features, taken from the natural history of the devil, as it lay open before him, so that in all future time it might not be thought that he spoke only according to Jewish superstition, and that he drew the figure for representing world-historical realities from unreal representations, springing from human delusion! Indeed (as the excellent Stein on Luke here also admits), he glorifies his wisdom precisely in this, that he was able to graft the loftiest truths upon erroneous popular conceptions. The expelled spirit wanders about through dry places, districts without water, and therefore without human houses or inhabitants. Such waste places are the devils' dwelling place, when they are not in and among men; as we find not only in passages of the apocrypha, as Tob. viii. 3; Bar. iv. 35, but even in Rev. xviii. 2 (according to prophetic representations, Isa. xiii. 21, 22, xxxiv. 14), and as is here with full earnestness confirmed by Christ. The ejected devils abide willingly at least upon the earth, as they are still at liberty to do, and have a certain pleasure in all that is waste and desolate upon it, in ruined paradises and overthrown glory. Then impelled by inward pain he seeks rest, i. e., first of all, a temporary place of abode and settlement, in which Christ (to whose mind passages of Scripture are always immediately present, inasmuch as all his thoughts and knowledge as a man take their rise from the Holy Scriptures) has again evidently Isa. xxxiv. 14 in his eye.* But when the word of the prophecy, less distinctly expressing the meaning which lies under the figure, speaks of the finding of rest (מָצְאָה מָנוֹחַ, Sept. also ἀνάπαυσιν), Christ here, as it were, justifies and confirms the word, inasmuch as he goes on to say: And findeth it not. For how can a devil find rest, which the creature can find only in God? He has lost it for ever, he seeks it in vain, in all waste places, which otherwise please him; he seeks it especially in vain where God the Lord of creation will have his rest, and where, therefore, the devil also, if he can force an entrance, finds himself relatively most comfortable—namely, in man. Therefore, the desire soon returns upon him to look after his own more peculiar house. He declares his intention, ἐπιστρέψω, I will return, which he cannot long leave unexecuted, for he is always willing to return if only he can. As, in verse 29, it was Satan's house, as a whole, that was spoken of, in which individual men are the household furniture, so now the same expression is, with equal truth, applied internally to the individual; every man in a devil's power is his house. He impudently speaks of the house as his own from the first—he still knows all the secret passages in it, as in a stronghold which he had left, and speaks, like a true devil, as if he had only gone out of his own free will, not confessing that he was forced out. And when he thus comes, how does he find it in the case here supposed? Swept and garnished, as both Evangelists have it. But would not this be contrary to the nature of the unclean spirit, who likes to dwell only in the filth of sin? Alas! this garnishing, which is here meant, is to him filthy enough to be agreeable; for it is the outward garnishing of hypocrisy, it is a sweeping with the besom of Pharisaism which makes worse what was already evil (in proof of which compare Luke xi. 39, 40). In Matthew there is still the term σχολάζοντα, at leisure, ("empty"), affording a certain explanation of the other two words before which it stands, and which designedly includes at once the figure and its explanation; in the figure, empty, open for free access, in the explanation idle, left unguarded through indolence, security, hypocritical conceit, and thus in the best way prepared and adorned for the devil.† This is a discovery going beyond his expectation, and in which he will have his pleasure and labor not alone. Then, he goes away once more (not concerned lest such a house should meanwhile be lost to him), and takes as a reinforcement seven other devils who are worse than himself. This does not mean worse in respect of wickedness (nequiores, sceleratiores), for in this, indeed, there is no difference possible between devil and devil, but worse in their power to destroy, and in their consequent obstinacy (ch. xvii. 21). Stronger ones are meant, but, because from them greater evil (i. e. in the explanation, worse sin) follows for the poor man, Christ speaks of worse ones. The seven dwell there instead of the one, are no more driven out, and the relapse of him who was once healed is worse than the first illness.

* In this case to be written κρύπτην. Euthymius: ἀπόκρυφον οἰκίαν.

† On the sense of which, we have already expressed ourselves at Matt. vi. 22.

* It is by no means mere appearance that is here spoken of, as if the malady were overcome, as if by the healing of the demoniac damage were done also to the "principle of evil itself" in the man (as Neander understands it). Every casting out of the devil is an actual step towards improvement, and even in the application afterwards to the generation of this time, this holds perfectly true.

Who is this man? Christ explains his parable unasked. Such will be the last end of this evil generation! Consequently, the end of the story here narrated will be realized in the then existing last generation of Israel, which fills up the measure of guilt, and draws down judgment upon itself. We know now how it happened. But inasmuch as Christ has put the ἔσχατα, last, in opposition to the πρώτοις, first, and begun the parable with the actual casting out of the one, first devil, we observe, at the same time, that he takes into one view the collective history of this entire people, from the fathers downward. What was their first devil? It was rude heathenish idolatry. This God truly cast out by the Babylonian exile; which certainly was in itself something good, it was a result obtained for the time. But soon again in indolent security they adorned the house which was mistakenly supposed to have been cleansed for all coming time. And, the more their pride recoiled from idols, with so much the more corruption and inward idolatry must they commit sacrilege in the true sanctuary (Rom. ii 22); in Pharisaism there grew up a γενεὰ μοιχαλίς, adulterous generation, which went a whoring after idols worse than the former. The seven devils were not merely on their way, they were already come when Christ spoke; still he speaks prophetically (ἔσται), because he has in view the last manifestation of this state, the outbreak of the destruction which awaited the people in judgment. Nor is it to be overlooked, what Von Meyer in his striking note here says, that as another application of this many-sided parable, the ineffectual casting out which is followed only by a worse relapse, means, at the same time, the coming in of the kingdom of Christ (ver. 28). The manifold good, both in the sphere of knowledge and of will, which was actually called forth by the labors of Christ for a time, might once more have effected a thorough cleansing of the people, but this also was in vain. In the period between the ascension of Christ and the destruction of Jerusalem, especially towards the end of it, this nation shows itself, one might say, as if possessed by seven thousand devils. It is judged, destroyed, blinded; its judgment is the great type of history for the last judgment of the whole world, and in its present blindness it must, even as the people of God, without knowing or willing it, serve at least as a warning and prophetic parable to the world.

* Moreover, a perplexing proof for those who too hastily throw many things among the Jewish fables, that by the צִיִּים and אִיִּים שָׂעִיר, and לִילִית, hellish spirits are actually indicated, though not the Rabbinical Lilith.

† Braune, here falsely understanding it in the good sense of preparedness for receiving the Holy Ghost, entirely mistakes the irony of the expression (Stud. u. Krit. 1847, ii. 390). It is truly not the beginning of regeneration that is here spoken of, in which Satan might yet again find room for working, but it is the offence of the hypocrite in false security.

For we find that the same holds good of Christendom, of those who are outwardly called taken collectively. The apostolical age is followed by the setting up of the golden calf in the Romish Church; even idolatry properly so called breaks out on every side. The return from the exile corresponds in part to the Reformation; nor have we far to look for the Pharisaism of Lutheranism. At present, indeed, every thing is more complicated, more spiritual, and on a scale of more complete development, still the ground-features remain the same, although Pharisees and Sadducees, on this side and on that, in many ways change places in and outside of the still remaining faith of the letter. Enough, that "in the midst of all the culture that exists," with all the sweeping and garnishing of the house by art, science, illumination, industry, and speculation, there is already something worse at the bottom than a mere Laodicean σχολάζειν, or vacancy. How one who has been cleansed only with the besom of an outward reformation, who is only outwardly civilized, is not safe from coarse excesses, as a savage, outwardly broken in, may yet easily fall back into wildness, and the nature which was washed only on the outside revenge itself all the more violently and filthily—the first revolution in the land of civilization has begun practically to show; and as an additional impending proof of the theory, Germany, also more spiritual in its sins, as the kernel of Christian nations, begins in like manner to develop itself.* What will it be when the ἔσχατα, or end comes, the last unbelief of completed antichristianity, the Man of Sin!

Finally, this grandly prophetic parable finds always its true application also in the individual, with whom the same may and must take place, if, after a first cure and conversion he becomes σχολάζων for the returning devil. Every relapse brings a worse state (John v. 14); but the complete relapse of the regenerated person (which the relapse of Israel and of Christendom shadow forth as a whole, just as they are really exemplified in many an individual, and of which Christ here speaks generally according to the innermost kernel of the word), such a relapse makes the destruction irreparable, it makes the person ripe for judgment, and is another, nay, the most fearful expression of that unparadonable sin spoken of above. Hence the apostle in 2 Peter ii. 20–22 plainly refers to this parable of Christ. Οὕτως ἔσται, so shall it be—the Saviour, as judge, has declared respecting his whole nation, and it has been fulfilled before the eyes of the world. A still more awful οὕτως ἔσται remains literally as the ἔσχατον, or in this, and the future world, respecting the evil generation, most properly so called, of the lost, whose destruction and judgment are prophetically attested by all the fearfully ending catastrophes of the men and generations of the Old and New Testament people of God in the world's history, as parables which already, more or less, carry their truth in themselves.

CHRIST'S MOTHER AND BRETHREN.

(Matt. xii. 48–50; Mark iii. 33–35; Luke viii. 21.)

Again, a contrast similar to chap. xi. 23–28. Often as the future Judge must cast down to hell by his word of truth, his Saviour's heart can yet never forget that he is come into the world not to judge, but to save. A gracious word coming immediately after the fearful denunciation against the seed of Abraham, which had become a generation of vipers; an expression of the deepest, tenderest feeling of love, which was still in his heart even when he spoke words of anger, and which was called forth by an intimation that was made to him; a word also for us, which is more to be felt than understood.

He had brought his address to the people towards its close; would he have been silent then, or what more would he have said? He is interrupted by the intimation, that his mother and brethren had already been standing a long time before the house, inquiring after him, endeavoring to come to him in order to say something to him. We should never have thought of conjecturing what this was, did we not read it with astonishment in Mark (whose account we must regard as parallel, in opposition to Ebrard's harmony which is not always correct). Surrounded by the throng of people, he had found neither time nor space for eating, and carried along by holy zeal, he had spoken without rest—the Evangelists giving only the substance of what he had said. His kinsfolk† become apprehensive about him, especially the unbelieving brothers, who probably had not yet desisted from going about with the humble first-born, as they were wont to do in Nazareth, who, again at a later period (John vii. 3), are represented as giving him advice, and who here, most naturally, from the human point of view, are for exercising their right as brothers, and even their mother stands, on this occasion at least, passively on their side. They will stop him, seize him (κρατῆσαι αὐτόν), for they think and say: ὅτι ἐξέστη, he is beside himself. Let us interpret this as gently as we may, it remains a strong word:* He does too much, forgets all moderation (2 Cor. v. 13), exerts himself beyond his power, and beyond what is proper; certainly equivalent to He is beside himself, out of his senses, knows not what he is doing, so that we have to interfere! Mark brings it expressly in connection with the words of the Scribes: He has Beelzebub! in order to show us at one glance all that happened from friends and foes to Christ, who remains ever the same, and whom neither devilish blasphemy, nor the false love of men, was able to move. Perhaps he will even indicate that the friends of Christ heard the fearful word, and, at least, in a milder sense, applied it to him. But it is altogether contrary to the text (Mark ver. 22) to suppose, that the Pharisees also (on account of the many paradoxes which Christ uttered) had merely meant to say, and to spread abroad that he was out of his senses, crack-brained, not quite wise. "Possessed of a devil," and "out of his senses" are two very different things.† Christ was certainly in an unusual frame of awakened zeal, but he was quite himself, he was fulfilling his work and office, viz: to speak the word of God to all who would, and should hear him, and so to speak as it was needful for them, for instruction, warning, and judgment. (What is recorded in Luke xi. 27, 28, also took place meanwhile.) His zeal had just carried him to the point of opening up a look into the fearful depths of destruction, from which he would willingly save those who are yet willing to hear and believe, when his mother and brethren according to the flesh, came in his way, and as his spirit in the ἔκστασις—which yet in reality was no ἔκστασις—well perceives, with a carnal request. What else can he feel and think, and therefore say, than what we read in Matt. and Mark. Away, perverse generation! Away, mother and brethren! I speak as long as I can for those who have ears to hear; for this am I sent, and I know that I do not speak in vain: here are those who hear me—these are my brethren, my sisters, and mother!

* This was in the year 1844—what will the reader now say to it?

† For this must at all events be the meaning of οἱ παρ' αὐτοῦ, Mark ver. 21, because ver. 31 again takes up the discourse with οὖν. Mark iv 10, οἱ περὶ αὐτόν is something quite different.

Thus faithfully speaks and acts the true High Priest himself, according to the word of Moses (Deut. xxxiii. 9, 10), which he wishes to be realized in his followers; and thus does he set before us the brightest example how we should conduct ourselves in reference to those family importunities which would often so dangerously depress the spirit. Raised above all concern about its seeming disregard of filial duty and brotherly love, as if, in his prophetical and Messianic dignity, he was even ashamed of his humble relations (for only malice could thus interpret his words), he now repeats, evidently more strongly, what he had already said at Cana, inasmuch as the improper interference was here repeated in a stronger form. But the first sharply repelling word is immediately followed by one of unspeakable kindness, in which the mother and brothers are again embraced, according to which also the brothers, as soon as they believe on him, and become disciples of their brother, are then truly his brothers. Thus to shame them, and draw them to himself, belongs to the aim of his zeal, which is always lovingly wise, and considerate even in its most rapid expressions.* He extends the gracious hand of blessing and protection over his disciples, just as if some one would take them from him; he turns a kind look of love towards all who sat around him (others, therefore, besides the apostles or his outwardly decided followers, but not those also who were now standing in a hostile attitude towards him, all, in short, whose quiet sitting around the master indicated that they were μαθηταί, who would learn and hear), and affectionately exclaims—Behold my mother and my brethren!

This is a precious word from the heart of the First-born. It means first of all simply: I love them as much as my mother and brethren (in which, at the same time, the natural affection of a son and brother, which was seemingly disowned becomes again apparent), nay, more than those who are such after the flesh, inasmuch as they are such in a truer sense. There lies in this certainly, as coming from the Son of Man still dwelling on earth, something of that humility which Timothy needed to be recommended to practice (1 Tim. v. 2), so that he should be able to say of the aged women: Behold I speak to them as to mothers! But it has a deeper meaning, and expresses the actual spiritual relationship, above all of a carnal kind, for which Christ would prepare, and to which he would elevate his people, which he already sees in the weak beginners, and makes them brethren, inasmuch as he calls them so (Heb. ii. 11, 12). But are we to take in this sense not merely

* Schleirmacher thought that this addition by Mark must always seem strange even when understood in the mildest possible sense—and therefore assigned it a place among those "accumulations and exaggerations which are so frequent in Mark."

† But to speak of ecstacy in Christ, as Sepp foolishly does, is folly; he was removed above ecstacy, though not above strong emotion.

* He answers in the first place, indeed, the person who had addressed him, and perhaps gladly so, in order thereby at length to put a stop to his severe discourse—but not this person alone. Such sayings were retained and repeated to every one whom they concerned, here certainly in a short time to the kinsfolk of Christ—and this Christ knew when he spoke the words.

brothers and sisters, but also mother, as it stands at the beginning, and again with the highest emphasis at the end of the address? By all means. Zinzendorf's naive circumlocution: "I reflect that I was a child, their race is my mother"—belongs here quite to the surface. Whoever receives him, has in heart conceived and borne him, is himself a Mary, as also Mary only thereby became and continues to be his mother (Luke xi. 28). The congregation of all the brethren (see also Psa. xxii. 22), is collectively the true Mary,* a presentiment of which profound truth forms the concealed ground of the shocking Mariolatry of that church which exalts itself above Christ.

But a dear friend whom I will not here name, has very far forgot himself when, in a sermon he makes Christ say: They are to me as father and mother! This he could not say. Where in the Scripture, after Luke ii. 49, does Christ speak of any other father or mother than the one whom he here also names, his Father in heaven? The mystery of his miraculous conception is in all his words plainly attested, even although there had been no account of it, no dogma concerning it. Brother, sister, and mother: these words express the compass and limits of the relationship of the Son of God and Man with the human race.* This relationship has already been laid open to the whole race by his birth in the flesh, already involved in the grace afforded to all; but it is only truly completed in every one who does the will of God (Mark), the will of his Father in heaven. This means in its completion, the utmost demands of the law laid down in Matt. vii. 21; in its beginning, however, so as kindly to draw to higher attainments, not more than is expressed in John vi. 40. Those who hear God's word in faith are to do it, and shall do it (Luke viii. 21); the hearing and learning receives and already has in itself all the grace necessary for keeping it (Luke xi. 28). With a kindness that hastens to meet its object, Christ already adjudging and appropriating, promises every thing to the good beginning, which, alas, is so often not a going onward to the end (Rom. viii. 29). On the other side—for this, as always, is the other side of the judging word of grace—he who does not hear and do, Christ knows him not, even though after the flesh he were born of his mother, nay, were his mother herself!

* As already in Isa. vii. 14, the Old Testament Church, David's house and Zion, the Virgin whose faith at last conceives him in Mary. See Hofmann, Weissagung und Erfüllung, i. 222: and compare Micah iv. 10, v. 2.

* By the way, this connection of the brothers and sisters with the mother in the mouth of Christ, frequently in the Gospel history, is at the same time the decisive proof that the "brethren" were actually children of his mother (Psa. lxix. 9). Yet not the sole proof. The sainted Von Meyer, unconvinced indeed with many to the last, asked me, "Why is it not said, the mother of Christ and her children, sons," and how could relations be otherwise named in the original languages than "brethren?" But the answer is easy. Christ remains the centre of all relation and designation. His mother, His brethren. Relations must, at least in Luke and John, be called ἀνεψιοί or such like. See my introduction to the epistle of Jude.

THE SEVEN PARABLES.

(MATT. XIII.)

The Evangelist opens up to us here, just as in the Sermon on the Mount, a scene in the teaching and preaching of Christ evidently complete in itself, and quite remarkable in its kind. On the same day on which what is narrated in the preceding chapter took place, Christ goes out of the house (chap. xii. 46), and sets himself by the sea-side, probably to seek rest and refreshment. But the ὄχλοι πολλοί, great multitudes, gather around him anew, and in order to escape from this new throng he enters into the ship (usually kept in readiness for him by Peter or others), and because the people remain standing on the shore, he immediately, without resting, begins again to speak to them. So much has he to say to the world and to judge of it (John viii. 26), and from his exhaustless treasure to bring forth things new and old (afterwards, ver. 52). He has just been speaking parables, and in parables he begins anew to teach, in calmly instructive parables, such as correspond to his frame of mind at that time, seeking rest in vain, whereby, at the same time, he composes his own soul to the survey of his whole office and kingdom, after the sharply judging prophecies in chap. xii.

Already does the plural ἐν παραβολαῖς, in parables, lead us to expect more than one parable as spoken at that time. When, after certain intermediate words, narrated by Matthew, addressed to his disciples, (showing why he spoke to the people in parables), and after the explanation of the first parable, we read (ver. 24), that he addressed another parable to them—this certainly means that it was on the same day (ver. 3). Consequently vers. 31 and 33 are connected in the same way with ver. 3; and ver. 34, therefore coincides again with vers. 3 and 10, ταῦτα πάντα ἐλάλησεν, all these things spake he. If now, ver. 36, Christ having returned to the house, explains the second parable to the disciples, and the Evangelist, without any mark of separation, connects with these words a three times repeated πάλιν ὁμοία, again—is like (just as before at ver. 18, he connects the first explanation with the first question concerning his reason in general for speaking in parables), if next occurs a question whether they had understood all these things (again, as at ver. 34), and finally, ver. 53 (just as at chap. vii. 28) closes the whole with: ὅτε ἐτέλεσεν τὰς παραβολὰς ταύτας, "when he had finished these parables"—it is impossible with all this before us, otherwise to read and to understand the writer, than that Christ, on one and the same day, on which many other things had occurred, consequently in pretty quick succession, spoke the seven parables, the first four outside on the sea to the people, the last three in the house to the disciples. With this agrees Mark iv. (see especially ver. 2)—although all the parables are not there given, while another is narrated which Matthew has not, showing that Christ indeed spoke many things on that day, from which Matthew selects the seven parables that contained the real plan and order of his teaching at that time. With this Luke viii. likewise agrees, although there only the first parable is recorded. Luke xiii. 18–21 might indeed be an insertion, without regard to time, of what was said on that day, but it may quite as well indicate a repetition of that parable at another time. At all events, there is not the slightest reason for going against the decisive words of Matthew, of which, in order not to break the Scripture, we cannot possible make up our minds to say, in spite of their savoring so much of the letter, that "not much value is to be attached to them." If harmonies cannot reconcile other passages with this, we must still go out from the firm data given in Matthew, verses 3, 10, 24, 31, 33, 34, 36, 51, 53, and judge of other passages according to these.*

The scene in Matthew is also complete in itself, in so far as the surrounding objects furnish the material of the parables. Christ, looking from the ship, saw before him the fields and lands—these are naturally taken to represent the people standing upon them. Seed—this continues to be the ground-material, variously applied, of the first four parables, for as, on the one hand, the leaven stands closely related to the farther history of the ripened fruit, so, on the other hand, it represents in itself the penetrating, renovating power of the wonderful seed. Another quite similar application takes place in the first of the three esoteric parables of ver. 44 (which, in general, go deeper than the others), since just as the seed was viewed as a leaven, so it may also be viewed as a treasure committed to the earth and concealed in it. Now, however, the spiritualized idea becomes quite detached from this range of figures so manifoldly applied; when the transition is made from the treasure in general to the precious pearl, we can hardly fail (seeing that pearls are fished from the sea, and at that time, especially from the Arabian Gulf), to note that Christ in this parable returns to the place from which he speaks, as in the concluding parable of the net, it is made to connect in the closest manner with the ship of his fishers of men.* Thus, between the shore and the sea (vers. 1, 2), the circle of figures is formed, in which, as we shall soon see in the interpretation, each succeeding parable connects itself with the foregoing as a further development of it.†

As, notwithstanding all the profoundness of meaning which belongs to the figurative language taken from the operations of God in nature to represent the kingdom of God, the single parable can yet never present every side of the subject with perfect fitness, but must leave out of view other sides of it which do not enter into the tertium comparationis, so it was most consistent with the wisdom of Christ to deliver his instructions here by means of several parables supplementing each other, thus to awaken and exercise the understanding for parables, and to place the many-sidedness of the truth in opposition to the one-sided misunderstanding of it. But this is not all. By turning the significance of the figures from one side of the subject to another, his words have a prophetic import as he advances into the signified "mysteries of the kingdom of heaven," and this remarkable cycle of parables has in it an organic progress internally developing itself in the same way as the Sermon on the Mount in its kind. Here, as there, if we first of all attend to the final points, we have the first establishment and the final separation of the church of Christ, the beginning of preaching and the last judgment in the first and last parables; between these the line of connection will have to be drawn—we conjecture it and find it too. But it is not (and Bengel is here at fault) the reference to consecutive periods in the history of the Church, that forms the principal thread on which we are to lay hold; for Christ will here, in the first instance, not prophesy but teach. The prophecy must, from

* It belongs not to our work to refute the confusion in Ebrard's note, p. 371. This arises first of all, from his understanding Mark ver. 33, as a parenthetical (?) remark, and then also from his reading Matt. vers. 53 and 54, in an unwarrantably strict connection.

* As already in my Andeutungen für gläubiges Schriftverständniss ("Hints for the believing Understanding of the Scripture," I. Collection, p. 46 ss.), I expressed myself in almost the same terms on the connection and sequence of the seven parables; in which also are additional remarks on the designed and instructive change of figures according to which seed and field, birds, leaven, appear with different interpretations.

† Which transitions might be still more plainly effected through the medium of subordinate parables, one of which Mark gives; this, indeed, may have been the only one of this kind; who knows of any other like it?

the nature of the case, appear as a result in the back-ground, in so far as the history of the Church is nothing else than the doctrine of the Church gradually developing itself—its own manifestation. We understand, therefore, the order of the thought on a survey of these parables (which, indeed, only the interpretation of the particulars can make quite clear), to be what will be presently stated, and we are not afraid of being charged by those that really understand the case with any artificial refinement.

The objection, moreover, urged for example also by Neander, that so many parables following each other could only have the effect of distracting the minds of the hearers by an over-fulness of matter, and was therefore not in accordance with Christ's method of teaching,* appears to us to have little weight, especially when we consider that all the seven parables were not spoken to the people, and that intervals of time for reflection are marked.

The four parables to the people, and the three that follow, addressed to the disciples, are one, and yet different. The first speaks more exoterically of the outward form and development of the kingdom as a whole; their fundamental twofold idea is, in its unity, sowing and harvest. This divides itself again into two propositions, to which the two connected larger parables and the two smaller correspond; the seed of the word brings forth fruit only in a few, yet such seed will develop itself to a full harvest. The first parable about the different kinds of ground expresses the first proposition as a now existing fact; the first thing is, that the whole field is sown, and the springing of this seed is the beginning of the Church. The representation—which goes out from the preaching that had just been addressed to the people, according to which the parable, as it were, describes and explains itself—is still to be understood quite outwardly: So it happens—the ground of this not yet being given. Not merely the complete unfruitfulness, but also the seeming growth of the seed for a longer or a shorter time, so that it becomes manifest only at a later stage that there is to be no harvest, consequently the uncertain mixture of the seed before the eyes of men, is already indicated. This will now awaken and draw out the question, Whence comes this condition of the land, and to what will this state and course of things lead? The twofold answer is given in the second parable, which thereby also makes an advance, in respect of time, to the approaching, continuing, and increasing mixture in the Church. The continuance of the kingdom, after the Son of Man has sowed the seed, is certainly therein presupposed. But as the question, Whence are the tares? pointing back, includes in itself, at the same time, a previous one, viz., Whence is it that all the land is not good?—so, too, does the answer, The enemy has done this! conceal within itself, at the same time, a reference to the first and foremost sowing of tares in God's field. This parable, likewise, already points forward to the separation necessarily coincident with the harvest, and denotes therefore the reason and aim of what the first parable had laid down merely as a fact.

From the conclusion results quite naturally the second principal glance at the full harvest to which, notwithstanding, the corn is to be developed. As before, the individual person was represented first as the ground, then as the seed itself, so now, by a new turn of the figure, the entire kingdom, the entire company of the children of the kingdom, is compared to the single seed-corn. The small seed-corn grows or develops itself (verse 32 takes up verse 30, according to the ground-idea of the preceding parable in Mark), by virtue of the life-power inherent in it as seed. This wonderful seed, however, is at the same time like leaven (bearing within it from the first the nature of the last product), which leavens the ground itself, changes it to corn and fruit according to its kind; it penetrates that into which it is put, or spreads itself out by virtue of the quickening power inherent in it. Mustard seed and leaven then represent the development and spread of the Church upon earth, which no mixture can hinder. Here, it will be observed, an advance is made toward the deeper internal truth, thus preparing the way for the three esoteric parables, although, in the first place, the reference is still mainly to the external history, as will be found. Each parable belongs to every time; but the first may be referred chiefly to the time of Christ and the apostles (the sowing), the second to the period after the departure of the apostles (when the tares, properly speaking, appear), the third finds a preliminary fulfillment under Constantine, the fourth, in the leavening of the popular life through the influence of the Catholic Church. Thus we have presented here a general survey of the history of the kingdom, as we might truly say (according to Eph. iii. 18), in the breadth of the seed scattering itself over the field of the world (fore-shadowed, at least, by the preaching of the apostles), in the length of the time of growing till the end of the harvest, in the height of imperial power which represents itself (at least outwardly already as heavenly) in the edifice of the Church overshadowing all kingdoms and nations, finally, in the depth to which every thing susceptible is penetrated by the new, leavening, and salting life.

But precisely in this depth is implied the truth which belongs to the esoteric doctrine for the disciples, that it is not properly in the Chuch at large as such that the kingdom of heaven forms and completes itself, but in each individual. The outward history of the Church, as a whole, is itself again only a type and parable setting forth this truth, as was already hinted at, vers. 32, 33. This is the characteristic distinction of the last three parables whose ground-idea, with special reference to the individual righteous ones who are at a future time to be separated from the rest, is now rather the necessity of renunciation and trial; this is the true seed for the true harvest in the heart of man. This points at the same time, to a still later period in the history of the Church, when, after the outward spread over, and internal mingling with kingdoms and peoples, the self-denying struggle and victory of the Church, which is to be proved to be true, is more properly called forth; it points to the second principal period, the character of which is this spiritual development from within, as, in the first, it was the unfolding of the Christian principle. Again, the kingdom of heaven is like—that is as much as to say: Farther on—the nearer it approaches to the harvest and the separation—it will be like. The treasure in the field, and the pearl are again closely related, and yet different, just as the mustard-seed and the leaven. Both speak of the renunciation of every thing else for the one thing (necessary from the first, but, in this future state of things, evermore necessary). The treasure in the field represents it as a thing hid, no longer known to the possessor of the field, which, however, by virtue of newly-revealed grace, may be found even by those who do not seek it; the pearl, on the other hand, represents it as a thing precious beyond every thing else, which is entirely overlooked, and is obtained only by those who come to know it, and who seek it aright. In the first parable, therefore, the treasure stands first as a thing present, and then comes the man who finds it; the other begins with the merchant who seeks pearls. If the Reformation may be taken to denote the turning point of the two periods in the history of the Church before named, then the most striking application would be, that the treasure hid in the field was then found anew, the treasure of the word, and, therewith, of the true Church, which has its life from and in the word, as Luther found the Bible in the cloister, and in addition to this the mystic theology. In the period of the final falling away, however, which is now near at hand, if we are not already living in it, it will concern true seekers, such at least as are dissatisfied with all the false tinsel wares of the market, and inferior goods, to find out the one true possession that lies ever hid and unknown among all sorts of merchandize, and then—giving up all for it—to buy it.

* So, too, Schneckenburger thinks: but we should have to take from Jesus the promise of being a wise teacher, if he had thus overburdened the people at once.

Finally, the last parable speaks of the separation and trial at the end, as was already pre-intimated in the second; it forms, however, at the same time a complete conclusion to the series of parables, and points back again to the beginning. If all the previous figures which followed each other (seed, leaven, treasure, pearl) were not yet developed from each other, we have here at last the transition, for which the way was already prepared by the pearl, from the parables of the shore and the land to the parable of the sea. The sowing, from which the whole series started, appears here as a catching. Thus the net is again, in the first place, the preached word, just as the seed,* but it is the word in so far as it founds a Church (the sowing makes a field to be the ground of the sower)—in so far as it unites individuals in a fellowship founded on the word and its effects, although it should be a merely outward fellowship, of which no account is taken at the last. Consequently it is the outward mixed Church itself, for the contents of which the separation draws near. If Christ began with himself as the first true sower, he here comprehends his apostles within his view, in whom he sees all his future fishers of men, and workmen in his kingdom, whose net will bring together fish of every kind until the angels make the separation.

Let any one now say whether, in this cursory survey, we have arbitrarily put all this into the seven parables, or whether it proceeds from the Evangelist having of himself brought together and arranged them with a view to this, or whether, which is the only thing that remains conceivable for us, Christ himself did originally speak, at one time, and in this profound connection, all these things, these parables.

WHEREFORE IN PARABLES?

(Matt. xiii. 11–17; Mark 11, 12, 21–25; Luke viii. 10, 16–18.)

These statements of Christ to his disciples about his speaking in parables, we think it right to place together, ere we proceed to the uninterrupted exposition of the parables themselves. The question of the disciples (verse 10) plainly shows, that his addressing the people thus publicly and at greater length, without any proper explanation, in nothing but finished parables (ver. 34), was something new and strange to them. The beginning of this mode of address denotes, further, a later development of his relations to the people, as, according to Mark xii. 1, at a still later period Christ began to speak also to the Scribes and Pharisees almost solely by parables. The right understanding of what Christ here says to his disciples will show the impossibility of supposing that this significant beginning of the enigmatic mode of address, which was designed as a judgment upon hardened hearers, belongs to an earlier period before the Sermon on the Mount.† "Why speakest thou unto them in

* For in all parables, as Roos observes, Christ ever tells us to look back from the great thing set before us to the beginning of it (which, in like manner, goes on re-producing itself, through all times).

† As the excellent and well-meaning Ebrard, after a criticism too hastily completed, carries back to so early a period his otherwise well connected "Syndesma G.," which also contains the parables, solely on account of the "calling of Matthew," parables?" The plural form further implies, that Matthew here inserts proleptically what properly took place after several parables had been spoken, therefore after vers. 24–30. Yet not after he had returned to the house (verse 36); for Mark informs us after ver. 2, ἐν παραβολαῖς πολλά, many things in parables, had gone before, then at ver. 10, that this esoteric intermediate address took place during a pause, when the people, satisfied for the time with a διδαχῇ, or teaching, which they had desired, withdrew, and left him again for awhile alone or at rest. (This ἐγένετο καταμόνας of Mark, with which Luke ix. 18 is to be compared, is by no means the same as the ἦλθεν εἰς τὴν οἰκίαν of Matthew, for we find in Mark afterwards a twice repeated καὶ ἔλεγεν, vers. 26–30, to which ver. 33 belongs.) This, however, we may yet learn chiefly from Mark, that the μαθηταί who put the question were not merely the twelve, but, along with them οἱ περὶ αὐτόν, others, followers who stood near to hear him and were inquiring after salvation; this remark we shall find to be necessary in order not to misunderstand the opposition between the two classes of individuals of whom he speaks. "Why speakest thou to the people there without as we have not been accustomed to hear thee, addressing to them no plain word, but speaking of ground, rock, and thorns, and such like things, of which we can see well enough that they are parables, but nothing further? The people cannot surely understand them, since we as yet understand them quite as little!" To so welcome a question addressed to him in so friendly a spirit Christ willingly replies, and it might be said that the answer which he gives, only develops, properly speaking, the sense of that call which he had just addressed to the people: He that hath ears to hear let him hear! (ver. 9), as vers. 16 and 17 show. The leading idea is: Because they (i.e., the greater number at least) have no longer hearing ears and understanding hearts to receive the plain and open word, therefore I hide it from them, if haply they might thus be stirred up to give heed to it; consequently, to awaken as much as possible every ear that yet hears, and as a deserved judgment on all who are thus dismissed!* Christ must certainly, for a considerable time, have spoken in such a directly instructive manner, enlivened indeed with מְשָׁלִים, or parables, but still for the most part plainly as we find in the Sermon on the Mount, before he could pronounce such a judicial sentence as we find here upon the unsusceptible multitude, and could turn to parables because of their deaf ears.

Verse 11. The mysteries of the kingdom of heaven (for which only Mark less precisely has —The mystery)—fit title and most general explanation of all the parables of Christ, and especially of those now before us. The kingdom of heaven is itself a mystery for the natural earthly understanding, and, like earthly kingdoms, it has its state secrets which cannot, and ought not, be cast before every one. When, on a frank and friendly approach being made, no feeling of loyalty shows itself, but rather a threatening of rebellion (and such on the whole had evidently now come to be the state of the people since the preaching of the Baptist, and such addresses of Christ as we find in the Sermon on the Mount), then it is wise and reasonable to draw a vail, which, however, is willingly removed whenever any faithful one wishes to join himself more nearly to the King. Here belongs the citation of Matt. ver. 35, the word of the Lord by the prophet Asaph (2 Chron. xxix. 30) in the 78th Psalm. It is altogether wrong, as even Matthew shows by his formula citandi, to say that Asaph himself in that place speaks in his own person; the עַמִּי and תּוֹרָתִי, my people and my law, alike strongly testify against this; comp. ver. 5, and in the other Psalms of Asaph, l. 7, lxxxi. 9, 12, 14. God himself, by the prophet, explains the events which belonged to the history of his people as an unwritten תּוֹרָה, or law, and their נִפְלָאוֹת, or wonderful acts as parables and enigmas. Matthew, then, with the deepest insight will here show that Christ now spoke to the people not otherwise than he had done from the beginning, that the language of God the king of Israel remained the same even after this manifestation in the flesh.† The κεκρυμμένα ἀπὸ καταβολῆς κόσμου, things hidden from the foundation of the world (חִידוֹת מִנֵּי קֶדֶם), are the secrets of his eternal counsel, already express-which must, he says, have taken place before the Sermon on the Mount. Here there is one internal reason against another, nay more than one against this single reason, and (as has been said at Matt. ix. 9), we can much more easily imagine another sense for that conclusive call, "Follow me!" than comprehend how Christ, in the severe address given in chap. xiii., could, even at the beginning, declare that the people were deaf, and then, notwithstanding, could address to them the Sermon on the Mount. A new proof, that without the most thorough exegesis of the discourses of Christ, the harmony must ever be liable to errors. Could then the enmity and impudence of the Pharisees have already been developed even to the extent of charging Christ with being in league with Beelzebub, before the Sermon on the Mount, or rather, could this latter have been spoken at so late a period, certainly in contradiction to its entire nature and significance? Alford, too, says quite rightly: The natural succession of things is against those who, as Ebrard, would place all this before the Sermon on the Mount.

* Both are meant in and with each other. Roos well says. This condescension to which the Saviour was, as it were, constrained to stoop, was mingled with his holy anger. Again Von Gerlach: "A parable is like the pillar of cloud and fire, which turned the dark side to the Egyptians, the bright side to the people of the covenant; it is like a shell which keeps the precious kernel as well for the diligent as from the indolent."

†This more at large in my "Seventy selected Psalms," i. p. 104, and following.

ed by the Creator in the sign-language of nature and the creature; while these divine utterances in parables constitute in Israel a new circle of figures, touching more closely on sin and redemption. Here in the first seven principal parables they are drawn chiefly from nature, in which the figures are already given as expressions of the hidden truth (not arbitrarily used for this purpose); in his later parables (as already here at the same time) he draws them more and more from Israel's prophetic circle of types, when he opens his mouth as well to reveal as to hide, in figures of inexhaustible meaning, the depths of the plan of his kingdom. The heavenly sowing on earthly ground, the outgoing of all efficacy from the word, the conflict of the eternal will of love with the creature freedom, the thorns of the lost paradise beside and among the new seed, the power and the cunning of the enemy, the patience of the householder till the harvest, on account of which in the long intervening period the evil also can and must grow and ripen, the great proceeding from the small, the secret nature of the transforming power, the seeking and finding on the part of the man, the long mixture previous to the speedy separation at last, the beginning and end, not merely of the Church of Christ, but the end of the world, in which what was not there from the beginning is judged—are not these purely mysteries of the kingdom of heaven? And does not Christ declare them by figures in which God, from the creation onwards, has spoken to our ears, in a way as loud as it is secret.

To you it is given to know, to understand them, inasmuch as you understand my parables. Therefore truly given from above, revealed (chap. xi 25; xvi. 17)—but why only to you? Because you bring to these mysteries open ears and inquiring hearts. To them it is not given, and never can be given, because this is wanting in them (Luke, τοῖς δὲ λοιποῖς; Mark has the most striking expression, which we willingly take from him as having been spoken by Christ—τοῖς ἔξω). Who are those without? (This recurs again in passages such as 1 Cor. v. 12, and more and more sharply defined on to Rev. xxii. 15.) First of all, in reference to the company whom Christ was addressing, they are opposed to the οἱ περὶ αὐτόν who were remaining round about him in the ship, or near him addressing questions to him; those, therefore, who now went away because they in the meantime had heard enough, or properly speaking nothing—"hearers by chance and by the by," who hear and yet will not hear. To such people, every thing comes the same as in parables (see Mark), for even the direct word is still more dark to them. But not because God keeps back any thing which he will not give, as is distinctly shown in what immediately follows.

Verse 12. A weighty word, as regards which an interpretation is vain, unless the Spirit reveal it to those who are taught by practice and experience. It is the great key to all the ways of God with fallen man, it is the theodicy of his holy love and righteousness as it will show itself in the end when all shall be revealed! God's free and abundant giving —but man's having as a condition thereof; God's righteous taking—but man's not having as the reason of this; these are two weighty secrets between God and man. The entire seeming contradiction in the letter, that unto him who hath shall be given, from him that hath not shall be taken away, urges us to a deeper investigation and explanation of the saying. The full development we shall leave to ch. xxv., where Christ himself explains it by a complete parable; thus much we would here observe preliminarily, namely, that the having indicates a receptivity, a faithfulness which receives and keeps. He who has, although he has not from his own strength (for all that can be had, nay each one himself who can have, comes from God), yet in contradistinction to him who has not, he has from a cause and determination within himself, as is shown in the whole of the first parable respecting the ground. He who will have and thereby can receive, has so far already what is to be received, for he has the open hand for the gift which is then certainly imparted, the ear for the word, the heart for the healing grace. Further, he who holds fast, keeps and uses (for only by use can it be kept), for him the gift will increase until he shall have abundantly. There is here no standing still on either side. He who has not, who neither will receive and take at the beginning nor use to the end, from him will be taken away that which he has. This still sharper contradiction decidedly implies that ὃ ἔχει, what he hath, is to be taken ironically.* First of all, as Luke (verse 18) has it: ὃ δοκεῖ ἔχειν, what he seemeth to have—for every ἔχων (one having) who does not keep (κατέχει) is only a δοκῶν ἔχειν (one seeming to have) in a manifold sense. It is an imaginary having, the nothingness of which is to be made manifest by a so-called taking, which yet properly indeed takes nothing from him. It is a having which has become lost through his unfaithfulness (2 John 8). Other references of this comprehensive saying are not excluded, which at last reach even to the entire judicial stripping of the unfaithful one, so that he is left naked and bare even of all that God's long-suffering had still left him as a portion in the meanwhile.

Verse 13. Therefore speak I to them in parables: this direct answer to the question of the disciples has hitherto, it is to be regretted, received very generally a one-sided explanation from the following ὅτι ("because"), although it must first of all be understood as an evident consequence from the foregoing ὅτι ("for"), together with all that follows. How has this truth, as earnest as it is friendly, been obscured by the one-sided explanation which has been given to it, as if Christ here speaks to them in parables, in order that they may not understand! Only read what the very unjustly slighted Mark, verse 33, says truly by the Holy Ghost: He spake the word to them as they were able to hear it (comp. John viii. 43). Does that mean "not understand?" Christ does not merely say in what follows, as will soon appear: "Therefore speak I to them in parables, because they do not understand"—nor has he in verse 12 said: "Therefore, that they may not understand." Either of these as separated from the other is "in no sense a justifiable idea"—the latter still less so than the former. The truth takes both together, as Christ's word here stands between what precedes and what follows. Does Christ then speak purposely to the wind? Are not parables given to be heard; and, if they may yet possibly be rightly heard, to be understood? Christ does not light his lamp in vain, as he assures us in Mark, vers. 21, 23. To what purpose is it then that he lets it shine until the night comes when none can see to work, and that he so patiently and diligently instructs this people also even to the last?

* Luther's saying commonly adduced here is well known: "Where the word of God is understood, there it multiplies itself and betters the man; but where it is not understood, there it grows less and hurts the man." We think this, however, not exhaustive enough, inasmuch as it does not depend merely on the understanding.

A parable, as has often been truly said,* has for the hearer, according to his state and the relation in which he stands to it, two sides; it is concealing and revealing at the same time. But even its concealing works towards a revealing; inasmuch as it draws after it the truth which is signified, urges it only the more strongly, and precisely "because it is not understood, acts as a spur and provocative to further reflection." Whoever then will no longer be moved by it to ask, seek, find, and understand, in him, and only in him, it proves its depriving, judging power; for in the case of such their own guilt becomes now fully manifest, that they would not hear although they could. In this way is Mark iv. 33 to be understood, and thus does the parabolic address come with a final sifting efficacy among the multitude, to awaken and save every one who is yet capable of hearing and willing to hear, but to leave, or rather entirely to deliver over to righteous punishment, the wilfully deaf.

In parables (or proverbs, ἐν παροιμίαις, John xvi. 26, 29, which is almost the same, comp. Ezek. xx. 49), i.e., as much as to say in a manner unintelligible, and indeed, where it is not fables like those of Æsop which speak of natural things concerning beasts and men, but eternal wisdom that gives form to its נִפְלָאוֹת, (wonderful things), and therein expresses the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven—the secrets of its eternal counsel from the beginning—the understanding of their meaning is a thing not so hastily or slightly to be spoken of. Still (and this is the other side), the eternal wisdom of love speaks in this way more intelligibly, more loudly, more openly of its secrets than ever an Æsop of the west, or a proverb maker of the east, was able to do. "The profoundest wisdom of nature, the world, and man (more correctly, the revealing wisdom of God himself), is connected with the simplest, nearest, most memorable figure. For the stubborn and the frivolous, this is still the only language which in a happy moment can soften and awaken them. After they have once heard it as a parable, the figure sticks to them, the mirror is ever turned towards them, and they cannot but look into it at some time or other" (Häfeli). "If Christ would not speak to the wind, he must needs break up the truth into parts—separate it into such instances, harsh to our ear and moral feeling, in which abstraction must make use of all its hermeneutical magic power to drive it back from the nearness where it causes us so much uneasiness, to the remote wilderness, amid the mist-light of generality" (Kleuker). What experience proves* in our day among the ὄχλοις or multitudes of the Church, cannot have been otherwise in the time of Christ; thus to understand the conduct and words of Christ, cannot be characterized as the arbitrary interpretation of a commentator. Therefore, speak I to them in parables; that to every one who still has anything, may yet be given; and then that from him who has not, may be taken away. To which second idea Christ now carries out his answer.

Verses 13—15. After having first given a direct declaration concerning the present obduracy of the people (which, however, is also to be found in the prophets: Jer. v. 21; Ezek. xii. 2—in the latter passage, it is expressly said immediately before כִּי בֵּית מְרִי הֵם, "for they are a rebellious house") Christ quotes at large the prophecy of Isaiah; the same with which John (chap. xii.) must needs close his account of the public testimony and labors of Christ, and Luke, in the Acts of the Apostles, his account of the apostolic testimony to Israel—the same as we find in the Epistle to the Romans still abiding upon them, as it was already announced at the first in Deut. xxix. 4. Ἀναπληροῦται, "is fulfilled," at all events intensifies the signification of the simple verb; although it does not precisely mean (as generally in Greek) again, or once more fulfilled, it yet means entirely fulfilled, now attains its entire truth; that which was already meant in the prophecy as such, is now first fulfilled, although it had also its fulfillment at that time in the contemporaries of the prophet (comp. this emphatic use of the word in Thess. ii. 16).

The first six chapters of Isaiah form an introductory ground-work to the whole book, consisting of three parts: Chap i., in immediate connection with the time present, begins with the prophet's contemporaries, who were to be chastised, as it were to show the foundation upon which the entire structure of the discourses that point to the distant future is raised. Chap. ii.—v. bring forward, by way of contrast, Israel's calling and destiny, which stands in the remotest prospect, in order again to come down from this elevation to rebuke the people now fallen away of themselves (chap. ii. 5), and to show the grace which is for the righteous; here, as it were, the two extreme points are laid down between which the prophecy is to move. Here already the future Messiah announces himself by the significant name, which entirely corresponds to the circle of ideas used by Christ in the parables: צֶמַח, sprout, shoot of a preserved and renewed planting of the Lord, from which at last is to proceed a glorious fruit of the earth (chap. iv. 2). Israel is represented in a parable as at present the unfruitful vineyard of the Lord. In chap. vi., finally, there is added the sending and instruction of the prophet, who, in his own time, finds no hearing, but who is still to prophesy for the future, because under the general corruption a holy seed (ver. 13) remains hid and preserved. In the original text, we find nothing but imperatives addressed to the prophet, as before to the people. Whilst he threateningly announces to them: "Hear ye, and understand not!" he is himself to harden their heart, to blunt their ears, to close up their eyes. How such language, which still retains its truth, is to be rightly understood, the whole Scripture shows us; the imperative is the sharpest form of the threatening future, the prophecy calls forth into manifestation the existing obdurateness, which is to develop itself through their own guilt in regard to the word: Thou shalt speak to them in vain, preach them entirely deaf; at the same time equivalent to—Thou shalt predict their obduracy; according to the form of expression occurring, for example, at Jer. i. 10. Let it not be overlooked, that these deaf and blind ones are the same to whom healing and salvation is afterwards announced (chap. xxix. 9–12, 18, 19, xxxv. 5, xlii. 7), to which, indeed, Christ himself referred in Matt. xi. 5. Christ is, therefore, truly come to heal them, as Isaiah also, in his time, spoke from the grace of God in a sincere yet friendly manner to the people. But what was then manifest, receives now a more complete fulfillment; the Gospel of Christ, too, proves at first to them only an occasion of greater hardening (John ix. 39), and the true salvation also of Israel according to the flesh which is there promised, is thereby put forward to the distant times of a second future. All this in Isaiah, as a whole, partly typified in the prophet himself, partly predicted for the future of Christ; therefore, in Matt. xv. 7–9, a similar word is taken from the same connection Isa. xxix. 9–13).

* For example, in Bacon (De Augm. Scient. ii. 13): Est autem usus ambigui atque ad contraria adhibetur. Facit enim ad involucrum, facit etiam ad illustrationem.

* Although many preachers practice, as much as in them lies, the putting back of the near truth into the mist of generality, here meant by Kleuker.

The Septuagint with which the citation here literally corresponds (as also the Chaldee, at least at the beginning), renders the imperative by a more intelligible future; and Kimchi expressly observes that the imperative is in that passage put for the future. Observe, now, the correspondence: not comprehend or understand, although they hear; not apprehend, discern, or see into, although they see. Observe the further order and progress of the expression, which very significantly goes out first from the heart to the ears and eyes, in order to return again through the eyes and ears to the heart.* For according to the state of the heart, the ear hears; and just as one has heard, so he sees; an intelligent insight results from an intelligent hearing of the word. The way back must now be the same, namely, that the preaching which, by means of parables, is set with special distinctness before the eyes, should again awake the hearing ear; and thus the access to the heart is opened for the right understanding of it. But the heart is and remains the decisive thing, all is properly only one sense, that of the heart; they perceive not with the heart, they are not converted that they might be saved! The ἰάσωμαι, I should heal, of the Sept. corresponds exactly to the Heb. וּרְפָא לוֹ, of which we find in Mark the true interpretation: And their sins should be forgiven them (as the Chaldaic וְיִשְׁתְּבֵק לְהוֹן, Kimchi וְרִפּוּאַת הַנֶּפֶשׁ וְהִיא הַסְּלִיחָה). This fearful consequence introduced by the μήποτε, lest, has certainly (to speak with Pfenninger), a half-ironical force "They feared evil, when they heard that I would save them!" But on this very account the ground of such μήποτε is taken away from Christ, who still ever speaks to the deaf; and is laid in their not hearing, in their not perceiving, in their hearts, which will not be converted. Nothing is clearer than this, and the true light is thus thrown on the ἵνα, that, which has been obscured by the predestinarians (and which Mark, ver. 12, and Luke, ver. 10, put by contraction for the ὅτι in Matt. ver. 11). Philological controversy, which would make it a mere ἐκβατικόν (ecbatic), is of no avail, and certainly does not quite meet the true sense; for it is by all means the purpose of God, that in his grace, the fruitlessness of which he knew beforehand, man's guilt and destruction should manifest and develop itself; this remains the judicial element in that blindness which, otherwise in the word of truth where are no empty phrases, could never be traced back to God.

---

* Ἐπαχύνθη, the Hebr. הַשְׁמֵן, which indicates a hardening of the heart, specially induced by the fat of prosperity and pride (Deut. xxxii. 15). Βαρέως ἤκουσαν, Hebr. הַכְבֵּד, as also βαρήκοος, surdaster, occurs. Ἐκάμμυσαν, Hebr. properly הָשַׁע, of the smearing of the eyes, here including both sleepiness and short-sightedness, our blinking. Expressions, therefore, all of which indicate a not yet entire deadness in the power of the sense.

Once more the sum is this: Christ preaches here to the last as the apostles in like manner did, in all patience and long-suffering, above all in order that whoever has ears may yet hear, ver. 9. But, because the ears which they have they yet have not, or do not use, as he well knew, he speaks with the second and secondary purpose, that their not knowing may be judged as not willing.

Verses 16, 17. Christ here turns a look of consolation upon his dear disciples, as before at chap. xi. 25; hence, at a later period, in Luke x. 21–24, Christ, connecting together both addresses, repeats them. It remains true, that the Lord makes the hearing ear and the seeing eye (Prov. xx. 12); therefore it is given to the disciples. But only because they have, as was also said before. All the prophets too longed for the coming of Christ, of whom they testified (1 Pet. i. 10–12); and so was it with all those who, in past times, were righteous by faith, whose believing expectation and hope pointed to him who was now come (John viii. 56; Heb. xi. 13, 16, 39). In the simplest parable from the mouth of Christ there is more than in all the former words of God, which the prophets themselves could declare, for it is immediately added: Hear ye now the parable of the sower! Hear ye who have inquiring hearts, hear it aright—with repeated emphasis on this word "hear," whose decisive significance between God and man pervades the whole of the first parables.

Mark, vers. 21–25, and Luke, vers 16–18, give the additional information that Christ, further, after explaining the first parable to the disciples, said again what he had already said in the Sermon on the Mount, Matt. v. 15 (with which then both Evangelists connect the foregoing proverbial saying in Matt. ver. 12). The first saying concerning the light, in particular, seems, as was very natural, to have been often repeated by Christ, as in Luke xi. 33 we found it addressed to the people shortly before, just as now to the disciples. As the sower sows the seed that it may shoot forth, so the light comes into the world, as a lamp is brought into a room (such an analogy lies certainly in the word ἔρχεται in Mark), that it may give light; where it seems to hide and obscure itself, this certainly is not its proper office. At the same time, the words are still more closely applicable to the listening disciples: Think not that the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, of which I spoke, are committed to you to be kept secret; you twelve know and should remember, that I send you to speak in the light that which you now receive secretly, to preach afterwards on the house-tops what you now hear in the ear! (Matt. x. 26, 27). Observe how significant, precisely here, is this referring the disciples back to the first word which was declared before all the people to be the kindled light, and how, afterwards at the first sending out of the disciples, the word which foretells the growing publicity of their preaching again recurs to this (Matt. x. 26). This prediction finds its fulfillment also with special reference to the parables, in so far as they become ever more clear as the history of the world and the Church progresses.

When in Mark and Luke we find, further, the charge addressed to the disciples, Take heed what (or how) ye hear—this is only to be taken as another application of the general call: He who has ears to hear, let him hear! But it is sharpened in its form, with special reference to the disciples who have eyes and ears; their seeing is to be a more careful looking to themselves also after hearing, while the people have not even the first seeing in order to hearing. Finally, Mark, ver. 24 is, in like manner, a repetition in another form of what is said in the Sermon on the Mount, Matt. vii. 2, and serves thus to the full understanding of ver. 25. (From which it necessarily follows that προστεθήσεται can only be equivalent to δοθήσεται, μετρηθήσεται, and is by no means to be understood with many, as Alford: More will be expected of you hearers of the mysteries of God, greater demands will be made of you.) For the rest, it is equally impossible and unnecessary for us to show how the manifold interpretations of a like kind related to the ipsissima verba of Christ; we remain satisfied in so far as there is no contradiction on the supposition of a substantially correct account, and not allowing ourselves to be misled by discrepancies that may be pointed out, we perceive throughout the same spirit and sense in the fluctuating letter. This is the only true result to which we must return, after all our criticism and learning—at one with the reading and hearing Church of the faithful. If any one can make out something better without injury to the faith which keeps fast hold of the word, without disturbing the simplicity which understands it—I have at least not found such in the libraries and book markets.

THE SEED IN THE DIFFERENT SORTS OF GROUND.

(Matt. xiii. 3–9, 18–23; Mark iv. 3–9, 13–20; Luke viii. 5–8, 11–15).

The parables of Christ can never be characterized as "loose and jejune," and their figures are never "obscure" (Evang. K. Z. 1833, No. 14). Each single parable cannot, indeed, say every thing, but must be supplemented by others; this, however, is even less true of the parabolic than of the proper form of address, because the picture-words of God in the creation and in the relations of man's history, are more full and expressive than the logically-divided words which result from human thinking. It belongs to us humbly to follow the divine truth imprinted on the figure, and rather, by due reflection, to let the particulars evolve themselves than by a too hasty interpretation to go beyond them. It is to be regretted that most preachers treat this parable of the sower in particular in such a manner, that only the general principal truth respecting the good and bad ground remains, while the three kinds of bad ground are not clearly distinguished from each other. We will endeavor to avoid such confusion as shortly and clearly as possible.

In the midst of, and after the intensest zeal in indefatigably speaking the word of God, which only a few hear and keep, Christ here, as it were, composes his own soul, so as to take the most quiet and reflective view of the state of the case. This opens to us, at the same time, a view into the first fundamental mystery of the kingdom of heaven—the co-operation of divine efficacious grace with the exercise of the human will in faith or unbelief, faithfulness or unfaithfulness, upon which its effect depends. So long as fruit grows from seed, even to the last day, and the seed needs a soil in order to its springing and growing, so long must this be the most appropriate figure within the whole sphere of nature for such a coincidence and correspondence, according to which the fruit comes not from the earth without the seed, but only from the seed, and again the seed can not prosper and grow without the favor and will of the soil. Hence, in general, such a figure has been used at all times, to represent spiritual labor on the heart of men and its effect.

Christ, however, gives us the innermost truth when in the explanation (in Luke) he begins by saying: The seed is the word of God, i. e., also conversely: The word of God is a seed. The word of man is also sown in many ways in the hearts of men, so that the wonderful power and efficacy of the word is thereby made manifest; that, however, which comes to man and works in him, in the most wonderful and independent manner, is the word in the highest sense (Mark verse 14), which the heavenly Sower sows, the word of God. Once only at the first creation did the earth bear grass, herbs, and trees, which had their seed in themselves, spontaneously without previous sowing, for then the creative word was itself the seed; since then, however, nothing grows unless seed be first put into the earth. Thus does the word of God which now is not in man, nor proceeds from him, come to him from without, and from above, as, by another application of the figure, the fructifying rain and snow from heaven (Isa. lv. 10, 11). Here, indeed, the written word is not excluded, yet it is the preached word that is principally meant, the written word only in so far as it is preached, or preaches and sows itself. In the word which proceeds from the mouth of God, although communicated through the mouth of man (ῥῆμα θεοῦ, Rom. x. 17), is a power of God (Rom. i. 16), a living, generative, and forming principle, as in every seed-corn, which therefore (to speak with Luther) no one can thoroughly sift, which bids defiance to all the learned. The word of God is also called a meat, which, however, gives life anew, and does not merely sustain and nourish what is already there, which does not assimilate itself to the form and condition of man, but rather transmutes him into its own new form, as the wonderful principle of the seed transforms the soil and its sap into the plant according to the kind of seed. It is the incorruptible seed of regeneration (1 Pet. i. 23), as ἔμφυτος λόγος, the ingrafted word (James i. 21). Even the smallest word and saying which comes to us from the word of God in the widest sense (Rom. x. 18, in the sense of Psa. xix), preached in all the world, nay, even speaking silently and yet loudly in all nature—is such a living, powerful seed. Christ, however, although not excluding this, yet here means and names principally the finished revelation and sum of all the divine word to man, the word of the kingdom (Matt. verse 19), which he sows and preaches, first of all in his own person, and then by his messengers and sowers.

Now, some have thought, that in the sower there is an intended contrast between the ordinary truth of the figure and the application of it here made, inasmuch as the sower here is a quite uncommon one; for he scatters his seed wastefully every where around, even in those places where nothing can grow—conduct which would be foolish in any other husbandman. This, however, is not right, and is an unprofitable refinement of criticism, going beyond the limits of the figure, which is quite simple and complete in itself. The parable speaks of the sower (Matt. verse 18, comp. verse 3, ὁ σπείρων), who just acts according to his office and work: he goes forth to sow, he sows the word (Mark verse 14). Thus did Christ pass through the whole land with his preaching, thus will he have his Gospel preached to every creature, thus are the servants of the word to leave nothing unsown, even no path, and no stone, for the field of God is by right the whole world. God will maintain his right to it, gain it again to himself, or, at least, testify to its being his: He does not even acknowledge the right of any other to the way beside the fields—as the diligent husbandman at least tries every year anew to gain the reclaimable footpath on the border or in the middle of his field; he knows well the stony ground, but he works it also before and with the seed (as we shall afterwards see): he will, at all events, sow every where for a testimony that he does not let the land want, that to him it properly belongs. The first great fundamental idea of the parable then is: God on his part sows diligently, always, and every where; all must at least hear the word, though it should be, in the case of many, against their will and without effect. And where fruit is not brought forth, the fault lies with the ground; it was sown also just that this might be evident.

Christ here comprises in three principal classes, one might almost say, really all the thousandfold kinds and mixtures of the soil that yield no fruit unto the harvest, which are therefore all the more carefully to be distinguished from each other. But here, it is to be regretted, the mass of preachers fall into much confusion, or, when they aim at strictly distinguishing, into many mistakes. When we look at the words, there appears at first sight to be a gradual ascent from the worst to the less bad, so that the truly good ground is at last connected with that which is least bad: first, there is no reception of the seed at all, then a shallow reception and a short growth, then there is even a complete taking root and a larger growth, not yet reaching, however, to maturity. Let us look more closely at the particulars, in order to see whether this first understanding of the words approves itself as the only correct one.

Some seed falls παρὰ τὴν ὁδόν, by the way side (as all the three Evangelists agree in saying), i. e., certainly not on the country roads and highways themselves, but in their neighborhood; the sense, however, plainly is, that this margin of the field has been wrongfully made to be part of the way, and trodden hard like it, so that the seed only remains lying on the surface, and is given up to destruction. If the field, which its owner and sower, nevertheless, does not yield up, comprehends the whole human world, then the road which lies beyond it, and upon which really no seed is to be cast, would be Satan's kingdom and province, or the sphere of the altogether outward natural life, for which there is no word of God at all, no seed that could spring up in it. And both are true, for viewed in reference to the human hearts lying upon its boundary, or which have already become almost such a way, it is really one and the same thing: Satan has his way and his kingdom in which the spirit has become altogether sensual, sunk into the lower sphere of the creature. Many and various are the things which have power to make the hearts of men so hard, among which, at the present time, "the freight-wagons of business" are not to be forgotten. These, then, are such as hear indeed with the outward ear, but no longer perceive or understand with the heart; who first of all live entirely unsusceptible in the earthly and outward, their heart a thoroughfare for thoughts and devices drawn from a sphere which has nothing in common with the truth and power of life in God's word—the indifferent (not merely those sunk in vice and wickedness), whose way is never to feel repentance, or to look at any thing in themselves that might awaken such a feeling, who offer to the seed no soft place into which it might penetrate, or where it might be covered. They are so when the seed is scattered, when they are brought into contact with it; more than this Christ will not say here, although we may justly suppose further, how from youth upwards, or at a later period, they may have become so by their own and others' fault. This, in its own time, God will find out and judge; he will certainly act unrighteously to no one, but yet will not overlook the secret beginnings in which the soul thus surrendered itself, and threw itself away upon vanity. Enough, that of the judgment nothing is now said in the parable, but only of the fact: Grace works superabundantly. Although there were no susceptible ground, still the sower sows the word even upon it; and is such a one truly described as ὁ παρὰ τὴν ὁδὸν σπαρείς, i. e., at least sown upon, as it might be translated? No, the expression has a deeper reference, and finds its justification in this, that the man properly so-called, the person himself (as he will or ought to become), is conceived of as the plant already present in the seed as *sown—there being here an anticipation of the second parable. Christ speaks even of an ἐσπαρμένον ἐν τῇ καρδίᾳ, "sown in the heart"—for where there is a man there also, although it may seem quite otherwise, is still a heart and conscience, a possibility that the seed may penetrate, however hardened he may be, a beginning of the new growth wherever seed lies, although it may be ever checked and arrested. That which is heard, although it be not understood, yet lies on the surface, in the memory, and might still penetrate farther were favorable rain to follow the sowing—if there were not one who acts contrary to the good Sower. It is not a merely human and natural result, then, if the seed cannot at all spring up. Wherever such seed lies thus,† the evil one comes (Mark, Satan; Luke, the devil, so that we can make no mistake as to who is spoken of), the counter-worker of the Sower, from his kingdom and province, whose evil counsel and will against God's counsel of grace, which overlooks no one, is declared in these terms: That they believe not, and be saved! So it is now; where the Creator works, the destroyer always follows—still more, where the Restorer begins, the enemy hinders and resists. He is never more busy than in those places where God has just sowed, he always follows (εἶτα, Luke) and comes (εὐθέως, Mark) wherever he can come, to destroy the good seed. He comes, however, not precisely in his own person, but the devouring birds are his power and his host. He is the spirit that rules in the air and fills the atmosphere, in which those live who walk after the course of this world. Christ here, certainly with design, makes use of the birds of heaven (as is added in Luke, and perhaps also in Mark) as an emblem of the manifold means and instruments, all of which serve the evil one in order to the taking away of the word. The little animals appear harmless, and yet, as regards the excellent, truly heavenly seed, they are mere birds of prey (Matt. ἁρπάζει equivalent to αἴρει, Mark and Luke)—the arch-robber, Satan, lets them fly. They are trifles, but many of them together; and they are powerful, so that every bird carries away its little corn. These are the thoughts, talk, and business of the world, that dissipate the mind, and keep it in an atmosphere of frivolity, preventing all entrance to the heart of what is heard; they are not cares and lusts which come from within out of the heart, for this would be to anticipate the third kind of bad ground. Here there is as yet enough in the hindrances that fly past from without, because the soul lives entirely in this outward sphere. In Luke it is also said beforehand that the seed is trodden down, which belongs of course to the designation "on the way-side," so that, on this very account, there follows the assurance that, besides this, destruction comes to the seed from other quarters. Christ might perhaps also have said: The wind carries it away, or the like, but he will declare more strongly that the good seed entirely perishes, which could only be expressed by the birds eating it up.*

* Alford quite truly: "The seed sown becomes the plant; it is therefore the representative, when sown, of the individuals to whom the discourse refers." Lange expresses it: "The history of his life becomes identical with the history of the seed. The fate of God's seed in the man, is the fate of the man himself."

† In Matthew it is placed before by anacolouthon: παντὸς ἀκούοντος καὶ μὴ συνιέντος, where such a one is found. In Mark, verse 15, ὅπου is to be construed with what follows, so that the same sense arises.

Other seed falls on stony ground; not precisely hard and naked rock (for Luke's ἐπὶ τὴν πέτραν is to be explained from Matt. and Mark), but on ground which has some earth indeed on the surface, but a rocky bottom further down, as is not uncommon especially in Palestine. This appears to be a little better than the former, yet it, too, is properly no ground for growth, but merely for the first springing for a while. Rock slightly covered with earth is always soonest green, but is soon again decayed; the reason is expressed in a threefold form with one and the same meaning: Because it has not deep earth, therefore, also, not moisture enough, consequently also, not root (Matt. and Mark, already in the parable give all the three, and then again in the explanation), i.e., only root which does not strike deep enough, therefore as good as none. The καυματίζεσθαι, ("being scorched") of the heat of the sun is indispensably necessary to all growth, it properly helps growth in what is good; here, however, the effect is a ξηραίνεσθαι, ("withering away"). These are such as are at first somewhat susceptible, who really receive and understand the word they have heard, but they are shallow and superficial; a little deeper beneath the easily moved, deceptive, false softness of heart, there is the rocky bottom of the hard, proud heart, into which the seed is unable to penetrate even less than in the trodden way (which is here preliminarily to be carefully observed). In order to the efficacy of the seed of the word, the nourishing sap must come from our soil, as the oil for the lighted lamp. True, the sap is again nothing but the rain and blessing of heaven, which has before been drunk in by the earth; but this cannot penetrate into the rocky ground. The seed-corn, in order to its successful growth, must send forth, as well upwards as downwards, its germ, extending in a two fold direction from the centre point of the generative principle, nay, must even at first and more strongly take root downwards, than grow upwards. Where it only speedily shoots upwards, it has but a diseased growth, and has no firm hold of the earth. But, on account of the identity which we have already found between the seed sown and the person here considered, it is said also, ver. 21 (Mark, ver. 17; Luke, ver. 17), that these people have no root in themselves; the not taking root is precisely their own fault and character. He who quickly with joy receives the earnest word of truth which judges the principle of the heart and conscience, perceives not at all its serious meaning and difficulty, expends his strength before the time in shallow feeling, in hasty words, instead of receiving it, as he ought, with the calm earnestness that marks a thorough work slowly effected. Then the sun arises (ἀνατέλλει, rises higher at mid-day, or in summer, according to the time of the day or year), and this the weak seed, which has shot up in a way not natural, cannot bear. This, too, is a hindrance from without, as in the former kind, yet different from the voracious birds which do not belong to the ground. The sunshine and its heat mean no harm to the seed, but come rather as an ordinance from God to promote the growth, and are even necessary to it. (The ἀνατέλλειν of the sun corresponds to the ἀνατέλλειν of the seed.) Affliction or persecution (Luke concisely πειρασμός) comes, indeed, also indirectly, through the men of this world, and from the evil one, yet not in entire opposition to God's counsel and will, but on account of the word; it belongs therefore itself to the word, proceeds from it, and corresponds to it in the natural order and progressive development of the kingdom. Nothing ripens without heat, and, in the case of a good root, it must promote, and not hinder the growth. The general designation of a man of the second class is πρόσκαιρος, "for a while," which is not to be rendered either by inconstant or changeable alone, for the word includes both; what subsists and continues only for a fit or conveinent time, continues only for a while.* Luke's explanation πρὸς καιρὸν πιστεύουσιν, for a while believe; is also to be read—not merely as 1 Cor. vii. 5—but at the same time as opposed to the unseasonable καιρὸς πειρασμοῦ, time of temptation.

The third kind of ground is certainly neither trodden into a path nor stony, therefore the seed takes deep enough root in it, and its growth continues longer and rises higher, shoots up even into the stalk, and seems to put forth ears. Such a man hears the word, and that not merely as those of the first class, but really hears it as those of the fourth class·

* It is not indeed the living seed of the word of God in itself that is destroyed, but in so far as it is sown in a heart as its seed, the germ of a new man —as he is here considered.

* "Dependent on the time, serving the spirit of the time" (as Lange expresses it), does not lie directly in the expression.

he hears and understands it—for in all the three Evangelists, the antithesis lies properly in the bringing forth fruit. But it fails in this, it also does not reach this point: Matt. and Luke ἄκαρπος γίνεται, it becomes at last, shows itself in the final issue to be unfruitful, although a quite different appearance really gave promise of fruit; Luke οὐ τελεσφορουσι, they do not bring to the full period, an expression also used of pregnancy. Satan then with his devouring host does nothing to this man, he has taken the word to heart with true apprehension of it. Nor is he, by any means, hurt by the assault of temptations, and opposition, he has root in himself, through a deeper experience, which keeps him from falling away at once, when he is offended; he has therefore, on the one hand, a good earnest will to bring forth fruit, for how otherwise could the seed grow to such an extent in him? What is it then that injures him? Insincerity in every thing. The indecision of his not yet settled will! On his ground are the thorns, or rather, as they do not grow till afterwards, their concealed roots are in it. Here the parable stretches beyond the natural figurative sphere into that of the biblical types, according to which the thistles and thorns of the luxuriant tares, growing spontaneously out of the earth since the first curse (as it were, the serpents and vermin of the ground), represent the state of the natural heart of man, in which sin already dwells and luxuriates (2 Sam. xxiii. 6; Jer. iv. 3). This other seed is already there since man was made evil by the evil one; and when any one only allows this to grow up along with the good seed, Satan does not need to sow it anew, and may for a long time see the good seed growing up along with it, conscious all the while of his victory over it. This is Satan's host within the heart, more hostile than the birds mentioned before, so that here the circle of the three kinds of ground, where Satan maintains his right and power, completes itself. What creeps more stealthily, or is more difficult to eradicate and more dangerous, than the fibrous roots of lust sown from the very first in the heart of man? They go in (as Mark has it) between the wheat, i. e., they grow up amongst it (ver. 7, ἀνέβησαν), and choke the word, notwithstanding the prosperous increase it has already made. These lusts are denoted by Matt. in a twofold form, as the care of this world and the deceitfulness of riches; which may certainly, first of all, be understood of the poor and the rich, although, on further consideration, it will appear, that the "desire to become rich" deceives also the poor, as in like manner riches carry with them their own cares. Luke adds to these the ἡδονάς, or pleasures in general, and finally Mark αἱ περὶ τὰ λοιπὰ ἐπιθυμίαι, "the lusts of (concerning) other things," in order that we may not understand riches or poverty alone, in the literal sense.*

Πλοῦτος, "riches," is in general equivalent to property, possession, enjoyment, any thing whatever that belongs to the world, and every where excites care as well as pleasure. Τοῦ βίου, "of life," equivalent to τοῦ αἰῶνος τούτου, "of this world," belongs probably to all the three ideas. The ἡδοναί, "pleasures," are at the same time mere ἀπάται, "deceitfulness," and vice versa; nay even the μέριμνα, "care," is the same desire towards what is earthly, represented and disguised as care. (Ἀπάτη and τέρψις are related also in the Greek writers.) All this, however, in itself comes neither from riches nor from poverty, neither from a superfluity of the good things of this life, nor from want, pain or hunger, but only develops itself through such πειρασμός, or "temptation," and is already in the heart and grows out of it. Now, those who allow it to grow up with the seed of the word, so as at length to destroy it, are the insincere and half-hearted, who do not press on to conquest and decision for what is good, but go so undecidedly to work, that for a while, no one knows what will come out of them, whether or not they will yield ripe fruit and a harvest—but at last the want discovers itself!

We are now prepared, after the examination of the three classes, to look more narrowly at their order and connection, so as to get beyond the common interpretation. The hindrances to the springing, growing, and ripening follow each other according to the time of this threefold development of the seed. The first are people whom the word does not awaken, because its reception, the springing of the seed, has already been hindered; the others are "awakened" people who, however, come to nothing because they have not steadiness and root for growth; the third are even converts, whose santification does not come to maturity, but goes back again. In like manner it might be said, that the first hindrance, viewed generally and as a whole, threatens the period of childhood, which lives for the outer world, and is yet unsusceptible of the higher truth; the second, the period of youth, which is as susceptible as it is inconstant; the third, a still farther advanced age, when the ripening in sanctification depends on the rooting out of indwelling sin. Already, we see, that Christ in his representation goes out indeed from principal classes distinguished from each other by the reception which is given to the word coming or already come to them; by no means, however, in the deeper sense can he mean, that these three classes exclude each other. We must rather say, further, that the three classes include each other, so that he who has found himself in the one must soon also find himself in the others, whether he begin with the first of these or with the last. The three figures taken together, supplement each other and correspond properly to the whole man, in so far as understanding, feeling, and will receive the word: the first do not understand it, although they have heard it and think that they have understood it as any other word, so that it is still present in their memory; the second do not truly feel its power inwardly, although they seem to have been exceedingly "affected" by it; with the last there is wanting the pure subjected will, notwithstanding their knowledge and experience.* Do we not see, then, that the gradual rise to something better is merely apparent, and that the corruption and the resistance of the human heart rather but discovers itself in such progress, in an ever more aggravated form? It is altogether superficial to take the first class in the sharpest sense as representing the hardened, to whom the discourse cannot apply, inasmuch as the trodden way is not yet a rock. Certainly (and this is what has led to that mistake), the first class corresponds here, first of all to the blind and deaf, who are described in Matt. vers. 13, 15, according to Isa. vi.; but this unsusceptibility is very different from what dogmatic phraseology, and the Scripture also in other places, means by "hardness" in the proper sense. It is a threatening picture for them, still it by no means represents an irremediable state; otherwise Christ would not here seek by parables to open their ears to hear. The first kind of ground represents to us the outward appearance and state of things with the majority in all times; this first figure, taken as it were from the surface, further develops itself, however, to the second and third which were already implied in it. The hardness of the human heart is not merely the result of being outwardly trodden upon, it shows itself in a more advanced stage as the internal rocky ground †—and hast thou found that it has gone so far with thee, then will a true self-knowledge soon discover to thee also the crop of thorns. He who has become a way on which the devil's hosts have free scope, is himself to blame for this, although the first treading down of this way was the work of the devil; it is the devil, in like manner, who has made the land rocky within, and has also sown his thorns in it, although, as regards both, it is again the fault of the man if they continue and do not give place to the word. The three figures are distinct from each other, in so far as they may be understood to represent the leading character, as manifested, of different men, stages of life, churches, even nations; and yet they are so far fundamentally one, as there is no single individual who must not in some way or other find himself in all the three. Finally, as there is a progress in the manifestation of corruption from the first to the third, so there is also a retrograde movement from the third to the first. If thou lettest the tares grow, will it not soon come to this, that every word which thou hearest anew shall only so superficially impress thee as it does the stony-ground hearers? And being thus inconstant, art thou not become again a trodden way? Or rather, is it not worse to receive the word with joy and yet not with earnestness, so as to let it take root, than not to apprehend it at first? Is not the guilt of the third the greatest, and liable to the severest judgment?

* Not precisely: Desires after what remains (other things), i. e., after this and that (after all sorts of things), but it means: And whatever else there is of this kind.

What now the good ground is, upon which, when God sows at large, some seed always falls, and which, as we are here told beforehand, does not fail—we may easily and rightly understand from the threefold antithesis to the bad which is given in the expressions themselves, Mark, verse 8: ἐδίδου καρπόν, "brought forth" (verse 7 καρπὸν οὐκ ἔδωκε, "yielded no fruit"), and this it does ἀναβαίνοντα, "springing up" (while in the first ground, not even a green crop sprung up as the first καρπός or "fruit" of the seed), καὶ αὐξάνοντα, "and increasing" (while this αὐξάνειν was wanting at least in the second). In general, the good ground is first of all soft or loose on the surface, then, it is also deep or soft below, finally it is pure, free from the seed of tares. The pure and good heart, then, is susceptible for receiving, solid for keeping, sincere or decided, self-denying, earnestly persevering in letting the divine seed work within it by that power which ever tends towards fruit. Which triad we find again expressed in Luke, verse 15, in the ἀκούειν, κατέχειν, and ὑπομονή, "hearing," "keeping," and "patience." The first condition is the right hearing, that it be really heard, and is denoted by different words, in Matt. συνιέναι, "understand," Mark παραδέχεσθαι, "receive," Luke πιστεύειν, "believe." For, truly to hear the word as God's word, and to believe it, is certainly in the first stage one and the same, and is found wherever the heart is soft for such hearing (2 Chron. xxxiv. 26, 27, רַךְ לְבָבְךָ). But, as between hearing and hearing, so at a farther stage between believing and believing, there is still a difference. Luke (verse 13) places, in opposition to the μὴ πιστεύσαντες, not believing, verse 12, a real πιστεύουσι, believe, of the second kind, but the πιστεύειν or believing, must perfect itself in the ὑπομονή or patience (which is again placed in opposition to the ἀφίστανται, "fall away").—Let us inquire, now that we are come to the true point: How can a human heart be pure from the bad seed of lusts, and, if it must be so at first, in order to afford good ground for the seed of God, i. e., if it must be already purified, to what purpose, then, is this seed of regeneration?—thus

* One might at the same time say not without a certain truth: The first are, in reference to the word, the phlegmatic, the second the sanguine, the third the choleric and melancholic together. Strangely playing upon the passage, so that the most wonderful consequences may proceed from it, Lange even views it in reference to the four religions of the world: Heathenism, Judaism, Mahommedanism, Christianity. Would that Christendom were the good ground! Missionaries find even heathenism more susceptible.

† As the rock of the sensual, natural man, reaching almost to the surface, as Braune says.

shall we find, at the conclusion of the parable the key to all the questions which it suggests preliminarily as a proposed enigma. As the new wine requires new bottles, and finds indeed only old ones, which itself makes new, even so it is with the good heart for the good seed. That newness of the bottles consists precisely in this, that they are made open to receive what is new, the καρδία καλὴ καὶ ἀγαθή, "good and honest heart," needs only from first to last to be a true, honest, upright heart, then will the seed be efficacious! There, indeed, where choking thorns come in the way, the similitude from nature is no longer applicable to the mystery of the kingdom of heaven; as a parable it has already reached its limits, where the truth goes beyond the similitude. There is a miraculous seed superior indeed to all natural seeds, so powerful that by its growth it can and will choke all thorns. Nay more, it can also break through the rock in striking its root down into the earth, and can make that to be again a field of God which was a way of the prince of this world. This is already the effect of the seed, and it is prepared and accompanied by the rain and the plow. He, then, who humbly and submissively yields himself up to the heavenly Sower, with all his sowing, helping, furthering, efficacy, becomes good ground, and brings forth his fruit. And, according to the condition or capacity of the soil, as also according to the faithfulness of the working (his own or another's) he brings forth fruit an hundred fold (which according to Gen. xxvi. 12, is the entire blessing of God), sixty fold, or thirty fold. Again three steps also in the degree of fruitfulness;* which means, however, that the same measure is not required of every one, that it would rather be a mischievous temerity to attempt to increase gain beyond the given talent. Mark reverses the steps in the degree of fruitfulness, while Luke, by mentioning the hundred fold alone, will teach us according to the meaning of the Spirit in such a change of words, that wherever ground brings forth as much fruit as it can, it is reckoned an hundred fold.

Where now is, and whence comes, the good ground? In this first parable it is only declared, in accordance with present experience, that when the entire word of God, the word of the kingdom, comes to men, it is found side by side with the bad; but precisely therewith it suggests the questions which the second parable answers. Will Christ then say, that there are from the first good and bad human hearts? This answer is found in Matt. vii. 11, Mark vii. 21, 22. Where is the rich man whom riches have not more or less deceived, or the poor man whom riches have not allured? Where is a poor man without cares of this life, or a rich man without care and heart-disquiet arising from his possessions? Where, in fine, is a human heart without lusts in it? No where, then, is the good ground natural. The natural, carnal man receives not that which is of the Spirit of God (1 Cor. ii. 14). Consequently, even the second and third kind is no longer this natural man as he is, but as grace has already worked and softened him, and has even more or less prepared an entrance for the seed. In the prophet we read (Isaiah xxviii. 24): Doth a plowman plow, or break, or harrow his land always for the sowing—without going on to sow? The same holds conversely: Does he sow at once, or only, without first plowing and then harrowing the land? The good land is of God's preparing; his rain softens what is hard trodden, his miraculous plow breaks in pieces the rocks, his plants spring up, choke even the thorns; his heats of affliction promote growth, rather than burn up. Before the Gospel of the kingdom, there went forth the law and the preaching of repentance; along with, and before, every true word, his secret, precursive grace works, in order to prepare the τεταγμένους or, "ordained" (Acts xiii. 48), for the preached word. Here the grounds that determine the decision lie much further back, and more concealed, and only come first into manifestation in the conflict of the preached word with the heart.

But, again, in all this there is no gratia irresistibilis, no decretum absolutum. The man obeys or resists this divine working, under which the progress to what is better or worse is then developed and confirmed. And, even to the last, must the sowing and working of man, spoken of in Gal. vi. 7; Jer. iv. 3; Hos. x. 12, correspond to the sowing of the word on the part of God, in order that what is sown may grow to fruit; thus it goes on even to the harvest, according to the principle laid down in Matt. xiii. 12. Heb. vi. 7, 8 describes the third kind of bad land in complete antithesis to the first; it is by no means the first.

Thus our parable teaches not merely the impartial, universal grace of the sower, sowing every where openly, with diligence and zeal, but also in that exceeding patience which does not yet give up the bad land, points further back to the working before and at the sowing. But man is nevertheless all the more to blame should this grace continue for him in vain. What is the fruit which the great, good, and patient Husbandman and Sower* will have? Not single fruits or words but a man of God born again by the word, and fitted for every good work. For this reason ὁ σπαρείς, οἱ σπειρόμενοι, σπαρέντες in the explanation given in Matt. and Mark, do not signify merely as is wont to be observed: Land sown upon (although in the Greek, σπείρειν ἄρουραν or γῆν, is also said)—but this form already glances over to the following parable, in which the children of the kingdom are themselves entirely the sown and fruitfully grown-up good seed; precisely as Luke (ver. 14) uses συμπνίγονται, "are choked," passively of men, as at the same time of the fruit.

* Yet not as Roos, who for once deviates into foreign ideas, and is for interpreting thus: Thirty corns from one corn—this takes place when one faithful soul communicates the word which it believes, and by which it is saved, to thirty others, so that they also shall be saved!

* James v. 7 also meant of him—ἕως ἂν λάβῃ to be referred to καρπός. Thus does our ὑπομονή also proceed only from his.

We hope that this our interpretation in some small measure answers to the word of Christ, which (Mark iv. 13) makes a thorough understanding of this parable to be of high importance: If ye understand not this, how will ye understand all the other parables? It is the enigma to which we consider those that follow, as the key. The question, Whence? which is immediately suggested chiefly by the first kind of ground, finds its answer in the second parable. The third parable of the great and high growing mustard seed is parallel with the second kind of ground, in which the growth is wanting; the fourth parable of the leaven stands opposite to the third kind of ground, in which there is the want of a purifying penetration. The self-denying, all-surrendering, nature of the good heart appears in the fifth and sixth, and the seventh winds up all with the separating judgment.

WHEAT AND TARES.

(Matt. xiii. 24–30, 37–43.)

The varying application of the figures in the different parables, which we noticed already at the commencement, is fitted, generally speaking, to excite the attention to penetrate beyond the figure to the thing itself. But the new application which is here in this second parable given to the "seed," signifies something more than this, and has its truth in the internal connection of these two principal parables which, rightly understood, supplement each other. In the first, we have the beginning, how the word, as the seed of regeneration, comes to and into men; in the other, the progress, which at the same time first reveals the internal proper course of the thing: Men themselves as the birth and fruit proceeding from the word. The new man is, as it were, nothing but the word of God, as Luther or J. Arndt would say. And, indeed as, in the natural figure, the chain which connects fruit and seed ever renews itself, the seed itself being called the fruit in the most proper sense (Isa. lv. 10), so are the children of God really sown again as seed on the field of the world. But who sows this good seed? He alone, the new holy Son of Man, whose humanity itself is the noble wheat-corn for all this abundant fruit (John xii. 24; iv. 36). Hence, in the first parable, over which the vail hangs, we may well understand by the sower every one who speaks the word of God, who preaches the Gospel of the kingdom; now, on the contrary, it is declared with emphasis that Christ alone, even when he employs others in the work, is the true sower. For he has the good seed, he is himself the good seed.

Verse 24. Παρέθηκεν, put forth—laid the parable before them: not precisely as a meal (ver. 52), rather as a kind of instruction, as the solution of an enigma, which, indeed, was itself again mysterious (Acts xvii. 3). Ὡμοιώθη, is like, although a common expression, yet intimates that the comparison is not made merely by the speaker, but already lies in the figure and the thing. According to the eternal counsel of God, the kingdom of heaven is thus arranged, constituted, predicted in the natural figure. In the dative ἀνθρώπῳ σπείροντι, to a sower, the whole story stands comprised. To sow good seed, in the deeper sense, is God's prerogative; men can merely take care of it in order to its growth, they can never procure and give the first seed of what is good. All good came from God at first in the creation, all renovating good in the evil world comes again from God, but through this Son of Man of Nazareth. Herein lies an answer more than sufficient to that question of Nathaniel. He sows good, i. e., at the same time, nothing but good, true, pure, and unmixed seed (see ver. 27, and comp. Lev. xix. 19). On his field (purposely ἐν τῷ, instead of εἰς τόν), according to the right of possession, and this field is the world.* Christ could not possibly say any thing else here than "the world," and all preachers and interpreters who, without reason, substitute "the Church" for this, lose thereby a highly important ground feature of the parable. For here is already predicted and comprehended what we read in Matt. xxviii. 19: the great sowing, which was done once indeed as a living groundwork and beginning, was for all nations, in all countries; its effect goes on as a further and further sowing without limits. In no period of the history of the kingdom ought we to understand and explain as his field only what has been already sown; we ought to build no garden-hedge around the "Church," as if it were confined and enclosed within certain countries.† It is true, on the other hand, that it is not the world as the evil world, that is meant, but as the field of the Son of Man which he has sown, and will sow, as his present kingdom on the earth (ver. 41), with which the perfected heavenly kingdom of the Father (ver. 43), stands contrasted, as the field yields up its fruit to the barn. That the field is not yet the barn—therein lies the great truth which the Donatists of old did not comprehend, and therefore in their controversy perverted the whole parable. When they laid stress upon this, that Christ says "the world" and does not therefore speak of his Church in the world,

---

* Roos thinks that "in this parable, therefore, (where it is said, his field), the field is now the principal idea of the whole, just as before, the seed (Luke viii. 5, his seed)." But this mistaken idea will hardly admit of being carried out.

† Roos, therefore, is again very wrong when he says: "In the second parable the kingdom of heaven has already a special field, or a place of its own upon earth."

they overlooked blindly enough that Christ, in this phrase, at the same time recognizes no other enclosed Church-field in this world, but leaves the boundaries open; consequently, even the mixture, which exists in the "world," must also be understood of the world in so far as it continually becomes, and is, his field.*

Verse 25. On the field stands now the sown wheat, the children of the kingdom, here in a different sense from chap. viii. 12. There, they are such as were patiently borne with in the outward appearance and calling, who had a claim to the kingdom until their being cast out reveals its want of foundation; here they are such as have a true claim and retain it, they are, what they are called, the good seed. They are such as have been made alive by the word of God, bearing its goodness, its truth, its life in themselves. They are those through whose diffusion and fruitfulness the world is to become, and will become, the kingdom. Where any such good seed has fallen, and may yet fall, there the King who sows, prepares and vanquishes for himself slowly and patiently this kingdom. The kingdom vanquished and won as a field by sowing! What a word this for destroying all false conceptions of this kingdom! The tares are the children of the evil one, for ver. 39 points back to ver. 19; he who sows them is the devil (their father, John viii. 44, as the children of the kingdom have God for their Father, Matt. ver. 43), consequently they are his work (1 John iii. 8), the fruit of his sowing. The devil sows error, lies, wickedness, offence, and hindrance against what is good, but this sowing springs up and shows itself in persons, who are therefore, themselves also comprehended under the offences, ver. 41.

Here Christ certainly means, as the words first of all intimate, a second sowing by the evil one, which again comes amongst the wheat† after the Son of Man has first sown his good seed in the evil world, after he has sown wheat among the devil's first and every where present tares. For the devil's first sowing, the tares which the enemy has first scattered in every soul to which the word can be preached, stands already on the field of the world; for whence, otherwise, at the first preaching of the word of the kingdom, are those evil hearts which, according to the first parable, it finds? The tares here, in this parable, are then not such as grow besides of themselves on the field of the world, in so far as it is the devil's kingdom, but such as show themselves anew in the kingdom of Christ. These may properly be denoted as a second sowing, coming between the wheat, for the devil has not merely seduced men at first, but is always seducing the whole world, he delays not to come again, especially wherever God with his word of grace has come (ver. 19). He does not tear out the wheat, for this he has neither the power nor the inclination; not the power, because the strength of the good seed from God at first resists him; nor the inclination, because his malice and wickedness rather lead him to choke the wheat by a secretly growing influence, and thus to mar God's sowing. It is his greatest pleasure to sow between the wheat, nay (a truth which goes beyond the figure), to put into the wheat the danger and the tendency of again becoming tares,* just as the good sower has torn away his tares from him, and made wheat of them. But—and this is of importance afterwards as regards the answer of the householder—the second sowing is only a continuation, consequence, and manifestation of that precious and initial sowing to which it points back, as also he who in the fulness of time sows as the Son of Man, as the concealed Logos and Mediator through whom all renovation is effected, has already sown from the beginning his good seed as the preparation for his kingdom then coming into manifestation.

While men slept: almost all preachers continually interpret this of an offence and neglect on the part of the appointed watchmen (Isa. lvi. 10), and cannot omit bringing in here also, against the text, their otherwise well-founded castigation of their own order. It is not, indeed, enough to object to this interpretation, that this sleeping is afterwards not explained, for neither is there any interpretation of what is said by the servants; in like manner, taken strictly, it is not enough to say that the ἄνθρωποι, "men," in the parable are found altogether apart from the seed, the good and the bad; for the servants are represented in the same way, because the parable does not admit of its being otherwise, although they themselves are also a part of the wheat. But what already is decisive as regards the true meaning of our Lord is this, that it is by no means said: The servants slept—these rather show themselves as watching and guarding with all laudable zeal.† So indeed, in that period of the Church to which the parable chiefly points, the apostles certainly did not sleep, but watched and were zealous for the purity of the Church.‡ In addition to this, finally, the parallel parable in Mark iv. 27, gives the certain truth, that men, indeed, have day and night, that they must sleep and

* Hence, on the other hand, Augustine erroneously objected to the Donatists that world stands here for Church. This alone by no means settles the matter. Rather, because the tares are not to be cleared away from the world that is to be sown upon, they must also remain upon it after it has been sown (where we properly expect to find them).

† Observe the probably genuine reading ἐπέσπειρεν, Vulg. supersemmavit.

* Daub: "The enemy who puts into the wheat the tendency itself to become tares" (Jud. Ischar. ii. 7).

† For, with Roos for example, to speak of other servants who came afterwards as more zealous, but too late, so that now the earlier church discipline no longer prospered, is evidently against the text.

‡ Very wrongly, as also contrary even to the progress of prophetical chronology in the parables as we find it, Thiersch (12 Vorlesung) will date the occurrence later, and now accuse the bishops under the Christian empire of the criminal "sleep."

rise again at the proper time; no one in ordinary life (according to which the parable is to be explained) watches his field all night against such wickedness as that here described; consequently, by this feature of the parable nothing else is expressed than by night (as Job xxxiii. 15), in darkness and secrecy. This is the way of the evil one in all that he does, just as in the parable the malicious enemy will not sow his tares in day-light, lest the faithful servants should immediately surprise him, and counteract the mischief before it is fully accomplished. Secretly does the enemy put his seed into the Lord's field, reckoning on its springing up at a later period, so that no one observes him but the Lord alone, who indeed knows all; secretly does he go his way —in which words the same thing is said—he is contented with his work, and is quite willing to be denied by all who think that there is no devil, or that he has at least done and accomplished nothing more here—until the confusion, alas! discovers itself, and the doubtful "Whence?" is no longer to be warded off. Precisely this is the signification of that feature in the parable, of which Neander thinks that, being introduced merely to fill up the picture, it has no signification.

Verse 26. Seen from a distance and in the infancy of the young vegetation, all seems to be wheat on the field; it is also called so, and the small, concealed, but strong beginnings of the hindrance, the mystery of wickedness which Satan has inserted, in opposition to the equally deep planted mystery of grace, are overlooked even by apostolic eyes without special illumination. This was the form of the Church at its commencement. Soon, however, more than one Ananias breaks forth in the midst of those who seemed to have one heart and one soul in Christ; more than one Simon among those who believed and were baptized. What the third kind of ground before represented in the case of the individual, was, is here repeated: when the grain shot higher and brought forth fruit, then were seen the tares now much more rapidly out-growing it. Τότε ἐφάνη, then they became manifest, and, by the want of good fruit, or rather by their bad fruit, were known as a spurious, pernicious after-growth, imitating the form of the wheat. It is not without special reason that Christ has not here again said ἄκανθαι, thorns, in general, but ζιζάνια, tares; for although both go together, and tares of every kind are not here excluded, he yet brings into prominence the special reference of the tares to the wheat in their worst species. Ζιζάνια signifies what we call darnel, also after-wheat, cockle-weed, etc. It is, as Schubert, in his "Natural History" significantly says, the "only poisonous grass," the true counterpart to corn in nature, hard to distinguish from wheat. Christ has certainly both these things in his eye, its resemblance to wheat, and its poisonous noxiousness, and it is not without reason that, in the striking change of name, he here penetrates into the physiology of nature. When, however, in the Talmud, where the word is זוֹנִין (instead of זְנִין), coined etymologically from זנה, actual wheat of a degenerate kind is understood by the expression,* this is indeed true in a certain sense, but by no means corresponds to the parable of Christ, in which the genuine is distinguished from the spurious, the fruitful grain from the tares, even from their origin and seed. He here teaches his servants to distinguish what is not from God but from the evil one, although, with false and hypocritical appearance, it stands in the midst of what is good; he even predicts already that with knowing glance they shall be able to detect it when its time comes.† Thus might it be said, at the same time, that the mixture in the Church of Christ is not so much any thing new, as rather a separation of the mixture already acknowledged to exist in the world; for, inasmuch as the servants of the Lord even now see and lament the mixture in the Church, it may be said that the old and the new tares of the evil one, because they grow among the wheat, have become manifest. When the world becomes the Church-field, then its sin will show itself in a different way from what it did before. So is it, and so will it be, just as there is no field or garden upon earth without tares, which must be weeded out: this Christ assures us of, and predicts, up to this point (in the first part of the parable), only as a fact, as in the entire foregoing parable; now, however, he carries the thing farther to the important question and answer.

Verses 27, 28. Is not this a field and thy field? This is the question which these servants address to this Master, well knowing what and how much they are saying, and presenting thus their question in a form all the more enigmatical, and, so far as regards their own thoughts, unanswerable in contrast to the actual state of things. Where wheat grows there is a field, there a previous sowing has taken place, a sowing of good seed; else, whence comes the good fruit? The wheat then makes the field, be it much or little, even though ten times as many tares should stand "among the wheat" (or "upon the field," ver. 36, for this is the same thing). Now the servants farther know so much of their Master, that, in a question which wants and needs no answer, they unconditionally take it for granted that he has sown no darnel on his field! They do not imagine, like many, for whom the

---

* When in the times of the flood the earth committed whoredom, seed was sown and the earth brought forth זוֹנִין instead. Hence now the bastard grows among the grain.

† If the literature of the Apocryphal and Gnostic periods (truly the first ζιζάνια) are now again sought for, so as to cause offence and confusion—this is pure wilfulness. Others rightly set before those who are candid precisely this spurious material, in order to a salutary and convincing comparison with the genuine.

perplexing whirl of church-history and heresy-history yields no other result in the end but fearful doubt, that all this must have arisen from the seed not having been quite pure at the beginning. So much the more enigmatically—as the darnel has evidently been carefully sown in abundance—does the unavoidable doubt present itself: Whence has this field these tares? As good servants of the good and wise householder, they do not lose confidence in him, they do not immediately leave his service when they find matters so, but come to him with the question, as modest as it is urgent, in which they confess their difficulty. This, now, is indeed the proper question of all questions, the ground-question of the philosophy of all times, relating to the origin of evil, the enigma of sin in God's world. It treats of the tares in the world, which appears as an after-wheat even on the place where Christ has sown, and look all the worse on this account; and this second sowing points plainly enough back to a first sowing of tares in the garden of God. When we find already in the earth the positive "tendency to inculture, to wildness," this is to be regarded as a true type of humanity—which, without a first evil in it, would not be so immediately susceptible of that which destroys the good implanted in it. Inasmuch, then, as the servants inquire first of all only after the origin of the evil in the new planting, their question points also back to the other, concerning the origin of evil in general, and in reality includes it. It is as if Christ here put into the mouths of those who heard the foregoing parable—the question: Has God, then, made human hearts having rocky-ground and thistle-seed in them? In this deeper sense of the question, let us mark and feel the strong earnestness and emphasis of the answer to such a question: An enemy hath done this.

Thus does the entire holy Scripture reply to this question, not otherwise, not less and not more. This great answer removes the origin of evil in the human world, as completely from God, as from man, inasmuch as it names the evil one; but further than this, it answers nothing, and we, too, ought to rest satisfied with this. I have sown no tares! Thus testifies the Creator, from whom nothing evil proceeds, and this is already pre-supposed by all servants, who honestly ask, even before they receive the answer. He who, in any way, so speculates as to trace back to God the occasion and ordination of sin, be it in phrases ever so cunningly concealed—has against him God's pure and clear word in the Scripture, as also in the conscience; he makes Christ a liar, who not merely in his word, but in his whole person and manifestation, in his entire new sowing of the good seed, is the living, actual protestation of God against all fellowship of his holiness with what is evil. So far from the righteous Father having created it, he sets himself directly against it in his Son, and it is his work to judge it and to eradicate it. But, just as little is the first origin of evil to be ascribed to man, and the kingdom of hell is not on the earth (Wisd. i. 14). All that is evil in man has its root in a deeper, altogether spiritual, kingdom of evil—of evil which is completely so, originally and finally—and is only its sowing and issue. He who so speculates as presumptuously to rob the poor man of his single excuse, which in reality has still a ground of truth: "The serpent deceived me"—let him see well whether he is not going against the Scripture, as well as against the inmost testimony of conscience, and rendering the enigma still more inexplicable by making out flesh and blood itself to be Satan.* No, the householder, in his answer, adheres to what is right. There is an enemy who is his enemy (ver. 25), and of whom with a sublime simplicity, he assures his servants who were not able to comprehend his night work: An enemy has done this! In the parable it is properly ἐχθρὸς ἄνθρωπος, a hostile man, i. e., here, as opposed to Christ, a hostile being,† although with perfect justice, and with a profound penetration into the sense of the words, Luther taking already into view the interpretation in ver. 39, renders: The enemy hath done this! For the householder will thereby tacitly say, at the same time: Vex not yourselves, I know well what you know not, I know my enemy. It is not to be overlooked, how the σπείρων τὸ καλὸν σπέρμα, "one sowing the good seed," is followed by the enemy as the ὁ σπείρας τὰ ζιζάνια, "the one that sowed the tares," who has sown the tares, as now, so also from the beginning. This is as much as to say, Who else, then, is the evil one but this beginner and father of all evil? The sin which exists only in the living, personal will, can have no beginning out of the personal will; its origin must be in a beginner. There is then "a kingdom of conscious wickedness," out of the human—a point of unity and beginning in a radically evil personality. This, again, is among the things hid from the foundation of the world, and this answer is no answer. For the householder says nothing further; and if we speculators, less modest than these servants, should begin again to ask, Whence then comes the enemy and the devil? thou hast surely not created him! how, then, has he become the devil? the householder in the parable is silent, and the whole Scripture and revelation is silent at this limit, as also Moses at the very beginning of it in Gen. i. 2, mentions the brooding darkness, and lets the serpent speak in paradise

---

* "The doctrine concerning Satan belongs to the revelations which God hath given to man"—aye, even to those doctrines that are especially kind and comforting. He who denies here, only accuses himself beyond what is due.

† In the Roman law there are punishments against such malice on the part of hostile neighbors. Roberts (Orient. Illustr.) speaks of Indian proverbs concerning this; Trench (on the Parables), who cites this, mentions a case which occurred in Ireland of a dismissed tenant who acted thus out of revenge.

without a how or whence. The angels may, perhaps, know the when and the outward how, a little more exactly than we children of men could understand it even if any thing were written about it; but the internal How? and Whence? of the fall is most probably just as much hid from them as from us. For sin is just that which is absolutely perverse, it is that which has no ground; how, then, could there be another ground out of it from which it might be explained? The Creator alone, before whom there is no mystery, fathoms the abyss, as he does the hearts, of men (Sir. xlii. 18); hell is naked before him and destruction has no covering (Job xxvi. 6). To the eye of the creature the final judgment and the origin of evil are equally dark abysses In fine, we poor sons of man, to whom this word concerning the devil yet gives some comfort, ought to rest satisfied with this: the tares are there, are actually manifest as such—and the good, wise, householder says: They are not from me! It is an enemy. When, therefore, that heathen, urging the missionary for information beyond this point, asks, Why does God not slay the devil (as even Kant relates in his Rel. innerhalb der Gränzen d. blossen Vernunft, p. 100), it is better to be silent than with affected wisdom to say with Daub (Jud. Ischar. ii. 178), "He could only answer—From love to thee." This unsatisfactory answer, however, Daub endeavors to confirm with no small acuteness.*

Verses 28, 29. The servants, with a modesty and contentedness with the answer they had received which might well be imitated by us, proceed no further theoretically, indeed, although practically they do. Quite naturally and pardonably, with a zeal, indeed, which is at least more laudable than the vain curiosity that might have inquired further, If thou knowest it why didst thou suffer it? couldst thou not ward off the malice of the enemy, and protect this field? hast thou then, the Master, been at fault, hast thou slept? they rather draw the hasty inference: If the hurtful and scandalous tares are not there with thy will, then wilt thou not that we act as faithful servants and get rid of them where and how we may be able? Who are these servants, and what is meant by this rooting out? Precisely these two things are omitted in the explanation which is given of the parable, an omission which many a commentator may have greatly regretted. But in the first place, Christ will thereby show that the centre point of the parable by no means lies (as is falsely supposed) in this prohibition to root out the tares, but really and only in the disclosure made in the words: The enemy hath done this! from which follows all that is further said in the way of setting their minds at rest, and the reference to the end of the world. Accordingly, it would have been somewhat superfluous to have said further to the apostles: Ye are these servants. They saw well enough, from the explanation of the rest of the parable, that they were represented by these persons, and would soon perceive this still more clearly when the parable was fulfilled in history. What concerns our practice is made clear to us by practice, if we but give honest heed to Christ's word. The servants are plainly enough the workmen in the employment of their master, whose business it is to take care of the field until the harvest; and although they, at the same time, are a part of the good seed, they are yet represented here as in their official character distinct from the field and belonging to the master.

A short and direct No comes from the mouth of Christ in reply to their question; and here (more than formerly in connection with the sower) is the proper place for speaking of an extraordinary husbandry, in which the process is not the same as in the natural. For this is actually the import of the answer—Here the case is quite different, and the thing is not done merely by your thus weeding out the tares; just as it was not you who sowed the good seed, and saw the enemy in the night, so neither are you the people for making a speedy end to the mischief! True it is, that in ordinary husbandry the weeds are carefully rooted out as much as possible (ver. 40, ὥσπερ συλλέγεται καὶ καίεται, as this is wont to be done), and the servants do not first ask whether they may or ought to do so; but here the master forbids it. Now, that we may rightly understand him, what does he forbid and what does he not forbid?* Above all things it is not the rooting out of tares by each individual from his own heart (ver. 22), a duty that is, on the contrary, strongly enjoined, for which we need only refer to Matt. vers. 29, 30. Neither, further, are we to understand as meant a duty equally self-evident, namely, the combatting of all sins and lies (which proceed from the devil) by the good word of God, the word of truth—in which Christ himself has laid this down as an unconditional principle in chap. xv. 13.† We are not therefore to look on with open eyes and slack hands when, in broad day, the enemy works mischief and puts hindrances in the way; we are by no means heedlessly and indifferently to let the darnel stand when we see it because it is there, much less are we to call it wheat (Isa. ver. 20). Further, nothing is said here of the office of worldly magistrates whom God has appointed to take vengeance on evil doers, even to the punishment of death, but only of that which the servants of Christ as such should or should not do in his Church, in his spiritual husbandry. There is no ground certainly for that distinction between darnel and other tares, on which, e. g., Melancthon, Calvin, Bengel, and others lay great stress, as if open and gross sinners who are well known are by all means to be rooted out, but not the "outside Christians," as Wesley expresses it, who cannot be identified; for on the one hand it is taken for granted, that the servants knew well enough what was the after-wheat—and that not merely in the way of presumption, as is groundlessly maintained in Tholuck's Anzeiger—on the other hand, the explanation of the parable afterwards given includes actual σκανδαλα or "offences" among the tares that are to be allowed to remain. Should it be said (as is there also maintained), that these are only such as have come to maturity at the time of the harvest, while their doubtful beginning formerly afforded ground for the prohibition to root them out—we cannot regard this distinction as in accordance either with the text or the thing itself; for assuredly from the very first there existed manifest offences enough, and it was precisely these that drew forth the question of the servants in the parable. Still (without needing to justify this in opposition to the parable) all true Church discipline by the word, the key which looseth and bindeth even to the putting away of the bad from the Church (Matt. xviii. 17; 1 Cor. ver. 13), retains its undisputed right; for this is so self-evident that on this very account the parable can contain no special reference to it, and may simply without any danger abide by what it says. The parable moves in quite a different sphere from that of the question concerning Church discipline. The true explanation rather lies in this, that while even the strictest Church discipline reaches only in certain extreme cases to the temporary casting out in order to reformation, the question here respects the general removal without more ado of all that is essentially bad, spurious in itself. The householder forbids and will not allow what the servants wish. These would have all the tares removed entirely from the field, from their place among the wheat, from the kingdom of Christ (ver. 41). But because the field is the world, that were equivalent to removing the bad out of the world (slaying the heretics), in order that the good may not, on their account, have to leave the world so as to have a pure field of God—and so strange a thing as this, the impossibility of which is at the same time self-evident, the servants themselves neither imagine nor wish; for in the original text they really speak neither of weeding nor of rooting out, but of συλλέγειν, "gathering;" so that, as appears right to them, every thing may properly be in its own place. They would like to have a pure field of pure wheat; and this to God's wisdom, goodness and justice is impossible. They do not rightly know themselves what they would have in their inconsiderate hasty word—and this is the key to the right understanding of it. For—and we speak now beyond the figure, inasmuch as the words themselves truly point beyond the figure—if the servants had gathered the tares, it would have been difficult for them to find out where to have put them, seeing that, as servants, they could not condemn; and the everlasting fire is as little in their power and at their command as any other world into which they might, in the meanwhile, deliver over and convey the evil-doers —any other, we say, because their duty is to bring the Gospel to the whole of this world as the field of Christ, but not to transport sinners beyond its limits as bad neighbors.

[* This position of the author, respecting the inscrutableness of the origin and final cause of evil, is especially commended to the reader, as being equally sound in philosophy and in theology.—Am Ed.]

* In Tholuck's Litt. Anzeiger (1847, Nos. 33, 34), there is a good review of the principal points connected with this question, showing how commentators have at all times taken pains with the answer to this question in its various aspects, and puzzled themselves with impertinencies which they have raised contrary to the parable. But when in that article Stier is classed with those interpreters who have not yet even touched the real difficulty, let it be remembered that the strict interpretation of ζιζάνια, which is there afterwards denoted as the only solution of the difficulty, had already been given precisely so by me, together with many other things, in which I think that I have hit the true sense not less successfully than has been done in that treatise.

† Here Thiersch for example is quite right when he renews the old distinction: The prohibition has respect not to evil things (false doctrine and ordi-

There is then good ground for the No. It duly acknowledges, at the same time, their well-meant, not less laudable than inconsiderate earnestness and zeal; it is given not in the way of rebuke but of friendly instruction; hence, with what immediately follows, it does not remain a mere blunt negative, but takes the form of a confidential, condescending, instructive opening up of the ground and reason of the prohibition. If your clumsy hands were to be applied to the complete weeding out of the world and the Church-field, you would destroy the good with the bad! How? First, because in your shortsightedness you could not enough distinguish between them; the full-grown tare, as also the wheat, which has already come to fruit, you might know well enough, but the tender springing of the good seed from ever successive sowing (τὸν χόρτον), you might, in your zeal (which would rather do too much than too little, so that you might only make thorough work of it), mistake many a blade of it for tares—just as, on the other hand, many a future darnel would escape your detection.* Then the roots of the enemy's sowing lie so deep that you might not be able to get down to them, and there would be no end to your work, as the tares would always spring up again.† Further, in the nances to which the Catholic Church shows so much indulgence!) but to persons, to evil ones.

* They have shown throughout the entire history of the Church, that they cannot yet perfectly distinguish between the tares and the wheat—the greater the zeal so much the less have they been able!

† Outside the parable, which indeed speaks only of wheat and tares from the first sowing, lies the truth in itself right and important, that the tares also may, under God's patience, yet become wheat. In this does the word of Christ only thus touch the limit of the parable, that we should cherish the fear third place: Even although you could rightly distinguish every blade, and could get down even to the undermost roots, you would yet, even against your will, pull away and root out the wheat ἅμα αὐτοῖς, with them. For the roots of the two kinds of plant are as much intertwined with each other in the common earth as the plants on the surface, and even more so. Men in the world are, by the relationships of state, nation, family, and the like, so entwined with each other, and have so grown together, so to speak, that the hand of man must infallibly hurt the good, if at any cost it would entirely separate it from the bad.* So close between the wheat has the enemy in his cunning sown his tares, so thoroughly has he penetrated all the relations of men with his mischief, even those in which grace carries on its deep-laid work; but God's wisdom (not yours!) will keep watch over the good and the true, preserving the good and judging the evil-doers. Men have therefore to give good heed to that warning: Destroy it not, for there is a blessing in it (Isa. lxv. 8), as also to the apostolical rule: The Lord hath given power to edify, not to destroy (2 Cor. xiii. 10). It is most true, then, that in weeding out the tares (as Hamann says), we should make slow haste, lest summum jus be perverted into summa injuria. Finally, when Zinzendorf, as Schubert informs us, had recourse to the expedient of pulling up and transplanting the wheat, this was just the same mistake in another form; in all such Churches and congregations there is felt the necessity of preserving the tares which are ever again rising up among them, at least in the outward appearance and form of the wheat, so that they may be able to say at last: Here we have thoroughly weeded out! And then, with good intent indeed, they account for the growth of the worst tares by bringing the charge of base hypocrisy against such.† In short, the householder carries the point against his servants.

Verse 30. In order completely to set their zeal at rest he kindly says still more to them, gives them an answer which goes beyond their question, and intimates to them in what this state of things, which they are meanwhile to tolerate, will at length issue, after having shown them whence it was. They are right in this, that tares are not wheat, and wheat is not tares, and further in this, that both cannot always remain mixed and together. Therefore he says: Leave the matter to me, it will be rightly attended to in its proper season! He names both classes, and therefore recognizes only these two classes: the tares, which are in the least degree poisonous, are yet tares, and the humblest blade, with its one or two corns on the short light ear is yet true wheat; the least among the little is still a child of the kingdom, as he who yet bears no fruit is still an evil-doer. The separation will not fail to take place when the evil which has come amongst the good in the world, the former and future kingdom of God, will be judged and done away with. But only when this harvest comes will be the right time for this; now is the season for necessary development towards maturity. This development is wonderfully attained, just by the intermingling of the good and the bad.* If the evil-doers were all together on one land, what a hell upon earth! Therefore is their power broken, while apparently greater freedom is given to it. But if the good were all together undisturbed by the bad, would it not be desirable? By no means, for they are not yet perfectly good, and would not grow to maturity in righteousness without conflict and temptation, without the practice of faithfulness and love among sinners. Therefore only let both grow (Rev. xxii. 11) and grow together —which Matthew aptly expresses by the single word συναυξάνεσθαι. The harvest is the end of the world, i. e., of this now mixed state and course of the world, τοῦ αἰῶνος; and the true reapers, better qualified and furnished for this than the servants who themselves belong to this present world, will be the angels, to whom Christ will in due time commit the work which he now forbids his servants to do (Rev. xiv. 15). These angels are just as little figures of speech or parables as the devil is; both are realities by which the parable is explained.† First of all the tares are to be gathered together, so that the righteous may witness with hallelujahs the judgments of God, and all that was right and pure in their former zeal for God's kingdom and glory satisfied; but the condemned are put out like Judas in the night, when the Son of Man is glorified among his own. What bundles these will be—many smaller ones in the one great bundle—when those who have sinned together, in particular the seducer and seduced, will now also suffer punishment together, and pain determined by the strictest retributive justice will consummate such fellowship!‡ That they

---

of rooting out future wheat along with the tares. Jerome: Monemur, ne cito amputemus fratrem, quia fieri potest, ut ille, qui hodie noxio depravatus est dogmate, cras resipiscat.

* Tares in general twine themselves very firmly above and under the earth. The darnel or cockle-weed, which is found with us among the oats, is moreover very difficult to root out, because it continues in the earth three years.

† What Lange says here is not too sharply paradoxical, that these zealous servants (as Christ, elevated above their strong feeling, sees) would be more dangerous to the wheat than the enemy—nay, that the weeders who are still to be found in the field of wheat are guilty of an offence against the distinct command of Christ.

* Or, as might also be said, of the called and the elect. For "it contradicts all ideas of Church and Christianity to attempt to fix the limits of the Church of the elect and to leave the Church of the called to itself" (Nitzsch, Prakt. Theol. i. 197).

† To understand with many (e. g. recently Zeller in Beuggen) by these angels (as opposed to the devil!) men risen from the dead, is an altogether unjustifiable caprice.

‡ It is only an ingenious application with a certain measure of truth, when Zeller remarks on may be burned —as is wont to be done with thorns and thistles and all tares, when any one has cleared a field of these (2 Sam. xxiii. 7). But put the wheat into my barn—he here reminds the people again of the Baptist's words, concerning him who will thoroughly purge his floor and gather his wheat into the garner (chap. iii. 12); he thus, at the conclusion, as yet without any explanation, tells all who have ears to hear, who is the householder in this parable. Observe, at the same time, the singular ἀποθήκην, barn, which will represent itself temporarily, in the purified Church of the latter time, finally, in the glorified earth.

Verses 41—43. After some brief hints, he reserves for the disciples the more full and proper disclosure of the mighty consummation. First of all he now adds to the κατακαῦσαι, burn, of the parable in the repetition at ver. 41 an express πυρί, in the fire, in order that having given a distinct meaning to every thing else he may also explain this figurative fire (ch. vi. 30) as the metaphor for another real fire, so that in this feature also the figure and the thing almost coincide, although the πῦρ ἄσβεστον (unquenchable fire) of the Gehenna is of another kind from our present fire. So much only is certain from the place in which the words occur, that we are not at liberty to say of this furnace of fire that it is again a mere figure. It is the real lake of fire (Rev. xix. 20), of which already such passages as Psa. xxi. 10 remotely prophesy; it is by no means merely the expression taken from the furnace into which the grass is cast, or into which oriental despots, such as Nebuchadnezzar, caused criminals to be cast. The wailing and gnashing of teeth (ch. viii. 12; xxii. 13; xxiv. 51) are to be understood in the same real sense, for these tares are not consumed in the eternal fire, else it would not be unquenchable, and they never again become wheat. The Son of Man will send his angels—this points back to the entire import of John i. 51, and forward to all the plain intimations concerning the judgment hereafter given as in Matt. xvi. 27; xxiv. 31; xxv, 31. Stumbling-blocks and evil-doers we find mentioned together already in Zeph. i. 3 (הַמַּכְשֵׁלוֹת אֶת־הָרְשָׁעִים), and in Job xxxviii. 13 mention is made of the evil doers who shall at some time be shaken out of the earth; passages which Christ has doubtless in mind here. The putting together of these two has for the most part not been rightly understood, inasmuch as the stumbling-blocks are taken to denote either, in the first place, the false teachers and disturbers of the Church (Rom. xvi. 17), or, on the other hand, the idea is supposed to be expressed that every evil-doer and worthless person in the kingdom of God, already by his very existence is a σκάνδαλον, a stumbling-block or "offence" (as we have explained at ch. xii. 30). Christ, however, seems to speak here plainly of things and persons: in such a way, indeed, that the evil-doers themselves again belong to the general conception of things that offend in the kingdom; still, by the latter being placed first, more is said than can be explained of individual persons.* For there are offences brought into existence, indeed, by evil-doers, and continuing to live in evil-doers, which have often arisen at an early period, and then remain long, and continue to work their mischievous effects. "Religious and ethical heresies," according to the common usage of the phrase, is not comprehensive enough; there are stones of stumbling, evils, corruptions of the most various kinds, as political, etc. All these (πάντα τὰ σκάνδαλα, so that not one shall be overlooked or left behind) shall then be removed with the judgment of those who have raised them up, or who have fallen upon them, and been broken.

Then remain the righteous, who are matured and perfected in righteousness. What a separation! This takes place, indeed, by virtue of the necessary internal attraction of what is homogenous, as soon as God loses the bonds of the present order of things; but he will also employ his heavenly servants in the doing of this for his own honor and their happiness, as a reward of their faithful services to the children of men, and as a final recompense of their perseverance in righteousness. Then it will be seen that it was no punishment or injury to the wheat to stand among the tares, but rather that it has been thereby ripened for the garner. Then will the righteous who, hitherto, have borne the light of God within them or have been obscured from without, shine forth, from this concealment (ἐκλάμψουσιν; as in Wis. iii. 7, ἀναλάμψουσιν, and Dan. xii. 3, Cod. Alex. also ἐκλάμψουσιν). This is the simple sense of the word, and it contains no answer to the foolish question of Origen, the father of those who hold a final restoration: "For whom will they shine but for those who are below, who are to become partakers of their light as the sun gives them light upon earth? For they will surely not shine for themselves." They will shine in and for God's glory, just as the sun now shines before it appears, and where it does not appear to men. As the sun: this is an explanation of Daniel's splendor of the heavens (צֹהַר הָרָקִיעַ), which means Christ the sun of righteousness, whom all his righteous ones shall resemble in glory; but at the same time, and first of all, it is to be understood also physically, accordthese bundles, how the ecclesiastical, political, social tares, driven by the tendency to association, will more and more separate themselves from the ground of the Church, and unite in all sorts of societies, sects, clubs, etc. (as already Cocceius brought forward something similar in his, in other respects, very strange "Prophetico-historical Interpretation"). The bundles in the text are bound by the angels evidently only at the end of the world—the associations of sinners formed already beforehand of themselves, only prefigure and pioneer the way for these.

* To go back to the figure, as it were the stones (of offence) and the tares.

ing to what we find more particularly stated in 1 Cor. xv. 40, 41. In their Father's kingdom: that is the highest and last, whereas the kingdom of heaven hitherto upon earth is called only his—the Son of Man's; for it extends to the time when the Son shall give over the kingdom to the Father. It means: They shall be called children of God (chap. v. 9, as the others of the evil one), and God shall honor them as a Father as highly as he can—"glory in them as a rich father in his well-trained children" (Val. Herberger). And at the conclusion of the explanation Christ adds for the disciples, as before at the first parables for the people, the awakening call: Who hath ears to hear, let him hear!

PARABLES OF THE MUSTARD SEED AND THE LEAVEN.

(Matt. xiii. 31–33; Mark iv. 30–32; Luke xiii. 18–21.)

Grow till the harvest! The parable that follows is connected with this conclusion of the foregoing, and contains first of all the prophecy that the small and imperceptible seed would yet grow to something great, that from the present sowing of the husbandman and householder (and the people must have in part perceived who was thereby meant), which had to encounter so much opposition and hindrance, there would spring up in due season a heavenly kingdom upon earth, as well, at least, as any other so-called kingdom. But when it is grown—this is, with respect to the sense, to be understood in the future; as in Mark the growing is still more strongly marked as the principal point by the two fold expression ἀναβαίνειν, grow up, and ποιεῖν κλάδους μεγάλους, shoot out great branches.* But as already in the two foregoing parables the second contained the explanatory ground of the first, so here the leaven stands in the same relation to the grain of mustard seed. The reason why the small seed of the kingdom of heaven, which is sown in the world, grows and spreads to such an extent is, that it has a penetrating, transforming, inwardly quickening power, a power to lay hold on every thing around it. Such growth is carried on, therefore, also outwardly before the eyes of men; not thus alone, however, but still more by an unseen efficacy. As has already been said above, Christ here still views the progressive development of his kingdom as a whole, but he makes at the same the hinted transaction to the esoteric parables, which exhibit the real existence and continued possession of that kingdom in the souls of those individuals who, with self-denial, lay hold on it. With the extension and penetration in the mass there is mingled not a little of false appearance, which, only in virtue of its pointing to the genuine growth and leavening that takes place in the true children of the kingdom, still retains a certain figurative truth. If, in the first parable, greater prominence was given to the individual, and in the second to the kingdom as a whole, the two following should now be understood as if in addition to these it were said: The kingdom of heaven, viewed as a whole and in its individual members, is like, etc.

In Mark, verse 30, the Rabbinical formula τίνι ὁμοιώσωμεν, "whereunto shall we liken," etc., precedes, which recurs also in Luke xiii. 18, and is likewise a ground for the conjecture, that Luke there inserts, by way of repetition, what had been spoken before—if we do not find any connection in that place (which appears to me almost impossible) to warrant the supposition of an actual repetition by Christ. At all events, it is to be supposed that Christ really, as Mark has it, spoke in the striking form of we, wherewith he, as it were, unites in counsel with himself, and in the most friendly manner engages to a favorable hearing, if not the people, at least the disciples who were around him. Such a communicative form of address (for it is such, and John iii. 11 is falsely compared with it) is, in the mouth of Christ, an infinitely greater condescension than when Paul in his epistles says: What shall we then say?

The change of the figure, which was calculated as well to rouse the attention as to show the thing itself in new aspects, lies not merely in this, that the entire kingdom itself again appears as a seed-corn, but the transition is now also made from the noblest and most important product of the earth for man, the claims of which have already been acknowledged by the use made of it in the foregoing parables, to another species; from corn and wheat to garden products and herbs (λάχανα); hence while in Matthew the expression ἐν τῷ ἀγρῷ αὐτοῦ, in his field, recurs, just as at ver. 24, and Mark has the more indefinite ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς, in the earth, Luke says definitely εἰς κῆπον ἑαυτοῦ, "into his garden." The mustard-seed is the smallest of all seeds—by the ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς, which is repeated here in Mark, might be understood: Which are sown in the earth by the hand of man. It is still further to be supplied, as there are indeed smaller seeds: In proportion to the greatness of the herb. And although even this should not be literally true, as, for example, our acorn as compared with the oak might make the superlative questionable, still the proverbial force of the expression remains (and Christ was ever ready to avail himself of such proverbs), which seems to be hinted at here, especially by the ὁμοιώσωμεν: To use a common saying in this country (where, for example, there were no poppies, as has been observed). The Rabbins called the mustard מִין זְרָעִים, only a sort of seed (quasi-seed), and

* Here already, therefore, it is not merely growth with respect to size or height, but also length and breadth—as Roos would thus quite superficially distinguish between the third and fourth parables.

כְּחַרְדַּל, as a mustard-seed, is proverbial with them for any very small thing, as, for example, Maimonides (in More Nevochim) contrasts the circle of the heavens with the mustard-seed, as the smallest possible thing (בְּחַכְלִית הַקְּטַנּוּת). In like manner, there are to be found in their writings accounts of the sometimes extraordinary size of the mustard plant in the East, as of one with three branches, one of which covered a potter's tent, of another on which the owner climbed up as on a fig tree. Accordingly Christ says truly, that this λάχανον or herb, contrary to the general rule, becomes a δένδρον or tree, as being, so to speak, nature's miracle of great growth, so that we are not under the necessity of supposing the more indefinite meaning of the Heb. עֵץ (tree). Along with the proverbial, however, he here also (as in the darnel before) glances at the typical element in natural history, according to which a particular seasoning, quickening, and leavening virtue is ascribed to the mustard-seed. That he has this in mind is to be supposed from its being placed side by side with the parable of the leaven, for which it prepares the way; although to keep by this as the principal point and to carry it out, would be unmeaning indeed. But this twofold reference to nature itself, and to the form of speech among men derived from it, is not enough; the figure as to the way in which it is carried out points farther back to the Holy Scripture, as we found was the case also in the second parable. For precisely in connection with those beginnings of the prophecy of Isaiah in ch. xi. 1 and iv. 2 (from which Christ had here taken the citation, ch. vi. 9, 10, and many other allusions), stands that word in Ezek. xvii. 22–24, where, literally as here, the Messiah and his kingdom is compared to a high tree grown from a tender twig, so that all birds dwell under the shadow of its branches. Great tree—this is generally the prophetic figure for the kingdoms of the world, as may be seen farther in Ezek. xxxi. 3–14; Dan. iv. 7–9, where there is always the characteristic notice of the birds dwelling in it. Observe, therefore, by what a wise selection, by what an ingenious allusion, Christ here speaks thus and no otherwise of the kingdom of heaven: If even earthly kingdoms grew from small beginnings to great power and extent, much more would this kingdom not fail of a similar growth. Observe further how, precisely by this figure, the outward appearance of the Church in the world is denoted also with respect to its might and power to afford protection, as being also a kingdom like great kingdoms.* If therefore not directly state churches (which are only the dangerous and never entirely to be averted consequence of the thing in its imperfection), yet certainly national churches are according to the mind and will of Christ.* What then are the birds but, in the first place, the many men and nations who are brought beneath the shelter of this protecting structure (in Homer ἔθνεα πολλὰ πετεινῶν). They come, in the missionary time when the Church is being set up with power and honor, like doves to their windows (Isa. lx. 8). They either sing under the branches of the tree which Christ has planted for them (Psa. civ. 12, 16, 17)—being now true birds of heaven in the kingdom of heaven)—the praise of him who has prepared a house and rest for them in his altars (Psa. lxxxiv. 4, 5)—the reader will pardon this play upon all these sacred figures which run into each other—or they dwell without knowing it under the shadow and shelter (see Mark) which outward Christendom with its manifold blessings affords.

Is not this the history of the Church with its great and mighty facts represented in an interesting figure, especially for a certain period, which was spoken of above? One cannot cease from comparing the little mustard-seed in the field or garden of Judea, with this shadowing tree of the nations, and from paying devout homage to him who has here so simply foretold this: Maximum ex minimo, in minimo (the greatest from the least, in the least)—this is the principle that obtains in the wonders of nature, but it is still more in history, and most of all, finally, in the internal history of the kingdom of God in the heart, the sign and seal of the divine operation, of divine power in the new creation of grace. As a man knows indeed what a small mustard-seed he has sown quietly and unobserved on his field, so the counsel of God by Christ here testifies, and the import is: With these prophetical words as to the will and counsel of God agrees the fact, it has been so, and will ever be so before our eyes. But it could not be otherwise. Trust not to anything great in this world which is not small in its beginning, for then it grows not from the kernel, or else in all probability the tree could begin from the branches ere it has roots. He who would work deeply and widely in the kingdom of Christ, must go with Christ into the depths, and then the result of his labors as regards their breadth will be seen in due time.

Let us now, however, inquire more particularly what is the period in the history of the Church, when first the grown-up tree spreads forth its sheltering branches. Yes, the sign of Jonah has become to the world a preaching of repentance, the cross of a heavenly sign of victory; the Roman empire becomes a Roman kingdom of heaven, a Church of Christ, a Catholic Church for the barbarians of all lands. The hosts of wanderers in the migra-

* Lange well observes in his interpretative manner: As the mustard-seed even changes its species, passing from an herb to a sort of tree, so does the kingdom of heaven pass into the species and likeness of a great world-state.

* [A palpable example is this observation of the author, of the bias of education and ecclesiastical connections upon the most evangelical minds.—Am. Ed.]

tions of the people turn into this home. But is this now really the true and genuine kingdom of heaven, so that the outward appearance corresponds with its internal nature? By no means! The victory of Christianity over the world leads to its secularization: here first, in right earnest, the pernicious darnel grows luxuriantly, the false Christians and after-Christians (after wheat) crowding round the imperial throne and the bishop's seat, and a leaven of wickedness and knavery is at work. They maintain a controversy about Easter, which does not sound like a pleasant song of praise among the branches; the new Pharisees and Sadducees come; the return to the fundamental errors of Israel in the Old Testament—errors which the cross ought to have destroyed—strongly progresses; and many Samaritans, if not even Ammonites, take part unhindered in the building of the temple. On such a view, it is more pardonable in some commentators than at first sight we might be willing to allow, when they have understood the leaven in the following parable (as every where else in Scripture it denotes what is bad) to represent the remaining corruption in the Church.* This certainly needs no refutation, for Christ does not say: The kingdom of heaven is like three measures of meal into which a woman who is an enemy mixes her leaven (something like the wickedness in the ephah, Zech. v. 6–8)—but like a leaven which a woman took, just as a grain of mustard-seed which a man sowed. Moreover, in Luke xiii. 18, where these two parables stand alone, it is not possible to suppose that they contain a prediction of the corruptions in the Church, as, for example, the Berleuburg Bible, which maintains this in reference to Matthew, must itself acknowledge. But if in the figure of the mustard-seed we found so manifold a reference, may not the reason why Christ here selects precisely that of the leaven be, that there is in it a side glance at the evil leaven which his prophetic eye must have also foreseen, when he spoke of the tree? Indeed, the leavening, seasoning meal is, first of all, itself the last form of the fruit in which it begins to work anew, to nourish, to show itself after the manner of the mustard-seed—and for the rising of the dough into palatable bread, the leaven is good. And yet Christ, as we every where see, can never entirely forget the further significance of the figures of nature in the types of Scripture; and if, ever since the passover and sacrifices of Israel, this word has the bad sense which he himself in other places gives to it, could he fail to have this also before his mind now? He had it in his mind, and precisely on purpose placed in opposition to it his good leaven, the heavenly leaven. To understand him thus, was so natural on the first surprise occasioned by the figure (so that the hearer must have asked: How! the kingdom of heaven too a leaven?), that I at least cannot wonder enough at finding in no commentator this idea, which yet first opens up the innermost meaning of the parable, and concedes to that mistaken interpretation what of truth belongs to it. Christ will say: With this expansion of the small seed in the field of the world, the tares of corruption will mingle all the more powerfully (like a leaven), but the good seed will notwithstanding choke the thorns, the mustard-seed will gain the victory, what is heavenly will also mingle itself with every mixture, in a word, will show itself as a subduing anti-leaven.† Thus we have the true, the entire sense of this ambiguous expression, the application of which is here changed from what is bad to what is good.

The ἐγκρύπτειν, or "hiding," which occurs only here in the New Testament, derives its emphasis first of all from this. The subduing power of the little, which yet, as it spreads, must disunite and become apparently ever less and less, will operate with such profound internal secrecy in the world and in man. The "little bit word of God" spread throughout the whole life of nations! They are both the same meal, only the one is already leavened, the other is still to be leavened with the word of God, that it may receive taste and relish to be used as bread. The whole then remains just as it was—meal or man—for God's renewing grace does not do away with what is creaturely, it does not break up and destroy the principle or forms of life that have existed in nations and individuals from their first creation.‡ The three seahs, which together make an ephah, appear in Scripture as the usual measure of a complete batch, Gen. xviii. 6; Jud. vi. 19; 1 Sam. i. 24. Christ has chiefly in mind the first of these passages, that well-known one concerning Sarah's baking for the Lord in Mamre, as the kneading is also particularly noticed there. In so far, however, as he means the whole world, all mankind, the number three may further point to the three quarters of the globe then known, or more correctly still, when viewed as a prophecy, stretching throughout all future time, it may have reference to the three sons of Noah, by whom every land is possessed, and in whom the prophetical word sees represented the whole seventy nations. This is no trifling, but quite consistent with the every where harmonious sense of Scripture. Into this entire popular life with its state developments, its art, science, wisdom, and folly, war and peace, into the entire history of the world, the good leaven enters with its secretly penetrating and subduing power, and at last it gains the upper hand. The new struggles, indeed, with the old in fermentation, and neither will bear the presence of the other, but the kneader takes care that it is impregnated, and through the fermentation the batch is produced. (In Ezek. iv. 12, where an ἐγκρυφίας ἄρτος is spoken of, ἐγκρύπτειν is used for לעג.) Luther says on this: "Just as it is impossible that the leaven, after it is once mixed with the dough, can ever again be separated from it, because it has changed the nature of the dough, in like manner is it also impossible that Christians can be severed from Christ. The dough is leavened, Satan cannot separate it from the leaven, let him boil or fry, roast or burn it, the leaven Christ remains in it, and will remain till the last day, till all are thoroughly leavened who are saved." We say in addition to this: Even Feuerbach and Bauer's worst leaven is at least penetrated by the opposition to Christianity, precisely thereby is it brought into prominence, and therefore is it already infected with the principle which finally overcomes.

* The work "On the Decree of God," etc (Frankf. 1847), so strongly tinctured with Irvingism, goes so far as to say, that not only the leaven is intended to prophecy the falling away, but (with absurd cross-interpretation) the mustard-seed also: for its tree has no fruit, while under its foliage nestles the seed-devouring birds of the evil one! And this is called "the only scriptural interpretation of these two parables."

* This is something quite different from what Richter's "House Bible" says: The mixed degeneracy and sinfulness of the no longer apostolically pure Church which now extends itself, is at the same time meant.

† Braune: As the dough is internally related to the leaven, so is the man internally related to the kingdom of God. When Zeller refers the entire parable in the last times, on the ground that then only after the judgment shall humanity be really prepared for the meal, we cannot agree with him. What would the leaven be then?

Who now is the woman who carries on the important work of kneading? It were superficial to say that the γυνή or "woman" here is merely parallel to the ἄνθρωπος, or "man" of ver. 31, because women bake as men sow, seeing that there are every where γυναῖκες σιτοποιοί, (bread making women); for the position of the words (which is never to be regarded as indifferent), is now strikingly changed. In the first parable we have merely the sower with the story about his seed; in the second the recurring superscription begins: The kingdom of heaven is like a man (coelestium similitudines ex humanis), which, in the third and fifth, is only somewhat transposed,* and appears again literally in the sixth. (On the other hand, in the seventh, where the work of separation by the angels is the principal point of view, each ἄνθρωπος or ἄνθρωποι, disappears in a passive and general "one.") If, however, the ἄνθρωπος who sowed the mustard-seed was still the heavenly Sower himself, the γυνή appears already to make the transition to the fifth and sixth parables where the ἄνθρωποι are other persons, those, namely, who now receive, find and seek what is given from heaven, and is within their reach, who themselves work it out. Thus the λαβοῦσα, who took, now obtains a further sense, and is to be taken more strictly than the foregoing λαβών. For the mustard-seed is as yet the first form of the heavenly seed which God put into the earth, but the leaven is a thing already there in relative perfection, a thing which has been made in a former and first baking. To take this and to make further use of it requires human co-operation and labor. We shall afterwards find and show, at Luke xv. 4–8, that there the woman is really the Church, namely, the true Church in which the Spirit lives, through which he works (Rev. xxii. 17): referring in passing to this proof, afterwards to be adduced, we do not stay to find here, as there, the work of the Spirit throughout the Church in the wonderful divine-human thorough working of the dough by the powerful hands of this woman.* In relation to this, the worldly Romish, pseudo-catholic missionary church, is only the historical likeness, and thus in the last of the exoteric parables a forcible transition is made from the external appearance to the internal truth.

Until the whole is leavened—or until the meal is leavened through and through (ὅλον equivalent to ὅλως). If this, in the fullest and most proper sense, is never true of the entire dough of mankind (for what then would be made of the tares and the separation at the end?) it is yet true individually and personally of the elect. These find the treasure which lies hid every where in the field, they seek and value the one pearl which, in a manifold way, offers itself to every one who knows it, so that he may entirely possess himself of it; in them the soul works through the might and impulse of the Spirit, selling all and thus obtaining all, until the whole man is leavened. And, in this depth of the microcosm, Olshausen's explanation of the three measures by spirit, soul, and body, which he brings in too soon, may find its confirmation; for—as those who have looked deeper have long since seen—Shem, Japheth, and Ham, in the microcosm of the world's history, correspond to this trichotomy of human nature. The little mustard-seed in the individual is now, as Christ also says elsewhere, the first small spark of living faith which removes all mountains, and from the small beginnings of the first graces and prayers, the sanctifying new life at length penetrates as a leaven the whole man, if he on his part does not neglect these two things, to continue in patient growth, and diligently to co-operate in the ἐγκρύπτειν or "hiding."

* Against the interpretation of Wächtler (afterwards to be spoken of), let it only be mentioned in the meantime that the "kingdom of heaven" is a quite special term, the thing compared in all these parables; therefore the apparently strictly grammatical position is not valid, and the kingdom of heaven, ver. 45, might be likened to the pearl, not to the merchant. When Plato speaks of his σοφία, that is something quite different (Stud. und Krit. 1849.)

* To knead in—that is the true work which the hand of God will have done by our hands—not to pluck out! The woman appears here as strong, if we keep in view the interpretation—by no means (as Braune thinks) as "a weak woman"—as also a child may bring the kingdom of God into a house!

THE TREASURE IN THE FIELD.—PEARL AND NET.

(Matt. xiii. 44–50.)

As the householder in the parable went, in his answer, beyond the question of the servants, and showed in addition to the Whence? also the Whither? so Jesus, with the explanation which the disciples asked, goes on to give them the next two parables over and above, which then, by the conclusion of the third, vers. 49. 50, lead back to vers. 41, 42; consequently this entire supplement of the treasure, pearl, and net, are, as it were, a developing application, a deeper explanation of the foregoing separation. Would you, as righteous, at one time shine like the sun—as those who turn many to righteousness like the brightness of heaven? Now mark and hear what I have further to say: The kingdom of heaven is again like—becomes, the nearer it draws to the separation, ever more perfectly like to a thing hid, which indeed one may find unsought, but in order to get and keep which, one must renounce every thing else; which, finally, must be even sought with the greatest earnestness, must be bought at the cost of the complete renunciation of every thing else. Those who do this are the righteous.*

According to Jewish conceptions, the kingdom of the Messiah was to be the most public thing in the world, and it was the will of Christ (ch. v. 14, 15), that the light in his followers should shine clearly before all the world (ἐκλάμπειν, ver. 43), as a city set on a hill; yet he says here beforehand that it will unfortunately not be so, least of all in the last times of trial before the judgment, in the times of obscuration caused by the mixture which comes not merely from the devil, but is, on the other hand, also the result of the divine purpose, so as to bring the leaven into contact with every thing that may be at all susceptible to it. The treasure hid in the field is, on the one hand (in connection with the second parable), still the precious seed, but at the same time also (now entirely departing from this figure) a treasure, or a precious possession in general. The field in which this treasure lies hid in the outside of the kingdom as existing in the world, viz., the Word and the Church.† Ah! how many treasure-seekers pass by, how many treasure-diggers dig beside it, because their eye and heart are turned towards another false treasure! because (to speak with Lange), they seek their bread just as in husbandry, only in a "decent conformity to the outward ordinances of worship," without truly seeking the Gospel which lies hid "deep beneath the law" (the outward ordinances, institution, etc.), like the merchant afterwards mentioned who aimed higher. The real treasure is so near them, they tread upon it and might lay hold on it with the hand, if they but knew the right spot. Luther says again: "Learn from this to know the kingdom of heaven; many seem to possess it who possess it not, and he who truly has it, seems as if he had it not." They even diligently cultivate the field of the Church, so that it may bear them—happiness and comfort in this life; but they do not see the real treasure therein, nor bring it out. Why then do they not find it, as well as this one in the parable, who is of course the representative of all true believers in common? It is not said that he sought or dug for it; the hid treasure then must have lain open enough to every true finder. It is to be observed that this finder is not, and does not need to be, such a seeker as the merchant in the next parable, but yet that he has something of his spirit and character; for he at least discerns and lays hold on what he has found. These two parables again represent two things which properly belong to each other, the offered grace of God, and the endeavor on the part of man; although these two come specially into prominence in different periods.

The fortunate finder now wants to have only the treasure, as the merchant the pearl, yet for this he buys the field. Is this, perhaps, merely a feature in the parable without particular significance? Then it would at least represent the wisdom to be used in acquiring the spiritual substance, such as the children of this world use in reference to the earthly: in order that he may make sure of not losing his discovery by any other finding it, he again covers it up and buys the piece of land; as its purchaser the treasure would at that time, according to Jewish and partly also to Roman law, belong to him. Nor was this any injustice to the possessor, who was leaving his best property to spoil in the earth, and knew neither how to find nor to value it; how, otherwise, should the right man for such a treasure get it? With still less propriety could Christ say: And he stole it, carried it off! If any one is satisfied with such an explanation of this part of the parable, let it be so; but it appears to us that the buying of the field really contains in it the deeper truth, namely, that one cannot get the treasure without the field, i. e., that no one can have the jewel of the kingdom of heaven in the heart without the appropriation of all the outward institutions which guard it, without the right use of all its means of grace (in vain possessed by so many). We have no sympathy, then, with such an interpretation as this: The good man

* In the general survey with which we began, it was already said that, in the last three parables, the inner state and progress of the kingdom of heaven in the individual persons is spoken of. It is therefore, however, not merely meant that the kingdom of heaven will (as Lange thinks) at every period remain a concealed treasure "for the individuals—even as a world-religion," but the parables really at the same time advance forward to a later period when that will be more the case than before.

† And that especially at a time, when "the kingdom of God is as it were buried beneath the clods of false Christianity, of superstition, human ordinances, and ceremonies" (Roos). And we would say further, also under a good divinely-established ecclesiasticism—for the field must be bought.

only had not strength enough immediately to carry off the treasure alone; for the way in which he acted is manifestly praised, as being that which led rightly to the end he had in view. Dost thou discover, by the revelation of God graciously vouchsafed to thee, the living word of regeneration, and the true Church, remember that neither of these comes into thy heart in the way of the Separatists, so as that thou mayest sever it from the external word and sacraments in the degenerate Church; for the treasure belongs to the field, the buyer of the first must also become the true possessor of the other. But as this is entirely an inward affair of the heart, it must be done secretly, and without the knowledge of those envious persons who might follow the treasure, although they did not themselves value it or use it, or who, as mockers, might throw it away as if it were old rusty iron. The true finder hides what he has found, as in the field from profane eyes, so in his heart, i. e. shuts it already in his overjoyed heart, ere he properly has it. This seems to be the true meaning of the figure, which is not otherwise to be pressed. And now he betakes himself in haste and in earnest, in the joy of his heart (a more deeply-seated joy than that in ver. 20), to selling and buying. For he must give up all his property for it, as is meant in Luke xiv. 33, and more particularly carried out by the apostle in Phil. iii. 7–10; this is the concluding point in which the two parables of the treasure and the pearl coincide.

Wächtler recently persists in maintaining, even after Steffensen adduced clear reasons against it (which we will not now repeat), a strangely inverted explanation of the parable of the pearl; we can only allude to it here; it scarcely needs any special refutation for the sake of those who in any way agree with it, beyond our positive development of the general sense of the parable. We have already spoken of the strikingly tenacious adherence to the grammar as respects the formula of comparison. "As the merchant goes forth to seek goodly pearls, so does the kingdom of heaven also go forth to seek goodly subjects"—this is held to be the only possible meaning; yet this proposition already sounds so strangely as to deter us. To correct a possible misunderstanding of the former parable, as if the man can only thus accidentally find the treasure, the design of this parable is said to be to show how the kingdom of heaven (Christ) rather seeks man. The good pearls are—"the souls who let themselves be saved and made children of God, the elect." And what is the one precious pearl? First of all it is said to be "those that are best disposed towards Christ, to whom he entirely yields himself" (as if to sell all and to buy could mean to give, and entirely to yield himself!) Afterwards, as an improvement on this, it is said to be "the communion of the saints, the invisible Church," out of which, indeed, there can be no good pearls. And here may also be mentioned the turn which Scriver* also has given to the thing (although more in the way of accommodation—"it might be so explained"), when he says, that the pearl shows the great value in the eye of Christ of a human soul which is to be saved. But we still think that "treasure" and "pearl" are to be taken together in the same sense, the kingdom of heaven alone can be the pearl found by the seeker—this explanation alone corresponds to the entire system of the seven parables, and confirms itself on every side. The "doctrine of Scripture" which is opposed to this, viz: "that the man is not the subject who effectually seeks the Saviour, but the object who is effectually sought by the Saviour," has not much weight here, inasmuch as the Scripture, with no less perfect propriety, speaks often of our seeking, our selling, yielding ourselves up, bringing ourselves to, etc.

As Solomon (Prov. iii. 13–15) and Job (chap. xxviii. 15–19) compare true wisdom with gold and silver, precious stones and pearls, or rather exalt it above them, the parable would be somewhat intelligible to the disciples from this allusion to the Scripture. Still the meaning here goes much deeper than what was then said of the "fear of God;" the pearl, as a treasure and possession, is here represented rather with reference to the obtaining and appropriating of it than was the case with the treasure lying in the field and waiting for the finder (just as in chap. vii. 6, "that which is holy," and "your pearls;" also in Prov. iii. 13 and Job xxviii. 12, the finding, the obtaining is the principal idea). It is the real "stone of the wise," whose true name no one knows but he who has it, and who bears the great eureka in his heart: this last and most internal parable needs and admits in the least degree explanation by many other words. The ἄνθρωπος ἔμπορος, seafarer or travelling merchant (Kleuker: who travels for jewels), possesses as a δόκιμος τραπεζίτης (reputable exchanger), that wisdom which we found also in the buyer of the field, even in a higher degree, for he seeks really good, genuine pearls. But the nearer the end of the Church draws on the more necessary will this testing wisdom be, in order to find what is sought; for not merely is true Christianity hid by the manifest falling away (which is not so much pointed at here), but amid the motley mart of confessions, sects, and opinions, the perplexing cry which is to precede the coming of the Lord, Lo, he is here! Lo, he is there! in this chamber or in that desert—amid the manifold forms of Christianity, each of which praises its own books, its own agencies, its confessions of faith or societies, there is need of a good understanding in the seeking heart; nor is any society of Moravian Brethren with their Bohemian stones the true field which one has only to buy.†

* Third Sermon of the first part, in my edition, i. 77.

† That (according to Roos) again at a later period the pearl may be freely bought even without

That the seeker first of all seeks many and many sorts of pearls (in the plural), shows that he has not yet learned (and this is natural enough) the experience which he will obtain after he has found, and of which the Church loudly enough holding forth that experience sings: "If I get this one thing, which compensates for all, then shall I in this one thing enjoy every thing"—or as it might with equal truth be said: Then shall I enjoy this one thing in every thing. Therefore Christ says here, ἕνα πολυτιμον μαργαριτην, "one pearl of great price," while before, in the Sermon on the Mount, he himself speaks of pearls in the plural. The men who offer them for sale according to their appearance know the precious one themselves just as little as that owner of the field knew of his treasure; and yet it is not to be bought from these ignorant possessors as a thing of trifling value, but Christ himself—who so wonderfully offers for sale his holy jewel, that he on his part may try the triers, and bring it to the true man who is worthy of it—gives it upon no other terms than those which Solomon has already mentioned: For all that he has (Prov. iv. 7). He who will rather continue seeking, and who goes back when it comes to the great discovery, he who begins to cheapen so as that he may still retain something of his own, cannot obtain it. But he who goes on and offers violence to the kingdom of heaven, and who boldly counts out the great price in the face of the mockery of the spectators and traders, he is the true buyer. O what a gracious word about buying,* when yet the price consists only in our entire poverty, debt, and misery! But what righteousness and truth in this, that the pearl is yet so dear, and assuredly in no other way to be obtained! What in earthly things were a foolish whim, is here the highest wisdom.

In opposition to this next to last parable—which, in the one buyer, has shown us the small number of true possessers as opposed to the foolish multitude, and the hidden Church, as, so to speak, itself the treasure in the field, the pearl obtained by Christ for himself (for so now, comparing anew, may we invert the sentiment)—comes last in the series, which shows, on the other hand, the great mixture in the wide net, thus again turning back, but now only to bring into prominence the inevitable separation as the chief and concluding idea, by the final οὕτως ἔσται, so shall it be. If, in a former parable, the tares were sown against the will of Christ by his enemy, we have here the other and innermost side of the thing, namely, that it was notwithstanding according to the counsel and will of Christ! He who there says: Let both grow together! had also said before: Let the enemy sow! and in holy love, a love which goes beyond all the malice of Satan, a place was given to the tares in his field, if haply wheat might yet be made out of them through the miraculous power of the opposing leaven. The bad fishes, too, were purposely fished and drawn in along with the others. If any one were still in doubt as to the meaning of that saying: The world is the field—his doubts must be set at rest when he finds here the bad, who are to be cast out, distinctly represented as being in the net, which is certainly not the same as the sea, but is drawn through the entire sea. The kingdom of heaven is not something specially set apart for any outward Israel, nation, or country, but the great sea of nations is its sphere, the restless raging sea of fallen humanity (a figure pervading the whole of Scripture, for one example of which we would now only refer to Psa. lxv. 8). Into this sea it sinks as a net hid beneath the waters. Christ will have infant baptism, conversions, national churches, and all that belongs to such a penetration of the leaven into the entire dough; and the Catholic Church, although in itself an untrue type, is yet right in its maintenance of this truth against the most well-meant, erring separatism. The wide σαγήνη, the great drawnet of God, is πάναγρος (all-catching), it works and draws with it whatever it finds, whatever comes in its way.* This net has many nooses, many small nets, which here and there many a fisher of men throws out, and that not merely like Peter, "at Christ's word," but many only προφάσει, "in pretence" (Phil. i. 18), at their own hand; nay more, even against his knowledge and will must Pilate write the superscription of the cross, and Caiaphas prophesy of the scattered children of God who find the truth therein. All things in the world's history must work together for good, for the calling of those whom the eternal purpose has distinguished; the history of the world is itself the history of the Church, and has in it the great net which the one great Fisher of men, with all the nets and hands that are helpful to him, draws by his strong hand to the shore. As the fishes are sometimes taken in an evil net, and the sons of men snared in an evil time (Eccles. ix. 12)—so man also knows not his time, when the good hand of God which draws into the kingdom of heaven comes upon him for the first time. The fishes are in the net ere they know it, even when they think they are still free to swim in the sea, for the net hides it-the shell (corresponding to the field before), we think quite wrong, because the seeking is precisely intended to denote a distinguishing from the spurious as the result of investigation—its costliness therefore does not lie open on the surface. The two parables are not at all thus to be combined.

---

* At which Wächtler takes very groundless offence, since only a predominant receptivity is conceded to us. Does he forget all those passages of Scripture which speak quite otherwise also of our doing, yielding ourselves, venturing, exchanging, holding fast?

* "Those missionaries are bad fishers who even at the first would separate the fishes (by baptism). They should take much more pains to catch them in masses, instead of losing time in unapostolical discriminating" (Richter's Bible).

self from them.* Ye fishers who, as wise and faithful servants, would follow out the mind of Christ, draw gently that you may not scare away many a draught. The water itself must move about in the net, the sin of the world must prepare for the universally offered grace of God, the raging of the nations and kingdoms must help on the kingdom of heaven and the gathering of the people of God; many a leviathan is caught, and although he would fain get out yet cannot break the strong net.

Thus, indeed, it brings together ἐκ παντὸς γένους, i. e. great and small, high and low, distinguished and obscure, whatever there is in the water (Psa. civ. 25). But with all this variety, there are only two kinds of which at last account is taken (see chap. xxii. 9, 10). In τὰ καλά and τὰ σαπρά, the good and the bad, the fishes are purposely not at all expressly mentioned, nor are they throughout the whole parable; ἰχθύδια, "fishes," is not to be supplied (seeing that עצוּמים or mighty ones, and תַּנִּינִים or sea-monsters were also caught), but the neuter is to be understood in the same way as καινὰ καὶ παλαιά, "new and old," in ver. 52. The sea of the world and the kingdom's history has a shore, as this αἰὼν or "word" has a συντέλεια or "end." There it will be seen what has been caught, what must be again cast out of the net, and just as little of the latter comes into the ἀγγεῖα or "vessels" as of the tares from the field into the barn.† The fishes in the parable are either eatable or not fit for use (which in general the word σαπρός also signifies), fishes which indeed might have made good food, but which unfortunately have died in the net, and, amid the swarm, have become corrupt; but the parable says nothing of this, in order to abide by the principal point. To this principal point belongs now only the third and last question which comes after the former questions, Whence? and Whither? namely, When will this be done? The answer was also given before: When the plants are ripe, i. e. here when the net is full. This means not merely, When the πλήρωμα τῶν ἐθνῶν, or "fulness of the Gentiles," which in its number is known only to God, has been brought in (Rom. xi. 25), when the foreordained number of the elect is complete, although this also lies in the background, as it is on account of the good that the net is drawn—but at the same time also: When the whole sea is fished out, when all that were swimming in it are in the net (Matt. xxiv. 14). As in the second parable the harvest was described only as future (it is by no means said: And the reaper came)—so now, on the contrary, the final decision appears as present, immediately follows.

Verses 49, 50 contain again an explanation unasked, but they only repeat the foregoing vers. 41, 42 (might the disciples also in heart repeat ver. 43!), and bring the last three parables into one frame with the conclusion of the second. It is this: The gathering is done also by men, but the separation only by the hands of the angels, with whom we cannot again with Zeller join the reigning and judging saints. Already does this literal repetition (for in vers. 39 and 41 the angels of heaven are certainly meant) refute the strange idea of the excellent Olshausen, that the ἄγγελοι (angels) here are the messengers or ἀπόστολοι (apostles), because in the parable the fishers themselves perform the work. This, however, is still the question, for in the whole parable, just in order to keep this in the back-ground, neither the fishers nor the fishes are named, and it is expressed in the indefinite form; as at ver. 40, ὥσπερ συλλέγεται, "as they are gathered," so is it now with the whole story of the σαγηνη βληθεισῃ, or "net cast," as if it were equivalent to ὥσπερ βάλλεται, "as it is cast," etc. The angels shall go forth from the throne and presence of God, and of the Son of Man, at his command and commission; they shall make a clean and true separation of the few righteous from the many wicked. What in the similitude was an emphatic ἔξω, "without," left indefinite, is in the explanation, again the fearful furnace with its wailing and gnashing of teeth; still, in order that the friendly promise (ver. 43) for those who have ears to hear may sound above this dreadful conclusion, there is already, in ver. 48, a gathering together of the good (συνέλεξαν τὰ καλά) placed before that gathering together (συλλέγειν) of the bad.

THE STORES OF THE HOUSEHOLDER.

(Matt. xiii. 51, 52.)

"Parables are indeed pretty and ingenious things, but one must also understand them"—says the excellent Wandsbeck Messenger (Matthias Claudius): therefore Christ asks at the conclusion, if they have understood him, as in Mark iv. 13, he referred to this at the beginning. This question was not for the people but for the disciples, that they might be thorough μαθητευθέντες or learners. And Christ, who could not follow the Socratic method in revealing the mystery of the kingdom of heaven, must first teach the disciples also, ere he ask them such a question. Forget not, ye under-masters, to do the same, neither the teaching first nor the asking afterwards. Have ye understood all this—the last through the interpretation that was given of the first—what has not been explained, and about which you do not therefore ask me? (for in

---

* It is not precisely right with Braune to lay emphasis on: They are caught; because the kingdom of God appears to them at first as a letter.

† The ἀγγεῖα (not the vessel in the singular as Luther has it) certainly correspond in some measure to the barn in a foregoing parable, but we may infer from the plural that this feature is here to be less urged.

Mark iv. 34, πάντα is not meant literally of every single parable, but of the import of all, which they might perceive from the explanation of some). The good disciples, because they had really understood something, and because now these stories were not as at first entirely unintelligible to them, answer in their naive simplicity: Yea, Lord. Christ receives this answer as true, for he who understands something is certainly in the right way. Luther: He praises them just as if they had understood, because at some future time they would understand. He deals with his disciples as with children, in the simplest earnestness and the most earnest simplicity, for he thinks of what they shall become by the Holy Ghost, and has patience with their folly or simplicity. He does not repel them from him as a proud master by saying: Ah, how can ye now already know and understand what the kingdom of heaven is, as my wisdom has spoken of it in these parables!

For their future office, in the discharge of which their "Yea, Lord," would come to be ever more true, he now says what follows. And so thoroughly has he got the taste for parables, after the eternal Wisdom in him opened its mouth in this way, that this last word also takes the form of a parable, which Matt. ver. 53 therefore includes under the ἐτέλεσεν τὰς παραβολὰς ταύτας, "he had finished all these parables." Perhaps meanwhile the table was covered in the house, at least the θησαυρός, "treasure," of the householder here is the store-room of the meats (Psa. cxliv. 13), and the whole is to be compared with ch. xxiv. 45. We might at first say: What condescension on the part of Christ thus to speak of himself as of every scribe! But this he does not properly do, for he himself is no γραμματεὺς μαθητευθείς, "scribe instructed;" he speaks of his disciple's office in which they are to follow his, the Master's, example just set before them. But he is certainly the Householder who has now given out things new and old to the people, and the disciples, the guests and the inmates of the house; still every one is therefore (διὰ τοῦτο, after such an example) to be like this householder. When Christ says "scribes," he gives it to be understood, as we have seen, that these seven parables also were founded on the Holy Scripture, were foreshadowed in it; then also he places such true scribes whom he forms and sends (ch. xxiii. 34), emphatically in opposition to the present false ones. Instructed or taught for the kingdom of heaven: this is the grand distinction, the fundamental idea of all true instruction and learning, upon which all true understanding depends. Instructed, namely, in a twofold sense, for himself and for others, that he may gain it himself and spread it abroad in others. The importance of αὐτοῦ which is the main point of the sentiment, is not to be overlooked; out of his treasure, almost as at ch. xii. 35. For the treasure and provision of the wholesome doctrine must through experience have become my own, in the way spoken of in the fifth and sixth parables, the θησαυρός or treasure must be put into a θησαυρός or treasury, if I am rightly and fruitfully to use it. Not from knowledge got by learning, not from books, not even from the Bible, that inexhaustible store-room of the Chief-householder, can one teach and preach as Christ here means, if the truth does not first go through one's own heart.

New and old—that is in the parable the produce of this year and of years far back (Song of Sol. vii. 13), for the nourishment and sustenance of the family, not (according to Neander, for example) jewels laid out to view, in which old or new does not signify so much; in the interpretation of the parable, however, it has indeed a manifold sense. The ground-idea is: According to the wants and taste of the guests, as it is good for them, or, by pleasant variety, agreeable to them. There is not to be a constant repetition, therefore, of the one old thing, that the people may not get disgusted;* therefore the new stands first. But neither is it to be always the new, or a new form for the Athenian itching ears, but as in the true wisdom for the kingdom of heaven all that is new really rests on what is old, the old therefore is not to be forgotten, even the first repentance sermon and the truths of the catechism are ever again to be held forth! The old is ever to become new by new accessions to it, the new must confirm and recommend itself by leading back to the old. Further, by the new and old is meant—not precisely, as Luther every where and here also finds, Gospel and law, for what is here spoken of is instruction into the kingdom of heaven—but the new word of the kingdom of heaven in the fulfillment, in convincing harmony with the old word of prophecy from the Scripture. By all means also the word of Moses as the old, but only in so far as it harmonizes with the Gospel, and essentially coheres with it. Further, because nature, as well as creation and history, is a writing of God, nay, the original, first book of wisdom, to interpret whose letters, and to put them into words, Christ opens his mouth in the commentary upon it, which forms the other writing, one may understand also these old metaphors, and stories familiar to every one, of the seed, the tares, leaven, net—and that by these the new ideas, the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven may be pleasingly taught. And whatever else he who will only diligently gather into his treasure, in order faithfully to bring forth from it, will find therein what may be called new and old.†

---

* Hence Neander speaks (wrongly) of "agreeable variety" in the modern or ancient jewels that are displayed.

† Yet not (with Neander) the "formal accommodation," here supposed to be allowed, nay recommended, which makes use of ancient expressions, without taking them exactly in their entire truth, which speaks of the authors of books, according to ancient opinion, without confirming such opinion.

For the Master, at the conclusion of his discourse, will say to his disciples: Only use all this diligently for yourselves and others, gather in assiduously in order to render back again, so will you learn ever better to understand all this (ver. 12).

THE FEEDING OF THE FIVE THOUSAND.

(Matt. xiv. 16–19; Mark vi. 31, 37–41; Luke ix. 13–16; John vi. 5, 10–12.)

Although what is further narrated in chap. xiii. 54–58, is by no means the same incident as that recorded in Luke iv. 16–30, but a repeated visit to Nazareth at a later period, on the details and significance of which we should have much to say, if we had now to deal with the narratives, still the words of Christ (ver. 57) are only to be rightly interpreted in their original connection in Luke iv. 24. We therefore refer the consideration of them to that passage, and will now pass to what follows.

Jesus hears from the disciples of John who came to him, and whom the death of their own master now at length leads to the true Master, not merely the (already known to him? John v. 35) lamentable death of the Baptist, by the cruel act of King Herod, springing from his conceited weakness, but into which he was on this occasion driven against his will—he also hears from them what the same king had said concerning him, Jesus, that he was, as many told him, John risen again from the dead, and that he would like much to see him (Luke ix. 9). This wretched king, under whom the King of Israel lives and works as a subject, now first noticed by him, this man, whose inner life was exhausted, who was made up of contradictions, speaking of his kingdom like Ahasuerus, and yet the slave of his Jezebel, willingly hearing the prophet, and unwillingly killing him, who will be a Sadducee, and yet thinks of a resurrection, who has a superstitious fear of the Lord Jesus, and yet has a curiosity to see him, is anxious for this, and yet takes no steps towards it—this Herod, Jesus, as by a fit judgment, avoids. Yet we read no word from his mouth concerning the person and conduct of "his king." He went over the sea κατ' ἰδίαν, i. e. privately, here (comp. ver. 23 and Luke ix. 18) without the people, but with his disciples, the apostles who had just returned from their mission. For, while the first obnoxious preacher of repentance dies, twelve new ones are risen up in his place, besides the one whom Herod now fears. Christ withdraws himself at the same time therefore on account of the information of the disciples, and we read in Mark iv. 31, the words of his mouth: Come ye also apart into a desert place and rest a little! For the press of the people going and coming was great, so that they could not even take their repast; it was shortly before the passover, which feast Christ did not observe on this occasion after having performed his work and his testimony at the feast of Purim. He speaks not of his own but of the disciples' rest; because they were somewhat too full of all the things that they had done and that they had taught, he kindly leads them into the solitude where is the true rest. They are not to create such a sensation or make such a noise among the people on their return to them. Come ye also (ὑμεῖς αὐτοί) now into retirement, as I am wont to do and even now have need of it for myself; rest yourselves from your journey, because ye too have labored! But when Christ permits or commands rest he yet significantly adds: A little. More is at present not yet granted them, unrest soon again sought out him and them. The crowds of people hasten on foot round the sea, and Jesus soon again goes forth from his solitude (ἐξελθών, Matt. and Mark; not out of the ship, but equivalent to δεξάμενος αὐτούς, Luke, in order to receive them with a salutation), heals their sick, and addresses to them again much instruction concerning the kingdom of God. For instead of displeasure at the disturbance, there is only compassion in his heart for the sheep without a shepherd. Yes, he is moved too even by the unintelligent zeal with which they run after him, and forget their food; they are not to suffer on this account, and he determines in the counsels of his wisdom now to give a sign which at the same time lovingly interprets to the people that word in Matt. vi. 33, and testifies of the bread of life, but which shadows forth something special for the disciples after their first official work. The Evangelists together give us six words from the mouth of Jesus on the occasion of this miraculous meal, the true order of which will clearly evolve itelf from a right understanding of the whole.

Evidently the first, in which Christ will signify to Philip alone what he has already determined to do, is denoted in John vi. 5 by the Evangelist's words before and after, as the beginning which Jesus makes. Whence shall we buy bread that these may eat? Here have we (in such things he is ever ready to speak thus) all at once again many guests; we ourselves have indeed got enough, as for this purpose, partly, we came hither; but these are hungry, as I suppose, must still have a meal to-day, and in their zeal have thought nothing of this: it is fit therefore that we entertain them; what thinkest thou, beloved Philip? That this was the disciple who took charge of the food may rather be doubted, for Judas carried the bag and bought generally what was needed (John xiii. 29). We will more correctly understand

John's words concerning the πειράζειν, "proving," by supposing that Philip, whom the faithful Master now singles out from the rest, needed the trying question, owing to his own state of heart (comp. John xiv. 8). He understands not, however, the gentle reference, contained in this Whence, to the miraculous power of the heavenly Father, but adheres literally to the buying, to which belongs also the question, For how much? Bread for these, said Christ, when he lifted up his eyes on the πολὺς ὄχλος, great multitude; and the disciple begins naively to reckon, and finds, on a hasty calculation, that a certain round sum (proverbial among the Jews; there can hardly have been so much in the Saviour's store) is yet far too little to satisfy such a multitude, so that every one at least may have a little! After this conversation between the two, the same thought now occurs to the rest of the disciples, which must very naturally have suggested itself, and they come to Christ reminding him that he should now bring his instructions to a close, in order that the people might yet find something to eat. They considerately give beforehand two reasons (only one of which Luke places after the request, after he had himself named the other): Here in the desert there is nothing to be had, and it is now late.*

But Jesus spoke to them all the second and now more open word, in which the we becomes a ye, and the buying becomes forthwith a giving: They need not depart, give ye them to eat! You propose their going away as necessary, but they are with me, and I say to you now: Must every thing go always by natural calculation? They are already tired enough, and must not give themselves more fatigue. If the disciples had at times fed one or two hungry guests from their stock of provisions—now they are to do the same with the thousands! This he said again to try them, whether they would not of themselves, especially after the great things which had just been done and told, hit upon the thing which he had determined to do. His striking word might have brought to their recollection that similar one of the prophet, 2 Kings iv. 42, 43; it is at least, on this account, as well as in accordance with the constant humility of Christ, that he speaks thus, and does not say: I will give to them! But they do not in this instance say: Lord, at thy word we will give them to eat! They perceive nothing, and answer as the servants of the prophet did on that occasion; they bring forward (according to Mark) again the same reckoning which Philip had just made, with the proverbial sum.† They are indeed very much to be excused, for it is truly human and not without a certain reason in God's ordinance, always to think and speak thus at first; Moses, the man of God, once spoke not otherwise before Jehovah (Num. xi. 21, 22). But here we may learn, at least, not to be too confident in our reckonings, so long as they are made for plus or minus, without the host. How many great counting houses and mercantile houses have forgotten in their books the column for the blessing or—the curse of God!

Before the answer of the disciples followed, Matt. ver. 17, Luke ver. 13 (Luke is at least literally accurate), we have, according to Mark's account,* a third word of Jesus to consider, viz: the intervening question proceeding from him, which very naturally connects itself with the reckoning just laid before him, as a reply to it: How much bread have ye? Go and see! I will divide and multiply differently from you. "We have not what thou tellest us to give, neither so much bread as will do for these nor so much money as will buy it even should we go away for that purpose"—so say you, but I say to you: Ye have, go away and only see how much it is, then will I take care that it be enough, and that every one gets not merely a little. Thus does Christ point to the present gifts of God which we have, in order to bless these; for the ordinary method must certainly be observed first, so that even miracles come only in this way. Where there is a door, one does not break through the window; where there is still something present, nothing new is created. Now Andrew speaks in the name of all the disciples, who agree with him: Here is a lad who has five barley loaves (the smaller bread, hence Judges vii. 13), and two dried fishes—that have we here or may soon have, but not more. Because, therefore, they cannot answer: We have nothing—Christ holds fast by what they have, and speaks fourthly (observe in this connection of the different accounts the ever-advancing gradation) the word of majesty, in which the transition is made to the miraculous power, and the increase is promised: Bring it hither to me! the five loaves and also the two little fishes; we will despise nothing that we have—but bring it to me! Now, they observe what he would do.

And he told the multitude to sit down; more exactly, according to Mark, he told the disciples to make the people do this; Luke and John give expressly as the fifth word of Christ: Make the people sit down! Or, let them sit down in rows by fifties. Thus exactly does Christ observe order in what he does, and here beautifully illustrates what is written in 1 Cor. xiv. 33–40, as has been at all times noticed The small stock of provision is brought before him, concerning which Andrew asked: What is this among so many? The multitudes arrange themselves in expectation of what is to come, probably not distinctly marking till the end of the meal, that here there was given a sign of miraculous power. On the rich green

* Matthew: The proper time is now past; Mark: Much of the day is already past, reckoning from the beginning of the day, therefore: High time; Luke: The day began to decline; for it was between the two evenings (Matt. vers. 15 and 23).

† We rather suppose this, than that the Gospel which was compiled from the account of Peter contradicts that of John even in such a circumstance.

* Among whose "graphic pictures" we cannot be so bold as to put the ipse fecit.

grass, which brings to mind the rich hand of God in the sustenance of the cattle, the separate rows of men, who are now also to find pasture, look like so many garden-beds.* They are not to mingle at pleasure with each other as at festivals of the people in the way of the world, but solemnly to sit as at the table of God in the kingdom of heaven. Then Christ took the five loaves and two fishes, looked up to heaven, pronounced the blessing over them (as Luke expresses it, blessed them, the loaves and fishes), and began now himself to break and to divide, that the disciples may do this further. He does not first command that the five and the two become five hundred and two hundred, to be taken openly by the multitudes; he conceals the miracle as much as he can, and no one sees rightly how it multiplies itself in his and the disciples' hands, any more than one sees the grass growing. Εὐχαριστήσας διέδωκε, when he had given thanks, he distributed—writes John; if what follows were only a gloss, it is yet, according to the other Evangelists, true; he himself breaks and distributes ever on without its coming to an end, and the disciples, who carried what they received through the ranks, perceived this. They know not themselves how it is so, but their faith grasps the whence. If, in the first ranks, they may have been still anxiously sparing, soon they gave to all as much as every one wished. For when God opens his rich hand he satisfies, according to, and with, his good pleasure (רָצוֹן, Psa. cxlv. 16). The more of the life of faith and receptivity for the divine power of this feeding there was in the individual, so much the more easily satisfied would he be with a little; but those too who ate quite naturally, were all filled. Here is set up the heavenly ladder of true "tradition," where "the blessing of the first hand runs through many hands, even to the end." The Father gives the gift to the Son, the Son to his servants, from whose intermediate hands all people receive it (1 Cor. xi. 23). Here is apparent, also, the purport and significance of the sign for the apostles who had just returned, inasmuch as, while, so to speak, imprinting a seal upon their first mission at its close, it foreshadows their future official work. Give ye them to eat! You need only to have something for such giving, my blessing will multiply in your hands in the giving. Nay, we might well say, that Christ had done all this in reality, more for the sake of the disciples than of the people.

The words of the prayer of thanksgiving and blessing† are not given, for it is most probable that, with a simplicity sublime in its humility, Christ had just said the grace commonly used in Israel. But while the three Evangelists merely narrate the taking up of what remained over, John specifies still the sixth word of Christ: Gather up the fragments that remain, that nothing be lost! Quite as simple as unostentatiously natural, and yet as profoundly significant as all the former unsearchable words of his mouth from the first to the last.* Also in 2 Kings iv. 43, 44, what is left over (as at Ruth ii. 14) is a sure proof of there having been enough; it was not to be altogether consumed, for God's gift is never exhausted, there always remains something over. And, behold! there was more of what remained over than of the original stock. But it is not for a memorial alone that they are to gather it; chiefly rather, in order that the people may not foolishly take relics of it with them. That nothing be lost of the dear, precious gift of God—this Christ gives as the reason. Wonderful union of the divine riches with due activity on the part of man! Beautiful picture of the working power of God in nature, which is at once lavish and careful! But Christ teaches and recommends to us precisely here, not merely that "gathering carefulness which keeps together at the right time, as belonging to the art of well-doing;" he gives us a still deeper ground, inasmuch as this carefulness belongs in general to doing justly. That nothing be lost! This is the single decisive ground upon which rests our household faithfulness with God's gift, of which we cannot create the smallest crumb, and which is to be regarded as valuable and holy—not faint hearted anxiety about the future, as if God's hand were shortened for us or others when our hand has not enough.

That God's hand has been rich and open in the hands of Jesus extended in miraculous blessing over the little, these men now at the end, when all were satisfied, have seen and experienced in this sign which Jesus performed. But, alas! in human fashion they see nothing more in it than the bread of which they had all eaten, and because it seems to them a very pleasant thing to have their table so easily covered, they will forcibly take to themselves this prophet who is indeed the Messiah, and at once proclaim him King with rejoicing, a king who would be better to them than Herod! This is the third instance related by Matthew of Christ's being taken for what he was not—the other two being at ch. xiii. 55, where the Nazarenes see in him the "carpenter's son"—and ch. xiv. 2, where by Herod he is mistaken for the Baptist risen from the dead. Christ, in compassionating love for the people, in faithful wisdom for the disciples and all future believers, performed this sign at the same time as a proof of what means

* Mark thus portrays the whole scene; the numbers with him may be variously understood: Every two fifties opposite each other as a hundred, and so fifty times; or unequally at least fifty, at most a hundred together; or most simply, a hundred times fifty.

† Which according to the Mishna had only to be said by one even for the largest company.

* One might preach many discourses on every point elucidating the true meaning, as Zinzendorf (Pensylvan Reden) has a rich and masterly sermon on the holy order of God, which we should imitate in all things.

were at his command, had he been a demagogue seeking adherents; while he takes care again that his disciples be not carried away by the error of the people, sends them forward to the ship, takes decided leave of the people against their will (though they presume not to contradict or resist him), and again goes to the mountain of his former solitude, there to pray from late in the evening till far into the night.

CHRIST WALKING ON THE SEA.

(Matt. xiv. 27, 29, 31; Mark v. 50; John vi. 20.)

Christ had commanded his disciples this time to cross over the sea before him, and had promised therefore to come after them without telling them how. Did he intend to walk round the lake during the night, which scarcely any one did during the day if ships were to be had, or did he intend to follow them in the morning in another ship (after having withdrawn himself from the people)? Neither of these suppositions is very conceivable; so that for the following miracle it only remains to be supposed that he himself knew well what he would do. He would once more show to his disciples in all stillness, even although no storm had arisen, his power over nature and the creature, in virtue of which there were ways for him every where. They, however, had, late in the evening, now come (according to Mark, ver. 47) to or beyond the middle of the sea, from twenty to twenty-five stadia, as John states, which was about two-thirds of the whole breadth (being altogether, according to Josephus, forty stadia or five geographical miles), and when now the storm arose, they made, in spite of all their exertions, very little more way by the fourth watch of the night (three o'clock in the morning), the wind being directly contrary. And Christ was not with them—this was worse than the former time, although their faith might instead have still clung to his power and majesty so shortly before revealed to them. Then he saw their distress (Mark ver. 48) from the mountain of his prayer, even through the night and darkness, and came to help them; yet it seemed to them, on first seeing his figure, as if he would go past them, inasmuch as he went to the prow of the ship, or, which may also be concealed in this, that he acted here as in Luke xxiv. 28.

God the Lord, who spreadeth out the heaven, walks upon the waves of the sea in his creative power (Job ix. 8)—this is now truly represented in his Son, who also thus gathers the winds in his hands, and binds the waters in a garment of his majesty (Prov. xxx. 4). This is more than was done by Moses and Elijah, for whom the depths must first be dried up. Not, however, in the exercise of omnipotence, but in the higher nature of the ideal man, in the might of the spirit over matter, of pure and perfect faith to which every thing must be subject, does Christ come forth from prayer to walk upon the waters (ὕδατα, which beneath his tread cease to be κύματα, waves). This inner life corresponding to that of his glorified state (analogous to Phil. iii. 11) breaks forth, according to his and his Father's counsel, in this moment of special elevation, in a way which was not always possible for him who so often crossed that sea, because he had no occasion to will such a manifestation. The disciples all see him whom they so anxiously wished to have beside them, nay, who had promised to come after them, approach so near to the ship that he can directly speak with them and Peter with him; his well known form would, if they could see a man walking at all, be also distinguishable at this distance, but that they are again perplexed by his going past them. What is that? they ask among themselves in terror, and the fear which now first breaks out in earnest, precisely when the helper comes, answers: It is an apparition, a φάντασμα (phantasm)—and when the terrifying word is spoken, they cry out for fear. Is it a welcome from the Sheol, to which they fancy they are now near? This it cannot be, for the thing upon the sea assuredly looks like the Lord; it is more likely, therefore, to occur to them, that their excited imagination now morbidly deceives them with the figure of him who has been so much in their thoughts—if, indeed, they have any definite idea at all of this φάντασμα. This is the fourth mistaking of Christ by his own dear disciples—prelude of the terror awakened in them by the sight of the risen Lord—most characteristic contrast to his own tranquil power over the elements! Man, in his present state, in the fear and perplexity of spirit which may so easily overtake him, sees apparitions, takes even his Saviour as he draws nigh in divine power at first to be such; this, however, is always better than, in the opposite folly of boldness, to take a φάντασμα of his own thoughts as the Lord and Saviour—for where Jesus really is, he will with his friendly "It is I" dissipate the mist of fear in all who do not, in their pantheistic illusion which looks on the laws of nature as the living (rather dead) God, hold that no one can walk upon the waves of the world and of history, and that the Christ who appears to any one to do so; is only a phantom of his own creation!

Be of good cheer, it is I, be not afraid! John, because his thoughts are ever hastening to the ἐγώ εἰμι (I am he!) of Christ, passes over the Be of good cheer, θαρσεῖτε, which in Matt. and Mark prepare the way for this comfort-bringing I. We recognize this word of kindness which he is ever so ready to address, which even yet from heaven, he delights to address to timid hearts (Acts xxiii. 11). In order that the majesty and miraculous nearness of the It is I may not terrify them, he encloses it, so to speak, on both sides by words of encouragement. Fear not! This is the word used by the graciously appearing Lord already in the Old Testament (as we have shown at p. 30, on Luke v. 10), but now first in the mouth of the Son of Man has it the full power really to take away all fear. Thus did he come into the world with his miraculous manifestation: I am the helper. Happy he indeed who in the true faith of a disciple, although it may at first be weak, gets acquainted with the gracious Master in order to be helped, so that then every new It is I! always more effectually dissipates anxious fears, until the gracious words are heard for the last time in the last fear of death, as in Rev. i. 17, 18. But how often when Christ comes to his disciples in extraordinary ways, when he draws near to them in the cross and in distress, and thus brings salvation and blessing to them, is there a repetition of this mistaking of his well-known form!

A Philip or a Thomas among the disciples doubts perhaps for a moment or two longer, even after such words, whether it is really he. They must first have him beside them in the ship; a John has enough in the inwardly adoring, calmly expecting assurance, It is the Lord! But the forward Simon Peter, the easily and strongly excitable, will still further, and after a cry of fear, momentarily display great faith, in token that he also is the Lord's Peter. Not as if in a yet hypothetical "If it be thou," does he take doubt along with him from the first, for then the first step would not have been taken. Oh no, the start is bold enough: Lord, if (i. e. because, there, as I see) it be thou —on this firm ground and bottom, he proceeds in hasty boldness of faith to tread, and like his Lord, upon the sea. But wherefore now is this? The other inference would alone have been natural and simple: Come then into the ship to us, and we shall all be saved! But in the questionable little word "me," always questionable when it too hastily replies to Christ's powerful I, ere it has been specially asked and called—lurks the secret flaw in the great faith, on account of which it must soon again become very little. Had Christ of himself called out: And thou Peter come out to me—he would certainly not have sunk. But because he will outrun the others in showing his faith, the real Peter must show himself just as, alas! he still is, and give a warning of the future denial of his Lord; falling back again as suddenly as he had raised himself. So far does Peter know, feel and acknowledge what is right, that a κελεύειν or bidding on the part of Christ must precede his ἐλθεῖν or coming; but he provokes this command, almost bidding himself do what should have been left to Christ to command.

What does Christ do? With a wisdom at every moment which we cannot enough consider, which always does what is right every where, and in every occurrence reflects at once the holy prudence of his whole conduct, he replies by a single little word to the almost prolix address of the disciple. He does not refuse the truly needless request, and with that false mastership into which we undermasters are so apt to fall, repel the bold disciple: Wherefore this now? I come to you, I have nothing to do with thee in particular, I do not need thee here on the waters. Peter needs him and receives, in the granting of his request, the better lesson by experience. He grants him his will. But he does not assent to all the terms of the request as formally spoken by the too courageous disciple; he does not add, upon the water—not even to me—as little does he say κελεύω, I bid thee—for in all this there would have lain the certain promise of a successful issue, which he neither can nor will give. He says merely, at the same time literally granting the desire of the disciple: Come! namely, as well and as far as thou canst, it will be seen whether upon the water and to me. This is the divine manner of acting and of leading in such cases. Joab at length, with angry compliance and without love, gives to Ahimaz who persists in asking, "Let me, I pray thee, run," the answer, Run! (2 Sam. xviii. 19–23). But Christ gives his word of permission in true love, which will not let the disciple sink, but will merely teach him by experience that to the best meant beginning of faith, if it has any self-conceit in it, the ὑπομονή or endurance will be wanting. He had not (as Roos here thinks) a pleasure in this, that Peter should inconsiderately beg so strange a command—but he willingly embraces the opportunity of giving this Peter a powerful lesson by actual experience—in this, indeed, Christ, as the truly good Master has always pleasure.

The bold disciple, having now gone from the ship upon the water, walks one or two steps (not more, for Jesus was near), confidently towards Jesus—then he sees, looking away from Jesus (wherefore this?) the strong wind which a few moments before he did not see, and yet which had been always there; as out of fear into faith, so now again he quickly goes out of faith into his former fear. And because, of course, only the faith of the entire will can bear him upon the water, he begins to sink, his doubt now beginning to break out (καταποντίζεσθαι, as at ch. xviii. 6, expresses more than a mere sinking down of the feet), he must, as a punishment before all the other disciples, who are now at rest, once more cry out for fear, and instead of his former exclamation, must call out the true word befitting our weakness, which he had forgotten, and which none of us can so soon get beyond, least of all in the false steps of Peter: Lord help me! All the fisher's natural skill in swimming (John xxi. 7), is at this moment gone, for when one has once committed himself to the miraculous sphere of faith, the power, art, and prudence of nature vanish, one can make no combination of the two. He who comes to a standstill in half-wrought miracles, has also, in the hapless miscarriage, forgotten and lost what he could otherwise do naturally. What occasion might there have been now again for Christ to address to the disciple a more sharply rebuking word of instruction: See! thou forward and presuming one, thus it fares with thee. I knew well that it would be so—or words to this effect! But when the thing itself speaks so powerfully, there is no need for him to say any thing more; his heart, too, has no delight in making the disciple's confusion more conspicuous by any words of his. No, he helps whenever the cry is addressed to him, "Help me"—this is the one principal thing in his heart, in his words and conduct. Nor does he call out merely a second κελεύειν, or bidding, so as to make his power appear great in contrast with the disciple's weakness: Walk again! sink not! hold! but he at once stretches forth his lovingly-inclined hand to the disciple near him, sinking beside him who stands, lays hold on him, so that thereby the faith returns and the sinking ceases, says nothing else, not more and not less than: O thou of little faith, wherefore didst thou doubt? Such words of Christ are unsearchable beyond all human thoughts. With all the defects in Peter's first faith, it was yet truly a great faith, the faith that He who walks on the water can bid others also do the same. Nor can we properly at any time have too great faith in the presence of Christ—if, of course, it be unmixed with self-confidence and self-will. But the greater the faith gives itself out to be, so much the more foolish is then even the smallest doubt, which, therefore, Christ here calls, as at ch. viii. 26, the being afraid. He might, indeed, have said here also to the sinking disciple: Wherefore didst thou fear? This would have been more humbling in contrast with the former courage of the disciple. But with this altogether kindly word, he will not shame him into conviction but encourage him; he discloses the innermost ground of returning fear as lying on the boundary of perfect faith. Not even until after he has laid hold of him and raised him up to himself, until he has purified, strengthened, and perfected the wavering faith of the disciple in his own faith—the faith of the Master—does he address to him the word which denotes the whole thing as now past: Wherefore didst thou doubt? Wherefore indeed? Thou wouldst and couldst walk in thy will, didst even walk! Has, then, he who comes on the sea to me, to regard and to be afraid of the wind? Thus in the greatest kindness does he overlook all of evil or of sin that had been mixed with the faith of the disciples, and most graciously repeats his rebuking word, O thou of little faith! O Lord, thy faith is perfect, thy love is perfect—we all add with shame, and presume not ever on our own authority to rebuke a Peter with this word, which the Master alone may and does say to all.

THE COMMANDMENTS OF GOD AND THE STATUTES OF MEN—WHAT DEFILETH A MAN.

(Matt. xv. 3–20; Mark vii. 6–23.)

Christ speaks freely and emphatically of the commandment of God and the ordinances of men, placing them in direct and sharp opposition. First of all, he speaks of the blind leaders of the blind, because they themselves by their forward questioning occasioned his doing so, and the people standing around may also have heard; but he speaks also to the people to whom he calls in the ever-growing zeal of love and truth. He rebukes, or rather recompenses, the naively bold question, by immediately meeting it with another strongly accusing question in return (ver. 3), in which already the whole answer lies. God's commandment and doctrine goes first, it alone is valid! Human statutes must be broken, when, and because, they break the word of God. This heavy charge he proves forthwith, illustrating it by a capital example taken from the midst of the existing system of lies (ver. 4–6), and then, faithful to his wonted manner, he seals his words and doctrine by a prophetical word of Scripture (vers. 7–9), which brings to bear on the particular example the most general rebuke, penetrating to the root of hypocrisy. First, there is the adduced proof, then the rebuke, and this is given humbly, not upon his own highest authority, but upon that of the word of God written before. He forthwith, however, again, as becomes him, carries forward the word of God in his own doctrine, and enunciates before all the people a general principle (ver. 11) penetrating still deeper into the thing, a principle which goes even further, already prophesying the abolition of the outward ordinances of the Old Testament, inasmuch as he rightly explains their true meaning. The disciples, to, still prejudiced in the same misunderstanding of the Old Testament statutes, out of which the Pharisaism that clung to them took its rise, understand neither this simple and clear principle which appears to them a "parable," nor the reckless zeal, as it seems to them, with which Christ has just spoken to the people against their leaders; they induce him therefore to give further explanations by two questions. In reply to the first: Whether he intends not at all to spare the Pharisees, but purposely to provoke them? he lets them know that human statute is to be extirpated, because it is false and pernicious (vers. 13, 14). The other question which follows this explanation: How, then, is the principle expressed at ver. 11 to be properly understood? is met by the reply, that before giving the answer, he would rebuke their want of understanding (ver. 16). After the rebuke follows the doctrine (vers. 17–20), which, at the conclusion returns to the first occasion and beginning of the whole. Thus has Matthew, who in chaps. xv.–xxi. represents "the ever-growing conflict of Jesus with the authorities at Jerusalem," here again, as we have found to be his wont, concisely and with an eye to the main substance, given the import and progressive sequence of the connected words of Christ on this occasion; Mark, on the other hand, is more full in his account, inasmuch as he not only retains many sentences which Christ may also have spoken, along with what Matthew gives, but (as is especially evident at ver. 15) enlarges by way of explanation for his readers, precisely as at the beginning he gives detailed information respecting the Jewish ordinances. He is moreover not exact when, inverting the order, he gives in the outset the prophecy of Isaiah, and then the convincing example, thereby also quite losing the counter-question put by Christ at the beginning, which contained the immediate answer to the one addressed to him. Had we only Mark's account of our Lord's words on this occasion we should lose nothing indeed essentially belonging to the import—this would rather be the more clearly brought out: only the significantly measured form and sequence of his words would be lost. Provision has been made, however, by the mutually supplementary Gospels, that we should lose nothing: Matthew preserves also the frame into which Mark's explanatory statements admirably dispose themselves. Thus does the inspiration of the Scripture as a whole confirm itself, while, in the particular writing of which it consists, scope is sometimes left for what is human; a principle which, in the four Gospels, finds its highest confirmation.

If in Matthew it is by no means necessary to supply ἐλθόντες, that came, at οἱ ἀπὸ Ἱεροσολύμων, those from Jerusalem (he purposely omits this, in accordance with his general delineation which now begins, and in which the masters of Jerusalem are placed in opposition to Christ, as has been said above, thereby, as it were, giving a superscription to what follows)—yet it stands beside it in Mark. Were they then Scribes and Pharisees who were returning from the Passover (John vi. 4), and had perhaps been specially irritated against Jesus by what had taken place at the feast of Purim, according to John v.—who lived elsewhere, and now, meeting him on their journey, make up to him? But then the designation οἱ ἀπό, those from, in Matthew would not properly be correct; yet we might suppose that they were really persons from the metropolis, the high school of hypocrisy,* who appear here with special authority,† and who had perhaps purposely come after Christ to watch him and to call him to account (which latter Mark seems to indicate by συνάγονται πρὸς αὐτόν). They boast proudly of their παράδοσις τῶν πρεσβυτέρων or ἀρχαίων, tradition of the elders or ancients, of the so-called oral law handed down from Moses (תורה שבעל פה), which they have invented, and which they hold so steadfastly against the Sadducees who reject it, that the mere text of the Bible is declared to have no validity at all without it; farther, of all that the πρεσβύτεροι or elders by a like authority have added to it, so that no one on any account dare transgress it. "To study only the text is a waste of time—the written word is water, but the interpretation and that which is added to it is the wine—if the Scribes say the right is the left and the left the right, hear them"—these and such like sayings we read at this time in the Jewish writings. Christ had already, in the Sermon on the Mount, openly opposed his ἐγὼ δὲ λέγω, "but I say unto you," to the ἐρρέθη τοῖς ἀρχαίοις, "It was said by them of old time," but the opposite of this is now again boldly laid down by his irritated opponents. Especially were the frequent and various washings (Mark vii. 3, 4) a principal part of their hypocritical ceremonial. R. Jose says in the Talmud: He who eats bread with unwashen hands—כאילו בא אל אשה זונה, "is as bad as if he were to lie with a harlot," and gives this as an interpretation of Prov. vi. 26. R. Akiba, who, when in prison, had once so little water given to him that there was not enough also for drinking, chose rather to die of thirst than to eat any thing with unwashen hands! This later obstinacy shows, at least, how bad it must already have been in the time of Christ, and what strong grounds he, who was not wont readily to give offence, must have had for acting as he did, when he purposely did not wash his hands before the Pharisees (Luke xi. 37, 38). The disciples, of course, followed the example of their Master, and the question with all its boldness only presumes to accuse these, although it is certainly meant to hit the Master of such disciples, who of course learn what they do from him.‡ Observe also how the horrendum: They wash not their hands! only follows as a proof of the general assertion before laid down in a general form, They transgress the tradition of the elders; an inference from one thing to all, and on this occasion not without justice, for these people know well what Christ in general thought of their παράδοσις or tradition.

* Rabbi Nathan: If the hypocrites were to be divided into ten parts, nine would be found in Jerusalem and one in the rest of the world!

† Yet not certainly as a deputed commission, as Lange thinks. In that case Christ would have answered the authorities with more respect.

‡ In the highest degree ironical, only still more severely denoting their presumption we might (with Von Gerlach) supplement the question thus: "If thou as a prophet, perhaps, art excepted—wherefore dost thou teach others such transgression."

Verse 3. Christ had spoken as yet very gently, in the Sermon on the Mount, of the Scribes and Pharisees, and even further on, in the growing warmth of his public rebukes, only sparingly and moderately, as appears when we take a nearer view of the web of conscious hypocrisy and actual folly, avarice and ambition, veiled under the covering of what was holy, with which they, by their customs and ordinances, ensnared the poor people. He certainly may have oftener refuted their doctrine in particular instances than the Evangelists were directed to record for the benefit of posterity; still we have reason for supposing that his special polemic against it, at all events on an average, bore the same relation to his teaching on the whole, as is now represented in the Gospels. The true reformer preaches, first of all, the truth positively, certainly at the same time from the first not shrinking from the open general contradiction—Not as the Pharisees! in order that the truth may not suffer from a seemingly pusillanimous silence, or even from the artifices of a false accommodation. He wisely observes further, in his conduct, the limit between a yielding conformity to the more innocent customs, and a decided protest against such principal parts as are of essential significance in the system of lies which is to be combatted (although these, singly and in themselves, might seem quite as harmless as the washing of hands in the present instance)—just as we find in the conduct of Christ. But then he waits for the attack, and when called out, he comes forth to victory in an attitude of severity. So it is with Christ here, in opposition to the Pharisees. They have attacked him, through his disciples, with a side glance of cowardly malice; he himself opens out directly against them: Wherefore then do ye transgress? They have with much seeming reverence pushed forward the tradition of the ancients, to which they were not at liberty to refuse obedience; he charges upon them also the keeping of even this as a continued παραδιδοναι; for the sake of your tradition! They have spoken, by a seemingly holy expression, of transgressing; he shows them to whom this word, in its severest sense, properly applies. They have brought forward the tradition of the ancients as an inviolable whole, no part of which one may touch or break (as James ii. 10 says of the law); he puts over against this as a sufficient answer to it, τὴν ἐντολὴν τοῦ θεοῦ, the alone true, in all its particular commandments, one, and entire, commandment of God! This is the original command, before which no ordinance of the ancients has any force. The commandment of God, not Moses; thus, says Christ, with the strongest emphasis, beforehand, and again in what follows: God has commanded! with which Mark, in his more enlarged account agrees, giving it thrice instead of twice (vers. 8, 9, 13), although in the particular example, ver. 10, he has it: Moses has said, in order thus to show how both are the same. We have here again another strong confirmation of the Old Testament from the mouth of Christ; a fundamental testimony to the great authoritative principle of all human teaching in relation to God's revelation, upon which alone every, not mere emptily protesting reformation stands with positive right. The ordinance of man in general, and as such, already transgresses the commandment of God even when it would support and further it, for it is written: Ye shall add nothing to it and take nothing from it (Num. iv. 2, 12, 32). There is need for no fence around the law, as that must soon become only an obstructing barrier; only too soon and too easily, as all history shows, is the opposition between the divine and the human forgotten, and the sole authority of the former destroyed by placing it on a level with the latter, so that the adding to it is already itself actually a taking away from it. From these beginnings a farther advance is made to transgression and abrogation. Here, too, lie the principles of all true doctrine respecting the relation of tradition to the canon; here must a check be laid on the first root of the abuse, y an unconditional maintenance pure and free of the words, with which no word of man is to be confounded: God has commanded, God has said!

Verses 4—6. The fifth commandment is (as at chap. xix. 19), particularly instanced as being most directly obvious to the conscience, and in so far a specially holy fundamental commandment (the first, in respect to the human life, Eph. vi. 2), which forms the connecting link between the first and second table, and in which are involved the germs of all fear of God and love of our neighbor, of all piety and morality in Church and State. He who violates it, has assuredly committed an offence against the order and plan of God in its very kernel. It is, at the same time, a universal word which God speaks every where among the heathen more plainly than the rest of the ten words given from Sinai: Thou shalt honor father and mother! The other word which stands beside it, and which, by the punishment of death even for an offence against this commandment in words, very strongly confirms it,* is to be found not merely in Exod. xxi. 17 (with ver. 15), immediately after the giving of the law from Sinai, but is repeated in Lev. xx. 9, and again sounds its Amen for all the people among Ebal's curses (Deut. xxvii. 16), while Solomon, too, gives a special emphasis to it (Prov. xx. 20, xxx. 17). In opposition to this, now comes ὑμεῖς δὲ λέγετε, but you are bold enough to teach—properly, only to say,

* This citation by Christ is besides important in opposition to those who regard capital punishment as a measure disapproved by the "mild" Jesus. "Precisely in it does Christ find the fitting expression of the holiness of God, and the entire severity of his will against the lax and arbitrary conduct of the hypocrites" (Evang. Kirchenztg. 1843). Reasoning against capital punishments from the Scripture is in general a failure.

inasmuch as this λέγετε designedly follows the strong word ἐνετείλατο, commanded. Care has been taken in the Jewish writings that we should well understand what is here meant, although Mark also gives no farther explanation. Δῶρον, as Matt. renders קָרְבָּן,* signifies in the first place a gift offered to God, then any gift, present, or dedication for the sanctuary or its servants; hence in Matt. xxvii. 6, the Temple-treasure also bears this name. Now the selfishness of the Pharisees made out of this doctrine their statute, that this Corban must take precedence of every thing of being of the highest sacredness. There existed already a so-called נֶדֶר אִיסָר, votum interdicti, vow of interdiction, by which any one might bind himself in reference to another not to accept this or that from him, and to give him nothing in return, and it was the usual and most emphatic form of such a pledge to say, "It shall rather be Corban," and thus to escape from every other obligation. It was a formula of swearing and cursing literally as it stands here: קרבן שאני נהנה לך, "It is offered, whereby I might profit or serve thee!" (comp. Matt. xxiii. 16, 19). Chiefly of children towards their parents do we find it frequently expressed in the Rabbins: "Let what I shall gain be consecrated, so that my father may eat nothing of it," and the like. In the statute: By Corban is the man bound—it was not merely implied that he was at liberty to do nothing contrary to it, even although it were the command of God; but even when what was refused and denied by this word was not actually offered as Corban, if the word had only been spoken hastily in the heat of the moment, it must yet stand inviolable.† How often may this Corban have been said, in anger and malice, or through the shameful selfishness of children, seeing that, even in Christendom, and to the present day, the sin of shunning the maintenance of parents still cries so often to heaven! It will from this be understood why Christ gives prominence to and connects with the foregoing κακολογεῖν, or cursing, this case in which by one little word this wilfully daring statute overturns the holiest obligations of reverence and love among men. Δῶρον, "a gift"—without ἔστω or ἐστί "be it," or "it is"—denotes the curse formula as such; by its being directly spoken to the father or to the mother the worst example of it is presented, when the parent asks and the children refuse, although substantially it retains its truth even when not done precisely in this form. To honor father and mother is a commanded worship of God superior to all self-chosen forms of worship:* this honoring comprehends under it, of course, taking care of and supporting, as a grateful requital (Sir. vii. 28); so that it is very unnecessary to show, as some have done, that τιμᾶν, to honor, has also this signification (Sir. xxxviii. 1; 1 Tim. v. 3–17). What the children have belongs to the parents—so writes Philo on the Decalogue. Whoso withdraws any thing from his father or his mother, and saith it is no sin, the same is a companion of the destroyer—thus did Solomon already almost prophesy for the future (Prov. xxviii. 24). Such Corban was an unjust possession, and an abomination (Sir. xxxiv. 18). If, according to Num. xxx. 4–6, the father could control the daughter of his house in every vow and bond, so that it should not be valid if he disallowed it, how much less ought so shameful a vow as this to have force.† But ye teach—thus must Christ rebuke them—that whoever has said Corban, the same needs not also to honor his father and his mother! The greater number, indeed, read as if there were a break in ver. 5, after which Christ himself speaks; this, however, sounds to us too harsh, although we might retain the καί, and, as genuine. In this καὶ οὐ μὴ τιμήσῃ, which is evidently the apodosis wrongly supposed by some to be wanting, "he needs not also (not even) to honor" father and mother—the daring counter-command of men is brought forward in a sharply convictive form, so that by this is directly confirmed the stronger repetition of what is said at ver. 3: And thus ye have not only transgressed, but entirely weakened and abolished the command of God by your tradition. Mark, who has entirely omitted the self-evident apodosis ἐὰν εἴπῃ, if he say, brings out the inference thereby in a still stronger form: οὐκέτι ἀφίετε αὐτὸν οὐδὲν ποιῆσαι, you allow him no longer to do any thing. He has already, at ver. 8, expressed the same antithesis by ἀφέντες and κρατεῖτε: You leave, dispense with, the command of God as a subordinate, less binding thing, in order to maintain only the παράδοσις of men; in like manner, at ver. 9 again with the repeated ironical καλῶς (which is at the same time still to be understood as at ver. 6) ἀθετεῖτε ἵνα τηρήσητε, "full well ye reject—that ye may keep." He specifies, moreover, at ver. 8, that Christ also expressly mentioned before the βαπτισμοὺς ξέστων καὶ

* Mark: κορβᾶν, ὅ ἐστι δῶρον—just as Josephus (Antiq. iv. 4, 4): δῶρον δὲ τοῦτο σημαίνει κατὰ Ἑλλήνων γλῶτταν. But whether in this simple δῶρον be expressed at the same time the oldest and most general ground-idea of all offering before God properly speaking (only gift, not atonement or substitution), we are inclined strongly to doubt in opposition to Rudelbach and Guericke (Zeitschrift, 1850, iii. 504).

† So much is true, but it is going too far to affirm that, according to the doctrine and practice, it was enough to say: Thou shalt have as little of it as if I were to offer it!

* There is a Chinese saying: If a man show reverence for his father and mother in his house, why go farther to burn spices?

† In general then the text here stands in opposition to all unjustifiable vows, inasmuch as we are only entitled to vow what it is in our power and right to perform. Luther used it in particular against even cloister-vows taken in opposition to the will of parents.

ποτηρίων, "washing of cups and pots," and represents him as adding twice at ver. 8 and 13: And many other such like things do ye. Christ may indeed have expressed himself thus, inasmuch as he brought forward the Corban "as an example;" still Mark seems here, at the same time, to fall into an amplifying fulness of words, in order rightly to denote in his own manner the same contrast which Matthew with his conciseness represents still more sharply and truly.

Verses 7—9. Ye hypocrites! who cover the grossest transgression of the law, with miserable, trifling, outward observances, with empty phrases, and yet must know what you persuade yourselves and others that you do not know! (Luke xi. 40). Every ordinance of man that is contrary to the existing word of God, is in its innermost origin and development truly hypocrisy, and can only consist with a general relation to God such as Christ now imputes to these hypocrites from the prophecy of Isaiah, thus sealing his own plain words of rebuke and reprimand with a prophetical testimony. Καλῶς προεφήτευσε περὶ ὑμῶν, Well did he prophesy of you—this may certainly also mean: his words are quite applicable to you, are true (really and truly, is it not so? which καλῶς may also mean, Mark, ver. 9), when spoken of you. Such accommodation is certainly also allowed, and occurs here and there. But we must here contradict those who wisely remark that Christ applies prophetical words merely to his own time, and yet hastily affirm that a prophet speaks only to his contemporaries. It may be thoroughly demonstrated that, even in by far the most instances in which it appears to be so, there yet remains a προφητεύειν or prophesying as regards the future for which the whole Scripture has been written aforetime; chiefly in the case before us did the Sprit in Isaiah mean more than the then existing people. But to demonstrate this fully would require a profound investigation of the whole subject of Isaiah the prophet, to whose prophecies (truly ill-used in the recent exegesis) the present writer has given the most careful study. It may be permitted, at least, to note the following.* In the entire section, Isaiah xxiv.–xxxv. (under Hezekiah, when Israel goes down and Judah remains), a threatening and a promise are three times set over against each other, and the prospect as regards the future opened up for the people; either as false Israel to be rejected and to fall in the judgment of Babylon, or as the true Israel of God to attain to the salvation of Zion (as both were already at ch. xiii.–xiv. opposed to each other). Of these three "layers" (as we like to designate the uniformly commencing sections of the prophetical discourse) the middle one embraces ch. xxviii.–xxxii., in which this general view is specially amplified into a doctrine, and stronger prominence is given to that which forms the innermost ground-intuition of all the prophets, namely, that by purifying judgments the true Israel is to be separated from the false, is to be won and prepared (ch. xxvii. 6–13). Thus now is indeed ch. xxviii. connected with the state of Israel and Judah under Hezekiah, but forthwith (for the prophetical address pulsates in such contrasts and combinations) ch. xxix. stretches far beyond, speaks of more than one future siege and dispersion (comp. ver. 3 with Luke xix. 43), comprehends (ver. 14) the wondrous dealings of God with this people even to the still future removal of their blindness (vers. 18, 19); it speaks therefore (vers. 9–14) by no means merely of the then existing state, but of the entire intermediate period which now lies open to view in the present Rabbinical Judaism (to which alone the whole delineation in its most literal sense applies), and which in the time of Christ must already in its first groundwork have manifested itself to him in the same character. Then follow chs. xxx.–xxxii., which, again returning to the contemporaries and connecting with their conduct, and yet reaching forward to all times, contain an exhortation on this prophetical text: "Yield yourselves to the guidance of God and go not in the ways of men! I the Lord am he who alone leadeth you to salvation!" O that we learned to read the prophets with such a profound and comprehensive glance as Christ read, understood, and explained them!

What Christ here adduces, is properly in the original text (although the Sept. only renders the לָכֵן following, not the יַעַן כִּי) a protasis, whose apodosis thereby brought to mind contains the threatening: "Therefore will I also proceed to do a marvellous work among this people, even a wonderful work, for the wisdom of their wise man shall perish, and the understanding of their prudent men shall be hid!" I will give them up to their blindness, so that out of Pharisaism shall at length grow the madness of the Talmud. With all their other differences Matthew and Mark are entirely at one in the citation, with the exception of the immaterial transposition of the οὗτος, this, and the completeness of the first clause which is probably genuine in Matthew, and has fallen aside in Mark (for we can neither dispense with the ἐγγίζει as the necessary antithesis to πόρρω ἀπέχει, nor with the στόματι as the point of connection for ver. 11 afterwards). Mouth and heart are divided, as Ezek. xxxiii. 31, and "on the lips" is still more emphatic than "in the mouth." In the main substance (only that τοῖς χείλεσί με τιμᾷ is transposed for ἐν τοῖς χείλεσιν αὐτῶν τιμῶσί με, as also διδασκαλίας) the citation follows the text of the Sept. (where וּתְהִי is read for וַתְּהִי). The sense remains the same. What the Hebrew says is properly: And their fear before me, their whole religion and piety is a learned, outwardly imparted, commandment of men—the Greek gives prominence by the μάτην to the nothingness, the emptiness of such worship, and thus admirably corresponds with the ἐντάλματα ἀνθρώπων, "commandments of men"; comp. the same expression, Col. ii. 22. They are, as it were, not even worthy the name of ἐντολαί, commands (as of the Decalogue), at all events they are the commandments of men, for the קַדְמוֹנִים (ancients) also, with all that they say and lay down, are nothing more. Human commandment and human doctrine never go farther indeed than the hand and foot, while God desires the heart of his people. If this be far from him, then must he also put his people from him, so that rejecting them, he says: This people—no longer my people (as Isa. xxviii. 11, vi. 9, 10, viii. 6, 12, and so in many places).

* With which at least the Introduction, p. 70 to 72, in my interpretation of the Not-pseudo Isaiah may be compared.

Verses 10, 11. Christ now, seeing that he has spoken of the corruption of the whole people as proceeding from these incorrigible hypocrites, leaves the blind leaders (ver. 14), and calls the people openly to him, in order to give them a faithful, earnest warning against such doctrine of men: *Hear and understand. In Mark, still more emphatically, all the people —Hear me all of you and understand. In like manner afterwards once more: If any one has ears to hear, let him hear! In a strikingly compact antithesis and plain apophthegm, he embodies his important doctrine, which, with deep-searching wisdom, is opposed to the lying and hypocritical work of outward ordinances, in order thus "to stamp it as the people's coin." What defiles the man, and what does not—namely, the man properly so-called, the inner man upon whom God looks—by this is already indicated what the explanation afterwards (vers. 18–20) brings into full light. When, however, Mark omits precisely the antithesis between going into and coming out of the mouth, although in this the point of the saying as a "parable" lies, and puts instead of this his ἔξωθεν τοῦ ἀνθρώπου, "without the man," as also the more forcible οὐ δύναται αὐτὸν κοινῶσαι, "cannot defile him" —it is quite evident that this is an anticipation of the subsequent explanation, and hardly corresponds with the original form of the saying. Even in the explanation afterwards he does not mention the mouth, so that one might include under what he says, also the actions proceeding from the man, while yet Christ in the first place means only the word as the most immediate out-going of the heart. We see that Mark has less the gift of seizing and representing discourses, than of delineating narratives; still we see, at the same time, that notwithstanding, he was allowed to fall into no substantial error. What Christ means is also clear enough in his account. All that comes from without to the man, such as eating and drinking (and then, farther, eating with washen or unwashen hands, etc. καὶ ἄλλα παρόμοια τοιαῦτα πολλά, comp. Rom. xiv. 17; Heb. xiii. 9)—is in itself an ἀδιάφορον, or thing indifferent, can neither defile nor cleanse in the true sense of the word. Even in the sacrament, eating and drinking is in itself nothing, with reference to which Origen found reason to apply the saying anew to the Christians.. It is evident, moreover, that it is by no means therefore a matter of indifference what one eats and drinks, in so far as this, on the other hand, comes out of the heart and works in the heart; for even the first prohibition of God was a prohibition of meat, and in Luke xxi. 34 Christ warns his disciples against burdening the heart with surfeiting and drunkenness, and the apostle must needs earnestly point out to the Romans and Corinthians what it is to eat from faith and in love. When, in opposition to temperance societies, some have sought recently to justify the use of brandy as being something that only goes into the mouth, the argument has been well answered: See how impurely it soon again goes out by the mouth! All this will afterwards appear more precisely in the explanation given by Christ.

Verses 13, 14. When Christ came to the house (see Mark) the disciples ask him to give a more particular account of what he had been saying. Their first scruple respecting the unsparing manner in which Christ shamed and offended the Pharisees, as well as the answer which Christ made to it, is found only in Matthew, who is the more intelligible notwithstanding the greater conciseness of his account. It is very natural that, of the two questions which they have at heart, this should be the first to break forth; for although (ver. 11) they had not quite understood what they heard, yet its manifest contrariety to the Pharisaic doctrine was to them evident enough. How, now, if the people should appeal to this word of Christ against their masters? The thing appeared to them all the more perplexing the less that they had been accustomed hitherto to such warmth on the part of their Master; with an amiable boldness (for his humility had accustomed them so to speak with him) they ask him whether he who, at other times, knows and well considers every thing, has this time also known and considered what great offence his words must give to the Pharisees. Why didst thou speak the word so publicly and openly to them? Answer: As by my acts, I protest against their ordinances, and ye with me, so did I also speak this now in order to root out the ordinances of men! Be not concerned in doing this, about giving offence to the seducers, there is a present necessity and duty—for such ordinances are destructive. Never more sharply than here has Christ expressed himself in favor of a decisive resoluteness as opposed to all compromise, which would yield any thing of the salutary truth Those, however, altogether mistake the meaning of his words who, in ver. 13, already understand the ἐκριζοῦσθαι, being rooted up, of the destruction of the persons, referring to the parable of the field; for the rooting up which is here commanded must evidently be something different from that which is there forbidden. Bengel's remark is quite correct, that φυτόν, plant, is what has grown naturally, φυτεία, planting, what is planted and fostered by man. Consequently the plants not planted by the heavenly Father (in his vineyard, his people) are here, it is evident, precisely the ἐντάλματα ἀνθρώπων, "commandments of men," ordinances, doctrines, regulations, which must be cleared away again. (See, on the other hand, chap. xxiii. 2, 3, by way of supplement to what is here said.) Not till ver. 14 is any thing said of the destruction of men: and first, that this is the sad result of those ordinances; consequently, that precisely for this reason the error is to be rooted up, so that the poor men may not fall by it into perdition. The seduced perishes with the seducer (Luke vi. 39)—unless the saving truth of God interposes. This, however, is done, and shall be done, irrespective of its being an offence to the seducers; it is a salutary offence when the blind are called to halt on their way to the pit. Therefore let them go, do not mind them, be not concerned about their being offended. The reforming protest against human commandments has divine right, it is a holy duty; at the same time, there lies in ἐκριζωθήσεται, shall be rooted up, the promise indicated, that a time will at length come when there will be an end to the reforming which at present continues to be ever necessary. Meanwhile, in patient hope and earnest zeal, every after-growth of human ordinances is to be resisted and abolished by the pure word, as much as possible, although the men themselves, out of whose evil heart they proceed, are to be borne with, and may not be rooted out of the world, which is God's field. Blind leaders of the blind: thus has Christ already spoken in the Sermon on the Mount, and again he speaks similarly at Matt. xxiii. 16, 24; here, however, he at the same time alludes still to the prophecy of Isaiah, chap. xxix. 10–12, 18; ix. 16; iii. 12.

* Euthymius: ἐκείνους μὲν ἐπιστομίσας καὶ καταισχύνας ἀφῆκεν ὡς ἀνιάτους. τρέπει δὲ τὸν λόγον πρὸς τὸν ὄχλον ὡς ἀξιολογώτερον, "them indeed having silenced and shamed, he left as incurable; while he turns his discourse to the multitude as more worthy to be addressed."

Verse 16. Hereupon, Peter, in the name of the rest of the disciples, brings forward the other question, as to how this offensive discourse is properly to be understood, with respect to which they had only perceived that there lay beneath it much that was important, new, and as yet unheard of in Israel. The explanations of the parables in ch. xiii. made it a pleasure to them to ask such questions, and therefore as affording, so to speak, a just ground for their request, they call the simple word in ver. 11 (for this is evidently meant, as the answer shows) also a parable. It was, properly speaking, scarcely so to be designated, as the slightly interpretative form in which Mark gives it, and in which it at once becomes a most plain and direct address, shows; besides the going into the mouth and coming out of the mouth was no figure, if they had only recollected ch. xii. 34. Still, as the going into the mouth was plainly enough to be understood of eating, the coming out of the mouth, which is directly opposed to it, may with their weakness of comprehension have led them astray; probably in addition to this the surprising contradiction to the divine laws respecting meats (as still later, Acts x. 14), may have awakened great doubt, so that they could not reconcile themselves to the discourse as a whole. Christ, however, who on this occasion, with justice, ver. 10, had expected even from the people an understanding of the main truth, which was so simple, first of all chides his disciples for their want of understanding, ere he gives the answer: Are ye also yet so very deficient in understanding? (ἀκμήν for κατ' ἀκμήν, scil. χρόνου, till this moment, as the directly following οὔπω corresponds). Are ye not able as my disciples at once to perceive what belongs to the man properly so called, the internal man? Are ye also yet so taken up with what is outward, so prejudiced in Pharisaic notions and offences, that you mistake for a parable this otherwise literally clear discourse, and rather seek something else beneath it than the truth lying openly on its surface?

Verses 17, 18. The course of thought in the discourse on to the conclusion is this: Mat is morally indifferent, ver. 17, words, on the contrary, are important as coming out of the heart, ver. 18, consequently by nature evil and impure, ver. 19—upon which then, ver. 20, winding up the whole, returns to the first theme of the entire discourse. There is a decided difference between κοιλία and καρδία, for the former, the belly, with its meat belongs to what passes away of the present outward man (1 Cor. vi. 13), while the latter, the heart, is the θησαυρός (treasure) of the man, properly speaking, and his disposition of mind.* (Compare also Col. ii. 16, 17, 22, in order to see that Christ here, while he rejects the commandments of men relating to the sphere of the outward and indifferent, at the same time undeniably makes already in this general statement a prophetical allusion to the impending abrogation of the Levitical laws regarding meats, Acts x. 14, 15; 1 Tim. iv. 4.) For it was indeed necessary that such hints should already come from his lips, in order that what was afterwards so fitted to create surprise might rest upon his authority: and precisely because he will include this in his far-stretching glance does he adhere (which Mark has overlooked) throughout the whole discourse so specially to the mouth, the eating, not the hands and their washing. He will certainly, at the same time, say: The reason of the divine commandments hitherto, which relate to the mouth, lies not in the meats themselves; they in no wise mean the eating or not eating in itself, as the Pharisees take them, and in their own fashion multiply them, but obedience. Every thing clean and unclean—where God has hitherto declared any thing to be unclean (as likewise ordained washings)—belongs to the heart, so that in those cases the eating or not eating already previously comes out of the heart, just as was the case in the forbidden fruit of Paradise. In saying this Christ speaks without false affectation, and with holy dignity, of every thing human, even of the ἀφεδρών or "draught"—partly on account of the obtuseness of his disciples on this occasion (as if he said to them, thus must I speak to you in a downright way, in order that you may understand), partly, in the exalted point of view according to which, even in the Old Testament, laws were given for the impurities of men, in their present state unfortunately burdened with such (Deut. xxiii. 12-14). Profoundly significant is the certainly genuine additional clause of Mark, who here also supplements what is said by Matt: καθαρίζον πάντα τὰ βρώματα, purging all [the] meats. The participle to which ὅ ἐστι, which is, is to be supplied, applies to the whole clause: Which process, which business of separation at the end (not the previous washing) purges all meats, i. e., removes from the meat properly so-called, that which, in some sense certainly, is impure in it, and thus does enough for the occasion; as, first of all in a physical, so then in a higher sense, compensation is made by evacuation for what, speaking generally, is impure for man in the whole business of meats. That of which Christ here so significantly speaks was for him, therefore, even a humble work of purification for the βρώματα, "meats," in the enjoyment of which and their passage through the flesh he was made like to us.*

*Compare the passage in Philo: στόματι, δι' οὗ γίνεται θνητῶν μέν, ὡς ἔφη Πλάτων, εἴσοδος, ἔξοδος δὲ ἀφθάρτων. Ἐπειδέρχεται μὲν γὰρ αὐτῷ σιτία καὶ ποτά, φθαρτοῦ σώματος φθαρταὶ τροφαί· λόγοι δὲ ἐξιασίν, ἀθανάτου ψυχῆς ἀθάνατοι νόμοι, δι' ὧν ὁ λογικὸς βίος κυβερνᾶται (De opif. mund. 1. 29).

All, therefore, that enters into the mouth goes in this natural way to be purged, and does not really defile the man with abiding impurity. But does all, too, that comes out of the mouth and heart defile him? It is true that (in Matt. and Mark), πᾶν, all, is not repeated here, yet the τὰ δὲ ἐκπορευόμενα, τὸ ἐκπορευόμενον, but the things, thing, that go forth, are put quite as generally. Nor does Christ say, by way of limiting these expressions: But whatsoever evil, impure, thing comes out. He means, therefore, truly all that the naturally corrupt heart of man brings forth, he takes the natural man as he is, as entirely impure, and of himself ever defiling himself anew; it is precisely this that with great severity he opposes to Pharisaism! The τὸν ἄνθρωπον, the man, which occurs twice in ver. 11, and now recurs in the explanation (Mark has it emphatically still oftener), is the culminating point of the whole discourse, which rises from the belly to the heart, and thus to the man, properly speaking. That which goes into the belly belongs not to the man in the sense in which Christ here uses the word. Therefore Mark more fully: That which from without comes into the man (i. e. in the common use of the term and to appearance), cannot defile him; for it goes not into his heart (properly his inner part), but into the belly, and continues, therefore, also in the εἰσπορεύεσθαι, entering in, to be yet properly ἔξωθεν, without; to which ἔξωθεν an ἔσωθεν, without and within, is then twice sharply opposed. What the tongue from natural, unrestrained impulse speaks, is only evil and poison from the hell of the heart; what the man lets out, is partly a manifestation of the impurity of his innermost being which is already there, partly a fault, inasmuch as he, every time reacting upon himself, further stains himself with his own filth (James iii. 6, 8). From this we will understand the sharp concluding words in their striking generality.

Verses 19, 20.—A dictum probans (proof text) for original sin, as strong as we could wish it to be. Ἐκ τῆς καρδίας, "from the heart"—this means certainly the man, here spoken of as he is in himself and every where; Mark has besides τῶν ἀνθρώπων, of men. Ye are totally and entirely unclean in your sins, Christ would say; here eating or washing from without, will afford no help, but there is needed an entirely different cleansing of the altogether perverted and corrupted heart (Jer. xvii. 9). This the wilfully blind Pharisee overlooks, and goes on defiling himself, while he foolishly holds with so much zeal his manifold distinctions of clean and unclean (chap. xxiii. 24, 27; Luke xi. 39, τὸ δὲ ἔσωθεν ὑμῶν, your own inward part, ye merely outwardly washed vessels!) Christ will certainly not thereby say that out of every man's heart and mouth only evil proceeds; but where good proceeds, there it has been previously implanted by grace, and comes therefore not properly from the man himself. He might also have said: Out of the heart proceed hypocritical words, when the people draw near to God with the mouth, ver. 8—but he has said this already, and he now rather discloses to the hypocrites what other sins in general, if not in works yet in equivalent words, are always flowing out of their heart (chap. xii. 34, 37). As a comprehensive generic idea, stand first of all the broad and deep-reaching διαλογισμοὶ πονηροί, evil thoughts. These are the innermost, first, heart-discourse and heart-thoughts, which in every word and work, were already there as properly sin, ere they represented themselves outwardly; in them precisely the ἐξέρχεσθαι, going forth, of all sins from the heart is made convincingly manifest.* These are lusts and passions, doubts and contradictions, these are in particular, for example, such questions also as were before addressed to him (ver. 2), and, on the whole, such elaborate systems of lies as do away with God's commandment; we cannot take the expression too generally in order to comprehend under it the catalogue of sins which follows. This, however, is in Matthew specialized only according to the decalogue, from which the concluding and transition-command of the first table was adduced before; therefore the catalogue goes on from this point, and all the sins against the commandments of the second table are named in correct order. Βλασφημίαι, "blasphemies," are accordingly calumnies and insults against one's neighbor; the last commandment had already been included in the διαλογισμούς, "thoughts." This simple arrangement might occur to Matthew, who here abridges more and extracts the kernel, while in Mark we find a greater variety of species. And though he may have added some expressions, yet the conclusion again speaks to us as genuine and original, and invented by no reporter. First of all, Mark also follows the order of the Sinaitic commandments (with the exception of that remarkable transposition of the seventh and the sixth which sometimes occurs): μοιχεῖαι, πορνεῖαι—φόνοι—κλοπαί and πλεονεξίαι, "adulteries, fornications, murders, thefts, and covetousness," are evidently to be taken together —now (instead of the literal ψευδομαρτυρίαι, "false witness," of Matt.) he has four other expressions which, however, by the following βλασφημία, "blasphemy," show that they yet collectively belong to the ninth (Lutheran eighth) commandment. For by πονηρίαι "wickedness," side by side with δόλος, "deceit," are evident'y meant wickedness, malicious acts, injuring one's neighbor through falsehood (comp. Rom. i. 29)—ἀσέλγεια, "lasciviousness," in like manner, beside ὀφθαλμὸς πονηρός, "an evil eye," cannot fall back again into μοιχεῖαι, πορνεῖαι, "adulteries, fornications," but in its fundamental signification means petulantia, self-will, wantonnesss. As theft and covetousness, doing injury and guile, belong to each other as the more open and more concealed form of the same sin, so also does petulence bear the same relation to the עַיִן רָע or evil eye of envy. All these are still included in a certain measure under the one commandment: Thou shalt not speak or be false against thy neighbor; they however penetrate so deeply into it as to reach beyond it to the last commandment, which is wanting in Matthew. Finally, in the concluding words after βλασφημία, "blasphemy," which are peculiar to Mark (the connecting link lying in the twofold sense of that expression, blasphemy against God and against our neighbor), a return is made in a most direct and profound manner to the general ground of all sin, as the first table reveals itself in the first commandment: pride against the Highest is, as inward idolatry, the evil ground of all sin (Sirach x. 12, 13, in the Greek), while from this pride flows all the ἀφροσύνη, "foolishness," that is connected with sin. Thus does the conclusion lead completely back to the beginning, and there is here attested by Christ, we think, a truth which cannot be too thoughtfully considered, namely, that all want of understanding in the blind, all unreason and folly on the part of those who are led captive by human madness in opposition to God's word, is a fault and a sin proceeding out of the evil ground of the proud heart; which will be made manifest in the Sadducees and Hegelians of our own day before Christ's judgment, as it was then in the Pharisees.

* A later Jewish statute prescribes that a man should go to stool, and if possible empty himself out ere he sit down to meat, in order that he may eat with clean stomach and belly; which the very wise Rabbins find in the "putting away of the old before the new" (Lev. xxvi. 10). If this, perhaps, had been said even at that time, we might find in it an occasion for Christ's discourse, which accounts for his going so far into the matter. For the rest we have here at the same time a testimony against that Gnostic doctrine, for example of Valentinus, which Clemens of Alexandria thus mentions: ἤσθιε καὶ ἔπιεν ἰδίως, οὐκ ἀποδιδοὺς τὰ βρώματα, "he ate and drank peculiarly, not evacuating his victuals:" so great was the power of the ἐγκράτεια (continence) of Christ: ὥστε καὶ μὴ φθαρῆναι τὴν τροφὴν ἐν αὐτῷ, "that even his food did not grow corrupt within him" (cited by Dorner, i. 457).

THE CANAANITISH WOMAN.

(Matt. xv. 24, 26, 28; Mark vii. 27, 29.)

That Christ departed (Matt. ἀνεχώρησεν, Mark ἀπῆλθεν), refers evidently to the stir that had just been made and the offence that had been given, from which, according to his usual practice, he again withdraws himself. He does not, indeed, betake himself beyond the boundary of Judea actually into the country of the heathen, for this, on account of what is said, ver. 24, is not to be supposed,* but near to it, towards the confines of the country of Tyre and Sidon.† From this time onwards we

* "The διαλογισμοὶ πονηροί, in relation to the following φόνοι, μοιχεῖαι, etc., are certainly not to be understood as a distinct species of sin beside the others, but as the first step in the development of sin, with which the others are then connected as the realization of these in act" (Jul. Müller, on Sin, i. 337, Clark's For. Theol. Library).

* The visit to Phœnicia, here by mistake inserted, is therefore only a chimera of Sepp's, which we have already put aside.

† Matt. εἰς τὰ μέρη, here equivalent to versus regiones, as the Syriac expresses it, for Mark says, observe in the Gospels that he also more and more avoids publicity in Galilee (see especially Mark ix. 30, παρεπορεύοντο, which Grotius rightly interprets παρὰ τὴν ὁδὸν ἐπορεύοντο, they went by by-ways). The inhabitants of the sea-coast around Tyre and Sidon were called in the special sense Canaanites (Judges i. 31, 32; Num. xiii. 30; and, with a play upon the name, Isa. xxiii. 8), or Phœnicians (Φοινίκες, Exod. vi. 15; Josh. v. 1, in the Sept.), in which case the Syrophœnicians and Libyphœnicians (Συροφοίνικες, Λιβυφοίνικες) were distinguished; and when Mark at the same time designates the woman in respect of her γένος or "nation" by Ἑλληνίς or "Greek," he only means by this in general, a heathen woman, so that we cannot find with Niemeyer in her striking reply (ver. 27) a "fine Grecian wit." The beginning of the account, in Mark, makes it appear as if she had sought out Christ in his house, but the crying after him (Matt. ver. 23) plainly shows that she had already called to him on the way. According to Mark iii. 8; Luke vi. 17, the fame of Christ's deeds was spread abroad also in this district; so soon therefore as this woman of great faith, who had a daughter possessed of a devil, had heard of the coming of the great Helper, which could not be hid, she sought him out (Mark ver. 25). She addresses him not merely by the general title of honor, Κύριε, "Sir," but, in order that she may make no oversight, she adds also the Israelitish appellation, "Son of David."† She begs for pity; but he pities her not! The fountain of mercy, usually open to every hand that only touches the hem of his garment, flows not, the much lauded Physician and Helper will not heal and help; the friendly mouth, which is ever so ready to give comfort, is silent. He answered her not a word—not a word either, however, of refusal: I will not, dare not, help you, be gone and leave me or the like—to say this is to him impossible, for it becomes hard enough for him to be silent. The disciples cannot understand their Master; it has been so much his practice to dismiss all suppliants by hearing and helping them, that this has become the understood rule of his conduct. Ἀπόλυσον αὐτήν, i.e., not certainly: Put her away at least, if thou wilt not help her; but it includes the helping as pre-supposed. Still, their request on her behalf springs not purely from sympathizing love, but here is a seeming against a seeming; the compassionate Master seems harsh, and the disciples seem more compassionate than he, while they are thinking at least quite as much of themselves as of the suppliant and her distress. For although the reason they give for their request is intended at the same time to mean as regards Christ: The people hear it, and now there will arise a real stir which yet thou art anxious to avoid—still the most important reason to them betrays itself in the very bold "us:" the Canaanitess is disagreeable to us, and troublesome with her crying. Hence they do not express themselves in the manner most natural to the awakened feeling of love: Help her, hear her (do take pity on her! would certainly not have been proper)—but, Send her away! Pray, make haste, and rid us of her and her crying! A truly injurious supposition on their part that such a reason could move Christ to help her, as it did them.

The remarkable answer of Christ opens to them an entirely different point of view, in which he kindly passes over every thing in the way of rebuke, actually defends himself humbly against their misapprehension of his conduct, and adduces a weighty reason for his surprising silence. Most of the practical commentators and preachers fall here into the error which has become traditional, namely, that Christ, thoroughly knowing the woman's heart, had from the first determined to help her, but meant previously to draw out her great and exemplary faith by a feigned refusal in the way of trial.* Thus the pre-determined counsel of God is improperly mixed up with the human acting and consciousness of Jesus, which is by no means at all times and entirely to be merged in the former; so here beyond regard to that which happens to the woman certainly in part as an example for us, the innermost significance of the narrative for Christ's own person, the wonderful conterminons meeting of the divine and the human in him, upon which, in the passage before us, much light is thrown, is not at all understood; thus is entirely overlooked a circumstance that lies quite on the surface, namely that Christ, when he first breaks silence, says what we read (Matt. ver. 24) actually to the disciples, as necessary information for them, and by no means merely that the woman may thereby hear it obliquely. This is, consequently, the real key-word to the enigma of his seemingly harsh silence (which Mark surprisingly enough passes over, while it is essential to the story as told in the Gospel of Matthew); this is indeed a truth which we are not at liberty to explain away as if the words were not spoken in earnest.

I am "sent,"—in this expression (as he elsewhere also says, I am come, and that sixteen times, but on the other hand he speaks only four times in the first three Gospels, and forty εἰς τὰ μεθόρια, in confinia, border, neighborhood. Matthew says of the woman: ἀπὸ τῶν ὁρίων ἐκείνων ἐξελθοῦσα, "came out of the same coasts"; Christ had, therefore, not come into her country.

† Which reference to the Jewish designation presents no difficulty whatever, so that we are not under the necessity of supposing with Lange (after Sepp), that the daughter who was possessed had a revelation of the name Jesus and the title Son of David.

* Even Bengel incomprehensibly thinks, that Jesus, in the exercise of his foreknowledge, made this entire journey to the borders on this woman's account.

times in the fourth, of his being sent and of "him who hath sent him," comp. John vii. 28 and the context)—in this expression he represents his whole earthly life and labors as subject to the Father's commission and appointment. In this commission is exactly prescribed what he is to do (Luke iv. 43), and besides obeying this he does nothing. Now, as the sent prophet, miracle-worker, and Messiah, he was, on account of the promises, actually a servant of the circumcision (Rom. xv. 8); not until his exaltation, was the salvation to be extended also to the Gentiles (John xii. 32). He was, therefore, bound by his instructions, as he here not less clearly than humbly says to his disciples. He actually thought, in his silence toward the first and only suppliant from the heathen world, properly speaking (for such is this woman in the Gospels): I dare not help her! Else he had been quite as prepared to answer her prayer as he was that of the centurion of Capernaum, the friend of the Jews. He will not, by passing over to a foreign sphere, draw to himself many needy Gentiles by giving help to one, and by thus opening a new theatre of action which is yet closed to him, give offence to the Jews as if he were not their "Son of David." It was not merely fit (as Bengel, on the other side, observes half correctly), that he should lay down, by way of testimony (before giving the help which he had determined to give), such a protestation against further consequences; but the protestation is meant in literal and entire earnest just as it stands. "The keen scenting, timorous, light-hating sagacity of the watchmen on Zion, the close suffocating air" (to speak with the poet Lange), has driven him, if not over, at least upon the boundary of the Holy Land; yet he speaks of that wicked Israel, whom he has to rebuke and from whom he has to withdraw himself, here as always, outwardly with the honor and dignity becoming him on account of his calling (for example, John iv. 22). For it is, and continues to be, the house of Israel to the lost sheep of which alone he is sent, in the first place, during his life upon earth. He has not now left them in order to give them up, and turn without distinction to the Gentiles before the time; he himself, in faithful obedience to the Father's commission as a whole, does not now at once perceive that the Father has brought to him here an exception to the rule—until he comes to see it in the victorious faith of the woman, as he oftentimes learned his Father's will, as regards the particular case, by what happened to him. Only thus we believe is the full justice of an unprejudiced interpretation (without bringing into it what is not there) insured to this earnest and most significant word of Christ's mouth, and to the entire narrative in which it stands. It is a heathen woman who now, contrary to time and order, desires help of the Messiah—this the disciples had forgotten, but he knew what significance belongs to this, and maintains the great distinction, when it is proper to do so, as firmly against the inconsiderateness of men, as, on the other hand, he can humble Jewish pride, and prophesy of the future salvation of the Gentiles who accept its offered blessings.

She has heard this—the poor heathen mother who feels the plague of her little daughter as her own, and asks compassion and help for herself in the healing of her child; but she does not let herself be led astray, she reasons not thus: It is then not true what I have heard of his readiness to help all. He is indeed but the Messiah of the Jews, who has no compassion for us heathen! Either Christ now at least stood still, when he spoke to his disciples, or she forces her way through to him, falling at his feet and ceasing not to cry: Lord, help me! No longer, "Son of David"—for this, as she has perceived, belongs only to the house of Israel, but she still repeats: Lord, mighty universal Lord, I leave thee not; help me! The most condensed form of expression wrung from the anguish of her heart; nor does she any longer say, Have mercy on me! but what at bottom is still stronger than this. Will Christ now help? Not yet! She first receives directly the same information as the disciples, and that expressed still more strongly, in which Christ rises from mere silence to the worst of excessive harshness—and yet there is no express refusal. It avails not that thou callest me Son of David, thou art a heathen woman. Christ here adopts the language of the Jews, who called the Gentiles dogs. Those who before were the lost sheep, to whom the shepherd belongs, are now the children—namely, of the house of Israel, the family of God, and what he now is, or can give, is the children's bread. Already, however (alluding to further perseverance), there lies beneath the seeming harshness the utmost kindness: these unbelieving Jews, who have even now almost driven me from their country, are yet the children! Οὐκ ἔστι καλόν, it is not right, not proper, cannot be desired, that one take the children's bread arbitrarily, contrary to the order of the house, and cast it to dogs! The Berlenburg Bible adds not amiss: I dare not—"else might the Jews say," It is not right. In their right and name, indeed, Christ here speaks; yet his kindness, which cannot deny itself, softening still further the severity, of his words, says little dogs—in which diminutive the idea of uncleanness (chap vii. 6), gives place to that of dependence, of clinging to (as now the woman does), of belonging to men and the family.* The words "sound like, No! they do not however say No, but waver and hang in suspense" (Heinr. Müller)—only every claim preferred in the impetuosity of the prayer must be broken, and every right, even were it only that of the Jews to the fulfillment of the promise, be taken away from this heathen woman. In this οὐκ ἔστι καλόν and κυναρίοις ("it is not right," and "[little] dogs") the compassionate heart of Christ already moves towards the presentiment, that it is the Father's will to make here an exception, anticipatory of his mercy (Rom. xv. 9). According to Mark, he said before this: Let the children first be filled—in which πρῶτον there lies the idea: It is not yet time for the Gentiles. This gives another spark of hope to the suppliant; it is at the same time a prophecy of the Spirit from the mouth of Christ, which might suggest to us the thought—Ah! they are unhappily too full, seeing they have cast the bread of God away from them, out to the dogs!

* In which feeling for the mode of expression Luther also has put "little dog" in Tob. vi. 1.

The same spirit which bids Christ speak thus and not otherwise, now teaches the heathen woman to advance farther, and to seize hold of the help which has been held out to her in this harsh word. Well might she afterwards her whole life long be astonished almost, at the bold, ingenious, pressing answer which the spirit of grace and supplication instantly suggested to her; for this spirit works every where in such moments of anguish, when a human soul struggling for the help of God (and that this was the case here is evident in the κύριε) becomes wise and ingenious to lay hold on the smallest finger. There is in the words of the woman, along with the ἀνθρώπινον or human also something θεῖον or divine, in virtue of which it was worthy of occupying a place in the Holy Scripture of the New Testament, as a pattern of wrestling prayer, the most perfect unity of humility, which bears all denial or chiding, and of trust, which is yet never given up.* She cleaves to the friendly word, "little dogs," in which Christ has betrayed his heart to her—"she catches him in his own words" (Luther)—"takes the sword out of his hand and slays him with it" (Heinr. Müller)—"drives back the arrow into his heart" (Rieger). Yes, Lord! thus speaks humility; pride would say: No, I am not a dog, I will not be cast out among them! No! says pride in many even till this day; but "No, Lord!" even when the Lord accuses, rejects all claim, shuts thee out as unclean from the family rights of the heavenly Father's dear children! Oh, that then at least, all might surrender themselves with the all-conceding acknowledgment: Yea, Lord! Oh, that we might learn from this woman at all times to connect with this, as closely the powerful importunate "but yet." In the connecting together of these two words is involved the whole order of salvation and prayer. Such faith finds the promise in the very refusal, makes the unworthiness, precisely as neediness, the plea for favor. The dogs—hast thou said? Well, then,† the dogs are and remain beneath the table when they are hungry, and do not let this little place in the house be taken from them. When the children break their bread (Mark has now παιδία for τέκνα) when from their master's table ψιχία fall (double diminutive: little crumbs), there is then no need, properly speaking, for λαβεῖν καὶ βαλεῖν, taking and casting, which I am not asking; for the dogs are contented even with the smallest share, if only they do not starve with hunger! I am even now, O Lord, not far from the table; even now there falls for us Gentiles a crumb of bread from Israel's table, seeing that thou art on our boundary. The dogs eat; well, I too may eat—it is done and there is no preventing it. Thus does the word of the woman outbid all refusal on the part of Christ, and to understand and feel this aright belongs to the right understanding of his reply, in which he acknowledges himself all at once overcome.

Mark expresses this reply more according to the sense: For this saying go thy way, the devil is gone out of thy daughter! Thus has he also correctly rendered more in human style, as another would have spoken, the acknowledgment and granting of her request, the precise original expression not being in his mind; Matthew, however, here also literally preserves the sacredly classical usage of Christ. Hitherto Christ had not accosted the woman, but in this address all is at once granted: O woman! Now, after the chiding she receives a commendation in requital: Thy faith is great! He does not find fault with her for holding on, for being so urgent, for crying after him; he rather praises this, inasmuch as it proceeds from faith. The cry of the disciples for help, ch. viii. 25, proceeded from the weak faith of natural fear, the "help me" of this woman from great faith. He commends and rewards not the natural love which made the child's distress her own ("have mercy on me, help me"), for in this there was yet also the impulse of nature, not as in the case of the centurion's zeal in behalf of his servant. He specifies not the humility but the faith, for precisely in humility, in the full consciousness and acknowledgment of unworthiness and the absence of all right, is faith great; only where one desires and hopes for grace, is there faith. This woman has wrestled more victoriously than Jacob, who stood upon the ground of a promise; her praying has become a willing, before which Christ's first humanly-formed will disappears, in order that what has now plainly become the will of the Father in her may be done. As Mark began his whole narrative with a willing on the part of Christ, while yet he could not (ver. 24), so what the woman wills is now done, by a holy wonderful yielding, in the proper sense, on the part of Christ.* Now then, as thou wilt, not as I will, or would. Such faith has a claim and right which the Son of the Father, even as David's son, may not resist. Let not this be explained away, let nothing Docetic be brought into Christ's first or last word, so that the kernel of the whole incident may remain untouched, the testimony given in the human life of the Son, to the unsearchably mysterious truth between God and man, that faith conquers, and every thing yields to its will! This Christ says—and that he can and must say it, was probably to himself here one of the most important and blessed experiences.

* For Ναί is here certainly not a continuation of the prayer, as many are for rendering it, thus destroying the most profound psychological truth.

† Thou sayest quite truly—but I interpret it differently precisely for me. That is the proper sense of καὶ γάρ in the original text, which is too fine to be translated. We are not at liberty (with Von Gerlach) merely to understand: Yes, Lord, it is lawful, for even the dogs, etc. Such a Yes would be almost a bold contradiction of what Christ had said, instead of the humility which necessarily belongs to it. Luther has with delicate tact brought out the true sense here.

THE FEEDING OF THE FOUR THOUSAND.

(Matt. xv. 32, 34; Mark viii. 2, 3, 5.)

And they praised the God of Israel.† Thus writes Matt. ver. 31, not precisely because the people then also certainly so expressed themselves, but by way of contrast to the preceding incident. Jesus betakes himself again to those to whom he is sent, he goes up to a hill near the sea of Galilee, his wonted resort, and there almost inviting and waiting for the people, sits down. Already (according to Mark) he had healed the deaf and dumb person on the way; now, in conformity with the duties of his office, he heals without further ado all whom any one may but boldly and reverently cast at his feet. To what a pitch was it now come in something more than a year's time since his first signs (John ii. 11, 23) with the crowding, pressing, and urgent claims of this people, as opposed to the enmity of their wicked leaders! Scarcely a couple of years more of this (the enemies of the Good Shepherd having tolerated him thus long)—and they were again accustomed to the works of their God, as formerly they were in the wilderness,‡ they desired them as their right, and as the ordinary course of things (see shortly Mark ix. 22), and yet were as little saved from death by them, as their fathers were by the bread from heaven. Precisely this is the folly of these sheep wandering in their sin; they know not their true malady, and seek not the true medicine and meat for eternal life. He had seriously told them this at the feeding of the multitudes on a former occasion; yet he begins now to perform his signs with patient testimony, to help and to feed at least their bodies, to show good to them as much as they desire and can receive it. It may be questioned whether, as some have said, these crowds of people who had continued with him three days were better than former ones, or were more inclined to the words of his mouth, than to the works of his hand: there is no special ground for such a supposition; and that they do not say in so many words: Spread again for us a table in this wilderness! (Psa. lxxviii. 18, 18), cannot be reckoned as a great commendation.

But the Good Shepherd's heart cannot deny itself and cannot refrain; his emotion again breaks forth in the words: Σπλαγχνίζομαι ἐπὶ τὸν ὄχλον, "I have compassion on the multitude." As in Matt. xiv. 14; xx. 34; Mark i. 41; Luke vii. 13; this is always an expression and outgoing of that deep compassion (Matt. ix. 36) with which Christ (as in former times the God of Israel, Judges ii. 18; x. 16) stoops even to the bodily wants of the wretched, whether on a great or small scale, because their great distress—that which is truly so—moves his heart. These words in the mouth and heart of Christ have called into existence all the institutions of philanthropy, unknown to heathenism, for all sorts of indigence and distress. They are hungry—this now with Christ takes precedence of every purpose of withdrawing himself more and more from this time forward, and of all hesitation about raising again a stir such as he wished to avoid. That they have continued three days with him (although in a very different sense from that continuing with him of which we read in Luke xxii. 28), he kindly reckons to their praise; for there was indeed a spark of faith in this, in which he rejoiced. Only once to forget bread in their nearness to him—how much better than the character of so many at this day, who so often forget and forsake him in their anxiety about bread! The time comes for dismissing them to their homes, but he bethinks himself with accompanying love of the νήστεις, fasting, on the way, how they might faint—he cannot reconcile himself to this, and therefore he must say: οὐ θέλω, I will not. According to Mark he added (entering into particulars) the words: For several of them are come from far! (Certainly ἥκουσι is not, as Luther understands it, a remark of the Evangelist, but a continuation of the direct words of Christ; ἥκω is the present with a perfect signification, are from far.) "Here tell me whether, if the people had sent a message to Christ to tell him of their necessity, they could have presented a stronger case for themselves than occurs to the mind of Christ himself? Ah, good Lord, have compassion on the poor people, only think that they have continued now three days with thee; that they have nothing to eat, for they are in the desert; if thou lettest them go away without having eaten, they must faint by the way; remember that several of them have come from far! See! he himself considers all this before any one tells it to him, and has already himself made just such a prayer as they might have in their hearts, so that no one could carry it so well in his heart. I already have compassion, he says, and have already considered every thing."* He, however, takes the disciples into counsel with him as he often does in his kindness, and his whole address to them implies without its being expressed: What think ye, shall we not feed them again? The frequent remark, that this time Christ speaks first, while, on the former occasion, the disciples had directed the attention of Christ to the thing, is founded on an oversight of what we read in John vi. 5, 6; so much only is true here, that on this occasion he at once calls all his disciples together, and will thereby certainly bring to their mind the thought of the five loaves among the five thousand (Matt. xvi. 9).

* Therefore, truly an "inconsistency"—as Hase heads the paragraph—but not "a beautiful weakness, the only one in his life."

† Which formal expression occurs from Exod. xxxii. 27; xxxiv. 23 (Josh. vii. 20; xiii. 14; 1 Kings i. 30), onwards through Psalms and prophets to Mal. ii. 16—which Sepp ought certainly to have known, instead of inconsiderately observing on this passage in Matt.: There were therefore many Gentiles among those that were cured.

‡ These words of the people whether occurring here or elsewhere can for the present only signify: Our old God still lives, and turns again to his people; comp. Luke vii. 16; i. 68; Matt. ix. 33.

And now the same Matthew, whose profound clearness in rendering the discourses of Jesus we so much admire, informs us, not less faithfully than strikingly, of his own and his fellow-disciples' perplexity on this occasion, from which it at first appears as if they had actually entirely forgotten the former miracle of feeding the multitudes. Yet we would not express ourselves on this point quite so strongly as Wizenmann: "It is, moreover, if Matthew was fabricating the story, the most awkward thing conceivable that he should have let the disciples give this answer." Looking at this answer psychologically, it is rather so to be understood, as expressing neither an entire forgetting nor an entire believing, but just their natural wavering state of mind and position. So much they indeed take for granted, that they are to have something to do in the feeding of the people, because he has called them to him, and πόθεν ἡμῖν, "Whence should we have?" sounds almost like a delicate allusion to the former occasion—a shy question which they only reverently conceal: Is it to be in the same way again? (Mark, indeed, has instead δυνήσεταί τις, "Can any one?" which sounds somewhat more indefinite.) It is certainly inconceivable that they should not have at all remembered the former miracle; but Christ had, on this occasion, allowed the third day to arrive before doing any thing, and many a want he did not supply in this miraculous way; they venture, therefore, to think neither one thing nor another regarding his present intention; in their embarrassment they do not at the moment well know what they shall say, and in reality they just say what is most direct and straightforward. Perfectly honest, they will neither boldly advance with their half faith to a repetition of the miracle, nor will they oppose their half doubt to what Christ has said as a direct contradiction; they therefore recur rather to what they said on the former occasion: Whence should we have so much bread in the wilderness as to fill so great a multitude? (On this occasion the stronger expression χορτάσαι, fill, is used to correspond with the νήστεις, fasting.) Christ at once receives this kindly, because there was in it at the same time something which recalled the procedure on the former occasion, and he therefore repeats now his former answer: How much bread have ye? (Mark vi. 38. viii. 5). This signified: By all means in the same way again! Whether the power of God really will not or cannot* create any thing new since the creation, without the "materia praejacente"—into such subtle questions we do not enter. If aught stands written to this effect, then must we read it, and if it be at this day done before our eyes (who knows all that is done?) —then our wisdom would have an end, just as the present physiology of animal life in the presence of the toad living for centuries in the stone. Now it is here said that the disciples had a little bread and a few fishes; that Christ first of all asked after these, and took them, is natural. Let him who has any wish to inquire farther suppose the case: We have nothing at all! and whether Christ would then have said, Then must the poor people indeed faint! or whether he might still have filled them with, or without meat, and done to them according to his compassion. Suffice it to say, he took also the fishes, which the disciples before had called little fishes, and, according to Matthew, at least had not counted them, while according to Mark they had not even named them—he gives thanks for every present gift of God, but his thanksgiving becomes a powerfully increasing blessing, when the people need and his heart wills it.

* Luther, Sermon for the 7 Trin. in the collection by Niethammer, where also he avoids and even corrects the error of his translation in Mark.

* It is a question, whether among the κυλλοῖς (ver. 30) there were maimed persons to whom Christ supplied the members that were wanting? About which, however, Grotius says, differently from Olshausen, Non video quid obstet, "I see no reason to the contrary."

REFERENCE TO THE SIGNS OF THE TIMES.

(Matt. xvi. 2–4; Mark viii. 12.)

Nothing is more natural than that the demand for signs should be repeated; it may quite possibly have occurred several times besides those mentioned at ch. viii. 12, here, and at John vi. 30: though not so often as alleged in certain standing objections and phrases brought forward against preachers, missionaries, and Christians in general, and differing according to the country and people; for the power of Christ to dismiss and deter from these objections, was greater than ours. Equally natural is it that he should repeat the same answer to the same challenge, especially as it certainly was other persons who only repeated the challenge, or rather brought it forward anew from the same disposition of mind. If this, then, was repeated once or twice, the striking answer of Christ would become commonly known in its general purport, and it would be said among his opponents: One must not come to him with this demand, else one gets for answer, The wicked and adulterous generation, and the sign of Jonah.

As, after the first feeding of the multitudes, the obstinate people desired bread from heaven, so probably the demand of the Pharisees and Sadducees here stands in some connection with the foregoing second feeding. They have heard of it, and (as at ch. xii) want to counteract the impression upon the people: "Who knows how this came to pass? Can he yet further, yet more conspicuously and surely, attest his power? We have asked this of him in vain!" For, that he will at all events not do what they desire, thus much do these hypocrites certainly know beforehand, although with no clear insight into the true reason of this. They say it indeed, πειράζοντες αὐτόν, tempting him, as Mark adds. Still, there is mingled with this presentiment of the truth, and with this malice that suppresses it, the actual folly of the Jewish opinion, according to which heavenly and earthly signs were at that time distinguished, and it was supposed that the latter might be wrought also by evil spirits (by Beelzebub). On the former occasion, therefore, when a sign was asked, it was a sign from heaven that was meant, as Luke says (ch. xi. 16). Matthew, however, here, for the first time, expressly specifies this. The idols of the heathen or the devils can show no sign in the heavens—as we read in the book of Baruch, ch. vi. 66 (comp. iv. 7; 1 Cor. x. 20), and the later corrupt taste has invented enough of apocryphal manifestations from heaven (2 Macc. ii. 22). It is uncertain whether those who now make the demand are thinking of signs such as these, or of those that are canonical, or bread from heaven such as Moses gave, causing the sun to stand still as Joshua did, calling forth thunder and rain (Jer. xiv. 22) as Samuel and Elijah, or something else; only they can hardly have had in their thoughts the Messianic signs in the heaven (Joel iii. 3, which many commentators mention here).* He has given them enough of Messiah-signs, and yet they will not receive him as the Messiah! Had he even done as many signs in the heaven as he did on earth, they would assuredly have impudently come forward still more with the objection: "What good is done to us by all these appearances and spectacles, which dazzle the mob, and which aërial spirits may produce for him by magic? Let him, instead of this, heal our sick, the lame, and the blind, as it is written in the prophets, that we may know that it is he!"†

According to Matt. ver. 4, Christ gave these knaves literally the same answer as at ch. xii. 39, where we have already explained it in its profound import. Mark, ver. 12, only indicates the same by a general expression (εἰ δοθήσεται, a formula of swearing, like the Hebrew ים), but adds, after his manner, which oftener represents the thing by such delineation of the feelings or gestures, that Christ heaved a sigh from the bottom of his heart (τῷ πνεύματι αὐτοῦ), which sign finds also its expression in the words, either literally spoken, or to this effect: Why does this generation seek after a sign? Whence and wherefore but from unbelief and hypocrisy, which repels from itself the evident miracles and clear proofs already afforded!

Matthew who, in giving the discourses of Christ, is always the most exact of the first three Evangelists [?], so far as regards the inviolable kernel, informs us, however, that Christ here, as is always to be supposed in similar cases, by no means merely repeated the former answer, but put before it something new, which is again repeated in Luke xii. 54–57:‡ You are generally wise enough to observe and discern in the sky what sort of weather is already present over the earth; if you would thus attentively look at the signs now present on the earth, they would be to you signs also from heaven. However general the manner in which Christ here speaks of

* With least probability of all, the star of the Messiah according to Balaam's prophecy!

† Pfenninger's Judische Briefe, v. 159.

‡ And that not without a difference: here to Pharisees and Sadducees, there to the entire people; here only of the aspect of the heavens for good or bad weather in general, there specially of particular weather-signs; there more closely pressing the application to this time and themselves.

the signs of the weather, what he says is yet strikingly and picturesquely carried out; for when Christ touches any thing in nature he hits it exactly; when he says any thing to men he takes close and pressing hold of them. The sky is red in the evening as also in the morning, and yet the evening and morning redness is not the same; moreover, it is not the clear evening redness, and the cloudy morning redness. The one prognosticates a pure atmosphere even for the following day, the other shows already the present χειμών, the violently overflowing or tempestuous rain, although it is as yet dry and calm. (Εὐδία and χειμών are the most general antithesis of the daily weather. The verbs ending in -άζειν, the immediately repeated πυῤῥάζει, and the adding of στυγνάζων the second time—are, in the Greek, strongly and vividly picturesque.) Such rednesses, otherwise similar, you know how to distinguish, and to observe the difference of that which has the στυγνάζειν or lowering along with it;* you speak as sure weather prophets, when you see these different prognostics with a wise Then—saying concisely with great certainty: A fine day (is indicated for the morrow by this evening)! to-day, rainy weather! (Not even an ἔσται, it will be, is required, as in our own language.) Στυγνός or στυγανός, "lowery," does not (as we find maintained by some on this passage) originally mean dark, but, in reality, sad, although already with reference to the outward appearance (hence στυγνὸν ὄμμα, hence also στυγνάσας, Mark x. 22, as an indication of the inward λυπούμενος; see, however, also Ezek. xxxii. 10, in the Sept.)—the expression corresponds with the utmost propriety to the following πρόσωπον τοῦ οὐρανοῦ, "face of the sky," which is not (after the Hebrew פְּנֵי) to be taken for aspect in general, but: The sky looks sad or joyful, presents to us a gloomy or cheerful face. In this lively way does Christ, with the true human feeling to which he will here appeal, apprehend nature, so as in the γινώσκετε διακρίνειν, "ye can discern," to point to the eye so receptive and open for natural things. But now he puts in oppositim to these signs of the weather, which the sky presents to us when we look at it, the σημεῖα τῶν καιρῶν, signs of the times, which by right should stand side by side with them. Already the Syriac is wrong, when it renders this expression as if it meant the signs of this time (דובנא הנא)—as at Luke xii. 56 Christ certainly said (τὸν καιρὸν τοῦτον). This application, which is indeed meant, is for the present, left to be made by themselves, in a more general way, while in the first place the before-mentioned distinction of clear and gloomy days is compared to different times, and their conjunctures. There is no ground for supposing that καιροί, times, stands here specially for the Messianic time, compare elsewhere Mark i. 15; Luke xix. 44. Christ rather means to say, that there are in general signs of the times, every time has its own, all χρόνοι (spaces of time, periods) have as καιροί an import, consisting of the events that happen and coincide, to which one can and ought to give heed, in order to understand what time precisely it now is. These signs of the times to the single eye, the upright heart, should at least be quite as evident as the signs of the weather in the sky (which, according to Gen. i. 14, are also connected with still other signs of the times). Nay, these signs, in the things that happen to nations and to man, are indeed, at the same time, in the most proper sense of the word signs from heaven, of the divine government and its counsel, for all who rightly consider what indications belong to earth, especially in the light of prophecy. Not as if Christ will here merely (although this also has its truth) put the unhappily so often lightly-esteemed and neglected observing of the time with natural wisdom, in opposition to the observing of the signs from heaven; rather are we admonished here to consider the time with the true, divinely-opened eye. Israel especially had, in addition to this, the word of prophecy given from heaven, in the light of which to prove and learn what God, from time to time, had caused to happen; not otherwise did the prophets in earlier times come to know their times from the former word, and thus find and receive new disclosures for the present, and the remoter future. If this holds good in general, it must do so in the highest degree in regard to the time of times, the period of fulfillment and visitation in the most proper sense, in which every thing now cried aloud: Who hath ears to hear let him hear! who hath eyes to see let him see! To the Sadducees also, even without prophecy, were manifest the signs of the time of the Messiah, which were now present in abundance. Let ch. xi. 4–15 be recalled; what was there said Christ means here, and still more, even in the widest sense—not merely his miracles, his works, or his whole labors, after Elias had cried in the wilderness—but also that the sceptre had departed from Judah, that Daniel's year-weeks had come to an end,* and whatever else the attentive might observe; even the wicked generation might be a sign to itself, were it only to judge rightly of itself.

But it will not do so, and, therefore, Christ rebukes it when it asks and requires signs; therefore, he asks, on the other hand: Ye hypocrites, who know so well to discern the redness of the sky, can ye really not discern the signs of the times, not perceive the great significance of the present time which is full of signs, in contradistinction from all that have been before it? If ye only would! Here is a text for a sermon to the conscience, the truth of which continually renews itself more or less strongly, although it was only then true in the strongest sense. Thus are men hypocrites, inasmuch as though wise in natural things, they show themselves and make themselves blind in spiritual, and like many even at this day "rather look to the weather and the barometer than into the Bible and their own heart." What is said of the weather is itself, at the same time, figurative, and to be further extended: In the political horizon they discern peace or war, εὐδία or χειμών, fair weather or foul, with cunning pragmatism as prophets of news, but as prophets of the kingdom to perceive God's work on the earth they are wilfully stupid, and yet, at the same time, act as if they really desired for themselves signs from heaven! Such a generation is still always, as it was then, referred to the sign of Jonah which is now set up in all the world, to the sermon concerning the risen crucified One and its effect on the earth; this is the true sign from heaven. He who believes not this, how is he to be helped against his will? And he left them and departed!

* Quod si et nigrae (nubes) rubentibus intervenerint, et pluvias (Pliny, Hist. nat. xviii. 35). Christ is no stranger even to meteorology, and when he speaks of this he has well considered what is right in the ordinary sayings of men on this subject.

* For the ancient interpretation of these prophecies remains sure against all new ones.

BEWARE OF THE LEAVEN!

(Matt. xvi. 6–11; Mark viii. 15, 17–21.)

The *warning against the leaven of the Pharisees and Sadducees, which he now gives to his disciples on the way in the ship, stands in close connection, as we shall soon see, with the incident just narrated. Leaven is also among the heathen a metaphor for what is corrupt, bad, in so far as fermentation is taken as allied to putrefaction. In this signification the Israelites were forbidden to use it as a meat-offering (Lev. ii. 11; Amos iv. 5), as also to avoid it during the seven days of the passover (Exod. xii. 15, 19; xiii. 7), and it is, even in the New Testament applied as a figure by the apostle, 1 Cor. v. 2. The Rabbins call the יֵצֶר הָרַע, or the natural sinful imaginations and aims of the heart, שְׂאוֹר שֶׁבָּעֲסָה—the leaven in the dough, "because as a little leaven it leavens and corrupts the whole dough."† Accordingly in this warning Christ has certainly in his mind nothing merely outward, but, precisely as the apostle in addressing the Corinthians, a disposition, a state of mind, which, deep-sinking and all-penetrating, either steals into the heart, or is already there; the διδαχή, doctrine, of Matthew therefore (ver. 12) either expresses the same thing regarded internally (as our word system, equivalent to principle), or perhaps (which at least may be possible) is intended to hint delicately, that the understanding of the disciples at that time had as yet not penetrated into the depths of the word, but still remained standing by the "doctrine" instead of the disposition of heart.*

* Mark uses here the expression διεστέλλετο. This word elsewhere in Greek signifies originally to distinguish, then to say or appoint any thing definitely and plainly, hence at Matt. xvi. 20. Hesychius explains by διεσαφήσατο. The Septuagint puts it for הֹזְהִיר, to impart light and instruction upon any thing, then also specially to warn; hence in the New Testament διαστέλλειν is chiefly to forbid, (see Matt. xvi. 20; Mark v. 43; vii. 36; ix. 9). Elsewhere also, Heb. xii. 20 τὸ διαστελλόμενον, in general, that which was spoken to them—as Acts xv. 24, οὐ διεστειλάμεθα, we have said expressly or laid down nothing concerning this—as distinguished from, commanded, properly speaking. Here, therefore, in Mark, it means, to say openly to them, pointedly and earnestly warning them; with which the anxiously careful misunderstanding of the disciples is intended to stand in contrast—"What does he mean by this so pointed word?"

† This general reference is sufficient as a motive for the warning. Lange again certainly interprets too subtilely when he thinks, that "with the feeling of one who was driven out"—as if he now "made his removal from the Jews who had become heathen," Christ with a typical retrospect warned them against taking along with them the leaven of the Egyptians. Although in other respects the idea appears quite ingenious, that "in the removal from an impure theoretical community they must have a higher care than the fear of being, in the first place, without bread, namely, the care lest they should take along with them, into the new order of things, any of the leaven of the same corrupt tendency of life deep in the secret recess of the heart."

* At all events, as regards the Herodians, the doctrine taken exactly can no otherwise be applicable than when understood of the "bad principles which prevailed at the court of the king." (See Braune on the passage, who interprets it just as we do.) In like manner, Neander well observes, that the "doctrine," properly speaking, of the Pharisees and the Sadducees, outwardly signified, could not at all be thus connected as alike. It is only an odd use of Scripture springing from his own ideas, when, for example, Nagel (in the Lutherische Zeitschrift, 1847, 1, p. 22) cites in favor of his close pressing of the doctrine, that Christ (xvi. 12) did command them to beware of the leaven of false doc-

In Luke xii. 1, where Christ repeats the same warning to his disciples before all the people, and names only the leaven of the Pharisees, he immediately adds to it the decisive explanation: Which is hypocrisy (comp. on this, above at ch. xi. 39–44). We shall scarcely go wrong, if we lay this explanation here also at the basis, although at first it is only the Pharisees who are called hypocrites, and here very remarkably the Sadducees also are classed along with them. In Mark we read, instead of this, καὶ τῆς ζύμης Ἡρῴδου, and of the leaven of Herod, which is substantially the same, only the Sadducees are denoted in that special point of view, in virtue of which the Pharisees themselves took them into fellowship to make common cause against Jesus. The Herodians, as they again appear in connection with the Pharisees in Matt. xxii. 16, and Mark iii. 6, were not exactly a special sect; nor, on the other hand, were all Sadducees precisely Herodians, but this name designates chiefly the political adherents of the Herodian dynasty who clung to the Romans, their protectors, and in so far, therefore, both by their Sadducean theory, and by their practice and their treatment of the circumstances of the time, stood in the sharpest opposition to the orthodox Pharisees, who, from Israelitish pride, abhorred and keenly felt the heathen sovereignty. Not the less, on this account, were these enemies united at heart, when the object was to tempt and assail Jesus, as they had just before, at ver. 1, appeared together making common cause. Perhaps the disciples, in their simplicity, had indignantly reprehended this mistaken demand of the Pharisees and Sadducees, which had been so sharply repelled by Christ; and Christ, wisely putting them to shame, checks their as yet unwarrantable judgment, and tells them that they were not yet so surely exalted above the state of mind of these persons, and had also reason still to beware of their leaven.

Leaven of the Pharisees and Sadducees—thus Christ views as fundamentally one, two parties, who, as regards the outward expression, seemed at that time, as at all times, to lie far separate from each other. The whole of Israel (not taking into account the few Essenes who stood almost outside of Israel) was then divided into these two opposing parties, so that every one must needs belong either to the one or the other; either with the one going at all events as far as Zealotism, which would refuse to give tribute to Cæsar for God's sake, or with the other as far as an entire adherence to the political court religion of the royal family, reigning by favor of the Romans. Jesus, however, will in his disciples form another and a new party, alike opposed to both, and yet not Essenes, but genuine Israelites in the fulness of times, in the kingdom of the Messiah now come. Ye hypocrites! Thus had he before rejected them both together; here, therefore, also he means, in the first place, the leaven of their hypocrisy. This, however, is not yet the deepest import of his words, in so far as he classes them both together. In the Pharisee, also, the secret Sadducee lies hid, beneath all the show of strict orthodoxy and zeal for the law; for they are hypocrites, because they are properly unbelievers in heart. The ground of all hypocrisy is the putting aside and repelling of the certified truth; on the other hand, also, all open unbelief, Sadduceanism, Herodianism, is in substance still the same hypocrisy, only in an inverted form, in so far as the freethinker and politician carries his delusion in like manner against conscience, as the right truth and wisdom, for show only. It is a hiding in the one case and an uncovering in the other, but both are equally false and human. While, therefore, when both are spoken of together as hypocrites, the honor of the "a parte potiori fit denominatio" falls to the Pharisee, and the Sadducee must nolens volens be contented to be reckoned in the same category—the Pharisee is, thereby, also at the same time, called a Sadducee, i. e., the one as the other an unbeliever. This is the leaven of the Pharisees and Sadducees—different in outward appearance and yet the same; the unbelieving hypocrisy and the hypocritical unbelief in its innermost oneness, such as must betray itself in hostile fellowship against the truth of God in Christ. Let us now in the application pass beyond the limits of Israel, and see how this Israel itself, in its decline and corruption, cannot cease to be a world-historical type of man and of Christendom. Orthodoxy and rationalism, zeal for the letter and criticism, pietism and libertinism, church zeal and political worldly-wisdom—also the "dry science without energy" (which Roos here mentions), and the energetic literature of unbelief and immorality—who can name and comprehend all the forms which, in theory and practice, on this side and on that, this twofold leaven has assumed, and even now assumes at this day? Thus it threatens the disciples of Christ every where, in public teaching, discourse or writing, in social life, finally (for otherwise there would be no danger), in their own hearts, which readily sympathise with the subtilely scattered elements of falsehood, in the one form or the other, to the prejudice of the pure truth held in entire faith. Therefore what Christ here says to his disciples, he says to all: Take heed, by looking around you! beware, by looking within you!

The disciples were then far from such an trine—just as if Matt. xvi. 12 were also the direct word of Christ! Christ rather meant the "disposition, character, life" of the hypocrites, which, as at that time among the Pharisees, may exist along with strict orthodoxy; any other understanding of it would only be the recorded misunderstanding of the disciples. Here lies an important principal point for or against the new Lutherans, who are right indeed in rebuking the really false doctrine in the Herodian-political or Sadducee-heretical system, but along with this should not forget also the leaven in the Pharisaic-orthodox, in the proudly hypocritical separatism.

---

understanding of the wise words of their Master, and thought he meant by the leaven only literal bread belonging to the Pharisees. So soon again had they forgotten what was said in ch. xv. 16–20! They had accidentally, on this occasion, not taken due care to provide themselves with bread according to their usual custom: Mark, who must have very direct information, says quite exactly, that only one loaf was in the ship.* This neglect, which now occurs to them, helps, moreover, to keep their thoughts fixed on the bread, as if the word of Christ were in some way connected with this. They said among themselves (ἐν ἑαυτοῖς, i. e., according to Mark, πρὸς ἀλλήλους)—He must certainly mean that we have not taken bread with us. Strange enough, to bring this into connection with the warning against that leaven? Where, then, might they find a baker who was certainly neither a Pharisee nor Sadducee in any wise? And could it be such as this that the Master meant!

He rebukes their foolishly confused thoughts again, at first, with the friendly word which he is always so ready to speak, and which was indeed in a certain measure always appropriate: O ye of little faith! Here it applies first of all (recalling to their minds ch. vi. 30) to their needless concern that such a thing as a want of bread should happen to him, that even he himself should be anxious about this; for it was this that had led to their confused thoughts. Then, however, Christ means in the thoughts of his wisdom precisely the leaven of unbelief of which he had spoken; for this, indeed, is already implied in every act of little faith, and then also occasions the hypocrisy of cleaving to what is external. By as much as faith is still wanting to us, by so much are we also as yet incapable of grasping the whole truth, and walking in it; that which proceeds not from faith is error, and those who are held captive in error fail also to perceive even what is most evident. According to Matthew, Christ simply chid them with a οὔπω νοεῖτε, "Do ye not yet understand?" at the beginning, and a πῶς οὐ νοεῖτε, "How is it that ye do not yet understand?" at the end; according to Mark, however, their want of understanding is brought into prominence in words of severer rebuke, in which we, at least, may be allowed to think it impossible that Mark here again "pleasantly and diffusely carries out the words of Christ." Truly there is nothing pleasant in the rebuke proceeding from impatient love, which longed so much to have at length intelligent disciples; still less is there any diffuseness or tautology in these significantly measured expressions. If this Evangelist knew so specially that the disciples had only one loaf, we may be sure also that the strikingly severe address of the Master is truly narrated from a good source, and we shall find not that Mark has diffusely extended the words of Christ, but that Matthew again gives the extracted essence. The innermost ground of all folly, as of that now shown by the disciples, is the unfeeling heart hardened in unbelief and little faith, καρδία πεπωρωμένη, which the Evangelist already, at ch. vi. 52, introduced as a reflection of his own, taking it from the words of Christ on this occasion; although, indeed, this designation is not to be taken in so bad a sense here as at ch. iii. 5, Matt. xiii. 15. If it is true of others that they never see or hear at all, the same is true of the disciples, at least oftentimes; still, and just because they are disciples, it is the more severely to be reprehended in them, and therefore Christ now for the moment places them on a level with those who have eyes and see not, ears and hear not—as if he had said: These thoughts were such as might have occurred to you if you were not at all my disciples! "You have eyes, do ye not then see? You have ears, do ye not then hear?" What follows always when the heart is hardened? Of course that we neither observe nor perceive what truth and wisdom speak to us; where, however, there is no perceiving, there, too, there can be no understanding, no intelligence. (Thus in Mark νοεῖτε and συνίετε are distinguished, while Matthew puts only νοεῖτε both times; comp. however, also Matthew ch. xv. 16, 17, as well as ch. xvi. 12, τότε συνῆκαν.) We can by no means say that νοεῖν ("understand") belongs to the ψυχή (soul) συνιέναι ("perceive") to the πνεῦμα (spirit); rather, indeed, inasmuch as we feel and perceive with the believing heart, and the faith-sense is true reason, the νοεῖν contains the ground, lying deeper in the will, of the συνιέναι following out of it. (Hence the exhortation, 2 Tim. ii. 7. νόει ἃ λέγω.) Finally, in the case of disciples who had already enjoyed for a length of time their Master's company and teaching, and had already passed through and experienced so much with him, although the perceiving and understanding, is always, at first at least, a seeing and hearing, yet afterwards there may justly have been required of them, a remembering of what was before learned, a retaining and working out of what had been already received, so as from this rightly to know any thing new that might be addressed to them. With this last word of rebuke, οὐ μνημονεύετε, "do ye not remember?" the representation of Mark now again becomes one with that of Matthew.*

Christ who, at the second feeding of the multitudes, had only made quite a slight allusion to the first (Matt. xv. 34), now expressly brings before them both of these together, chiefly noticing the supplies that had remained over. What Matthew, with respect to the sense, comprehends in Christ's own discourse, is given by Mark in the form of a thorough catechising of the disciples as to what they had forgotten, so that the shamed disciples are obliged to answer; in Mark, too, it is impressively noted that Christ himself brake the bread among the thousands, and therefore so many fragments remained. So literally historical are these two narratives (of which many ἀσύνετοι, "without understanding," are at least for making one, if not a fable),* here confirmed by the mouth of Christ, in a discourse which the apostles could hardly have fabricated in order to glorify their Master. On the first occasion, there were twelve smaller baskets (κόφινοι, such as are conveniently carried upon journeys) corresponding to the number of the apostles; on the second, there were seven large σπυρίδες (baskets) corresponding to the seven loaves (see Acts ix. 25)—for they were probably more careful, this time, to take at once vessels sufficiently large for the quantity that remained over.

* The seven baskets full were certainly consumed, for the incidents are by no means so closely connected together.

* On the entire passage compare Beck, Bibl. Seelenlehre, p. 56 and 59—with whom I have coincided in the exegesis.

Christ having thus reminded his disciples of these things, Mark, because he had laid strong emphasis on this at the beginning, now shortens the termination of the discourse into a mere abruptly concluding πῶς οὐ συνίετε, "How is it that ye do not understand?" at which, first of all, there is to be supplied as a middle member—How do ye not understand that with me there should be no anxious care about bread? Then, however, as the proper conclusion which is expressed by Matthew: That I cannot have meant bread in my warning against the leaven! Not bread—more, however, the Master himself does not say, and leaves it to the disciples, here also, to find out and to understand (or misunderstand) something besides (comp. Matt. ver. xii. with ch. xvii. 13).

THE CONFESSION OF PETER—CHRIST'S FIRST ANNOUNCEMENT OF HIS SUFFERINGS—TAKING UP THE CROSS AND FOLLOWING CHRIST.

(Matt. xvi. 13–28; Mark viii. 27—ix. 1; Luke ix. 18–27.)

Here begins at all events a last, brief period of the life of Jesus, previous to his sufferings, and in all that Matthew tells us of it there is a regular chronological connection (see ch. xvii. 1, comp. there ver. 22 with Mark ix. 30; Luke ix. 43; further, Matt. xviii. 1, xix. 1; comp. Luke ix. 51). We have no reason for taking Mark ix. 27 in close connection with this, and supposing that "Peter's confession followed close upon the conversation about the leaven of the Pharisees." Rather, as appears from all the other results of the harmony, in forming which we cannot be too careful to include every thing in the general view so as not to go wrong in particulars, there lies a considerable intermediate period between Matthew xvi. vers. 12 and 13, in which we, for our part, lay the journey of Christ to the feast of Tabernacles, and his probable stay in Jerusalem till the consecration of the Temple, i. e. all the contents of John, ch. vii. on to x. 39.†

In the district of Cesarea Philippi or Paneas (northwards at the source of the Jordan, different from Cesarea Herodis on the Mediterranean Sea), Christ speaks with his disciples what all the three Evangelists narrate in its main substance; Mark says it was spoken ἐν τῇ ὁδῷ, in the way, Luke, that Christ was engaged in prayer immediately before, at which the disciples were either present, or to which they came. We are not to seek for any close reference in this striking question, thus expressed for the first time, as to who or what the people took him to be; by no means is it merely a momentary inquiry about what the disciples had just been hearing of him on the way, or what the people here (in Galilee, Trachonitis, etc.) were saying of him; but his object is now, when his public labors have already in a certain sense come to a close, really to inquire after the result of these labors on the whole, in order to pass from this to a second principal part of his discourses with the disciples, which is denoted by the public intimations of his sufferings now first begun to be made (ch. xvi. 21; xvii. 9, 22; xx. 17). There is here a great and significant turning-point to be observed. "I am the Christ"—this he now finally confirms and ratifies to his disciples, while he challenges their faith to confess it before him in opposition to the ἄνθρωποι or men; immediately however, he adds to this first sentence the second, "And this Christ must suffer and

* Schleiermacher, too, amongst the number—who "could not make up his mind to believe in the second feeding!" Unfortunately even Neander also—we do not, however, retract even in his case the expression we have used above, nor can we sympathize with the two strong eulogies pronounced over the grave of the man who handled the Scripture so unbecomingly. For, leaving aside the Christianity of the heart, all believing science must have neither history nor piety, but the objective word for its foundation.

† Bengel: "The gracious year in Galilee was accomplished, and the Saviour in the midst of his career spent a considerable of his time in quiet. He withdrew himself more and more from action, and prepared himself for suffering." Ebrard, rightly rejecting Bengel's external principles, has nevertheless given far too little consideration to his grand internal apprehensions and perceptions. [This, however, is too subjective a basis for the construction of a harmony: the order of the Evangelists does not favor the author's location of the chapters of John in question.—Am. Ed.] die!" There is in Matthew an unbroken connection in every thing from ch. xvi. 13 onwards: with the confession of Peter in the name of the disciples is connected the promise in reply, addressed to the first apostle, and to all the apostles, to the entire future Church; upon this directly follows (see the double τότε, "then," vers. 20, 21), the announcement of his sufferings, and all that the address of Peter, now proceeding from another spirit, gives him occasion to add respecting his followers on the way of the cross. It is one connected testimony: That he is the Christ, the founder and highest ruler of the true house of God, the King and Lord of the kingdom of heaven, which is his kingdom (ver. 28), the future Church (which was only prepared and foreshadowed by the עֲדַת יְהוָה, or "the congregation of the Lord," in Israel); but that his way lies through death to the resurrection, consequently also, that the way of all his disciples and of his whole kingdom upon earth, leads to the victory of confirmation and glorification through a conflict of suffering, through a continual cross consisting in a renunciation of life in order to find it again.

Verse 13. What now at last do the people believe, think, say of me, after all that I have hitherto done and taught? The question is thus given with a simple μέ, me, in Mark and Luke, while Matthew, certainly more directly exact, replaces this or strengthens (?) it by τὸν υἱὸν τοῦ ἀνθρώπου, the Son of Man. For the reading wavers as to whether also in Matthew the μέ is to be retained, or (which indeed has only few authorities) whether it is to be cancelled; and there appears here, first of all, to be a great deal depending on this little word in giving a different sense to the entire saying. If we retain it, then it is certainly natural to take the appellation which is added, "Son of Man," already in the Messianic sense. Either with Beza, Piscator, Clericus, to point thus, Τίνα με λέγουσιν εἶναι; τὸν υἱὸν τοῦ ἀνθρώπου; Do they indeed know me now to be the Messiah?—or, with Olshausen, to take the words as intimating the truth: Μέ τὸν υἱὸν τοῦ ἀνθρώπου (ὡς οἴδατε) ὄντα, Me who am (as ye know) the Son of Man. In favor of the former of these readings is the circumstance, that the latter would make Christ to have anticipated his second altogether unassuming question (ver. 15), and to have prescribed to them himself what their confessing faith is now to bring to him; thus would the only true, and profoundly significant, sense of his awakening question be disturbed. Further, against the latter reading is the fact that the expression "Son of Man" is never precisely and absolutely equivalent to "Messiah," but while there are pregnant intimations lying behind this appellation, it yet first of all denotes the personal manifestation of this Jesus (now in humiliation, but afterwards also in exaltation). See, especially, ch. viii. 20. Finally, by the latter reading, the antithesis preserved in Matthew is destroyed: Whom do men say that the Son of Man is? What do they think of this man whom they see and hear with all his works and words—of me, *this Jesus. This is the simple sense of the question, as Luther's correct feeling has rendered it in German with the omission of μέ. Are we to suppose, then, that the manuscripts in which it is wanting are right, and that it has been inserted here from ver. 15 and the parallel places in Mark and Luke? This, too, is difficult to suppose, and not necessary, if we only understand aright the added clause υἱὸν τοῦ ἀνθρώπου, that in the first place it corresponds to the mere μέ in ver. 15 and the parallel places. If we hold this fast as we ought, then we may, if we please, suppose that there lies behind the word an intimation of its deeper sense, its Messianic signification, but only slight, such as is suitable to that kind of asking which will draw out the right answer; this, then, is something quite different from the unsuitable anticipation of an openly announced testimony concerning himself: I am the Son of Man, i. e., the Messiah!† It is what might thus be extended: Ye know now what I properly mean when I at any time thus designate myself! (And this would be what is true in Olshausen's ὡς οἴδατε, without the too strong ὄντα, which never belongs to this expression.) Such a preparatory intimation lies at all events already on the surface in the Τίνα—not τί—by which Christ asks: Whom (not what) do they take me for? Do they give me the right predicate? Do they perceive and acknowledge that I am what I am, or do they think something else and false concerning me? (with a λέγειν εἶναι, "say that I am," to which the εἶναι or reality does not answer, but ἄλλον τινά or some one else—?).

Christ's reason, however, for putting this question, after all that he had done and taught, was, naturally and necessarily, that all his past acting and teaching (Acts i. 1) had no other end and aim than to manifest who he is, to awaken and establish faith in his person (John viii. 24). The question here expressed is and remains the great decisive question, which now, with stronger emphasis, is ever being addressed to the world and to Christendom; previous to all obeying of his doctrine (as a hollow rationalism will foolishly speak of this) there must be the knowledge of his person. His servants must, in the name of their Master, ask in a way that will admit of no refusal "Who was Jesus? Who is Jesus?" and only the excess of folly and of blindness in the "Friends of light" has recently put aside such a cardinal question with the senselessly naive remark—"There the answer is wanting." In another sense may, and ought, the servants as regards their own persons and for their Master's sake also to inquire, what the people say and think of them.

* As afterwards, ver. 20, where the predicate ὁ Χριστός is joined to this subject, at least as a quite true interpretamentum of what the reading Ἰησοῦς means.

† In which impossibility of the usage: Ἐγώ εἰμι ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου—lies the most decisive refutation of this view. The name "Son of Man" in the mouth of Christ, goes over from the most direct import: "This man here," to the hint which lies behind it: "This one, who now appears as man, who will be only man in humiliation"—which then points farther back to Daniel, and has still more significance, viz.—Representative of humanity, new first man, etc. Comp. Liebner's reference to Dorner in the Dogmatic of the former l. i. p. 331, Note.

Whom do men say that I, this Son of Man, am? i. e., first of all the bulk, the majority—what is the prevailing public opinion—which Luke will denote by οἱ ὄχλοι, the multitudes, less exactly indeed, but right also, in so far as the disciples were in the first place so to understand it. Christ, however, does not say, the people, or even Israel (what opinion is held of me in Israel?)—or the like, but men; thereby he hints, on the one hand, at the universal importance of his appearance for all mankind (which lies also in υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου), on the other hand, he has thereby in a certain measure expressed what forms an antithesis to the following Ye—my disciples. How runs the human opinion concerning my person (that proceeding from flesh and blood, ver. 17). Thus at least do the disciples understand him in their answer, which would not be according to truth if its import were what inconsiderate commentators have found in it; viz., They say all manner of things of thee but the one thing, no one any where says of thee that thou art the Messiah himself, all hold thee in too slight estimation for that. Were there not in reality many who called him the Son of David? (ch. ix. 27; xii. 23; xv. 22). Might there not be many who, after his testimony upon the occasion of the message sent by John, recognized and confessed that he was the expected one, he that should come? (comp. even at an earlier period John vii. 26, 31, 41). Do we not find such a confession even long before in Samaria, as we read in John iv. 42? Certainly, however, those who thus spoke of him were already also his disciples, whom Christ seemed, to his disciples at least, not to include here among the "men," and, therefore, in their reply they only inform him of all the false opinions regarding him. They also do not speak first of the enemies who called him seducer, because this was not the opinion of the people, who rather esteemed him every where to be at least a prophet. They mention first the strangest and newest opinions by which men evaded the truth concerning him (ch. xiv. 2); then follows what was more allied to the truth, the folly which recognized not Elias as already come, and saw in Christ himself the forerunner; finally, those expectations of the return of this or that prophet, which had been sought out in order to account for him.*

Verse 15. Now comes the second, properly the chief, question for which the first was merely to prepare the way. The ὑμεῖς placed before has strong emphasis: What have ye, who have been so long with me, by this time learned? Do ye indeed now know otherwise and better than men? Is it not enough to know what the people say of the Son of Man—this lay already very prominently in the first question as a trial for them. Here it avails not to reckon up opinions and to have no conviction yourselves! True he says, here again, "say" (λέγετε, as λέγουσιν before), but now coming closer to them in a tone of trial: Ye should not merely say it, ye should in faith know and confess it! The expression of faith is in itself already a strengthening and confirming of it, and, therefore, does Christ require this of them here. Not, what think ye of me in secret as opposed to this confusion of opinions? Speak it out, frankly, first before me, then, at the proper time, when the Church is built by and upon your confession, also before men. Then answers Simon Peter τὸ στόμα τῶν ἀποστόλων, ὁ πανταχοῦ θερμός, "the mouth of the apostles, the one warm on all occasions" (as Chrysostom calls him), quickly and gladly in the name of all the disciples, taking it for granted that none would contradict, by declaring the same confession which (although perhaps not literally the same) he had already made (John vi. 69), and which Nathanael had made at an earlier period (John i. 49). Peter is not only led astray, but is only the more decided and certain, amid all the confused sayings of the people, and the contradiction in Jerusalem (John vii. 27, 41; viii. 48; ix. 22; x. 24), where, just before this question of Christ, it had come to the crisis of decision, whether he is the Christ or not. He answers, therefore, the question not as it was put with, I say, we say—but the πληροφορία (full persuasion) of his saying comes plainly and fully out: Thou art the Christ. The υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ, Son of God,* which in the second confession of the apostle, is added to Χριστός, Christ, is by no means merely synonymous with it, but the second expression of a deeper knowledge. A Nathanael, indeed (John i. 49), as also a Caiaphas (Matt. xxvi. 63), knew from the old Scriptures, that the promised Christ was to be at the same time the Son of God (which the Scribes, contrary to the Scriptures, overlooked, Matt. xxii. 42), and the report of this had come even among the people (see Matt. xiv. 33). The Baptist also testified of Christ as

* Jeremiah, according to a tradition that took its rise from 2 Mac. ii. 5, 14; comp. 4 Esr. ii. 18. In the case of him and the other prophets we are not to think of transmigration of souls, but Luke has the best expression. In like manner it is not to be connected with John i. 21, or Mark vi. 15—on the other hand, John vi. 14 might be meant thus in ignorance.

* While Luke, leaving out the forcible words σὺ εἶ, connects τὸν Χριστὸν τοῦ θεοῦ—Mark gives these words indeed, but for the rest retains only ὁ Χριστός. We may see ever anew the preference due to Matthew in the discourses of Christ.

the Son of the Father, when he explained his Οὗτός ἐστιν, "This is He" (John iii. 28, 35). Yet, on the other hand, there was and remained still a difference between a mere recognition of the Messianic dignity of Jesus according to the inferior (Ebionitic) conception of the most of the Jews, and an insight also into his divine nature.* Therefore Peter expresses both together here, he confesses the Son of Man to be the Son of God (ver. 13), as he opposes the Christ to the Baptist, Elias, and the prophets (ver. 14). Christ himself, indeed, had from the first (since John ii. 16) continually testified of himself as the Son of God, and every where used this name instead of the doubtful name Christ, which by itself might have been misunderstood (John ix. 35, x. 36). Peter then answers in his confession (as every confession of faith can and must be only such an answer) with perfect propriety to the assumed testimony of Christ: Thou art what thou thyself sayest and testifiest of thyself—we say nothing otherwise—we have understood thy words and works, we have now learned in thy school so much as to pass the examination which thou art now beginning. He makes the expression finally still stronger, inasmuch as he says, "of the living God," which can here be neither a mere solemn formula (as εὐλογητός, Mark xiv. 61), nor, as before in the Old Testament, a mere antithesis to the false Gods, but what already penetrates into the depths of the testimony at John vi. 57.† The understanding of history from without finds in the Son of Man, Jesus, first of all the Christ promised to Israel; the philosophy of faith (the expression will be excused), when it rightly reads, hears, perceives, and understands the words, soon finds in this Christ the Son of the living God; the Gospels declare him, by his own testimony and the confession of his disciples, to be both together—the Gospel of Matthew as well as the Gospel of John (ch. xx. 31).

Verse 17. The very remarkable and significant words of Christ to Peter, which now follow, the pronouncing him blessed, and the promise addressed to him first of all, and immediately thereupon the severe rebuke and repelling of his carnal forwardness—all this is entirely passed over by Luke, so that the discourse about the cross and the self-denial of his followers thus begins very abruptly. Mark again, in order to confirm this, informs us only of Peter's forwardness, for which he paid so dearly, but leaves out the commendation and the promise that went before. The Holy Spirit thus teaches us plainly enough, that no important and effectively permanent attribute for the Church in all future time, is here ascribed to Peter personally, chiefly in that he himself, whose communications Mark follows, has not in any way assumptively given prominence to what is here said to him, although, on the other hand, care has been taken in Matthew to preserve a complete record of these sayings of Christ. If what we read in vers. 18, 19, really had the meaning which the Papists give to it, then surely this appointment of a chief of the apostles, with a continuing caliphate of his successors, must properly be the principal thing with every Evangelist, who in general gives any account of this conversation with the disciples; least of all might it be wanting in the Gospel of Peter. We shall see, however, that in all that is said to Peter according to Matthew, over and above what he, as speaker, in the name of the disciples receives back also in this capacity, there remains only a certain historical temporary preference of his own person.

The very first word, μακάριος εἶ, Blessed art thou! although addressed to the quick and frank disciple who uttered the confession, is yet at bottom nothing else but what in ch. xiii. 16 was already addressed to all disciples in common as such (not even merely to the apostles). Christ is perfectly satisfied with the general import of the confession that he is Christ, the Son of God, without missing in this the specially dogmatic speculative acknowledgment, upon which, at a later period, so much weight was laid. (Both in John vi. 69, and again in John xi. 27, in the mouth of Martha this confession is expressly held fast, even when, in other respects, his enigmatic words are not understood.) This is at the first enough for him, so that he can already ascribe blessedness to such faith.* He, however, derives even this simple insight of faith from the revelation of the Father. He does not say, I have now often enough testified this to you both by word and deed, so that you may and must at length apprehend it! For flesh and blood does not yet perceive the open truth—the heart of each individual must open itself to a revelation which it specially appropriates. Let what is said at ch. xi. 25–27 be recalled here, and observe that as there it is the Son who reveals, here the same is humbly attributed to the Father by the Son. And that not merely on account of the humility which here so becomes him, but at the same time because Christ, inasmuch as he says "My Father," will thus accept and repeat the confession of Peter, confirming and sealing it: as if he said, Yes! I am the Son of God! Further, it is thereby indicated, as indeed Jesus always thus spoke and acted in the presence of his disciples, that with all the fulness and clearness of his testimony respecting himself,

* Just as, in like manner, there is here a difference between that "first enthusiasm" of a Nathanael, and the matured persevering faith of the apostles at this time. In this, Sepp is right, ii. 275, Note.

† From which (ver. 69) the apostle already the first time may have derived his confession, if the genuineness of the reading could be maintained.

* He does not at once press the disciple further with the question: "But in what sense dost thou know me thus, and how dost thou apprehend the union of the Divine and the human in me" (Braune).

he yet left over the last decision, in the νηπίοις or babes who accepted it, to the drawing and illuminating power of his Father. Thus, again, does the first agree in substance with the fourth Gospel (see John vi. 44, 45, 37), and we may reasonably reserve for the discourses in John the more exact interpretation of the fundamental conceptions already indicated here.

But the commendation addressed to Peter in the words, My Father hath revealed it to thee, i. e., certainly alone could reveal it to thee, thou hast heard it and learned it from the Father—must appear at the same time as of a humbling character, by the mention which is made of flesh and blood, which cannot properly reveal, but rather only resist. Christ, in the midst of his joy at having brought the disciples now so far, feels sad to think not merely how obstinately and how long the blindness of nature has resisted the light of grace even in them, but at the same time how much of flesh and blood still remains in them (see shortly ver. 22)—therefore he can as yet rejoice over their faith only in this form, and must still connect the commendation which they have deserved with a warning allusion to their old nature. It is spoken ironically indeed, amid the earnestness of acknowledging love, when the ἀπεκάλυψε, "revealed," is by catechresis, with an οὐκ, "not," said also of σὰρξ καὶ αἷμα, "flesh and blood." Peter has confessed in the name of all; naturally also he receives, in return, in the name of all, the commendation limited by a warning; yet at the same time, Christ has special reason first of all to keep fast hold of him personally, and by no means (as would otherwise have been natural), according to the analogy of ver. 15, to continue thus: Blessed are ye, etc., but, Thou Simon son of Jonas.* That is as much as to say, Chiefly has thy flesh and blood often enough, to speak ironically, revealed something different to thee, and will yet often thus speak out of thee; this time, however, thou hast not spoken as the old Simon who came to me at first, and is even still here. Son of Jonas: this is the third term which stands between "Son of Man" and "Son of God," vers. 13 and 16, denoting the natural birth and descent, in contrast with the new name Peter, which is given for the new creature in Christ (hence John xxi. 15-17, where again at last this humbling designation occurs, without the new name)—certainly not, as Olshausen strangely thinks, from its similarity to the commendation: "Thou art also a child of the Spirit" (Ἰωνᾶ being taken by a play on the word for יוֹנָה, i. e., dove); for partly, this signification of the name is not even certain, on account of that reading in another place, according to which it might certainly be a contraction for יוֹחָנָן John, partly, because at all events the new name which follows here, as at John i., notwithstanding its connection with the natural individual character of Peter, yet forms, in the main point an antithesis to the old birth in general. To mistake this, is to destroy the deepest significance of the entire saying, either entirely, or else by an etymologically separate play on the word in the bad sense,* in part to deprive it of its penetrating sharpness. Flesh and blood—this includes in Christ's thoughts these two things together, namely, the natural man Simon as the son of his father, and at the same time a reference back to ver. 13, men. (See the same perfect antithesis afterwards again at ver. 23.) "Neither from men without nor from thyself hast thou this revelation." Completely analogous to this explanation is the entire first chapter of the epistle to the Galatians, with the antithesis that pervades it throughout between the human and divine. In ver. 1, Jesus Christ and God the Father, in opposition to the οὐκ ἀπ' ἀνθρώπων οὐδὲ δι' ἀνθρώπου, "neither from men nor by man," as, at ver. 10, God and Christ to the ἀνθρώποις, "men"—vers. 11, 12, the ἀποκάλυψις, "revelation," in opposition to the κατὰ ἄνθρωπον and παρὰ ἀνθρώπου, "according to man," and "by man"—vers. 13 to 16 the ἀποκαλύψαι τὸν υἱὸν αὐτοῦ ἐν ἐμοί, "to reveal his Son in me," pre-ordained indeed, at the same time, from his mother's womb (peculiar to Paul as to Peter) in opposition to the former natural Saul—and then the same antithesis with σὰρξ καὶ αἷμα, "flesh and blood," which here still more evidently includes men without (vers. 1, 10–12) along with the natural man of Saul (vers. 13, 14), nay even comprehends the apostles (ver 17) in a certain sense. This whole chapter, then, so developes itself from the word of Christ to Peter, that it almost sounds as if Paul remembering this, to him well known, saying of the Lord Jesus to Peter, would say: I am also a Peter, "my faith and confession is, like his, not of flesh and blood but from divine revelation." This is again an illustration from the Bible which already puts far aside the Romish interpretation of the words that now follow addressed to Peter! So much the more significant, as it is precisely Paul, in whose person is prefigured the immediate validity of every new calling and ordination proceeding from the head of the church, against all historical connection even of apostolical tradition.†

* Which Matthew purposely makes more emphatic by retaining the Aramaic βάρ (see, on the other hand, John i. 43), in order that the nomen proprium may appear thoroughly intelligible.

* The sainted Von Meyer wrote to me: "I also suppose in Jonas an allusion to the dove, but not as Olshausen. John xxi. 15–17 led me to this. The dove is a shy, timid animal, and points there to the denial of Peter from the fear of man." Lange, moreover, plays strangely upon the word: "Before, he was the shy dove of the rock (which seeks refuge in the rock, the church!)—in future he would be the sheltering rock of the dove." It is not shelter that is spoken of, but a foundation for building on.

† [The author's fondness for illustration has here

Verse 18. Thou hast said to me σὺ εἶ, Thou art (He)—in recompense I say the same also to thee. This confirmatory repetition of John 43 is at the same time an advance beyond it. There it was in regard to the presence of him who should come. Thou art Simon!—but prophetically for the future Thou shalt be called, become and be Peter! But here it is very different: Thou art now Peter, as thou art called, thou the same Simon son of Jonas, in the personal unity of that which the grace of the Father, revealing the Son in thee, has now already wrought in thy nature through faith. Thou art, even now before me, what thou art ordained to be ever more perfectly, in all the future of thy apostolic calling, and therefore art thou called Peter by me; a firm, frank confessor, on whose confession and faith something may be built, a strong foundation-stone for the building of God upon earth (as the old temple stood on a foundation of rock—observes Delitzsch on this, in the "Catechism of the House of God," p. 6). That this now applies to Peter no longer merely in the name of all the apostles, but with a certain preference of his personality, the Protestant Church ought never to have denied to its own hurt, by an unnatural explanation of the words. It runs strangely enough in the Berlenburgh Bible—"Thou art a Peter"—for the meaning of the giving of the name and the calling lies in nothing else than in the circumstance that this name is entirely so appropriate only to this Simon. Against the explanation, "one of the rocks upon which I build my Church, one of the first preachers and founders of the Church"—Sepp by way of ridicule, is right when he says, "Then also by a logical inference backwards, it is only, Thou art Christ, one of the Sons of God! Καὶ ἐπὶ ταύτῃ τῇ πέτρᾳ, And upon this rock—in these words undoubtedly the personal reference to Peter is continued, for Πέτρος is explained by πέτρα only according to its etymology: ὁ πέτρος signifies indeed in Greek also rock, and was in the Aramaic כֵּיפָא, "Cephas," not to be distinguished from πέτρα (so that Christ, to a certain extent, at the same time really says, And upon thee, this Peter); but, in order to make the sense clear to the Greek reader, Matthew must the second time take the appellative for the proper name. It is not therefore, as well meaning people have artificially sought to make out: And upon myself, the true rock; in which case, in order to take from the ταύτῃ, this, the necessary reference to what goes before, Christ must have suddenly pointed to himself with his finger.* And then it would, in this view, be incomprehensible, what in general Peter had to do before with such a saying.* Just as little, although the most even of the Church-fathers† understand it thus, are we to explain it: Upon this thy confession—this faith in me—this conviction of the fundamental truth, firm as a rock in thee and in others. Thiersch is quite right when he says, "The demonstrative can just as little have the force of isolating the faith and the confession of Peter from his person, as it would be justifiable to refer the promise to the person of Peter, apart from his faith." Quite recently Alford also observes very strikingly, that according to the whole usage of the New Testament, it is not doctrines, confessions, characters, that are designated as pillars and columns of the building, but men, persons; in like manner, he refers us to what the same Peter says of the living stones, 1 Peter ii. 5. Simon Peter therefore retains indeed the preference as regards his calling and place in the circle of the apostles, which, already looking triumphantly beyond the intervening denial, is here ascribed to him. On thee as (whom I will make to be) the first confessor, preacher, and chief apostle of Israel (Acts i. 15; ii. 14; Mark xvi. 7), and even of the heathen (Acts x. xv. 7). Thus does Meyer's note comprehend all that must stand here. But now we go on to say, further, with equal justice: Peter is the first and chief ground-stone, yet not in his human character as the son of Jonas, but precisely as Peter—not alone but with the other apostles—finally, not in himself, which no man can ever be, the proper foundation and rock in the deeper sense.‡ So soon as flesh and blood shall again speak, he shall be repelled as Satan. John also and James are pillars with him (Gal. ii. 9). On the twelve foundabetrayed him into too great a degree of refinement. Paul's ground idea is doubtless the same as that contained in this address to Peter, but more than this can hardly be maintained.—Am. Ed.]

* Which artifice of Protestant criticism on this passage, bringing little honor to the cause, Thiersch compares with the similar artifice of Carlstadt in reference to the words used at the institution of the Supper.

* Only on a very superficial consideration and as the result of prejudice can any one find the ancient saying of Augustine to be plausible: "Super me ædificabo te, non me super te. Non enim a Petro petra, sed Petrus a petra, sicut Christus non a Christiano, sed Christianus a Christo vocatur."

† Launoy, Doctor of the Sorbonne, out of 77 sayings of the most famous Church-fathers and Church writers, has found only 17 that explain Peter himself as the rock; 44, on the contrary, understand the faith and 16 Christ himself. Gregory of Nyssa records particularly that "to this day many will not at all admit that it is the confession which is here spoken of." Wieseler is especially arbitrary in his exegesis from this point of view (Chronol. d. Apost. Zeitalt. 585)—as if the πέτρα must be distinguished from the personal Peter!

‡ For our readers this remark will suffice, with a word or two in addition: On the one hand it is least of all true that he had successors, and especially in those who maintain that they are such! Bengel's Quid haec ad Romam? is enough. On the other hand, we are not even entitled to say that he had equals. Origen's commentary is not (with Alford) to be pronounced excellent: Christ says this as to that Peter, so likewise πρὸς πάντα τὸν γενόμενον ὁποῖος ὁ Πέτρος ἐκεῖνος. Against this Firmilian rightly protested, that the Romish Stephen would introduce multas alias petras.

tions (Rev. xxi. 14), stand twelve names without distinction, as, in like manner, in Matt. xix. 28, twelve seats are promised. Finally (and this is what of truth remains in Augustine's word, which is, however, too sharply applied), upon what then would Peter be built, who does not stand fast in himself, if not upon the one foundation and corner-stone laid by God, of which we read in 1 Cor. iii. 11; Eph. ii. 20; and also in 1 Pet. ii. 4? Christ has significantly said only: On thee will I build, οἰκοδομήσω—not found, θεμελιώσω. A man can be the first building-stone upon the foundation of God, and in so far himself a foundation, but not more. As a section of the church of Christ rests upon a preacher or missionary whose natural qualifications and new nature together were ordained for this, so upon the apostolical labors of Peter was the whole at first built. But such a foundation-stone is for this reason no head, no prince and ruler over the others, or over the entire house, for it is built on his ministry, not on his commands (1 Cor. iii. 5).* In the Gospels, the Acts of the Apostles, and the entire New Testament, there is no trace to be found of such a supremacy, but the contrary, indeed, every where. In Acts vi., the twelve call together the multitude of the disciples; in Acts x. 47, Peter asks permission from the inferior attendants who were present, as at chap. xi. he vindicates himself before God and man by a "What was I." In chap. xv., he takes the first word, but James gives the judgment which the apostles and elders, together with the whole church, sanction by the Holy Ghost; in 2 Pet. i. 16, iii. 2, he speaks by a we with the other apostles, as in 1 Pet. v. 1, he is only a fellow-elder; in Gal. ii., he receives a rebuke from the reformer Paul. Shall we still further show here in a few words, which are not at the present time superfluous, how the Papists with their Peter are overthrown, if they will only read the Bible and let it be read? Already has Christ himself uttered a sharp prophetical word, as against idolatry towards his mother, so against the false father on earth over the equal brethren (Matt. xxiii. 8, 9); afterwards, Peter must needs testify in the Scripture against almost all the principal parts of the Papacy; against lordship over the Church, 1 Pet. v. 3, 4; against a separate priesthood, chap. ii. 5–9; against assumption over the civil magistrate, vers. 13–17; against silver and gold and shameful gain, Acts iii, 6; 1 Pet. v. 2; against unbecoming marks of honor and slipper-kissing, Acts x. 25, 26; against infallibility, ver. 34; against celibacy, 1 Cor. ix. 5; against all righteousness by works, in harmony with Paul, Acts xv. 10, 11; 1 Pet. i. 13, etc.

Upon this rock, this true Peter, confessing his grace and truth without pride or falsehood proceeding from flesh and blood—on this future Peter, whom he even now sees standing before his far-reaching glance in the great and strong word of confession—will Christ build his Church. For a good building must also have a good foundation (ch. vii. 25). Here, for the first time, in the mouth of Christ,* and in general only once again in the Gospels in Matt. xviii. 17, we find this great word ἐκκλησία, church, corresponding to the Heb. קָהָל, "congregation," and עֵדָה, "assembly." Although in that second passage the expression obtains at the same time a more special signification, yet, on the other hand, the whole of what is said in ch. xviii. evidently points definitely back to this passage in ch. xvi., so that the fundamental idea can only be the same. In order not to repeat ourselves, we shall therefore postpone the more particular explanation till we come to that passage where Christ himself says several things of the ἐκκλησία. Here we perceive, in the first place, that he will set up a church in the future, that at the same time this will correspond to the true house of God upon earth, the temple of the old dispensation (which is evident from the expression build), that he alone himself builds (Psa. cxxvii. 1; cxlvii. 2), and therefore it is called his church (μοῦ placed with emphasis before), consequently once more, that he himself also alone can and will make all stones for the building, and all workmen, (πέτρας and πέτρους) to be what they become (Matt. iv. 19).

Opposed to this building, at this time still lying in the future, for which the promised οἰκοδομήσω, "I will build," from the founding to the finishing is ever being fulfilled (for until the descent of the keystone from heaven, ch. xxi. 44, the building is not finished, Eph. ii. 21, 22; 1 Pet. ii. 5)—opposed to it the prophetic glance of Christ sees, in fierce assault against it and conflict with it, another house or kingdom unhappily already built; against the kingdom of heaven upon earth (which, ver. 19, is in a certain measure a synonym for the Church), nothing less than the entire hell is at work!† That the gates or doors, πύλαι, are intended to denote‡ a power, is already evident from the κατισχύσουσιν, shall prevail, which follows; the expression, however, is used in order to put building against building. Walls and gates mean defence and power (Isa. lx. 18; xxvi. 1); chiefly, however, in oriental usage, as at this day still the high gate, the gate of the royal palace, indicates what we westerns denote by "court"—the

* "By Peter, this representative of the apostles, being called a rock, nothing else is denoted but the essence of Protestantism, the power of an ecclesiastical personality" (Petersen, Von der Kirche ii. 99)—of course a personality actively instrumental in the cause of Christ, filled with the spirit and life of Christ through faith.

* Not before the death of the Baptist—in this many are for finding a special significance, because till then the old economy lasted. Did it not rather last till the death of Christ?

† For αὐτῆς at the end refers of course now to ἐκκλησία, certainly not, as has also been said, to πέτρα.

‡ Least of all a court of judgment, the judgment of the dead in the nether world!

throne of the ruler, power and dignity, from which every thing comes forth, and to which all returns in his kingdom (Esth. ii. 19). Thus are the gates of death, Job xxxviii. 17; Psa. ix. 14 (to which at ver. 15 the gates of the daughter of Zion are opposed), Psa. cvii. 18, not merely entrances, but indicate the power of death, seizing on his prey, and then keeping fast hold of it in his province; thus finally we find, just as here, in Isa. xxxviii. 10, שַׁעֲרֵי שְׁאוֹל, Sept., πύλαι ᾅδου, gates of hell; comp. again Wisd. xvi. 13, the same thing together with θανάτου ἐξουσία, "power of death." When, as usually, the promise of Christ in reference to his firmly built Church is explained of victory and sovereignty over all the power of sin, over the devil with his enmity as manifested in malice and rage, in cunning and falsehood,* according to what is generally understood by the word hell—this is indeed not exact, in so far as the first fundamental idea of the שְׁאוֹל, Sheol, or ᾅδης, Hades, of the Bible is thereby entirely passed over, although this must be primarily meant here. Christ says, first of all: No power of death, and of the kingdom of death, shall prevail against you, any more than against me, whose death becomes a resurrection—an idea in which he already hastens forward to the second part of the discourse, ver. 21. What is said in Acts ii. 24, iii. 15, is repeated ever onwards in the members of the Head.† But then again, indirectly, that common understanding of the words is indeed quite correct and well founded: for what is the power of death other than the power of sin, which casts down into death, and is properly itself death; what else can aim at destroying the life of the Church but the power, consisting in sin and lies, of him who rules in Sheol, and has the power of death over sinners upon earth, of which the death and resurrection of Christ forcibly deprives him? (Heb. ii. 14). The "kingdom of death," and the "kingdom of Satan," are indeed one and the same.‡ Christ means Satan, without doing him the honor of here naming him; of his own and the Church's certain victory over this strong one he speaks in this strain of humble majesty—even when triumphing beforehand in the promise of it, yet as it were coming down to the arena, and looking at the heat and anxious solicitude of the conflict, so that he only says, The gates of hell shall not prevail against it, instead of saying, It shall prevail over them!

Verse 19. We reserve the more particular consideration of what is here said also for the place where Christ, repeating the word church (which when first uttered to the disciples must have been almost quite a dark word), confirms and explains it. Build upon thee—commit to thee the keys of the edifice—thus does Christ proceed on purpose, as if this second thing were said of Peter personally and pre-eminently; but really only with the purpose of trying Simon son of Jonas, whether he can bear any such thing without boasting. Thou art certainly become an able and important man in my kingdom: what sayest and thinkest thou of this? Dost thou bear thyself humbly, art thou all the more on thy guard against flesh and blood, or—? We know, indeed, what was soon to follow! Certainly, the expression "on this rock" signified before almost as much as "upon thee," yet we feel that Christ could not, and would not, so express himself as to say, I will build the Church of God upon a man! The man is Simon Bar-Jona the sinner (Luke v. 8): not upon him, therefore, is it to be built, but upon this Peter such as grace makes him; upon him, because, and in as far as, he certainly corresponds to this name more than the others. Still for this very reason the co-ordinate πέτραι and στῦλοι, stones and pillars (see even the promise in its widest enlargement, Rev. iii. 12), are by no means excluded, and even the primacy of Peter himself rests at bottom only upon this, that he is called to begin the preaching of the word as "primus inter pares." So soon, however, as by further inference an actual rule and authority seems to connect itself with such a primacy (ver. 19), we then learn upon the second mention of the future Church at chap. xviii. 17–20, that the same authority is immediately given not merely to all the apostles in common, but even in the most proper sense to the Church, and indeed to every individual church where two or three are met together in the name of Jesus, just because he, the soul-abiding source of all power and rule in this kingdom, is in the midst of them. Only after these connecting words of transition follows then, in John xx. 23, the more particular explanation and reference of the power of the keys to the apostles and their successors in office, which with Paul, who in like manner exercises that power, although he was not then present, we must explain according to what is said in 1 Cor. v. 4; 2 Cor. ii. 10.

As the first part of Christ's reply, Thou art Peter! proceeds only from the κἀγὼ δέ σοι λέγω, "and I say unto thee," of Christ (which certainly does not merely contain a confession of what we are, as does our confession to him), as it is only he himself who builds the Church on the πέτρος whom he by his calling has made, to be what he is (Rom. iv. 17), so further, all that follows proceeds only from his δώσω σοι, "I will give unto thee." That the kingdom of heaven is now evidently "in a certain measure" synonymous with the Church, has already been observed. We can and must still, it is true, make the distinction (for example with Richter): "The Church has the keys of the kingdom, for it is the institution by which we enter into that kingdom; Christ builds upon Peter, not his kingdom but his Church, which, as regards Christianity, is not the form, but only one form of its manifestation." Still, here at least, in chap. xiii. and xvi. 28, this distinction is preliminarily but not yet more specially brought out; here the keys belong simply to the building spoken of before.* That which Christ will build upon earth is God's house or temple, but it is a living house composed of living stones, therefore in the first place an assembly of the faithful, built upon him in faith and confession; this ἐκκλησία, however, with all the power and fulness of that which is committed to it, is forthwith a βασιλεία, and that precisely the true kingdom of heaven upon earth, hitherto announced and signified in every thing, a kingdom which stands as strongly and victoriously above the opposing power of hell from beneath, as, in the type, the fruitful and habitable terrestrial globe (תֵּבֵל) stands above the waters of the abyss and of the first fall (Psa. xciii., xxiv. 2). But, because the kingdom of heaven was represented just before as a house to be built, Christ at the same time continues the figure when he speaks of the keys which correspond to the gates, the going out and coming in. Also in Job xii. 14, the building and shutting stand together; in Isa. xxii. 21, 22, the key of the house of David signifies the official authority of the householder or administrator, as a burgomaster or commander (of course only as under the king) keeps the keys of the city or fortress; which, finally, in Rev. iii. 7, is again represented as the prerogative of the one king and lord, in his house and kingdom, who certainly cannot commit his own supreme power and dignity by transference to substitutes in his name. Here let so much only be observed in general beforehand, that the power of the key is the right and power to determine who shall enter into the kingdom of heaven, and who belongs to it, who shall abide in it or not (comp. chap. xxiii. 13, where we read of shutting with a falsely assumed right, and Luke xi. 52, of the key of knowledge); at the same time further in general, what is to be held valid in it, the power, namely, of distributing or withholding its goods and graces. When immediately after the keys, Christ goes on to speak of binding and loosing, this is not properly speaking a transition to another figure, but is just equivalent to "shutting and opening;" for the locks of the ancients had bands which were fastened or unfastened by the simple key-bar (see Odyss. δ. 802, Σ. 447, φ. 45, 240)—although, by means of this transition, Christ at the same time refers to the Rabbinical usage which had arisen from the Old Testament, according to which binding and loosing are equivalent to forbidding and allowing, and already also in the special signification of retaining or remitting sin.* The general meaning recurs again at chap. xviii. 18, without any allusion to the keys. "Key of knowledge" is certainly comprehended in the keys here spoken of, as the first and the starting-point, but we are by no means warranted in saying (with Wieseler) that it is only the keys of knowledge that are here meant, seeing that they involve at the same time an authority to act. Christ says here, indeed, as afterwards, chap. xviii. ὃ ἐάν, ὅσα ἐάν in the neuter: What ye shall bind and loose, not properly whom. This authority then is exercised, in the first place, by the preaching of reconciliation or condemnation in general, by the true doctrines regarding the conditions valid before God upon which grace is to be received;† but the application, flowing from this, to the authority over persons, which is so strongly expressed in John xx. 23, must not be excluded. Chap. xviii., in which the saying is repeated, will first make clear to us the full, profound import and emphasis of the assurance, that whatsoever is thus bound and loosed on earth in the name of Christ is, as such, to be ratified also in heaven. Bengel's Harmony of the Gospels contains only the following profound observation on these verses: "Great power of faith in the Son of God. Hell, earth, and heaven are in divers ways conscious of it."

* Already Jerome: Ego portas inferi reor esse vitia et peccata, vel certe haereticorum doctrinas.

† The ἐκκλησία has, according to Ignatius ἀφθαρσία from Christ. It is immortal—"perpetuo mansura," as the Augustana says.

‡ Which, in opposition to Neander (p. 470), is said in order to ward off the one-sidedness of a narrow sense.

Verses 20, 21. These verses are connected by the repeated τότε, then. All that had been announced regarding the future kingdom extends to a period, previous to which the Son of God must first suffer and die. This is the wondrous decree of the Father, the revelation of which the apostles' flesh and blood still kept them from understanding, although it is openly declared to them by him whom they perceive and confess to be the Christ, the Son of the living God. In order that the fulfillment of this purpose may not be hindered—to speak after the manner of men—rather in order not to aggravate the guilt of those who crucify Christ, the great word which had just found expression in the circle of the apostles, "Jesus is the Christ," is not yet to be made the subject matter of public preaching, as it was afterwards to be from the day of Pentecost onwards. It is not to be declared even where the faith that apprehends it may not hitherto have opposed it, and least of all is it to be insisted on before the time, where it would cause opposition and offence, ere the second great word, which must always stand connected with it—viz., "Christ has suffered for us," has become a fact for announcement.

* Which, moreover, touches the well-authorized yet subtle determination of the distinction between "kingdom of God" and church according to ordinary usage—thus have I since expressed myself on this point in the Epistle to the Ephesians (ii. 252).

* In the Old Testament the way is prepared for this when אֱסֹר אֶסֹר (Num. xxx. 3) is a vow or obligation whereby one binds his soul to anything; the corresponding Chald. of Dan. vi. 8 means a prohibition, and in Psa. cv. 21 22, אסר evidently passes over into the signification: Forbid and command, instruct (Vulg. ut erudiret). Compare the Arabic חבת and חרם. Afterwards in the Talmud אסר signifies retare, אָסוּר or אִיסּוּר illicitum in antithesis to הֶיתֵּר concessum; in like manner שָׁרָא solvere then also absolvere, remittere, condonare.

† According to Maimonides it was spoken thus on the appointment of a teacher: We give thee the power to bind and to loose. It was, indeed a symbol of the Rabbinate actually to deliver a key to the person who received the office.

Scarcely are the disciples happy in the joy of their confession, and in the great anticipation of the kingdom of heaven upon earth, which Christ had awakened within them by his little understood words, when he again immediately damps their feelings by the still less understood, terribly sounding, word concerning his sufferings and death! He had already given them (and not them merely) many a hint about this, the most pointed of which we find in ch. x. 38; but from this time forward, he began to speak of it with literal plainness (which Matthew denotes by δεικνύειν, Mark not merely by διδάσκειν but by the additional words καὶ παῤῥησίᾳ τὸν λόγον ἐλάλει—only Luke gives no prominence to this). The significant word δεῖ, must (as afterwards, Luke xxiv. 26, the retrospective ἔδει, and Matt. xxvi. 54 the δεῖ again when it was being fulfilled), points beforehand to the divine purpose intimated in the Scriptures (comp. Matt. xxvi. 24, with Luke xxii. 22), and is thus certainly not merely equivalent to μέλλει, shall, into which Grotius, for example, would flatten the expression. The last journey to Jerusalem, which indeed is as yet in the distance (ch. xx. 18; Luke ix. 51; xvii. 11), stood before him, and all that was there to be fulfilled in him, the first expression of which is here in the words πολλὰ παθεῖν, "suffer many things"—in which general expression are comprehended the later special intimations of his being mocked, spit upon, scourged, crucified.* Mark and Luke add, by way of strengthening the expression: And be rejected, in which we are all the more to recognize an allusion to Psa. cxviii. 22, as Christ afterwards expressly says this to his enemies (ch. xxi. 42), and here indeed has just been speaking of building, of stones for building, and foundation stones. The same sad ἀποδοκιμασθῆναι or rejection lies implicitly also in Matthew in the mere ἀπό, "of," as Luke xxiv. 20, in like manner declares. Those who, as builders in Israel, should acknowledge and receive him—from these must he suffer many things, even to the being killed; elders, high priests, and Scribes—viz., the most distinguished, most holy, and most learned; the government (or Consistorium, in so far as the Roman government, which the name Cesarea Philippi a little before significantly called to mind, permitted this still to exist), clergy, and faculty in Israel. To be condemned to death as an outcast by these, and actually to suffer this with patience—what an announcement respecting the Messiah for the ears of the disciples! They do not comprehend it, they are quite dumbfounded (verblüfft) (sit venia verbo), and therefore entirely fail to hear, as we know, what is said afterwards quite as literally as to his rising again on the third day, in which the earlier hints (ch. xii. 40; John ii. 19) now find their clear and direct expression (comp. so on Mark ix. 10).

Verse 23. Simon Peter, however, who had just been placed so high, ventures alone with bold haste, following the impulse of the first and immediate impression, to protest against what Christ has said. We may imagine the different effect which these words of Christ might produce on the other apostles, according to the individual peculiarity of each—the still, astonished, feeling of a John, or a Nathanael, the prostrate sadness of a Thomas: "Is this then the end to which he is to come?"—quite forgetting for the moment perhaps the preceding words about the Church; on the other hand, the crafty listening of a Judas Iscariot; then again the naive questioning of an Andrew or Philip: "What is this that he says? We understand him not?" None of them, however, ventures at once to give expression to his secret thoughts; Peter alone is bold enough to speak without much deliberation, and he comes out indeed with the most foolish reply. To suffer many things and be killed—this has plainly struck upon his still attentively listening ear, and his flesh and blood has immediately a No to give to it! As if he had already the promised keys in his hand, he delivers his protest against allowing upon earth what he considers to be unjust, nay more, as the Master takes the pupil to task, so he takes the Master himself, and would rather at once stop up Christ's way to the building of the Church, because he does not understand him. Προσλαβόμενος, took him, i. e., he takes hold of him by the arm or garment, draws him aside, and, full of zeal and earnestness, gives him the good confidential counsel, to think better of what he says, and to change his mind! It must have been so bad that Matthew can use the very striking expression ἐπιτιμᾶν, to rebuke (which, as directed against Christ, occurs only here), together with an ἤρξατο, began, which, in the exalted irony of the simple narrative, corresponds to that ἤρξατο of Christ (ver. 21). Luther's German translation, "Lord, spare thyself,"* does not indeed directly correspond to the first sense and sound of the proverbial expression ἵλεώς σοι, which escapes from Peter, and at which is rather to be supplied εἴη ὁ θεός (God have mercy on thee!). It is parallel to the Heb. חָלִילָה לָךְ, for which the Sept. has, in one place, ἵλεως, in another μὴ γένοιτο, but which is still more properly rendered by the German Gott bewahre! Gott behüte! (God forbid!). But as this, in the form of a proverb, loses its proper meaning, and merely signifies No, No! with the additional meaning according to circumstances of: Keep or preserve thyself from this—so there certainly lies something of Luther's expression in the exclamation. For, that Christ himself, instead of this μὴ γένοιτο, should do what he tells him—this is the good advice which Peter takes him aside to give him. The κύριε, Lord, as a strong re-echo of ver. 6, follows rightly after the first exclamation, and is intended to confirm it. Such a thing must not happen to thee, the Christ, and Son of God! And the good Peter is so confident of his cause, that he, moreover, by way of strengthening and deciding, adds with an almost comical presumption, if it were not tragical on the other side: οὐ μὴ ἔσται σοι τοῦτο—which certainly cannot again (according to Winer) signify merely absit, ne accedat, but speaks decisively, as if the matter is at the will of Peter—for which therefore the rendering in Luther must be more accurate: That shall not happen to thee, I will not have it so, I know better!*

* Although, as against Nitzch (in Fichte's Zeitschrift, 1840, p. 52), we would like to be held so considerate as not to deny that the Evangelists, without prejudice to the higher truth, might confound words of fulfillment with words of prediction, yet by a like considerateness we see not the slightest ground for the certain supposition that such was actually done. For even Nitzch will certainly not concede to the critics a not being able on the part of Christ.

* Or even as the Berlenburgher Bible: Have compassion on thyself! Erasmus makes an ill improvement on the Vulg.: Propitius tibi sis.

And the answer of Christ? It strikes, indeed, sharply at Peter before the others as he deserved, but it is still at the same time addressed to the others, as the continuation ver. 24 shows. Peter had taken him apart, Christ answers him in like manner as the words run, but at the same time he turns again to the rest, that they too might hear it, because something of that which in Simon had come out with such prompt candor was in them all. This application and meaning of the words Matthew denotes in his significant brevity by the single word στραφείς, turned, Mark not merely strengthens it into ἐπιστραφείς, but describes it more exactly in the words, and he looked upon his disciples—finally, he also puts a well-warranted, more than compensatory, ἐπιτιμᾶν, rebuke, in the mouth of Christ, in opposition to that of the disciple. Peter's zeal of the flesh is met by a like, or rather an overpowering, zeal of the Spirit, and he who shortly before had been pronounced blessed, endowed with high honors, is now, as the words at first seem to run, almost honored with the title of Satan. Does this mean, perhaps (as many are for understanding it), a Satan, adversary, seducer? Wilt thou become a Satan to me? (as 2 Sam. xix. 22). It seems at first sight as if this were its meaning, and then the foregoing words would signify, Get thee behind me! Thou oughtest to follow me, instead of putting thyself in my way, and going before with thy advice.* But then the second sentence: Thou art a σκάνδαλον,† "an offence," to me, would be so like the first as to be almost a tautology, which is not suitable to the profound meaning of the words proceeding from deepest emotion. Further, the Get thee behind me, Satan, as a repetition of the word in the temptation (chap. iv. 10), is too strong to be thus explained. But then this would be too strong and harsh for poor Peter personally, who, according to the explanation immediately afterwards given by Christ himself and kindly intended to have a softening effect, meant to speak only humanly, and did not, therefore, knowingly and designedly speak Satanically. How then are we to explain it? I think (with many others) that Christ actually marks in this temptation Satan lurking behind the flesh and blood of Peter (Eph. vi. 12). The first word is at bottom to be applied to the wicked enemy himself, the second to the instrument of his assault, as appears from the reference of the σκάνδαλον (stumbling block), to πέτρα (stone), which is not merely accidental.‡ The future groundstone now as yet throws himself at the feet of the Master-builder as a stone of stumbling—so little does his fitness consist in any thing else than in what this Master-builder will yet make out of him.

It was, in fact, a severe, and deep-searching temptation for Jesus, this word of his dear Peter, springing from a zeal, which at heart, was so well meant; this we perceive likewise from the earnestness and warmth of his reply. He cannot answer here with his usual exalted equanimity, for he is very sensitive on the point of this Δεῖ με πολλὰ παθεῖν, I must suffer many things, when any one attacks him upon it—this is the tender, sore point of his own most peculiar and innermost conflict, his own shrinking fear of the baptism of death. The apostle's flesh and blood expresses what the flesh also of the Son of Man, resisting in human weakness, had long previous to Gethsemane begun to say in him: hence, this holy zeal of obedience to the Father, of love to sinners, determined denial of self, hence this sharpness towards the apostles, such as we find him showing towards his disciples in con-

* There certainly lies something in this of what Von Ammon so strongly expresses (L. J. ii. 298): Peter puts Christ under care as an enthusiast, who occupies himself with melancholy thoughts.

* In this sense what Roos says is true and excellent: "He did not therefore bid him entirely away, but behind himself into the place which became a disciple." In no case is it an entire "expulsion from the circle of the disciples," as Von Ammon wilfully presumes, that is here spoken of.

† We would not press the word quite so sharply as Alford, who is for supplying the definite article: Thou art my stone of offence, my πέτρα σκανδάλου! (1 Pet. ii. 7, 8). This Judas was to Christ in the circle of the apostles, and in a much deeper sense.

‡ The first puts in opposition to the ἵλεως (εἴη ὁ θεός) an exclamation repelling Satan, the second corresponds to the good intention of Peter personally: That must not happen to thee.

nection with nothing else. Hence his so suddenly detecting and repelling the Satanic cunning which aimed at making him waver! But scarcely has he said this in the first sentence, as he must and could not otherwise say it, and in the second, has come down again to the person of Peter, when his tender, sorrowful love, vindicating itself, so to speak, in order that the poor disciple may not be too much cast down, adds the third exculpatory and explanatory sentence. Thou knowest not, indeed, that and how Satan has now spoken to me through thee. Thou art for leading me away from God's decree, thou art doing so, however, not from intentional opposition to it, but from human ignorance, which must serve the enemy. Thou meanest, thinkest, understandest not, now (only now) τὰ τοῦ θεοῦ, the things of God—thou thinkest and speakest in the manner of all ἄνθρωποι or mere men. Thou certainly meanest well, of that I am sure, and thy ἵλεώς σοι, be it far from thee, proceeds from a heartfelt love, as the κύριε, Lord, from the half faith, which now knows of Christ, but not yet of his cross. Thus does Christ sorrowfully excuse him, although on the other hand it is an earnest warning addressed to him, and shows us here by the most lively example how "the human is so often the profane," how little men in their human feeling can grasp the counsel of God with respect to redemption and his kingdom,* how dangerously the love that springs from the flesh comes in the way of the holy love of the Father and Son. This temptation of Christ by Peter repeats itself in a thousand forms in his followers, and is still more hazardous than the direct temptation in the wilderness, being here also placed after that temptation as a higher degree of it. Those whose intentions towards us are the best, are then most dangerous to us when their intentions are merely human. Then it is necessary to know, and to keep fast hold of, the things that be of God against flesh and blood from without, by which Satan would entice our flesh and—in us sinners otherwise than with the Holy One—more than our flesh into unfaithfulness; then it is necessary to hold fast that which the faithful Forerunner immediately after holds forth to all his followers (vers. 24, 25), as the weapon they are to use when placed in the same circumstances.

Finally, there appears in this conflict of the pseudo-Peter with Christ, at least remotely as in a prophetic figure, the presumptive successor of this apostle, in his well-meant human blindness to the mystery of the cross in the kingdom of the cross (thus mildly to interpret the Papacy and the better Papists), on account of which, while he imagines himself to be the representative of the householder, supplying his place, he is really for driving him out of the house. But this is and remains the pseudo-Peter, even with the true confession of the dogma respecting the Son of God, and against his continuing σκάνδαλον in the way of Christ with his Church, the words Get thee away Satan, proving his power, have long since been spoken once for all.

Verses 24, 25. These verses have already received their explanation at Matt. x. 38, 39, of which Christ here reminds his disciples with a tacit "Have you then quite forgotten these my words? Must I repeat them to you again?" In ver. 26 there follows then, in addition, the clearest, most decisive, explanation of ψυχὴν σῶσαι, saving one's life. The repetition also gives prominence to the fact, that with all his invitations, Christ must still leave the matter over to the will of each individual, just because it stands thus: εἴ τις θέλει, if any man will. According to Mark he now calls also "with the disciples" the people who were standing near, and speaks openly to them also of his cross, as before to the disciples, only indicating, however, and pre-supposing his own cross in that of his followers. This is a further continuation intended for all who will yet become his disciples, as that which was before said to Peter was spoken with an eye to all who are now his disciples; for in the bearing of the cross, there avails no distinction, no rank or preference, from Peter down to the last and the least who will enter into the kingdom of heaven. Luke also observes at least that He said to them all—so that, in this instance, the τοῖς μαθηταῖς αὐτοῦ, to his disciples, of Matthew receives its correction or rather its explanation from the other Evangelists—to all present and future (whosoever will be my disciple, as ye are). Deny himself—of this we have already spoken at chap x.; here let the remark be made, which would there have reached beyond the first development of the sense, namely that in the strictness of this requirement there yet lies, at the same time, a comforting mildness. It is pre-supposed, and, in the meanwhile, acknowledged that the old self is as yet present in the disciples of Jesus, for otherwise there would be no necessity for their denying it. And what else is this denying than first of all the λογίζεσθαι, or "reckoning" of faith (Rom. vi. 11), which is not merely allowed but even required of us by the kindly assisting grace? "As Peter said when he denied Christ: I know not the man! So say thou of thyself and act accordingly" (Bengel). Not: Let him kill himself, crucify himself—God will take care that this come about by means of the never-failing cross, which offers itself for acceptance. Again, that this means nothing merely coming from without, nothing extraordinary alone, we have already seen from the καθ' ἡμέραν, daily, of Luke. If thou hast not now precisely contempt, rejection, enmity, from without for the sake of Christ, still thou hast some suffering of body, some burden arising from the transient nature of the world; or if thou hast not this, thou shalt yet all the more assuredly feel the tribulation and temptation of sin in the evil world, thou shalt and must at all events even now feel something of the inward conflict with thy sin, that which is peculiar to thyself, for the denial and destruction of which all that every moment of life brings, has been given to thee and laid upon thee by God. Without this inward cross all outward suffering in the flesh is profitless and unavailing, for an Indian fakir undergoes the extremest sufferings of this kind which tend rather to the strengthening of his pride, so that they are no real עִנּוֹת נֶפֶשׁ, (affliction of soul). All bearing of burdens on one's self, without self-denial, is not the cross of which Christ speaks to his followers; all sacrifices and surrenders are vain, if they be not done as he says for my sake—Mark, for my sake and the Gospel's—i.e., in order that we may become partakers of the Gospel, of the kingdom of heaven, which is offered in it (1 Cor. ix. 23). God prepares the cross for thee; cast it not away, but consider it as thine, according to the will of obedience, as if thou thyself hadst chosen it. Deny thyself, say to the opposing will of the flesh: Not as I will—this is the first and fundamental thing. Thus is the cross taken up, and now comes the second word in which the necessary strength and perseverance are held forth: Follow me.

* I cannot forbear adding here a beautiful passage from the profound book (which I would kindly recommend to believing thinkers), Chr. Kapplinger, Beschreibungen über das Wesen der Gottheit (Heilbroun, 2d ed. 1846): "It is a spiritual law for the proper revelation of divine qualities and powers, to lay the foundation for the development of these in their perfection under the forms of outward meanness and lowliness. By this process of revealing and unfolding great divine qualities and powers, so opposed to the earthly reason, they, as it were, repel from themselves those qualities and powers that are only earthly and human, so as to reveal themselves according to their original and peculiar divine character, etc. Hence, Jesus Christ repelled even his disciples from himself, in order that no foreign and human power might come in to disturb and limit his essentially divine qualities and powers, when revealing them in their perfection. Therefore he had already before said to Peter: Get thee behind me, thou thinkest only what is human but not what is divine." This is indeed profound exegesis proceeding from a genuine Theosophy of the Cross, and that by a dreamer of Weinsberg. How does it contrast with the shallow treatment of Scripture even by a Schleiermacher, who has nothing more to say than—Christ called the apostle a Satan, one who has not at heart the divine word!

The train of thought in the remaining part of Christ's words, from v. 24 onwards, is therefore so to be understood as that he first lays down the great motive for his followers, and then gives the grounds of this inevitable requirement. The nature of the case demands, first of all, as a present necessity, that only the death of the old sinful, selfish, life shall introduce to the new holy and glorious life of Christ (ver. 25). Without this, however, if the man continue in his own life, if he continue as he is, the whole world will help him nothing, and he cannot thereby redeem himself or save himself from destruction and judgment (ver. 26). This therefore is required secondly (which was already implied in the first), in the future trial at the coming of the Son of Man to judgment, which is inevitably certain (ver. 27), the certainty is pledged for by a previous, more proximate coming and revelation of his kingdom (ver. 28).

Verse 26. Here again is one of those sayings of which we are wont to observe, that there is much to be said concerning them in the way of preaching, but little in the way of interpretation! He who will understand it understands it, and, in thus receiving it, the understanding of it becomes more clear and perfect. Christ evidently refers to Psa. xlix., and not merely in the second half of the saying almost literally to vers. 8, 9; but, in the saying as a whole, he refers to the main import of this entire psalm, in which is declared the nothingness and insufficiency of all earthly good and earthly possessions for the final destiny of the soul at death (see vers. 7, 17–20). Christ alters, however, and strengthens the words of the psalm—which only declares that no one can redeem the soul of his brother—to: How and whereby may a man redeem himself? Ζημία is hurt, loss, damage, in any thing (Acts xxvii. 10, 21; Phil. iii. 7, 8): consequently τὴν ψυχὴν ζημιοῦσθαι is to lose the soul, or himself, as Luke has it, thus evidently explaining it.* If, in a general fire raging around thee, thou wert to save and preserve thy great and well-filled palace, and yet be destroyed thyself by the fire—what wouldst thou have gained in comparison with him who, while his goods were burned, has yet escaped with his life? Therefore also conversely: What shall it damage a man though he should give up the whole world (which will at one time pass away and be consumed), if only his soul be saved? The true eternal salvation of one human soul is of infinitely more value than the whole world. Thus must we set profit and loss against each other, and he who has not so reckoned will, in the end, find to his eternal loss how terribly he has miscalculated! Then will the bankrupt be forced to cry out, What shall a man give? to which the psalm already furnishes the answer: It must cease for ever! And though he alone were to possess the world, it would be no ἀντάλλαγμα, no equivalent for his soul, as the Zürich translation renders it, nothing that in the exchange could compensate for the lost soul, (Vulg. commutatio). But the word expresses still more than this, for it corresponds to the "ransom," or "redemption" of the soul (οὐ δώσει ἐξίλασμα, τὴν τιμὴν τῆς λατρώσεως τῆς ψυχῆς αὐτου, Psa. xlix. 8, 9—Heb. כֹּפֶר and פִּדְיוֹן). That must be οὐ φθαρτά, not corruptible things (1 Peter i. 18). Christ at the same time hereby testifies, that God alone has found out the ἀντάλλαγμα, and λύτρον, equivalent and ransom (Matt. xx. 28): he who despises this, who makes its power and sufficiency of none effect for himself—what shall he be able to give of that which belongs to another?

*Ἑαυτὸν δὲ ἀπολέσας ἢ ζημιωθεὶς—"the being lost is here denoted first as a doing, then as a suffering" (Lange).

Verse 27. The same reason is further given as formerly in chap. x., according to our interpretation of that passage: There lies before us in the judgment a trial, in order to be prepared for which, we must now let our soul be redeemed, saved, sanctified, and kept by Christ's cross. Then it will be no loss to have borne the cross, but an eternal gain, while, on the other hand, it will be no gain to have possessed the whole world, but an eternal loss! According to Matthew, Christ has said here by anticipation what he afterwards said (chap. xxiv. 30, xxv. 31). The same Son of Man, concerning whose present appearance in lowliness the discourse began at ver. 13, will appear personally a second time; as the first time he appeared entirely as Son of Man in our weakness, so, although still the Son of Man, he will yet then manifestly appear as the Son of the living God; in the glory of his Father, which is at the same time his own glory (chap. xxv. 31; Luke ix. 26), with his angels serving him as Lord (chap. xiii. 41). Mark and Luke have, instead of this, another saying which Matthew, with still further alteration, repeats, and we may well suppose that, on this occasion, Christ used both sayings. It is the only occasion on which we find this expression in the mouth of Christ: Whosoever is ashamed of me—which is still sharper and more reprehensory than the denying, spoken of in Matt. x. It cannot, however, signify: Whosoever is ashamed of the Son of Man, for this name always denotes the visible presence of Christ, whether in its more lowly or more exalted manifestation—but, quite properly, of me and my words, the confession and following of my doctrine and truth, in which I myself am now here for the sake of the world, previous to my coming again to judgment. In Mark what is said before (ver. 35), precisely corresponds to it: For my sake and the Gospel's (Rom. i. 16). Mark alone adds besides, in order to bring into full light the criminality and perversity of being thus ashamed: In this adulterous and sinful generation! (Matt. xii. 39).

Verse 28. In the μέλλει, shall (ver. 27), Christ has represented his second coming to judgment (which must point to something else than the rising again, ver. 21), as a thing, indeed, perfectly sure (Luther: Will certainly happen), but still as belonging to a more remote future, to a last end which is left quite undefined. But in order that this may not prove too faint and too wide a prospect for the disciples and for us, in order that even from these words we know already, at least in general, how it shall stand with the building of the Church—of course after the resurrection of Christ when the rejected stone has become the corner-stone—how it shall be in regard to the therein valid representation of the Master of the house by means of regularly appointed holders of the keys, nay how, in regard to the conflict, also announced to the Church, of the powers of hell against it—to show this, Christ adds a word which could scarcely have been wanting (as, it is hoped, will be evident) for the complete rounding off of the entire announcement which he here makes. With a here concluding Ἀμήν, verily (Luke ἀληθῶς) he again announces a coming of the Son of Man, a more mediate, more proximate coming, which is to be the pledge of his coming to judgment. That this latter coming is not what is here spoken of, is incontrovertibly evident from its being said that those who have seen this other and nearer coming are yet afterwards to die, which can have no application to the last day.* It is evidently, in the most general conception of it, the same coming of the Son of Man that is here meant as was spoken of chap. x. 23; for Christ points back here, throughout, to what was said there, at the sending out of the apostles. Christ comes in his kingdom (comp. Luke xxiii. 42), with his kingdom, when he sets it up, reveals his power in it and by it; and precisely hereby is the coming at first in his kingdom to be distinguished from the visibly personal coming. Mark and Luke, therefore, as regards the sense, quite correctly change the saying (which Matt. retains in its original form as connected with chap. x.), so as to explain it in opposition to any misunderstanding of it. Luke, indeed, says only, Until they see the kingdom of God—where the strongest emphasis rests on the seeing with the eyes what has actually been brought to pass. Mark more distinctly has, in addition to this, the words ἐληλυθυῖαν ἐν δυνάμει, come with power, in which the original ἔρχεσθαι or "coming," spoken of Christ himself, is applied to his kingdom, but quite correctly so, in as far as the δυναμις or "power" of the coming King, the efficacious power of his invisible presence, displays itself in the establishment and maintenance of the kingdom (see in Rom. i. 4, and 2 Cor. xiii. 3, 4, the interpretation of this ἐν δυνάμει). His kingdom is his Church, as also in Matt. xiii. 41. He assures his apostles, then, that the setting up of his Church, announced ver. 18, sha'l be accomplished even in this generation, and he expresses this by the striking words which all the three Evangelists have preserved: that some of those standing here (among whom are by all means to be understood those also of the people who were standing around, although at the most only secondarily) would not taste or experience death (which can only be meant here as at John viii. 52) until his kingdom, and therein his power and presence, be as clearly displayed to their view as if they saw Christ himself already come. Consequently he can least of all mean by this, the transfiguration which immediately follows ver. 17,* nay, not even merely the building and continuance of his Church, in general, beginning with the day of Pentecost; for how then would he, thus selecting, speak of some? And, although we may not strain this expression, so as to make it mean that only two or three of the apostles should survive, what he announces there still remains a τινές μέν, some, to which corresponds a τινές δέ, others, who shall taste of death before they see. We therefore rightly understand this, as at chap. x. 23, of the great catastrophe of the destruction of Jerusalem, the setting up of the New Testament Church, which was then first fully ratified and manifestly loosed from Jewish entanglements, of that ἐκκλησία which, in Rom. ix. 24, is already described with believing anticipation. Then also did Christ come in his power to judgment, foreshadowing the judgment of the world, so that all who believed in his power to save, and who have since become his people (Rom. ix. 25, 26), have before their eyes in that event a pledge, equally consoling as it is warning, of that which is testified of as in the remote future in the words μέλλει ἔρχεσθαι, ἀποδώσει ἑκάστῳ κατὰ τὴν πρᾶξιν αὐτοῦ, "he shall come—and reward every man according to his works" (comp. Deut. xxxii. 36 with Heb. x. 30). John xxi. 22 also belongs to this as an appropriate parallel passage; how many even of the apostles may, with Peter (and Paul) have tasted of death previous to this event, we know not.

* The confusion in Hofmann (Weissagung und Erfüllung, ii. 272)—according to which Christ is represented as having actually expected the last judgment before a generation should pass away—takes its rise from this, that men, despising the genuine tradition of the fundamental conceptions of the Bible, are ever for building their exegesis upon their own self-wisdom.

THE TRANSFIGURATION—THE FUTURE ELIAS.

(Matt. xvii. 7, 9, 11, 12; Mark ix. 9, 12, 13.)

Luke ix. 28 points, in the expression, μετὰ τοὺς λόγους τούτους, "after these sayings," at the inner connection between the transfiguration and the first announcement of suffering on the part of Christ, even more strongly than the two other Evangelists, who mention the number of days that intervened. It will be difficult, in this instance, to adhere to our plan of interpreting the sayings of Christ, and not the narratives, and it may here also be said with special truth, that only the perfect understanding of the whole occurrence can open our ears for perceiving the innermost, peculiar force of the word of Jesus: Arise and be not afraid!

On the day at least, on which he takes† with him up to the high mountain the three disciples, who had already been the selected witnesses of the first miracle of raising from the dead, the sons of thunder, and the man of rock, Christ knew that something was now to happen to him, and in general what that was. That question, six days before, which denoted that the turning-point in his course was now reached, from which the Son of God approximated ever nearer to his sufferings, was already a presentiment of this testimony that was now to be given by the Father, and which was to seal the confession of the disciples. The innermost reference to Christ himself of this voice sounding at the middle-point between Matt. iii. 17 and John xii. 28, with all that accompanies it, the parallelism between this consecration to his suffering, and the first inauguration at his baptism, is now more distinctly acknowledged by the more recent orthodox theologians than it ever was by the ancients; it is no longer deemed enough to find in it merely a testimony for the disciples who beheld his glory (2 Pet. i. 16, as also Luke ix. 32), but it is now explained of the new anointing for the knowing and doing of his work, which was here given from above, especially to the Son himself.* He who for us is to enter by a voluntary death into glorification, in order that he may fulfill all righteousness, must first learn and actually experience in regard to himself otherwise than by the knowledge arising from faith, that the δόξα, glory, of light and life is already present in his humanity, that it can break forth in him, and radiate from him, even without his passing through death—in order that thus anticipating the Father's good pleasure, he may be prepared to deny this self, and to empty himself of this glory even to the cross. He who thus fulfills the law and the prophets, must now already beyond the limits of death hold a secret council with the personal representatives of the law and of prophecy, who have beforehand some participation in the fruit of

* A curious idea of many commentators, beneath which there lies only thus much of truth, namely, that this transfiguration was again a very natural figurative pledge of all future glorification.

† Already in the unusual expression ἀναφέρει there is something that indicates how he took them up with himself, brought them before God (compare Luke xxiv. 51).

* We may refer chiefly to the profound expressions in Beck, Christliche Lehrwissenschaft, i. 512, and following. With wilful ignorance, Schleiermacher says: "In vain do we take pains definitely to represent to ourselves an aim for this mysterious occurrence."

